"She was seated in a window, through which the crimson light of the evening sky shed a dying glow upon her pale cheek, and was gazing on the setting sun and the falling leaf, as if reading her own doom in the book of nature.

"As soon as I regained the power of utterance, I addressed her, I scarce know how, for I was bewildered with sorrow. But she answered me coldly and as a stranger. I then mentioned my name, and asked her if she had forgotten me? She raised her beautiful eyes, and—looking at me with a vague and abstracted gaze—replied, that she thought my name was not new to her, but the recollection of it was like that of a dream: 'Indeed,' continued she, 'I have been very unwell, and my memory begins to fail: but I will call my mother, and she will recollect you at once, for she is not one of those who forget their old friends.'

"I was struck with remorse as I gazed upon the ruin which my folly and wickedness had wrought; while the kindness with which her unsuspecting mother received and welcomed me back, was like coals of fire heaped upon my head.

"My tale now draws towards a close. A bright hectic spot began to glow upon the cheek of Emma; and a fearful thing it is to see that fatal sign,—that blossom of the grave lurking amid the smiles of hope, with which consumption flatters and deludes its victim. It is as if, while gazing on the face of beauty, we could discover through the bright eye and blooming cheek the ghastly frame-work which they veil, and could see the naked skeleton grinning behind its mask, in mockery of the 'fools who adore.'

"At length Emma died. She waned to a shadow, and vanished like a noiseless dream. Had she lived to recognize and forgive me, it had been some consolation; but she never once had a lucid interval, nor even for a moment awoke to a sense of her sorrow. I saw her laid in the grave, in the same churchyard, and beneath the blighted tree where the old woman had foretold her death on the day I first beheld her.

"Her father and mother were inconsolable,—the former has become dead to the world, and regardless of his affairs, which are rapidly falling into confusion, and it does not seem likely that he will long survive her loss; and my sister has now left that part of the country, which no longer holds any thing dear to me but the grave of Emma.

"I shall pay a pilgrimage to it once more, and then seek such alleviation of my sufferings as time and distance can administer in some foreign land."

Such was the conclusion of Morris's story. I mused upon it in silence, but answered not, for I had no consolation to bestow.

PRIZE POEM.

The following is the poem which obtained the prize of $50, offered by W. W. Clapp, Esq. editor of the Boston Evening Gazette. It is from the pen of that accomplished writer, Miss HANNAH F. GOULD, of Newburyport, Mass.

THE DEATH OF THE SAGAMORE.

A SCENE OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

THE Servant of GOD is on his way
From Boston's beautiful shore;
His boat skims light o'er the silvery bay,
While the sleeping waters awake and play,
At the touch of the playful oar.

The purpose that fills his soul is great
As the soul of a man can know;
Vast as eternity, strong as the gate
The spirit must pass, to a changeless state,
And enter, to bliss or wo!

His boat is fast; and over the sod
Of a neighboring wood he hies.
Through moor and thicket his path is trod,
As he hastens to speak of the living GOD
In the ear of a man who dies!

Where Rumney's* forest is high and dark,
The Eagle lowers her wing,
O'er him, who once had made her his mark;
For the SAGAMORE, in his hut of bark,
Is a perishing, powerless King.

At the door of his wigwam hang the bow,
The antler, and beaver-skin;
While he, who bore them, is faint and low,
Where death has given the fatal blow,
And the Monarch expires within.

The eye that glanced, and the Eagle fled
Away, through her fields of air—
The hand that drew, and the deer was dead—
The hunter's foot, and the chieftain's head,
And the conqueror's arm, are there!

But each its powerful work has done!
Its triumph at length is past;
The final conflict is now begun,
And, weeping, the mother hangs over her son,
While the SAGAMORE breathes his last!

The Queen of the Massachussetts grieves,
That the life of her child must end!
And that is a noble breast, that heaves,
With the mortal pang, on the bed of leaves,
Of the white man's Indian Friend!

The stately form, which is prostrate there,
On the feet that are cold as snow,
Has often sped, in the midnight air,
A word to the Christian's ear to bear,
Of the plot of his heathen foe!

And oft, when roaming the wild alone,
That generous heart would melt,
At the touch of a ray of light, that shone,
From the white man's GOD, till, before his throne,
Almost has the Indian knelt.

Yet the fatal fear, the fear of man,
That bringeth to man a snare,
Has braced his knee, as it just began
To bend; and the dread of a heathen clan,
Has stifled a Christian prayer.

But now, like a flood, to his trembling heart,
Has the fear of a GOD rushed in;
And keener far, than the icy dart,
That rends the flesh and spirit apart,
Is the thought of his heathen sin.

To the lonely spot where the Chief reclines,
While the herald of love draws nigh,
The Indian shrinks, as he marks the signs
Of a soul at peace, and the light that shines,
Alone from a Christian's eye.

"Alas!" he cries, in the strange, deep tone
Of one in the grasp of death,
"No GOD have I! I have lost my own!
I go to the presence of thine alone,
To scorch in his fiery breath!

The Spirit, who makes the skies so bright,
With the prints of his shining feet;
Who rolls the waters, kindles the light,
Imprisons the winds, and gives them their flight—
I tremble his eye to meet!

"When, oh! if I openly had confessed,
And followed and loved him here,
I now might fly to his arms for rest,
As the weary bird to her downy nest,
When the evening shades draw near.

"But, grant me the one great boon I crave
In a dread, and an awful hour!
When I shall have sunk in my forest grave,
O, take my Boy to thy home, and save
That beautiful forest flower!

"The God of thy people, the HOLY ONE—
And the path that shall reach the skies—
Say! say that to these thou wilt lead my son,
That he may not second the race I've run,
Nor die, as his father dies!"

"As his father dies!" with the breath that bore
That sorrowful sound, has fled
The soul of a king—for, the strife is o'er
With spirit and flesh; and the SAGAMORE
Is numbered among the dead!

But has he not, by his high bequest,
Like the penitent on the tree,
The Saviour of dying man confessed;
And found the promise to him addressed—
"To day thou shalt be with me!"

From the Saturday Evening Post.

THE VENITIAN CONSPIRACY.

It was a calm, delightful evening in summer, the day had been hot and sultry—but as it began to close, the cool breezes from the Adriatic sprang up, but just enough to wave the flags and streamers upon the vast crowd of vessels, that from all quarters of the known world, then frequented the bays of Venice. The sun was setting and seemed half embedded in the sparkling wave, as he threw his last rays across the water, lighting them as well as the glorious sky, in one vast sheet of crimson and gold. It was a splendid sight, far too grand for the pen to describe, or the pencil to portray. So indeed thought Francesco di Loria, as, leaning against a column of a ruined Pallazzo, on the shore, with his arms folded on his breast he gazed over the calm Adriatic, upon the glorious golden orb, as it sank beneath the wave, leaving its crimson traces in the cloudless sky.

Francesco di Loria was descended from a noble, but now decayed family, that had once swayed Venice—and whose illustrious banner had once floated over the battlements of the Palazzo, against whose shattered ruins he leaned. Now it was almost treason to breathe the name of di Loria in the streets of Venice, and wo to the wretch who chanced to murmur against the tyrannic sway with which the family of Valmarino, with the despotic Doge Niccolo, at their head, governed Venice. But the measure of their crimes was full; and a mine was laid which at the slightest spark would crush with a tremendous explosion the whole race and family of Niccolo Valmarino to atoms.

The sun had now set, and the Italian twilight was fast stealing over land and sea. Francesco remained leaning against the broken column—thinking perhaps of the days of happy childhood that he had spent in those halls, when he, now an exile, was sole heir to the vast possession. He remained some time lost in thought, when a step approaching, roused him from his reverie; turning round he saw the figure of a man stealing towards him, and knowing he was in a dangerous situation, he was about to retreat within the ruins, but the stranger quickening his pace, exclaimed aloud, "who goes there?" "Permit me to ask the same question, before I answer you Signor," replied Francesco.

"I care not who knows my name—'tis Marco Bertucio."

"Marco Bertucio!"—exclaimed di Loria starting, "my old friend, and am I so changed then, that even you cannot remember me?"

"In the fiend's name who are you?" said Marco, approaching him.

"I fear not to trust you with my name; we were friends in our youthful days, and I trust are so yet. I am Di Loria."

"Heaven be praised," said Bertucio embracing him, "but my friend, you certainly are aware of the danger you are in, by exposing yourself so near the city, surrounded by your foes."

"I knew it well—but adversity and hardship has steeled my heart against danger; I am therefore perfectly at my ease. But how do the Venitians like their mild and peaceable governers, now?" asked Di Loria in bitter scorn.

"Like them! there are thousands in the city, that, had they a leader, would assemble and tear their Doge's heart from his body, for the most inveterate and deep rooted hatred prevails against the Valmarinos, and as I say—could there be found a firm and resolute leader of an opposite faction, the bloody head of the Doge would soon be seen rolling down the Giant's Staircase."

"Marco—were I to trust you with a secret that concerns my life—would you be faithful."

"By St. Marco, my patron, I swear, that never"——

"Nay,—a promise," said Francesco, "is all that is necessary."

"That is freely given to my friend," said Marco.

"Know then, that I have at last formed bold designs for raising my fallen fortunes. I have put myself at the head of a few friends, that are daily, and hourly increasing, for what purpose you may easily guess, as we all have sworn if God and St. Mark aids our cause, that the power of the Valmarino family shall be brought down. We meet nightly in the subterranean vaults of our old Pallazzo, and only wait till our numbers are strong enough to raise my decayed family from the obscurity and disgrace into which it has fallen—and settle it upon the ruins of the now powerful Valmarino. Now my friend, I leave it at your option to join us or not—for 'tis a desperate undertaking."

"And join you I will without delay—but 'twill be scarce worth the while, as I possess naught but my sword."

"And a courageous heart"—said Di Loria.

"It is danger only that can prove that"—said Bertucio—"I once was—but no mattter, my heart and hand will be joined to promote your just and virtuous cause, to deliver from the gripe of oppression, a proud and noble people. But the night has closed in, I must begone—where do you sleep to-night?"

"Sleep! I sleep"—answered Di Loria—"no no—not until Niccolo di Valmarino sleeps—in his tomb—but you see that tall white column—just visible amid the gloom, near it is a tomb—be there to night at the hour of eleven, strike thrice upon the iron door, and it will be opened, repeat this watchword, 'Venice and Liberty,' and amid the bones af my ancestors, deep in the earth, you will become one of our band; till then, farewell."

"Farewell, and may St. Mark bless you," said Bertucio, and after Di Loria was out of hearing added, "but if St. Marco can save you now, you may bless him. Ah! simple, simple Francesco, thou knowest not what a viper thou hast in thy bosom; it is laughable to think that I, the head spy of the Doge, should so easily find these conspirators haunts, and become a worthy member. I will instantly to the Doge, and inform him of it; and if I can secure these villains to night, my fortune is forever made." So saying, the treacherous Marco Bertucio departed.

Niccolo di Valmarino, the Doge of Venice, was walking with a slow and measured step, in a balcony of the palace, that over-looked one of the principal canals. The balcony communicated with a large room, the private hall of audience of the Doge, which was furnished in singular magnificence. On either side of the apartment, was a row of slender marble columns, supporting a carved cieling, representing the firmament, while the floor was paved with marble. At the upper end of the room, which was hung with purple and black satin, was a chair or throne, above which, in sombre majesty, appeared rampant, the Winged Lion of St. Mark. At the extremity of the room, were large folding doors that, however, were seldom used, owing to a small door concealed by the hangings, and opening upon a back staircase, which better answered the purposes of the Doge and his emissaries.

The moon had now arisen above the towers of the Inquisition opposite, and the Doge was entering the apartment, when a sound below arrested his footsteps. Leaning over the balcony, he discovered a small gondola, with a single rower, approach the stair that led to the Pallazzo. It seemed as if the Doge expected this visiter, as he gave a signal to the rower, who immediately advanced up the staircase, and in a short space of time, was standing unannounced in the hall.

"Ha! Marco, is it thee," said the Doge.

"It is your servant, most illustrious Signor," answered Marco Bertucio.

"Well, what wouldst thou—is there any more accusations in the Lion's mouth—or have the men of the Lagune rebelled?"

"Something of more importance, Signer, of Francesco di Loria!"

"Saint Michael! what sayest thou?" said the Doge, starting.

"I have the means," answered Bertucio, "of entrapping him with his whole band this night, if your noble highness will give me fifty picked soldiers with their stout halberds."

"Hell and furies!" cried the Doge, "what do I hear, the last of Di Loria's race in my power! Lodge them in the deep vaults of the holy tribunal, and the wealth of the Indies, good Bertucio, shall be yours. Instantly to the captain of the guard and show him this signet—take a hundred soldiers with you—and if the conspirators make any resistance, spare not one—but you know your business." "And shall remember the reward—good night, noble Signor;"—and Marco Bertucio departed—

* * * * *

It was about the mid-hour of the night, and the bright moon silvered the many christian banners that floated in the cool and night breeze, high above the temples and towers of conquered Jerusalem. The streets were all silent, and deserted, except by two persons, who passed swiftly along towards a postern gate of the city.—One was habited as a monk, and the other seemed of the lowest class of the peasantry—though he was, as appeared, a christian. The gate was passed, and they were walking along the banks of the Kedron, before either of them broke silence—at length the monk spoke.

"Where is thy habitation, friend?" he enquired. "You can see it, holy father, that low white house about a quarter of a league up the brook, but craving your pardon, had we not better walk faster—the man is near his end."

"'Tis well, knowest thou his name?"

"No, he does not wish it known; but he says he was formerly of Venice."

"Of Venice," cried the monk, "holy St. Mark, who can he be?"

"What disturbs your reverence so," said the peasant.

"Nothing, nothing; I lived at Venice in my youth," said the monk, and added musingly, "twenty bitter years have gone by, since then; but twenty years of suffering has failed to wash out from my remembrance, the horrors of that night; betrayed by my dearest friend—Oh heaven!"

"Of what night do you speak, good father," said the peasant.

"Night!" said the monk starting, "Oh, good friend, I sometimes think aloud, that is all, but we have arrived, I suppose?"

"Even so, and may it please you sir, to enter my poor abode."

So saying they entered the hovel, and in a corner of the only room the house afforded, was a wretched sight. Upon a few tattered rags, lay the remnants of what once had been a man, but so emaciated by hunger and disease, that he looked more like a beast than a human being. His hair, grizzled more by care than by age, floated wildly around his features; but the fire of his dark eye was unquenched.

Hearing footsteps approach, he turned round, and seeing the monk, clasped his hands and shrieked as in agony.

"Holy father, I thought thou wouldest never have come; behold a vile sinner suffering the torments of the damned—Oh for the love of God, pray for me—I cannot, the words would blast thine ear."

"Compose thyself, my son, confess to me, and I will pray thy Redeemer to have mercy on thy soul."

The monk then requested the peasant to leave the room, and seating himself by the dying man, requested him to proceed.

"Holy father," began the man, "before my eyes are closed forever, I will cheerfully unburden my loaded conscience to thee, and pour into thy ear a tale of horror and of crime. I am a Venetian by birth, and my name is——is——oh how can I speak a name, never before stained by crime, it is Bertucio!"

"In the fiend's name, tell me," said the monk starting wildly, "are you Marco Bertucio?"

"Even so," groaned the dying man, "and has my polluted tale reached even to Palestine—oh, 'tis too much to bear."

If an attentive observer had been there, he would have been surprised to have seen the death-like hue, that overspread the features of the monk, as he sunk on his knees beside Bertucio. In a few minutes, however, he was calm enough to bid the man proceed, who soon spoke as follows:

"It was a beautiful evening, many years ago, that I, prowling about the ruins of the Pallazzo di Loria, being a spy of the Doge Valmarino, chanced to see one, who, thinking I was his friend, requested me to join a conspiracy against the hated ruler of Venice. This man was Francesco di Loria, who in the simplicity of his heart, even informed me where his little band held their nightly meetings. Wishing to be the gainer by this information, I appeared to consent to join them, but could he at that moment have discovered my treacherous designs, his stilettoe would have been buried in my heart.

"All that I had learned, I carried to the Doge, and he already thinking his power giving way, offered me large sums of gold, if I would murder, aye, murder the noble Francesco and his band. That was all my rapacious soul wished; I already saw the confiscated estates of the conspirators, in my possession, and that very night, at the head of a band of soldiers, I forced my way to where they were assembled—and, God of heaven! amid the hecatombs of their fathers, murdered them all; even the noble and generous Francesco; since then, like Cain, I have wandered upon the face of the earth, with the horrible thoughts of being a murderer; and the murderer of one, who, in my younger years, I was proud of calling my friend. What worlds would I give, could Francesco be but here to——to——oh how could I ask his forgiveness, as—— "He does forgive thee," cried the monk, embracing Bertucio, "I am what once was Di Loria, and from my heart, I forgive thee all!"

"What do I hear," exclaimed Bertucio, "thou, thou Francesco di Loria!—oh do not deceive me, or thou wilt madden me."

"Marco, be calm and hear me," said di Loria, "when you stabbed me in the burial vault, the blow aimed by a guilty hand, did not take effect; being merely stunned; I soon recovered, in body but never in mind; it was the deathblow of all my hopes; and having nothing earthly to fix my attention upon, in the gloom and silence of a cloister I have passed my days in peace."

After some conversation, Bertucio proceeded with his confession: "Believing you dead, the Doge rewarded me, as he had promised; but a year after, I was dragged before the holy tribunal; tried, condemned, and banished for years; I found a refuge under the banners of the Infidel, and with the blood of many a christian on my scymetar, have wandered friendless and forsaken, but I die in peace."

His soul passed to its eternal resting place, but not a stone marked his grave. He that was born in a Venitian Pallazzo, and was nursed amid the the powerful Bertucio's and Di Loria's, died in the hovel of a low born Syrian.

Years passed on, and when the cross was again trampled beneath the feet of the Arabian conquer, and when once more the cresent shone above the holy city—deep in the vaults of the monastery of St. John of Jerusalem, was seen a white marble tomb, with but this inscription—

"Hic Jacet—
Francesco Di Loria.'

THE WATER LILY.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

———The Water-Lilies, that are serene in the calm clear water, but no less serene among the black and scowling waves.—[Lights and shadows of Scottish Life.

Oh! beautiful thou art.
Thou sculpture-like and stately River Queen!
Crowning the depths, as with the light serene,
Of a pure heart.

Bright Lily of the wave!
Rising in fearless grace with every swell,
Thou seem'st as if a spirit meekly brave,
Dwelt in thy cell:

Lifting alike thy head!
Of placid beauty, feminine yet free,
Whether with foam or pictured azure spread,
The waters be.

What is like thee, fair flower?
The gentle and the firm? thus bearing up
To the blue sky that alabaster cup,
As to the shower?

Oh! Love is most like thee,
The Love of Woman; quivering to the blast,
Through every nerve, yet rooted deep and fast,
'Midst Life's dark sea.

And Faith—oh! is not Faith—
Like thee, too, Lily? springing into light!
Still buoyantly above the billows' might,
Through the storm's breath!

Yes, link'd with such high thoughts!
Flower, let thine image in my bosom lie,
Till something there of its own purity,
And peace be wrought.

Something yet more divine!
Than the clear, pearly, virgin lustre shed,
Forth from my breast upon the river's bed,
As from a shrine.

Oft in the Stilly Night.

BY MOORE.

Oft in the stilly night,
Ere slumber's chain has bound me,
Fond memory brings the light
Of other days around me;
The smiles and tears
Of boyhood's years,
The words of love then spoken:
The eyes that shone
Now dimm'd and gone;
The cheerful hearts now broken.
Thus in the stilly night,
Ere slumber's chain has bound me,
Sad memory brings the light
Of other days around me.

When I remember all
The friends, so linked together,
I've seen around me fall,
Like leaves in winter weather,
I feel like one
Who treads alone
Some banquet hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed!
Thus in the stilly night,
Ere slumber's chain has bound me,
Sad memory brings the light
Of other days around me.

KENTUCKY SPORTS.

It may not be amiss, kind reader, before I attempt to give you an idea of the pleasures experienced by the sportsman of Kentucky, to introduce the subject with a slight description of that state.

Kentucky was formerly attached to Virginia, but in those days the Indians looked upon that portion of the western wilds as their own, and abandoned the district only when forced to do so, moving with disconsolate hearts farther into the recesses of the unexplored forests. Doubtless the richness of its soil, and the beauty of its borders, situated as they are along one of the most beautiful rivers in the world, contributed as much to attract the old Virginians, as the desire so generally experienced in America, of spreading over the uncultivated tracts, and bringing into cultivation, lands that have for unknown ages teemed with the wild luxuriance of untamed nature. The conquest of Kentucky was not performed without many difficulties. The warfare that long existed between the intruders and the Redskins, was sanguinary and protracted; but the former at length made good their footing, and the latter drew off their shattered bands, dismayed by the mental superiority and indomitable courage of the white men.

This region was probably discovered by a daring hunter, the renowned Daniel Boon. The richness of its soil, its magnificent forests, its numberless navigable streams, its salt springs and licks, saltpetre caves, its coal strata, and the vast herbs of buffaloes and deer that browsed on its hills and amidst its charming valleys, afforded ample inducements to the new settler, who pushed forward with a spirit far above that of the most undaunted tribes which for ages had been the sole possessors of the soil.

The Virginians thronged towards the Ohio. An axe, a couple of horses, and a heavy rifle, with store of ammunition, were all that were considered necessary for equipment of the man, who, with his family, removed to the new state, assured that in that land of exuberant fertility, he could not fail to provide amply for all his wants. They who have witnessed the industry and perseverence of the emigrants, must at once have proved the vigour of their minds. Regardless of the fatigue attending every movement which they made, they pushed through an unexplored region of dark and tangled forests, guiding themselves by the sun alone, and reposing at night on the bare ground. Numberless streams they had to cross on rafts, with their wives and children, their cattle and their luggage, often drifting to considerable distances before they could effect a landing on the opposite shores. The cattle would often stray amid the rich pasturage of these shores, and occasion a delay of several days. To these troubles add the constantly impending danger of being murdered, while asleep in their encampments, by the prowling and ruthless Indians; while they had before them a distance of hundreds of miles to be traversed, before they could reach certain places of rendezvous called stations. To encounter difficulties like these must have required energies of no ordinary kind; and the reward which these veteran settlers enjoy, was doubtless well merited.

Some removed from the Atlantic shores to those of the Ohio in more comfort and security. They had their wagons, their negroes, and their families. Their way was cut through the woods by their own axemen, the day before their advance; and when night overtook them, the hunters attached to the party came to the place pitched upon for their encamping, loaded with the dainties of which the forest yielded an abundant supply, the blazing light of a huge fire guided their steps as they approached, and the sounds of merriment that saluted their ears assuring them that all was well. The flesh of the buffalo, the bear, and the deer, soon hung in large and delicious steaks, in front of the embers; the cakes already prepared were deposited in their proper places, and, under the rich drippings of the juicy roasts, were quickly baked. The wagons contained the bedding; and whilst the horses which had drawn them were turned loose to feed on the luxuriant undergrowth of the woods, some perhaps hoppled, but the greater number merely with a light bell hung to their neck, to guide the owners in the morning to the spot where they might have rambled, the party were enjoying themselves after the fatigues of the day.

In anticipation all is pleasure; and these migrating bands feasted in joyous sociality, unapprehensive of any greater difficulties than those to be encountered in forcing their way through the pathless woods to the land of abundance; and although it took months to accomplish the journey, and a skirmish now and then took place between them and the Indians, who sometimes crept unperceived into their very camp, still did the Virginians cheerfully proceed towards the western horizon, until the various groups all reached the Ohio, when, struck with the beauty of that magnificent stream, they at once commenced the task of clearing land, for the purpose of establishing a permanent residence.

Others, perhaps encumbered with too much luggage, preferred descending the stream. They prepared arks pierced with port-holes, and glided on the gentle current, more annoyed, however, than those who marched by land, by the attacks of the Indians, who watched their motions. Many travellers have described these boats formerly called arks, but now named flat-boats. But have they told you, gentle reader, that in those times a boat of thirty or forty feet in length, by ten or twelve in breadth, was considered a stupendous fabric; that in this boat men, women and children, huddled together, with horses, cattle, hogs, and poultry, for their companions, while the remaining portion was crammed with vegetables and packages of seeds? The roof or deck of the boat was not unlike a farm-yard, being covered with hay, ploughs, carts, wagons, and various agricultural implements, together with numerous others, among which the spinning-wheels of the matrons were conspicuous. Even the sides of the floating mass were loaded with the wheels of the different vehicles, while themselves lay on the roof. Have they told you that these boats contained the little all of each family of venturous emigrants, who, fearful of being discovered by the Indians, under night moved in darkness, groping their way from one part to another of these floating habitations, denying themselves the comfort of fire or light, lest the foe that watched them from the shore should rush upon them and destroy them? Have they told you that this boat was used, after the tedious voyage was ended, as the first dwelling of these new settlers? No, kind reader, such things have not been related to you before. The travellers who have visited our country have had other objects in view.

I shall not describe the many massacres which took place among the different parties of white and red men, as the former moved down the Ohio; because I have never been very fond of battles, and indeed have always wished that the world were more peaceably inclined than it is; and shall merely add, that, in one way or other, Kentucky was wrested from the original owners of the soil. Let us, therefore, turn our attention to the sports still enjoyed in that now happy portion of the United States.

We have individuals in Kentucky, kind reader, that even there are considered wonderful adepts in the management of the rifle. To drive a nail is a common feat, not more thought of by the Kentuckians than to cut off a wild turkey's head, at a distance of a hundred yards. Others will bark off squirrels, one after another, until satisfied with the number procured. Some, less intent on destroying game, may be seen under night snuffing a candle at the distance of fifty yards, off-hand, without extinguishing it. I have been told that some have proved so expert and cool as to make choice of the eye of a foe at a wonderful distance, boasting beforehand of the sureness of their piece, which has afterwards been fully proved when the enemy's head has been examined!

Having resided some years in Kentucky, and having more than once been witness of rifle-sport, I shall present you with the results of my observation, leaving you to judge how far rifle-shooting is understood in that state.

Several individuals, who conceive themselves expert in the management of the gun, are often seen to meet for the purpose of displaying their skill, and betting a trifling sum, put up a target, in the centre of which a common-sized nail is hammered for about two thirds of its length. The marksmen make choice of what they consider a proper distance, which may be forty paces. Each man cleans the interior of his tube, which is called wiping it, places a ball in the palm of his hand, pouring as much powder from his horn upon it as will cover it over. This quantity is supposed to be sufficient for any distance within a hundred yards. A shot that comes very close to the nail is considered as that of an indifferent marksman; the bending of the nail is, of course somewhat better; but nothing less than hitting it right on the head is satisfactory. Well, kind reader, one out of three shots generally hits the nail; and should the shooters amount to half a dozen, two nails are frequently needed before each can have a shot. Those who drive the nail have a further trial amongst themselves, and the two best shots out of these generally settle the affair, when all the sportsmen adjourn to some house, and spend an hour or two in friendly intercourse, appointing, before they part, a day for another trial. This is technically termed driving the nail.

Barking off Squirrels is delightful sport, and in my opinion requires a greater degree of accuracy than any other. I first witnessed this manner of procuring squirrels, whilst near the town of Frankfort. The performer was the celebrated Daniel Boon. We walked out together, and followed the rocky margin of the Kentucky river, until we reached a piece of flat land thinly covered with black walnuts, oaks, and hickories. As the general mast was a good one that year, squirrels were seen gamboling on every tree around us. My companion, a stout, hale, and athletic man, dressed in a homespun hunting-shirt, bare-legged and moccasined, carried a long and heavy rifle, which as he was loading it, he said had proved efficient in all his former undertakings, and which he hoped would not fail on this occasion, as he felt proud to show me his skill. The gun was wiped, the powder measured, the ball patched with six-hundred-thread linen, and the charge sent home with a hickory rod. We moved not a step from the place, for the squirrels were so numerous that it was unnecessary to go after them. Boon pointed to one of these animals which had observed us, and was crouched on a branch about fifty paces distant, and bade me mark well the spot were the ball should hit. He raised his piece gradually until the bead (that being the name given by the Kentuckians to the sight) of the barrel was brought to a line with the spot which he intended to hit. The whip-like report resounded through the woods and along the hills in repeated echoes. Judge of my surprise when I perceived that the ball had hit the piece of bark immediately beneath the squirrel, and shivered it into splinters, the concussion produced by which had killed the animal and sent it whirling through the air, as if it had been blown up by the explosion of a powder magazine. Boon kept up his firing, and, before many hours had elapsed, we had procured as many squirrels as we wished; for you must know, kind reader, that to load a rifle requires only a moment, and that if it is wiped once after each shot, it will do duty for hours. Since that first interview with our veteran Boon, I have seen other individuals perform the same feat.

The snuffing of a candle with a ball, I first had an opportunity of seeing near the banks of the Green river, not far from a large pigeon-roost, to which I had previously made a visit. I heard many reports of guns during the early part of a dark night, and knowing them to be those of rifles, I went towards the spot to ascertain the cause. On reaching the place, I was welcomed by a dozen tall stout men, who told me they were exercising for the purpose of enabling them to shoot under night at the reflected light from the eyes of a deer or wolf, by torch-light. A fire was blazing near, the smoke of which rose curling among the thick foliage of the trees. At a distance which rendered it scarcely distinguishable, stood a burning candle, as if intended for an offering to the goddess of night, but which in reality was only fifty yards from the spot on which we all stood. One man was within a few yards of it, to watch the effects of the shots, as well as to light the candle should it chance to go out, or to replace it should the shot cut it across. Each marksman shot in his turn. Some never hit either the snuff or the candle, and were congratulated with a loud laugh; while others actually snuffed the candle without putting it out, and were recompensed for their dexterity by numerous hurrahs. One of them, who was particularly expert, was very fortunate, and snuffed the candle three times out of seven, whilst all the other shots either put out the candle, or cut it immediately under the light.

Of the feats performed by the Kentuckians with the rifle, I could say more than might be expedient on the present occasion. In every thinly peopled portion of the state, it is rare to meet one without a gun of that description, as well as a tomahawk. By way of recreation, they often cut off a piece of the bark of a tree, make a target of it, using a little powder wetted with water or saliva, for the bull's eye, and shoot into the mark all the balls they have about them, picking them out of the wood again.

After what I have said, you may easily imagine with what ease a Kentuckian procures game, or despatches an enemy, more especially when I tell you that every one in the state is accustomed to handle the rifle from the time when he is first able to shoulder it until near the close of his career. That murderous weapon is the means of procuring them subsistence during all their wild and extensive rambles, and is the source of their principal sports and pleasures.—Audubon's Ornithological Biography.

TO A LADY.

BY F. G. HALLECK.

The world is bright before thee;
Its summer flowers are thine;
Its calm blue sky is o'er thee;
Thy bosom virtue's shrine:
And thine the sunbeam given
To nature's morning hour,
Pure, warm, as when from heaven
It burst on Eden's bower.

There is a song of sorrow—
The death-dirge of the gay—
That tells ere dawn of morrow,
Those charms may melt away.
That sun's bright beam be shaded;
That sky be blue no more,
The summer flower be faded,
And youth's warm promise o'er.

Believe it not—though lonely
The winning home may be;
Though beauty's bark can only
Float on a summer sea;
Though time thy bloom is stealing,
There's still beyond his art
The wild flower wreath of feeling—
The sunbeam of the heart.

THE MINATURE.

In all her youth and loveliness,
She lies before me now;
The same bright curls of shining hair,
Upon her sunny brow.
The witching look, the soft blue eye,
The lip of laughing glee,
And the blush that burned upon her cheek,
And the smile I loved to see.

The round white arm is still the same,
Embraced with jewelled band,
And the taper fingers seem fresh with life,
As you mark the lily hand;
And the painter's skill hath caught the hue
Of the roses in her hair,
They are pale with envy's withering blight,
Out-blcomed by maiden fair.

She moved amid the young and gay,
Within the lighted hall,
And she seemed among a thousand girls,
The fairest of them all.
It was the last time that we met,
The hours flew swiftly by,
And I never deemed a star so bright
So soon would leave the sky.

She was too pure for weary earth—
She might not live to feel
The sadness that should cloud her brow,
And o'er her spirit steal;
And in life's young hour she faded,
Like all cherished things below,
A buds may wither on the stem,
E'er yet the roses blow.

Ye may gaze upon this pictured thing,
And praise the beauty rare,
Of her speaking eye, and laughing lip,
And curls of shining hair;
But you know not half the gentleness
That dwelt within a breast,
Where the sorrowing might relieve their woes,
Where the startled dove might rest.

O, there never moved on earth a form,
Of more bewitching grace,
Or a kinder heart, whose gentle thoughts
Illum'd a fairer face;
But they all are hid within the grave—
Bright smile and sunny brow,
And nought is left but this pictured thing
That lies before me now.

THE STAGEMAN'S HORN.

Written by a lady in the country to her husband in town.

Oh! say not the horn has no musical notes,
Its sound is delightful to me,
Far sweeter than warblings from nightingales' throats,
For it brings me a letter from thee.

The little ones joyful all gather around,
Their pretty eyes sparkle with glee,
Exclaim, as they hear the enliv'ning sound,
"Oh, mother! a letter for thee."

A magic there is in that sweet little word,
Delightful to age and to youth;
In absence, what joy does a letter afford,
When filled with affection and truth.

That thine are thus filled, dear Howard, my heart
Enraptured delights to confess:
I open, and read them, and dwell on each part
With a transport I cannot express.

Then say not the horn has no musical notes,
Its sound is delightful to me,
Far sweeter than warblings from nightingales' throats,
For it brings me a letter from thee. N. Y. Mirror.

THE BIRTH OF CHRIST.

WRITTEN ON CHRISTMAS DAY.

Behold the babe
Wrapp'd in a mantle, in the manger laid,
The shepherds shouting round him: see him then
The great Redeemer of a fallen world,—
The Saviour of mankind.

The brilliant orb which arises on this memorable morn, shedding light upon a benighted world, is a type of that more glorious luminary, which arose in beauty on Bethlehem—and went down in blood on Calvary. Behold the infant Saviour! Behold the herald of Heaven and the harbinger of hope and future happiness! Behold the great emancipator of a wicked world! Methinks I see the shouting shepherds flying to and fro, with the glad tidings that a child is born whose virtues shall bequeath to them the rich inheritance of hereafter. Methinks I see the admiring multitude, crowding round the manger to catch a glimpse of that glorious Being, who had come into the world not to propagate his Gospel like Mahomet, with the sword, but with his blood to baptize all nations.

What a destiny is his! Born in a land of peace, and nursed in the lap of persecution, we behold him at one time the pride of the pulpit, adorned with all the dignity of a man, and with all the glory of a God, every knee bowing before him, and every heart paying the tribute of its homage; while at another, we see him the scorn, the scoff and mirth of the multitude, his head covered with a crown of thorns, his temple a dungeon, and future destiny a lingering and ignominious death on the cross. But he trembled not at the taunts of the multitude, or the tyranny of the magistrate. Magnanimous amid the ruin that surrounded him, he stood the hope of this world, and the harbinger of a better, welcoming the bitter cup that contained the price of universal emancipation. He crouched not at the footstool of power, nor fed and fattened on the plundered property of the people, but, he came as a father to the fatherless, a pattern to the rich, a pastor to the poor, as a balm to the blind, and a beacon to the benighted and forlorn. In a word, he came to save the sinner and redeem the world. The accumulated calumnies of the wicked and the worthless, the arrows of envy, and the daggers of defamation fell harmless against the breast plate of his piety, and the world's passions, instead of stirring him to revenge, only roused him to the exercise of virtue, and to the promulgation of the Gospel which he came to establish. A man of sorrow and suffering, he appealed not to the passions and prejudices of the multitude—he offered not his blessing to the Pagan priest as the pay for his apostacy from the faith of his fathers, but he taught a morality and a religion purer than the pages of Socrates, and Seneca, a doctrine fraught with the noblest precepts, and practice that ever served as a pattern and a model for man. He sought not to dazzle the imaginations of men, with the splendors of eloquence or the pomp of philosophy; he drew not his morality from the temples of Grecian genius or his inspiration from the tombs of Roman learning; superior to all, and opposed to that system from whence the Kantian philosophy sprung, he breathed but the inspired spirit of his Father.

What an object of admiration! With all the grandeur of a God, and with all the mind of a man, at one moment refuting the learned Doctors in the temple, and at another, mingling with and comforting his fellow creatures in wretchedness and rags. To him the petty distinctions of mankind were nought but mockery—alike to him was the pomp of earthly power and the pride of penury—alike to him the rags of the beggar, and the crimson robes of royalty—alike to him the grandeur of wealth, the boast of birth, the mansion of the monarch, and the cottage of the plebeian. Alike to him the humble and the haughty, alike to him the pompous and the poor. In the spirit of his divinity he dashed the golden crown from the head of guilty greatness, bade tyrants tremble on their thrones, and drew from the solitude of poverty the Apostles of his church and his Gospel. He was no titled tyrant or imaginary monarch, tricked out in gaudy magnificence to dazzle and degrade a horde of slaves, pleased with the chains which rattled on the limbs of liberty. Far different was his glory and his grandeur, upon his manly lips hung the hallowed accents of religion and Gospel law—his regal robes were innocence and peace, his weapon was his word, and his throne and sceptre were the hearts and hopes of men. With the light of faith he dissipated the illusive landscape of human error, and with the sword of truth he trampled to the dust, the splendid Pantheon of Pagan idolatry. The darkness which surrounded their golden Gods and their Gospel, was dissipated by the dawn of that day which shed brilliancy and beauty on the purity and the practice of piety. In the urbanity of his benevolence, he led the van of victorious emancipation, he decked his brow with the garland of glory, with the wreath of every religion, and filled his army with the soldiers of every sect, and every clime. But he forged no fetters, he lit no fires for those who refused to bow to his decrees and obey his decalogue. Unlike the monarchs of the earth, he pleased not the eye of the world with the pomp of his power, and yet at the magic of his word, the mighty waves of the ocean in its anger were stayed, and while it obeyed him he walked upon its surface with a dignity that adorned him, and with a faith that never failed.

The hideous heart of Judas, actuated by the gluttony of gold, betrayed the Redeemer of mankind. How short was the transition from the cradle to the cross! Behold the insulted Saviour of the world, rudely beaten and basely scourged! Behold him on the cross, gashed with gushing wounds, and suffering all the agonies of outraged humanity, with all the unbent and unbroken spirit of a God, now commending his soul to his Father, and now calling for mercy on those who were cruelly baptizing him in blood. He was indeed the great martyr of mankind, for the first drop of gore that gushed from his wounds, sealed that redemption which the Prophets had foretold, and his death fulfilled. The mighty multitude grow giddy while they gaze and glut their senses on the sufferings of an expiring Saviour. There are none but a few followers to vindicate his violated honor. Behold his blanched and bruised brow! Behold his sunken sockets, and his visage pale! No vile passion is depicted there—revenge sits not enthroned on the martyred brow it has butchered—anger lights not the eye, nor curls the lip which once beamed with moderation and blessed with mercy and love. Oh no, the angel dove-like peace sits there the herald of the happiness he came to bestow on degenerate men.

Ah see! he has bowed his head and died! With the word of life upon his lips, and the blessing of Heaven in his heart, he has met death from the dart of the assassin, and perished to perpetuate the boon he bequeathed. The prophecies are fulfilled and man redeemed. In the moment he became a conquerer, he became a corse. Thus to reclaim sins, and soften the condition of man, the great mediator withered from the world. No sooner had the spirit of the glorious victim vanished, than the great triumph was announced. The sun blushed and buried his face in the gloom of midnight, while the marble jaws of the tomb were rent asunder and rolled forth the dead who had slumbered for ages on the pillow of their repose, to walk the earth, startled from their deep damp vaults by the agonies of an expiring God. In that awful hour the key of Heaven's happy portal, and of Hell's inexorable doors was placed in the hand of man. In that awful hour man became the arbiter of his own choice, whether to be doomed to the dark dungeons of the lower world, or rise to the sublime palaces and gardens of God—whether to be entombed amid the burning wreck of human crime, or wander in the flowery fields and pleasant plains of Palestine.

No garlands adorned his grave, and no tears save those of women, bedewed the place of his repose. His few followers alone wept over his death, and worshipped his divinity—they alone mourned over his wounds, and admired his wisdom. Jesus Christ was a martyr to the very immortality of man, for his Gospel, the glorious mantle of his memory, fell upon us all. Precious and imperishable was that legacy of his love. Treasured in the heart, it has become the brightest gem on the brows of beauty, at once the refuge of the wretched, the solace of society, the charm of solitude and the amulet of age, of anguish and despair. His very tomb became a temple, and his relics and resurrection confounded skepticism, which in vengeance, though in vain, attempted to rise upon his ruin, and make him the scourge and scorn of all mankind. Even when enveloped in the gloomy garb of the grave—even when the doom of death had passed, and the glorious intercessor no longer blushed and bled for the sins of his enemies—even when piety and affection in the angel garb of woman, alone mused and mourned at the door of the sacred sepulchre—even then his spirit triumphed in the doctrine which his death had achieved. Even then his Gospel was destined to become the glory of the world, a solemn and sublime moment of his merits, and the glorious monument of his mercy, which neither Pagan superstition could pollute, nor all the revolutions of time could blast or obliterate. Inspired with the spirit of that wonderful Being who sits throned in gold, and in whose sight the Gospel became more imperishable than the pillars of the universe, and though all the rays of persecution have been concentred upon it, in the language of a great classic, they served but to illumine but could not consume.

He has left behind the light of his glorious intellect to linger among men, at once the beacon, the beauty, and the blessing of the world. His humility and mildness, his benevolence and love must forever remain the blest memorials of his mission, and be handed down to the latest posterity as perfect patterns, for he was without a model. The benefit conferred, can never be abolished, for he crushed the very serpent that crawled over the cradle of Eden, and dashed from the hand of death, and the grasp of the grave, the very attributes of their victory and their vengeance. In his death he redeemed the violated virtue of our first father, and palliated with his blood the impiety of Eve, when her soul was won to sin by the seductive blandishments of the serpent. The miseries they entailed upon mankind, were mitigated and immerged in the immunities conferred by his martyrdom and the Gospel he gave to the world.

The very cities and empires which were the scenes of the prophecies, of his miracles and martyrdom, as though cursed by Heaven, have crumbled to dust, and their ruins alone remain as mementos of their former magnificence. Where now is the glory of ancient Jerusalem, the princes of Palestine, decked with the gaudy grandeur of Solomon, and graced with her lofty temples, her towers, and her tombs? Where now is the splendour of Babylon, adorned with her golden gates, her temple of Belus, and her hanging gardens, and everlasting walls. Alas, they are in ruins, and their crumbling temples and tombs alone remain sad monuments amid the waste of time, of their rise and ruin, of their degradation and decay. Their sumptuous halls where eloquence, and mirth, and music once held the listening ear of the grand, and the gay, have since become the lion's lair, or echoed the hooting of the dusky owl, or the hiss of the solitary serpent. The land of the elect, the garden of God, has become the abode of the barbarian, the home of the Mahometan, and the very scenes which groaned and glittered beneath the palaces of Solomon, are now distinguised only by the tent of the humble Arab, or the moving caravan of the Moabite. The laden camel now rests his limbs in the banquet halls of ancient kings, and the toad spits its venom in the boudoirs of ancient beauty. Even the tombs of the mighty and magnificent, the tombs of oriental genius, have become the refuge of the Arabian robber, while the sepulchres of Israel's potentates are profaned by the nocturnal triumphs of a barbarian banditti. The very dust of their high priests and princes, may have become the cement of the sepulchre of Mahomet. Melancholy is the memory, and sad the renown of the once worshipped and wonderful Jerusalem. The fame of the East, and the favorite of Heaven, she bade fair to flourish through all time like the Pyramids of Egypt, and to wither but with the world. The traveller now treads upon her mouldering walls, and the ruins of her once majestic temples, to muse for a moment on the mutability of human glory, and to sigh over the miseries of ungrateful man.

And where too is the glory of Athens, the seat of science and the home of song; the illuminator of nations, the haunt of Socrates, Plato and Zeno, and the very cradle of liberty, learning and law? Like Greece she has become the grave of her own glory, her light only serving to distinguish the circle of darkness which surrounds her, magnificent in her ruin and melancholy in her magnificence. The lamp of her ancient learning has gone out in the midnight of ages, and her Acropolis has crumbled at the touch of the irresistible tooth of time. The fame of her philosophy alone survives her fallen grandeur, the pages of history alone preserve the relics of her renown. When Paul preached in her pulpit and Plato plead his philosophy in her porch, Athens was the wonder and the admiration of the world.

Imperial Rome, whose pampered soldiery offered insolence and injury to an insulted Saviour, lies in ruins a mighty marble wreck, the spectre of her ancient splendor, the mere apperition of her ancient renown. Rome, within whose walls millions once congregated—Rome, the conquerer of Carthage and the world, has become the lap of ruin like her ancient catacombs, still white with the mangled remains of of the martyred christians. Her millions have gone down to dust, her glory slumbers beneath her crumbling columns, and her time-worn walls, her arts lie dormant in the lap of Gothic darkness, and her science reposes in the unnumbered volumes of the Vatican. She is no longer the city of the Cæsars. The palaces of Augustus and Tiberius have become the property of the Pope, vainly considered the vicegerent of Heaven, and the grandson of God.

Such has been the fate of all those countries which were the scenes of the Saviour's sorrows and sufferings. A thousand thrones have fallen, a thousand cities have become silent, empires have passed away on the ocean of oblivion, and even nations have been annihilated amid the wrecks and rubbish of time's revolutions. The Jews are a splendid example. Born in the lap of luxury, and bred amid all that was grand and glorious, the peculiar favorites of Heaven, they dreamt not of their degradation, and reckless of their ruin seemed to dare that arm—

Which heaved the Heavens, the ocean and the land.

The Jewish empire and people were once mighty. What are they now? The sun of their glory, which arose in lustre, was doomed to go down in oblivion; they have been scattered over the earth, while their identity has been preserved as a mark and a remembrance of their turpitude and treachery. The cup of Heaven's kindness dashed from their lips, and pining under the doom of prophecy, they have become the proverb and the prey of all nations. Looking forward for that Saviour who has already suffered for the sins of mankind, and neglecting the mercy which he has already meted out, they wander in the dark for the rays of that light which has already illuminated the world.

Yet notwithstanding the benefits conferred by the Gospel, there are those in the present day who would hurl from the hand of age the only cup of his consolation, and snatch from the lip of sorrow the balm of its salvation. There are skeptical scoffers who would drag from the beggar his only boon on earth, who would extinguish the very day-star, whose beams light error and ignorance to the path which leads to glory and to God. Merciful God! there are those who would see the venerated temple of christianity tumble to the earth, and triumph over the downfall of the most beautiful and beneficient doctrine in the world. Yes, there are those who would mock at the bleeding shade of the resuscitated Saviour, and laugh to scorn the blessings conferred by his doctrine and his death. Infidelity strikes at the very divinity of Christ.

The introduction of christianity has conferred benefits on society which were unknown in the days of Pagan doctrines and darkness. Abolish it and what is the consequence. Let us examine the pages of history—let us turn to France, the land of fashion and fancy, for a picture so touching, and so terrible a catastrophe. Aye, let us turn to France, the very home of philosophy and fame, the very land of the social virtues, of elegance and grace, and we shall then see her scaffolds streaming with the blood which skepticism demanded for the altar of her hellish adoration. We shall there see her sabbath abolished, her cities sacked, her sons groaning in dungeons beneath an intolerable tyranny, her priests turned out to pine in penury, and her princes and her potentates sacrificed on the pyre lit from the fires of hell. Poverty became the pander of licentious power, and virtue became the victim, and beauty the oblation on the accursed altar of promiscuous prostitution. No charm was sacred, no virtue was secure; the attractions of beauty, the pride of birth, the pomp of wealth, and the glory of talents served only as incentives to persecution and plunder. The infidel demon Robespierre was in league with death, and the gore which gushed from a hundred hearts of the bravest and best, was but a moiety of that terrible torrent which swept away the religion and the liberties of France, and dyed their brow red with the avenging wrath of God. The convulsive heavings of the French volcano lit all Europe with its lurid flame, and the terrors it excited subsided only with the death of the master demon. Look at the last moments of those miserable men, who plunged all France in grief, made blood their oblation at the altar of liberty, and plundered the expiring heart of its very hopes of Heaven. Too cowardly when condemned, to strike the dagger home to their own hearts—they were meanly dragged to the same block which their tyranny had made run red with the blood of so many. Trembling at the terrors which surrounded them, and deafened by the rejoicing plaudits of the multitude, they perished and found a grave unregretted though not forgotten.

Thus died the ruffian Robespierre covered with the curses of a thousand mourning mothers. Thus fell one of the most terrific tyrants that ever prostituted power, or disgraced the glory of a nation. He died not like a christian, but like a demon. The principles he had perpetuated perished with him, and if these were the trophies of the tenets of Rousseau, well might Napoleon exclaim while contemplating his tomb, that it had been better for France had he never lived. Beneath the skeptical philosophy Rousseau originated, France withered, and under such a system of universal vice, the world would become a waste, and man a murderer. Sweep christianity from our hearths and our hearts, from our churches and our homes; banish the Bible from the pulpit, the parlour and the closet, and give skepticism the sceptre of the same power she possessed in France, and the world would become a mighty Coloseum of carnage, and the hands of a hundred Robespierre's would reek with the unmeasured gore of millions.

Let us then cling to christianity as the last plank of shipwrecked humanity, and the only anchor of our hopes and our happiness. Let that brilliant luminary which went down in blood on Calvary be the morning star of our merits, and our memory being assured that it will light us to the pleasant paths of peace in this world, and beyond the dark defiles of death and the grave. It is with regret, my dear reader, that I bid adieu to so grand and so glorious a subject. MILFORD BARD.

JAMES LAWRENCE.

James Lawrence, a distinguished American naval commander, was born at Burlington, New Jersey, in 1781. He early manifested a strong predilection for the sea; but his father, who was a lawyer, was anxious that he should pursue his own profession; and, when only thirteen years of age, he commenced the study of the law; but after the death of his father, entered the navy as a midshipman, in 1798. In 1801, the Trippli war having commenced, he was promoted, and, in 1803, was sent out to the Mediterranean, as the first lieutenant of the schooner Enterprise. While there, he performed a conspicuous part in the destruction of the frigate Philadelphia, which had been captured by the Tripolitans. In the same year he was invested with the temporary command of the Enterprise, during the bombardment of Tripoli, by Commodore Preble, all the ships of the squadron being employed to cover the boats during the attack; and so well did he execute his duty, that the Commodore could not restrain the expression of his thanks. He remained in the Mediterranean three years, and then returned with Preble to the United States, having previously been transferred to the frigate John Adams, as the first lieutenant. In June, 1812, war was declared between Great Britain and the United States, and Lawrence, at the time in command of the Hornet, a few days afterwards sailed with a squadron under the orders of Commodore Rogers, for the purpose of intercepting the Jamaica fleet. They returned, however, at the end of the following month to Boston, without having been able to accomplish their object. Lawrence then accompanied Commodore Bainbridge on a cruise to the East Indies; but they separated near St. Salvador, on the coast of Brazil, the Hornet remaining there to blockade a British ship of war, laden with specie; till compelled to retire by the arrival of a seventy-four. Feb. 24, 1813, the Hornet fell in with the brig Peacock, Captain Peak, which he took after a furious action of fifteen minutes. This vessel was deemed one of the finest of her class in the British navy. In the number of her men and guns, she was somewhat inferior to the Hornet. She sunk before all the prisoners could be removed. The latter was considerably damaged in the rigging and sails, but her hull was scarcely hurt. Lawrence returned to the United States; where he was welcomed with the applause due to his conduct; but the most honorable eulogy bestowed upon it, was contained in a letter, published by the officers of the Peacock, expressing their gratitude for the consideration and kindness with which they had been treated. Shortly after his return, he was ordered to repair to Boston, and take command of the frigate Chesapeake. This he did with great regret, as the Chesapeake was one of the worst ships in the navy. He had been but a short time at Boston, when the British frigate Shannon, Captain Brooke, appeared before the harbor, and defied the Chesapeake to combat. Lawrence did not refuse the challenge, although his ship was far from being in a condition for action; and June 1st, 1813, he sailed out of the harbor and engaged his opponent. After the ship had exchanged several broadsides, and Lawrence had been wounded in the leg, he called his boarders, when he received a musket ball in his body. At the same time, the enemy boarded, and, after a desperate resistance, succeeded in taking possession of the ship. Almost all the officers of the Chesapeake where either killed or wounded. The last exclamation of Lawrence, as they were carrying him below, after the fatal wound, was, "Don't give up the ship." He lingered for four days in intense pain, and expired on the 5th of June. He was buried at Halifax with every mark of honor.—Enc. Amer.

GO-BETWEENS.—There is perhaps not a more odious character in the world, than that of go-between—by which is meant that creature who carries to the ears of one neighbor every injurious observation that happens to drop from the mouth of another. Such a person is the slanderer's herald, and is altogether more odious than the slanderer himself. By his vile officiousness, he makes that poison effective, which else were inert; for three-fourths of the slanderers in the world would never injure their object, except by the malice of go-betweens, who under the mask of double friendship, act the part of double traitors.

The people all running to the capital city, is like a confluence of all animal spirits to the heart; a symptom that the constitution is in danger.

TO THE DARK EYES OF ——.

BY BARRY CORNWALL.

Where now are those dark eyes—(sweet eyes!)
In tears? in thought? in sleep?
Those lights, like stars in the stormy skies,
Which gently shine, when all else weep?
O dark, unconquered eyes!
Are ye from human anguish freed?
Or do you sometimes mourn indeed,
In pity or superior pain,
For some deep secret hid from all the world, in vain?
O melancholy eyes! which love to dwell,
On Juliet's passion, Belvidera's wo,
Where was the light which now ye wear so well,
(That tender, touching lustre!) long ago?
Did it lie dreaming in your orbs unknown,
As in the rose's bud the unblown perfume,
Till evil fortune, now forever flown,
Struck out your dazzling bloom?
For what too dangerous purpose were ye born?
To lead the youthful poet's ear astray?
Or was't to turn to tears the proud and gay,
With looks that in their beauty mock the morn?

Long may ye shine, as dark, as bright, as young,
(Shall age e'er harm ye?) as complete in power,
As when from out Verona's midnight bower,
Upon the moonlight first your glances hung,
And filled with love the rich enamoured air,
And made the fair more fair!
Long may ye shine, undimmed by storm or cloud,
Uninjured, unconsumed by grief or pain;
Your high, heroic spirit never bowed,
Your love ne'er lost, your tears ne'er shed—in vain!

Long may she live and shine, and have no fear
Of fatal fortune or the touch of time,
To whom belongs your beauty without peer,
To whom belongs this slight and careless rhyme!

OLD MAIDS.

BY MISS SEDGWICK.

I would by no means persuade you or any woman to prefer single life. It is not the "primrose."—Nothing less than a spirit of meekness, of self-renunciation, and of benevolence, can make a woman who has once been first, happy in a subordinate and second best position. And this, under ordinary circumstances, is the highest place of a single woman.—Depend upon it, my dear young friend, it is safer for most of us to secure all the helps to our virtues that attend a favorable position; besides, married life is the destiny Heaven has allotted to us, and therefore best fitted to awaken all our powers, to exercise all our virtues, and call forth all our sympathies. I would persuade you that you may give dignity and interest to single life, that you may be the cause of happiness to others, and of course happy yourself—for when was the fountain dry while the stream continued to flow? If single life, according to the worst view of it, is a moral desert, the faithful, in their passage through it, are refreshed with bread from Heaven and water from the rock.

I shall conclude with a true story. The parties are not known to you. The incidents occurred long ago, and I shall take the liberty to assume names: for I would not even at this late day, betray a secret confided to me, though time may long since have out-lawed it. My mother had a schoolmate and friend whom I shall call Agnes Gray. Her father was a country clergyman with a small salary, and the blessings that usually attend it—a large family of children. Agnes was the eldest, and after followed a line of boys as long as Banquo's. At last, some ten years after Agnes, long waited and prayed for, appeared a girl, who cost her mother her life.

The entire care of the helpless little creature devolved on Agnes. She had craved the happiness of possessing a sister, and now, to a sister's love, she added the tenderness of a mother. Agnes' character was formed by the discipline of circumstances—the surest of all discipline. A host of turbulent boys, thoughtless and impetuous, but kind-hearted, bright and loving, had called forth her exertions and affections, and no one can doubt, either as lures or goads, had helped her on the road to heaven. Nature had, happily, endowed her with a robust constitution, and its usual accompaniment, a sweet temper; so that what were mountains to others, were mole-hills to Agnes. 'The baby,' of course, was the pet lamb of the fold. She was named, for her mother, Elizabeth; but instead of that queenly appellation, she was always addressed by the endearing diminutive of Lizzy. Lizzy Gray was not only the pet of father, brother and sisters at home; but the play thing of the village.

The old women knit their brightest yarn into tippets and stockings for 'the minister's motherless little one'; (oh, what an eloquent appeal was in those words!) the old men saved the 'red-cheeked' applies for her; the boys drew her, hour after hour, in her little wagon, and the girls made her rag babies. Still she was not, in any disagreeable sense, an enfante gatee. She was like those flowers that thrive best in warm and continued sunshine. Her soft hazel eye, with its dark sentimental lashes, the clear brunette tint of her complexion, and her graceful flexible lips, truly expressed her tender, loving and gentle spirit. She seemed formed to be sheltered and cherished; to love and be loved; and this destiny appeared to be secured to her by her devoted sister, who never counted any exertion or sacrifice that procured an advantage or pleasure for Lizzy. When Lizzy was about fourteen, a relative of the family, who kept a first-rate boarding school in the city, offered to take her for two years, and give her all the advantages of her school, for the small consideration of fifty dollars per annum. Small as it was, it amounted to a tithe of the parson's income.—It was well known, that, in certain parts of our country, every thing (not always discreetly) is sacrificed to the hobby—education. Still the prudent father, who had already two sons at college, hesitated—did not consent till Agnes ascertained that, by keeping a little school in the village, she might obtain half the required sum. Her father, brothers, and friends all remonstrated. The toils of a school, in addition to the care and labor of her father's family, was, they urged, too much for her—but she laughed at them. 'What was labor to her if she could benefit Lizzy—dear Lizzy!' All ended, as might be expected, in Lizzy going to the grand boarding school. The parting was a great and trying event in the family. It was soon followed by a sadder. The father suddenly sickened and died—and nothing was left for his family but his house and well kept little garden. What now was to be done? College and schools to be given up. No such thing. In our country, if a youth is rich he ought to be educated; if he is poor, he must be. The education is the capital whereby they are to live hereafter. It is obtained in that mystrious but unfailing way—'by hook and by crook.'

The elder Grays remained in college.—Agnes enlarged her school; learned lessons in Mathematics and Latin one day, and taught them the next; took a poor, accomplished young lady from some broken down family in town into partnership, and received a few young misses as boarders into her family. Thus she not only was able to pay 'dear Lizzy's' bills regularly, but to aid her younger brothers. Her energy and success set all her attractions in a strong light, and she was talked about, and became quite the queen of the village.

I think it was about a year after her father's death, that a Mr. Henry Orne, a native of the village, who was engaged in a profitable business at the south, returned to pass some months at his early home. His frequent visits to the parsonage, and his attentions on all occasions to Agnes, soon became matter of very agreeable speculation to the gossips of the village. "What a fine match he would be for Agnes!—such an engaging, well-informed young man, and so well off!" Agnes' heart was not steel; but though it had been exposed to many a flame she had kindled, it had never yet melted.

"Pardon me, Mrs. Seton, for interrupting you—was Agnes pretty?"

"Pretty?" The word did not exactly suit her.—At the time of which I am now speaking, she was at the mature age of five-and-twenty, which is called the perfection of womanhood. Prettiness is rather appropriate to the bud than the ripened fruit. Agnes, I have been told, had a fine person—symmetrical features, and so charming an expression that she was not far from beautiful, in the eyes of strangers, and quite a beauty to her friends and lovers. Whether it were beauty, manners, mind, or heart, I know not; one and all probably—but Henry Orne soon became her assiduous and professed admirer. Till now, Agnes, had lived satisfied and happy with subordinate affections.—She had never seen any one that she thought it possible she could love as well as she loved those to whom Nature had allied her. But now the sun arose, and other lights became dim—"not that she loved Cesar less, but she loved Rome more." Their mutual faith was plighted, and both believed, as real lovers do, that the world never contained so happy, so blessed a pair, as they were.

Lizzy's second year at school was nearly ended, and one month after her return the marriage was to be solemnized. In the mean time, Agnes was full of the cares of this world. The usual preparations for the greatest occasion in a woman's life are quite enough for any single pair of hands; but Agnes had to complete her school term, and the possibility of swerving from an engagement never occurred to her.

Lizzy arrived, as lovely a creature as she had appeared in the dreams of her fond sister. In the freshness and untouched beauty of her own existence, just freed from the trammels of school, her round cheek glowing with health, and her heart overflowing with happiness. 'Here is my own dear Lizzy,' said Agnes, as she presented her to Henry Orne, 'and if you do not love me for any thing else, you must for giving you such a sister.'

Henry Orne looked at Lizzy and thought, and said 'the duty would be a very easy one.' 'For the next, month,' continued Agnes, 'I shall be incessantly occupied, and you must entertain one another. Henry has bought a nice little pony for me, Lizzy, and he shall teach you to ride, and you shall go over all his scrambling walks with him—to Skycliff, Rose-glen and Beech-cove—the place he says nature made for lovers; but my poor lover has had to accommodate himself to my working-day life, and woo me in beaten paths.'

The next month was the most joyous of Lizzy's life—every day was a festival. To the perfection of animal existence in the country, in the month of June, was added the keen sense of all that physical nature conveys to the susceptible mind.

Wherever she was, her sweet voice was heard ringing in laughter, or swelling in music that seemed the voice of irrepressible joy—the spontaneous breathing of her soul. To the lover approaching his marriage, Time is apt to drag along with leaden foot, but to Henry Orne he seemed rather to fly with Mercury wings at his heels; and when Agnes found herself compelled by the accumulation of her affairs, to defer her wedding for another month, he submitted with a better grace than could have been expected. Not many days of this second term had elapsed, when Agnes, amidst all her cares, as watchful of Lizzy as a mother of an only child, observed a change stealing over her. Her stock of spirits seemed suddenly expended,—her color faded,—her motions were languid, and each successive day she became more and more dejected. 'She wants rest,' said Agnes to Henry Orne; 'she has been unnaturally excited, and there is now a re-action. She must remain quietly at home for a time on the sofa, in a darkened room, and you, Henry, I am sure, will, for my sake, give up you riding and walking for a few days, and stay within doors, and play on your flute, and read to her.' Agnes' suggestions were promptly obeyed, but without the happy effect she anticipated. Lizzy, who had never before had a cloud on her brow, seemed to have passed under a total eclipse. She became each day more sad and nervous. A tender word from Agnes—sometimes a look, would make her burst into tears.

'I am miserable, Henry, said Agnes, 'at this unaccountable change in Lizzy—the doctor says she is perfectly free from disease—perhaps we have made too sudden a transition from excessive exercise to none at all. The evening is dry and fine, I wish you would induce her to take a little walk with you. She is distressed at my anxiety, and I cannot propose any thing that does not move her to tears.

'It is very much the same way with me,' replied Henry, sighing deeply, 'but if you wish it, I will ask her.' He accordingly did so—she consented, and they went out together.

Agnes retired to her own apartment, and there, throwing herself upon her knees, she entreated her Heavenly Father to withdraw this sudden infusion of bitterness from her brimming cup of happiness. Try me in any other way," she cried, in the intensity of her feeling, and, for the first time in her life, forgetting that every petition should be in the spirit of "Thy will be done," "try me in any other way, but show me the means of restoring my sister—my child, to health and happiness!"

She returned again to her little parlor. Lizzy had not come in, and she sat down on the sofa near an open window, and resigned herself to musings, the occupation, if occupation it may be called, of the idle, but rarely, and never of late, Agnes!

In a few moments Lizzy and Henry returned, and came into the porch adjoining the parlor.—They perceived the candles were not lighted, and concluding Agnes was not there, they sat down in the porch.

"Oh, I am too wretched!" said Lizzy. Her voice was low and broken, and she was evidently weeping.

"Is it possible," thought Agnes, "that she will express her feelings more freely to Henry than to me? I will listen. If she knows any cause for her dejection, I am sure I can remove it."

"Why, my beloved Lizzy," replied Orne, in a scarcely audible voice, will you be so wretched? why will you make me so, and forever, when there is a remedy?"

"Henry Orne!" she exclaimed, and there was resolution and indignation in her voice. "If you name that to me again, I will never, so help me God, permit you to come into my presence without witnesses. No, there is no remedy, but in death. Would that it had come before you told me you loved me—before my lips confessed my sinful love for you—no, no—the secret shall be buried in my grave."

"Oh, Lizzy, you are mad—Agnes does not, cannot love as we do. Why sacrifice two to one?—Let me, before it is too late, tell her the whole, and cast myself on her generosity."

"Never, no never—I now wish, when I am in her presence, that the earth at her feet would swallow me up; and how can you, for a moment, think I will ask to be made happy—that I could be made happy at her expense? No I am willing to expiate with my life, my baseness to her—that I shall soon do so is my only comfort—and you will soon forget me—men can forget, they say."

"Never—on my knees, I swear never!"

"Stop, for mercy's sake, stop. You must not speak another such word to me—I will not hear it." She rose to enter the house. Agnes slipped through a private passage to her own apartment.

She heard Lizzy ascending the stairs. She heard Henry call after her, "One word, Lizzy—for mercy's sake, one last word." But Lizzy did not turn. Agnes heard her feebly drag herself into the little dressing room adjoining the apartment, and after, there was no sound but the poor girl's suppressed, but still audible sobs.

None but He who created the elements that compose the human heart, and who can penetrate its mysterious depths, can know which of the sisters was most wretched at that moment. To Agnes, who had loved deeply, confidingly, without a shadow of fear or distrust, the reverse was fatal. To Lizzy, who had enjoyed for a moment the bewildering fervors of a young love, only to feel its misery, that misery was embittered by a sense of wrong done to her sister. And yet it had not been a willing, but an involuntary, and resisted, and most heartily repented, wrong. She had recklessly rushed down a steep to a fearful precipice, and now felt that all access and passage to return was shut against her. Agnes without having one dim fear—without any preparation—saw an abyss yawning at their feet—an abyss only to be closed by self-immolation.

She remained alone for many hours—she resolved—her spirit faltered—she re-resolved. She thought of all Lizzy had been to her, and of all she had been to Lizzy, and she wept as if her heart would break. She remembered the prayer that her impatient spirit had sent forth that evening. She prayed again, and a holy calm, never again to be disturbed, took possession of her soul.

There is a power in goodness, pure, self-renouncing goodness, that cannot be overcome, but overcometh all things.

Lizzy waited till all was quiet in her sister's room. She heard her get into bed, and then stole softly to her. Agnes, as she had done from Lizzy's infancy, opened her arms to receive her, and Lizzy pillowing her aching head on Agnes' bosom, softly breathing,—'My sister—mother!'

"My own Lizzy—my child, answered Agnes. There was no tell-tale faltering of the voice. She felt a tear trickle from Lizzy's cold cheek on her bosom, and not very long after both sisters were in a sleep that mortals might envy, and angels smile on.

The rest you will anticipate, my dear Anne. The disclosure to the lovers of her discovery, was made by Agnes in the right way, and at the right time. Every thing was done as it should be by this most admirable woman. She seemed, indeed, to feel as a guardian angel might, who, by some remission of his vigilance, had suffered the frail mortal in his care to be beguiled into evil. She never, by word, or even look, reproached Lizzy. She shielded her, as far as possible, from self-reproach, nor do I believe she ever felt more unmixed tenderness and love for her, than when, at the end of a few months, she saw her married to Henry Orne.

My story has yet a sad supplement. Madame Cotin, I believe it is, advises a story-teller to close the tale when he comes to a happy day—for, she says, it is probable no other will succeed it. Poor Lizzy had experience of this sad mutability of human life. Hers was chequered with many sorrows.

Lapses from virtue at eight-and-twenty, and at sixteen afford very different indications of character: and I think you cannot expect much from a man, who, at eight-and-twenty, acted the part of Henry Orne. He was unfaithful in engagements with persons less merciful than Agnes Gray. He became inconstant in his pursuits—self-indulgent, and idle, and finally intemperate in his habits. His wife—as wives will—loved him to the end.

Agnes retained her school, which had become in her hands a profitable establishment. There she labored, year after year, with a courageous heart, and serene countenance, and devoted the fruits of her toils to Lizzy, and to the education of her children.

I am telling no fiction, and I see you believe me, for the tears are trembling in your eyes—do not repress them, but permit them to embalm the memory of an old maid.

NIGHT—By James Montgomery.

Night is the time to rest;
How sweet, when labors close,
To gather round an aching breast,
The curtain of repose;
Stretch the tired limbs and lay the head
Upon our own delightful bed!

Night is the time for dreams;
The gay romance of life,
When truth that is and truth that seems
Blended in fantastic strife,
Ah! visions less beguiling far
Than waking dreams by day-light are!

Night is the time for toil;
To plough the classic field,
Intent to find the buried spoil
Its wealthy furrows yield;
Till all is ours that sages taught,
That poet's sung, or heroes wrought.

Night is the time to weep;
To wet with unseen tears
Those graves of memory, where sleep
The joys of other years;
Hopes that were angels in their birth,
But perished young, like things of earth!

Night is the time to watch;
On ocean's dark expanse,
To hail the Pleiades, or catch
The full-moon's earliest glance
That brings unto the home sick mind
All we have loved and left behind.

Night is the time for care;
Brooding on hours misspent,
To see the spectre of despair
Come to our lonely tent;
Like Brutus midst his slumbering host,
Startled by Cæsar's stalwart ghost.

Night is the time to muse:
Then from the eye the soul
Takes flight and with expanding views
Beyond the starry pole,
Descries athwart the abyss of night
The dawn of uncreated light.

Night is the time to pray;
Our Saviour oft withdrew
To desert mountains far away,
So will his followers do,
Steal from the throng to haunts untrod,
And hold communion there with God.

Night is the time for death:
When all around is peace,
Calmly to yield the weary breath,
From sin and suffering cease;
Think of heaven's bliss, and give the sign
To parting friends—such death be mine!

OH! DEEM NOT THAT I LOVE HER LESS.

Unnoticed I have followed her
To mansions of the proud,
Without a thought that passes me,
Among the menial crowd;
But while they praise the dazzling gems,
That on her forehead shine;
One fait'ring voice has breathed her name,
She little thinks 'tis mine.

I gaze at midnight on the lamp
That from her chamber gleams,
Morn finds me there, but I am not
The subject of her dreams;
Of me she thinks not, tho' for her
My health and strength decline,
And when she looks upon my tomb,
She'll little think 'tis mine.

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

THE FAIR QUERIST.

"Oh! did you see that curious sight!
The shooting stars, the other night?"
The laughing Harriet cries.
"O yes—methinks I see them now,"
Replies her lover with a bow.
"Good gracious!—tell me where and how!"
"In Harriet's sparkling eyes."

"Well—did you see that foolish show,
The strange fantasticals, you know,
Who dress'd so very queer?"
"O yes—I see them, every day,
Parading up and down Broadway—
And see one now." "O tell me!—say!".
"In Harriet's walking gear."

"Pshaw—you've no taste!—But, do you know,
Perpetual motion's all the go,
With both the old and young?
If you had now the skill or wit,
Or genius, to discover it."
"I think I've made the lucky hit."
"Indeed! O tell me, e'er you quit?"
"It moves in Harriet's tongue."

CORRECT ANSWER.—"Might your name be Smith?" said a lout to that oddest of odd fellows, I——, after a rap at his door loud enough to disturb the occupants of a churchyard. "Yes, it might, but it aint by a long chalk."

"Timothy," said a certain Grocer to his clerk "I've joined the Temperance Society, and it won't look well to sell liquor, in future, before folks. So if any person call for any, you must take them into the back room."

THE STANDARD.—Judge a man by his actions—a poet by his eye—an idler by his fingers—a lawyer by his leer—a player by his strut—a boxer by his sinews—an Irishman by his swagger—an Englishman by his rotundity—a Scotchman by his shrug—a justice by his frown—a great man by his modesty—an editor by his coat—a tailor by his agility—a fiddler by his elbow—and a woman by her neatness.

VERY MALAPROPOS.—A certain turf Baronet who had been struck with the charms of a pretty fille de chambre of his lady's, lately stumbled on her on the staircase and could not resist the temptation of imprinting some kisses, which the damsel cordially returned. Flushed with excitement, Sir ——— exclaimed, "By Jove, Susan, your lips are sweeter than your mistress's." "Lord, Sir, (said the blushing soubrette, with the greatest naivete,) only think! why now if John, my lady's own man, does not say the same." The Baronet's courage cooled down to zero.

As the celebrated and haughty Seymour, speaker of the house of commons in England, was riding out one day in his carriage, he met a large west country wagon, which he was astonished did not turn out of the road in compliment for his dignity. As the wagoner approached him Seymour raised his gold-headed cane and made a stroke at him. The driver, falling back his whip's length, soon convinced the courtier of his error; who, smarting under his well applied lash, exclaimed, Sirrah, villain, I'll commit you to jail; I'll send you to the devil; dont you know who I am—I am the Speaker, rascal! D—n you then said the countryman, why didn't you speak before!

Some years before we became settled in life, it was our custom to spend a few weeks in the spring and autumn, for the purpose of fishing and sporting at a small village on the south shore. Our landlady was very ugly and rather cross; but blessed with "one fair daughter," with whom we occasionally took a walk in a grove by moonlight, the interval of sentimental speech being filled up by an owl solo, and the perspective being generally a rainy walk home afterwards. She was tall and wrote poetry; at least we have a song of her's entitled, "Why do I weep?" to the the tune of "There is nae luck about the house," in slow time—It having been ascertained that quick tunes are the most pathetic ones when sung slow. A beautiful thing we thought it, then, and were surprised that she did not put "Alice Gray" hors decombat. We thought also that we were in love; and are very glad it was not so, for she turned out fat and eat mustard with her roast beef. She married a particular friend of ours, and we wished him joy. We wish him so still, but doubt the efficacy of our prayers, inasmuch as his wife's countenance resembled an illuminated dial plate. All this, however, has nothing to do with the anecdote. During the interval between one of our spring and fall visits, our hostess became converted. We were ignorant of this, but as we drove up to the door at which she was standing, we imagined something was in the wind, for her face seemed to "shed a browner horror o'er" the front yard. "Good morning, Mrs. T——," throwing our valise from the chase, and preparing to alight.

"We can't accommodate you, sir."
"Have you boarders?"
"No, sir, but we can't take you."
"Havn't I always conducted myself like a gentleman?"
"Yes, I spose so—in a worldly way; but you are a sinner, young man,—you dont believe as I do."
"Why, what do you believe that I dont?"
"You don't believe that we shall all be damned."
"No, not all—but I believe that some will."
"How many?"
"Fifty thousand, perhaps,"
"Well, that's better than nothing."

ANECDOTE OF GENERAL JOHN SULLIVAN.—The Portsmouth Journal is mistaken in representing this distinguished character as of Scotch descent. The father of John and James—the President of New Hampshire and the Governor of this Commonwealth—came to this country in 1723; from the Emerald Isle, where he and his wife were both born. Both the sons were educated also by the father. There is a good story told, on the best authority, of John's first debut as a lawyer, which illustrates the character of the man.

He went to Durham, N. H. accompanied by his brother James, who was younger, for the purpose of opening an office. The settlers there, chiefly Irish, were opposed to such an innovation. They wanted no lawyers at all at all. They soon gave John to understand as much, and indeed told him he must make off, in so many words. John thought of it awhile, consulted James, and finally made a deliberate proposal, to settle the matter by a personal combat between himself and his brother, on one side, and any two of the Irishmen they might select on the other; if the former whipped they should stay; or if otherwise, they should go. The challenge was accepted, and decided in favor of John and James; and never were two men more popular than they ever after.

Sharp Penetration.—"You don't love me, I know you don't," said a young married lady to her husband. "I give you credit, my dear, for a keen penetration," was the consoling reply.

EXCUSES FOR NOT ATTENDING CHURCH.—No other time to myself. Mean to have a walk into the country. No fresh air but on Sundays. Caught cold last night at a party—intend nursing myself to-day. Don't like a Liturgy—always praying for the same thing. Don't like Extempore Prayer—don't know what is coming. Don't like the organ—it's too noisy. Don't like singing without music—makes one sad. Can't bear extempore sermons—too frothy. Dislike a written sermon—too pressing. Nobody to-day but our own minister. A stranger to-day; don't like strangers—always so much to say. Can't keep awake when at church: snored aloud last time I was there—shan't risk it again.—Charleston Mercury.

Sandy Wood's Plan of Supporting a Wife.—The eccentric and well-remembered Sandy Wood, an eminent surgeon in Edinburgh, at the outset of his professional career, married Miss Veronica Chalmers, second daughter of George Chalmers, W. S. a highly respectable man, and to whose honesty and integrity his fellow citizens bore the most ample testimony, by giving him the popular title of "Honest George Chalmers." This marriage turned out very fortunate for both parties, though before it took place, there was danger of its being impeded by the poverty of the intended husband. It is related that Mr. Wood, on obtaining the consent of the lady, proposed himself to Mr. Chalmers as his son-in-law, when that gentleman addressed him thus: "Sandy, I have not the smallest objection to you, but I myself am not rich, and should therefore like to know how you are to support a wife and family?" Mr. Wood, putting his hand in his pocket and taking out his lancet-case, with a scarlet garter rolled round it, presenting it to him, said, "I have nothing but this, sir, and a determination to use my best endeavors to succeed in my profession." Mr. Chalmers was so struck with this straight-forward and honest reply, that he honestly exclaimed, "Veronica is yours."

FIRST INTRODUCTION OF THE SHERIDANS TO FASHIONABLE LIFE.—It was at the house of the present Dowager Countess of Cork, then as now, remarkable for its admixture of literary and fashionable society, that the late Duchess of Devonshire was struck by the singing of a very beautiful young woman, who was represented to her as a professional person, just married to an Irish gentleman of literary connections.—"She is a charming creature, and I should like very much to have her at Devonshire-house," said the Duchess. "But what shall we do about the husband? He is such an odd-looking person, and the Duke so much dislikes strangers! I scarcely know how to manage it." Yet within a year the odd-looking man was the most favourite guest and distinguished ornament of the circle of Devonshire House; the Duke himself, a scholar of no mean attainments, being often unable to tear himself away from the fascinating society of the all-accomplished Sheridan!

There are people in the world who are continually speaking of their ill-luck. One of these discontented beings was passing through our streets the other day. Something glistened on the side walk, and he stooped to pick it up. It was an old fashioned pistareen. "Dang it," he exclaimed, in a tone of petulant disappointment, "if any body else had found it, it would have been a quarter dollar."

Never did an Irishman utter a better bull than did an honest John, who being asked by a friend, "Has your sister got a son or a daughter," answered, "Upon my life, I do not yet know whether I am an uncle or aunt."

A SCENE AT COURT.—An attorney, whose practice was confined to the crown or half-crown business, delayed later than usual to obtain the necessary instructions from his clients, insomuch that he was obliged and allowed to accompany some of them into the dock where the gaoler, being a bit of a wag, locked the legal adviser in with his accused clients. The Court was about to sit, and the attorney perceiving his awkward predicament, was precipitately effecting his retreat over the spikes, upon which he was caught just at the moment that Chief Justice Downes appeared at the side curtain of the bench, and spying the clambering agent, cried out—"Gaoler, look to your prisoner." Attorney—"My Lord, my Lord!" Chief Justice—"Gaoler, I say, your prisoner." Attorney—My Lord, I'm an attorney." Chief Justice—"I'm sorry for it—I'm mighty sorry for it." Attorney—"My Lord, I'm guilty of —— Chief Justice—"Prisoner, don't commit yourself." Attorney—"There's no charge against me, my Lord," (somewhat recovering.) Chief Justice—"You'll be tried by your King and your country." Attorney—"I say, my Lord, I'm not a prisoner—there's no indictment whatever." Chief Justice—"You'll be discharged, then, by proclamation." The convulsion of laughter was here so great and so general, that it was some time before an explanation could be effected. —Stewart's Despatch.

A BLACK JOKE.—Blackee passing along Fleet street, was astonished at hearing a voice call out,—"How d'ye do, massa Mungo, how d'ye do, Snowball," and on looking up, observed it proceed from a parrot, in a splendid gilt cage. "Aha, massa Parrot," said Blackee, "you great man here; you live in gold house now, but me know you fader very well, he live in de bush."

A very virtuous lady was desired by another to teach her what secrets she had to preserve her husband's favour:—"It is," said she, "by doing all that pleases him, and by enduring all that displeases me."

A traveller on the continent, visiting a celebrated cathedral, was shown by the Sacristan among other marvels, a dirty opaque phial. After eyeing it some time, the traveller said, 'Do you call this a relic? 'Sir,' said the Sacristan, indignantly, 'it contains some of the darkness that Moses spread over the land of Egypt.'

A NEW METHOD OF TAKING A PROFILE.—Early on a very cold morning, a travelling profile cutter called at the house of a wag, and inquired if he wanted a profile taken. "Yes," was his reply, "I want yours taken from my door."

WITTY INFERENCE.—A lady asked a child how long it took to build Rome, and was answered a night. "How do you make that out?" She replied, "Because mamma told me it was not built in a day."

A person very fond of playing at nine pins, and who when excited was rather apt to sputter out with great vehemence anything which came uppermost in his mind, fell a-sleep one day in meeting, when all at once he bawled out loud enough to stun the whole congregation—"I'll be to-totally condemned if they aint all down—no two ways about that—SET 'EM UP."

A MERRY PLACE.—"Which, my dear lady, do you think the merriest place in the world?"

"That immediately above the atmosphere that surrounds the earth, I should think."

"And why so?"

"Because, I am told that there, all bodies lose their gravity."

OLD GRIMES'S SON.

Old Grimes's boy lives in our town,
A clever lad is he,—
He's long enough, if cut in half,
To make two men like me.

He has a sort of waggish look,
And cracks a harmless jest,
His clothes are rather worse for wear,
Except his Sunday's best.

He is a man of many parts,
As all who know can tell,
He sometimes reads the list of Goods,
And rings the Auction bell.

He's kind and lib'ral to the poor,
That is, to number one,
He sometimes saws a load of wood,
And piles it when he's done.

He's always ready for a job—
(When paid)—whate'er you choose.
He's often at the Colleges,
And brushes boots and shoes.

Like honest men, he pays his debts,
No fear has he of duns,
At leisure he prefers to walk,—
But when in haste he—runs

In all his intercourse with folks,
His object is to please,
His pantaloons curve out before,
Just where he bends his knees.

His life was written some time since,
And many read it through,
He makes a racket when he snores,
As other people do.

When once oppress'd he prov'd his blood
Not covered with the yoke,
But now he sports a freeman's cap,
And when it rains, a cloak!

He's dropped beneath a southern sky,
He's trod on northern snows,
He's taller by a foot or more—
When standing on his toes!

In church he credits all that's said,
Whatever preacher rise,
They say he has been seen in tears,
When dust got in his eyes!

A man remarkable as this—
Must sure immortal be,
And more than all, because he is Old Grimes' posterity! J. W. B.

LAY OF A LAZY PUNSTER.

'Tis well I'm born a gentleman,
And that enough I've got,
But I would fain earn what I eat,
Yet do—I don't know what.

A sailor I would never be,
To risk my life as nought;
Your tars are loose and ignorant,
Though some say they're all taut!

Then for a valiant colonel I'm Too old to gain renown;
Besides, a kernal of my (y) ears
Ought not now to come down!

A public private I'd not be,
To be at all commands;
I'm sure I should not like to walk
My arms borne in my hands!

A doctor's an uneasy life,
No time to sleep or sup,
For unwrapp'd, just laid down to sleep,
You're in the cold rapt up!

Then he who would a poet be,
Must maddest be of men;
For my part I am not a calf,
To take up with a pen.

I ne'er could learn a cobbler's trade,
Or if I on should get,
I should make pumps like engineers,
That is, they'd water let!

Were I a moody sexton, I Should hate while I add mire;
I see no fun in delving down,
And getting little hire!

A SHORT SOLILOQUY

BY MY MAIDEN AUNT—AGED FORTY.

Scene discovers my Aunt at her toilette. Time—New Year's morning.

And 'tis e'en so? (abstractedly) Another year;
Alack! how time glides on;
Another year; 'tis very queer;
Another year has gone.

Heav'n help me! I am growing old;
And ah! (sorrowfully) I fear the Colonel
And the world too, begins to think
My youth is not eternal.

Why! a grey hair! (starts and shrieks) Pshaw! what a fool!
Thank heaven! it is a thread;
How it did frighten me; Oh! la;
Dear me I'm all but dead. (out of breath)

(Takes up the thread and tries to put it through a needle.)

Bless me! I do declare, 'tis strange;
'Tis odd I cannot thread it;
I know my sight is good enough; (tries again.)
But pshaw! I do not need it. (throws it down.)

No, no; my hair, I'm sure, is quite
As black as 't ever was, (very complacently)
And to complain of my eye-sight,
I'm certain I've no cause.

My skin is smooth and white as snow, (approaching
My eyes have all youth's fire, the mirror)
There is no wrinkle on my brow,
My teeth are all entire.

And then my form is en bon point,
My step is light and spry, (cuts a pigeon wing)
There's many a spruce young Miss, that looks
Not half as young as I.

In fine my New York visiters, (slowly retiring with Though one year more is gone, her face toward Can't estimate my age, I think, the mirror.)
Much over—twenty-one! [Exit. X.Y.Z.

My Pretty Kate.

My pretty Kate, I do not know
The reason why I love you so
Devotedly; but when a day
Without thy presence drags away,
I feel as though a year had flown
And I the while been left alone.

Yet when a day I spend with thee,
It scarcely seems an hour to me;
Yet tho' no suicide am I,
Nor very anxious am to die;
My soul unmoved the hope surveys,
That Kate may shorten all my days.

What is the end of fame? 'tis but to fill
A certain portion of uncertain paper;
Some liken it to climbing up a hill,
Whose summit, like all hills, is lost in vapour;
For this men write, speak, preach, and heroes kill,
And bards burn what they call their "midnight taper,"
To have, when the original is dust,

LORD BYRON.

This distinguished poet was born at Dover, January 22, 1788. He was the grandson of admiral Byron, and succeeded to the title and estates of his uncle, when only ten years old. By the eccentricity and misconduct of several members of the Byron family, the reputation of the family, so ancient and honorable in English history, had been considerably tarnished. One of them was indicted for murder, in killing his relation, Chaworth, and only escaped by pleading his peerage. The father of the poet having deserted his wife and only child, Mrs. Byron returned with her son to Aberdeen, where she lived in narrow circumstances and great seclusion. The singular circumstances attendant upon the early childhood of Lord Byron, seem to have operated very materially in the formation of his very striking character. Until seven years of age, the care of his education rested solely on his mother, to whose excusable, but injudicious indulgence, some of the waywardness by which it was subesquently marked, was, even by himself, attributed. Being then of a weakly constitution, that disadvantage, added to a slight malformation of one of his feet, naturally rendered him an object of peculiar solicitude; and, to invigorate his constitution, he was not sent to school, but allowed to brace his limbs upon the mountains in the neighborhood; where he early acquired associations, and encountered a mass of legendary lore, which indisputably nursed his poetical tendencies. At seven years he was sent to the grammar school of Aberdeen, whence he was taken, when but ten years old, and sent to Harrow. While there, he fell in love with Miss Chaworth, the daughter and heiress of the gentleman who had fallen by the hand of his great uncle, whom he met with on his occasional visits to Newstead; but the attachment amounted to a mere interchange of billets and poetical epistles. At nineteen he quitted the university and took up his residence at the family seat of Newstead Abbey, where he employed himself chiefly in amusement. In 1807 he arranged his "Hours of Idleness," which, on their publication, drew down a severe attack from the Edinburg Review, which ridiculed the poems so much as to rouse their author, who soon after came out with his celebrated "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," which was even more severe and illnatured, in many particulars, than the original attack.

About this time Lord Byron fell into a career of dissipation too prevalent among the possessors of rank and fortune; thus he became deeply involved before he attained legal maturity. In 1809, he determined to travel, and left England for Lisbon, whence he proceeded through Spain, Greece, Turkey &c. In 1811 he returned home, but not in time to close the eyes of his mother, who breathed her last a short time before he arrived at Newstead. In 1812 appeared Childe Harold, which, in spite of its moral defects, produced a great impression. Eulogy flowed in from all quarters, and his first entry into public life may be dated from this time. The Giaour, the Bride of Abydos, the Corsair, Lara, and the Siege of Corinth, followed each other in quick succession. In January, 1815 he married Miss Anna Isabella, only daughter of Sir Ralph Millbank Noel; her fortune was not large, but it was soon dissipated by the splendors which followed the nuptials. A formal separation, after the birth of a daughter, took place the following year, which produced a great sensation, in the midst of which Lord Byron left England, never to return. At Rome he completed his third canto of Childe Harold, Manfred, and other poems. In 1819 appeared Mazeppa and Don Juan. In 1822 he wintered at Genoa, and began first to indulge those feelings in regard to the efforts of the Greeks to throw off the Mohammedan yoke, which determined him to lend them the aid of his person, purse and influence. In 1823 he established himself in Cephalonia, where he advanced about $50,000 for the relief of Missolonghi, for which place he sailed some time afterwards in person. Here he exerted himself in a variety of ways to aid the cause of the Greeks. In the month of April, 1824, while riding out, he got extremely wet, the result of which was a violent fever, which proved fatal on the 19th. His body was conveyed to England, and interred near his own seat of Newstead Abbey. He left a natural child in Greece, to whom he bequeathed five thousand pounds, on condition of her not marrying an Englishman.

ALLAN M'TAVISH.

In a secluded nook of one of the wildest and most solitary parts of the Argyllshire coast, where it is washed by the Atlantic waters, there stood, some thirty years ago, the cottage of a Highland fisherman. The traveller who should now look for its site would probably be unrewarded for his pains;—it has long since mouldered from the face of the earth. A few stones, half buried among sand, are all that remain to indicate where the humble dwelling of human hearts once sanctified the bosom of solitude;—yet were its walls the mute witnesses of love as deep—of agony as intense—as ever lived and burned within the soul beneath the roof of palaces. Nature is no respecter of places. The passions, which obey her call, belong alike to all her children; the decay which follows her footsteps is the appointed lot of all things wherein these children have a path here below.

At the period of which I spoke the cottage stood at the very base of a range of lofty and precipitous cliffs, which, retiring in a semicircle from the shore at that particular spot, left a recess at their feet, whose only opening was to the sea. This little nook, not more than half an acre in extent, was during high water entirely separated from communication with the world beyond it, as the sea flowed up to the base of the rocky walls which, girding it on either side, extended themselves along the coast. The only mode by which it was at such times possible to obtain egress from it, was one accessible only to the foot of a daring and fearless craigsman, that of scrambling on hands and knees across the face of rocks, which, beetling over a sea so high and tempestuous, looked as though they defied the pigmy efforts of man to surmount their mighty ramparts. Yet this feat, frightful as it would have appeared to one unaccustomed to it, had more than once been accomplished by the bold and sure-footed inhabitants of the coast, by means of strong wooden poles, ropes to aid their descent, and a judicious method of availing themselves of every projecting bush, or tuft of heather, to assist their toilsome progress. At ebb-tide, a narrow strip of sand, turning the projecting headlands, afforded a path whereby to gain the wider extent of shore beyond them, some three-quarters of a mile along which was situated a row of fisherman's cottages, lying on the right hand, after leaving the solitary cabin above mentioned, which stood aloof and secluded from all, yet wearing a character very superior to that of the others. Its appearance, in fact, was nearer that of the neat and carefully-kept abodes of peasantry on a Lowland gentleman's estate, than the slovenly hut of a northern fisherman. Some pains had been taken to form a little garden beside it, at the sheltering foot of the cliff; and these pains—screened as it was from all winds, even from those blowing off the sea, at least in ordinary weather—had been attended with considerable success. Every thing around the door was kept in extreme order; and the narrow strip of grass on which the sand had not encroached, served as a little bleaching-green to the fisherman's young and lovely Lowland wife, on which she was often to be seen spreading out her clothes, and with her baby laid upon the grass beside her, while awaiting the return of her husband from his fishing; at which time it was her usual custom to repair to the beach, in order to assist him in carrying up his nets to the house.

Allan Mac Tavish, her husband, was a tall and handsome young Highlander, who had, about two years previous to the time of which I write, arrived in that part of the country to settle, with his newly-married wife. He was a native of the coast, and had been bred a fisherman from childhood; but some time before his marriage he had left the country, to accompany his foster-brother, a young Highland gentleman, to the bridge of Allan, a watering-place in Stirlingshire, whither he had been ordered for his health. The young laird's affection for his foster-brother was such that he could not endure to be separated from him, and Allan left his fishing to go with him. The laird returned no more; he died in the Lowlands, but Allan Mac Tavish came back, enriched by a small legacy from him, and accompanied by one of the prettiest girls in all Stirlingshire as his wife. From that time they had continued to reside in the Cove of Craigna-varroch, as the spot where their cottage stood was named, to all appearance the happiest of couples. They were doatingly attached to each other; and when, on returning from his fishing, Allan Mac Tavish sat down beside his clean and cheerful hearth, with his infant on his knee, while his wife spun, or mended his nets beside him, he at least felt that the world did not contain for him a spot so blessed as his own little home.

But there was one heart in the group that felt as though it dared not be happy. Margaret Weir, the young wife of Allan, loved her husband with a depth and intensity of affection which had led her to do as she had done—to violate filial duty for his sake, but which could not teach her to forget the fault she committed, or the parent whom she had deserted; and the consciousness of her disobedience was with her, in her happiest hour, to sink her heart as with a weight of lead. She was the only child of a wealthy farmer, originally from Ayrshire, who had come during his daughter's childhood, immediately after the death of his wife, to settle in Stirlingshire, not far from the Bridge of Allan. Andrew Weir was one of those who still retain, almost in all their original strictness, the peculiar tenets, and ideas of the Cameronians; of whom there are many to be found at the present day in the wild and lonely districts of the south-western part of Scotland. His notions of family discipline, and of strict seclusion from those who held a different doctrine from his own, were extremely rigid;—yet notwithstanding these, the affection which he had borne his daughter was very great,—nor had the harmony subsisting between them ever experienced any interruption, until the arrival of Allan Mac Tavish near their place of residence, and his subsequent acquaintance with Margaret, first broke in upon the calm tenor of her life, by introducing sensations to which her heart had never before been awakened. The intimacy of his daughter with the young Highlander had continued for a considerable time, ere Andrew Weir became aware of it; for Margaret knew her father's prejudices too well to dare to make him acquainted with her lover. It came to his knowledge by accident, and his anger was proportionably great. In common with many of his countrymen, Andrew entertained an extreme dislike to Highlanders, which dislike, in the present instance, received tenfold confirmation from the circumstances of Mac Tavish being a Catholic. He would have considered himself as signing the warrant for his daughter's eternal perdition, had he not instantly forbidden all intercourse between them.

At this conjuncture, Allan's foster-brother died, and left him the legacy already mentioned, but with his death, at the same time, ceased all the reasons for Allan's remaining absent from his own country. He contrived an interview with Margaret ere he should depart. It is needless to linger on an oft-told tale. The struggle between filial affection and all-powerful love in the heart of the unsophisticated girl, was severe and long continued; while the religious feelings in which she had been educated contributed to swell the amount of reluctance and of terror with which she contemplated the step to which she was urged. But love at last prevailed.—Margaret fled from her father's house with her lover. They instantly proceeded to Edinburgh, where they were married by a Catholic priest; and then sought the lonely solitude of Allan's old Argyllshire mountains. But Margaret,—so strict had been the filial obedience in which she was brought up, so severe the religious faith of her youth,—could not find happiness the portion of her married life, notwithstanding all the kindness of her husband, the loveliness of her infant, and the peacefulness of her home. The image of her gray-haired father going down in his sorrow to a lonely grave, mourning, in bitterness of heart the sin and the falling away of his only child, was ever before her eyes. She concealed from her husband the remorse which embittered her happiness; but often when his boat was on the sea, and she was alone in her little dwelling with her infant,—not a sight or a sound of a human being near,—nothing but the sea-birds screaming from the cliffs, and the sea making wild music to their song, as it splashed and roared against the rocks that shut out the cove from the world—often at such an hour, would Margaret look back to the image of the cheerful farm-house in the green sunny holm by Allan water;—to the blazing ingle, by whose side stood her old father's chair,—to the venerable form of that now forsaken father, as he opened "the big Ha' Bible," to begin the evening worship; while she sat by his side, and the farm servants formed a circle around. Alas! her accustomed seat was empty now. The name of the undutiful daughter was heard no more in the dwelling of her childhood. Had she indeed still a father? or had her guilty desertion not broken his heart and sent him to a death-bed which no filial hand had smoothed?—Then would she press her babe to her heart, while the tears of bitter and fruitless penitence fell on its innocent face, and pray to God that her sin might not be visited on it; nor be punished in her own person by a like instance of ingratitude in her own child. The return of her beloved husband might for a time dispel these miserable thoughts; but still they came again when he left her—sometimes even when he was by her side. And when, as often happened, his boat was out in rough and tempestuous weather, the anxiety and the terror of poor Margaret were indeed terrible. She seemed ever haunted by some mysterious dread of punishment through the means of her warmest affections—her husband or her child.

There came a bright sunny day in April, when the sun set calmly and cloudlessly, leaving a long train of light over the sea. Allan Mac Tavish went to his bed at sunset, bidding his wife awaken him at eleven at night. It would be high tide in about an hour after that time, when his boat would be most easily floated off; and he, in common with the fishermen who lived in the huts already mentioned, farther along the coast, were then to depart on their expedition. Margaret determined accordingly to sit up until that hour, in order to obviate any danger of not waking in proper time, had she laid down to sleep. But as the night darkened in, and all became stillness and silence in the cottage, an unwonted drowsiness crept over her: in spite of all her efforts, her eyes closed—thoughts wavered before her mind in confused and shapeless forms, till they gradually melted away into dreams; and leaning her head on a chair beside the low stool on which she had seated herself, she sank into a profound sleep.

When at last she opened her eyes, which was with a sudden start, she perceived her husband standing on the floor, and nearly dressed. Casting her eyes towards a silver watch (the gift of Allan's foster-brother,) which hung upon the wall, she perceived by the firelight that it was after eleven: and hastily rose from her seat, in that confusion of ideas which attends a hurried awakening from sleep.

"Margaret, dear," said her husband kindly, "what for did ye stay out of bed? I never knew till I wakened, and saw ye sleeping there."

"Have I no' been i' my bed?" exclaimed Margaret, as she looked around her, "Oh, ay, I mind it a' noo. I just felt asleep sittin' aside the fire. An', Allan, whar are ye gaun e'en noo?"

"Where am I gaun?" returned Allan. "Where would I be gaun? Ye're no awake yet, Margaret, dear. I am for the boat, lass."

"The boat!" almost shrieked Margaret, as the recollection seemed to rush upon her; "the boat!—Oh no, Allan, ye maunna' gang the nicht, Allan. Ye maunna' gang?"

"Not gang to night!" exclaimed he in astonishment. "And what for no? I must gang in half an hour's time. And gang ye to your bed, hinny, and tak a sleep."

"Oh, Allan," said Margaret, bursting into tears, "be guided by me, and take na the boat the nicht, or we'se a' rue it."

"What's the matter, Margaret?" anxiously inquired he. "What's pitten that in yer head?"

"I had a dream e'en now, Allan," sobbed Margaret, "that warned me no to let ye gang. I fell asleep, and I dreamed that I was sitten' here, i' the ingleneuk, an, waitin' till it was time to wauken ye for the fishin', an' on a sudden the door opened, and my auld father cam ben, and stood afore me; there whar you're stannin', Allan. An' I thocht he leukit gay an' stern-ways at me; an' says he, 'Margaret,' says he, 'tell your husband to bide at hame the nicht, and no gang to the fishin', or ye'll may be rue it when ye canna' mend it.' And wi' that he turned roun', and gaed awa' again, or ever I had pooer to speak till him; an' I startit up, and wankenet wi' the fricht. But do, Allen!" and Margaret again burst into a flood of weeping: "it's na for nocht that I've seen the auld man this nicht. Be ruled by the warnin' he gied me, and dinna gang to the fishin'."

"Hoots, bairn," exclaimed her husband, "your father liked na' me. It was mair like he wad warn ye no' to let me gang, to hinder me from some good than from ill. No, no, Margaret dear, gang I must, this night."

Margaret again wept, wrung her hands, and implored her husband not to go. But superstitious as every Highlander is, on this night it appeared that his wife's mysterious dream made no impression upon Allan Mac Tavish. His spirits, on the contrary, had seldom seemed so high or so excited. He led Margaret to the door;—shewed her the calm, clear sky, brilliant with stars, and the full spring-tide coming so tranquilly into the little bay;—asked her with a kiss, if this were a night to let a dream frighten him from his fishing; and without awaiting farther remonstrance, strode to the place where his boat was moored: and as he pushed it from the shore, turned his head, once more to utter a light and laughing farewell. "Gang to your bed, my bonny Peggy," he said, "and be up belyae the morn, to see the grand boat load o' fish that I'll bring ye back."

Margaret stood upon the shore and watched his boat as it doubled the headland, until, through the darkness, her straining eyes could no longer discern it; heedless the while of the still advancing tide, that now laved her feet. She dried her tears, and looked up to the calm heaven, where not a cloud obscured the dark-blue bosom of night; till at last, half reassured by her husband's cheerful anticipations, half cheered by the serene aspect of the weather, she returned to the cottage, and after commending him in a fervent prayer to the protection of heaven, she replenished the fire with peats, and lay down beside her child, where, in a short time, she fell into a tranquil sleep.

How long Margaret had slept she knew not; but it could not have been very long, for, except the fitful flashes of the firelight, all was darkness in the cottage, when she was suddenly awakened by a loud prolonged sound. She started up in bed, and listened, in an agony of apprehension that almost froze her blood in her veins. It was no dream,—no delusion, she distinctly heard the loud wild howling of the awakened blast, raging overhead as though it would tear off the very roof of the cottage, and scatter it in its fury. She had sunk to sleep when all was stillness on earth and in heaven. She awoke to a tumult as awful as though all the winds had at once been set free from their cave, and dispatched to waste their wrath upon the vexed bosom of the sea. But, deeper and more awful than the winds, there came another sound—the raging of the waters, as they rose in their might, and dashed themselves with a loud booming roar upon the cliffs. Margaret sprang from her bed, and, undressed as she was, rushed to the cottage door. The instant she raised the latch, the force of the tempest dashed it open against the wall. She looked out into the night. A pitchy darkness now brooded over all things; every star seemed blotted from the face of heaven; but dimly through the gloom she could descry the white crests of the waves, as they surged and lashed the beach within a few yards of the cottage door. The tide had risen to a height almost unexampled on that coast beneath the influence of a vernal storm; it had far overpassed its usual limits within the Cove of Craignavarroch; and on the rocks, beyond which it could not go, it was breaking high,—high over head,—with a noise like thunder. Never was change in the weather more sudden and more complete. Margaret stood for a minute in speechless horror and dismay; then, rushing back into the cottage, she fell upon her knees, and held up her hands to heaven: "Lord God!" she exclaimed—"have mercy! have mercy!" She could not utter another word. She hid her face in her hands, and sobbed in agony.

Still the tempest raged, and the waves roared on. Margaret dressed herself, and carefully covered her infant, whose sweet sleep was unbroken by the fearful tumult. Again she went to the door, and stood, looking into the night, regardless of the wind, which drove a heavy rain against her face. She strained her ears to distinguish some sound,—some cry,—amid the pauses of the hurricane. As well might she have striven to distinguish the low music of the woodland bird, as the wildest shriek that ever broke from the lips of despair and anguish, in the midst of an uproar of the elements like that which she had dreamt of hearing. But those from whom that sound must have come, were far—far beyond where her ear could catch their voices.

She closed the door, returned into the room, and knelt down again on the floor, burying her face and closing her ears, as if to shut out the noise of the tempest; while her whole frame shook with the gasping sobs which brought no tears to relieve her; and at every fresh howl of the blast, she shuddered and her limbs shrank closer together. She tried to pray,—but the words died upon her lips. She could not speak;—she could not even think;—she only felt as though she were all one nerve—one thrilling nerve—quivering beneath repeated and torturing pangs.

On a sudden the wind sunk,—completely sunk. For the space of three minutes there was not a breath heard to blow. Margaret raised her head, and listened. All was still. She was about to spring from the ground, when back—back it came again,—the hideous burst—the roaring billow of the augmented hurricane, as though it had gained strength and fierceness from its brief repose! Back it came—shaking the very cottage walls, and rattling the door and little window as though it would burst them open,—and Margaret flung herself forward again with a wild shriek, and clasped her hands over her ears again, to deaden the sound.

Then she started from the ground, as a thought struck her, which seemed to bring some faint gleam of hope. "I kenna whan the storm began," said she to herself. "He may never hae won farrer nor the houses ayont the craigs yonder;—or they may hae pitten back time to ashore there; and he'll be biddin' the mornin's licht, and the fa' in' o' the wind, or he come back here again. Oh, ay, that'll just be it! Surely—surely that'll be it," she repeated, as if to assure herself of the truth of what she had said. She took down the watch from the nail on which it hung, and looked at it by the fire-light. The hand pointed to half past two. "Oh! will it never be day?—will it never be light again?" she exclaimed as she replaced it, "that I may win yont the craigs, and see gin he be there." She went again to the door. All was darkness still, and wild uproar without. No gleam of light to announce the far distant dawn. A fresh burst of wind drove her back. "Oh!" she exclaimed, wringing her hands; "I gin he had been advised by me! But the dochter that left her father's gray hairs to mourn her, deserves na' a better lot. It was e'en owre muckle guidness to gie me a warnin' o' it."

The long dark hours of that terrible night dragged on—on—in all the torments, the unutterable torments of suspense. And if any thing can aggravate those torments, it is enduring them amid darkness. There is something awfully indefinite at all times in the thick impenetrable gloom of night:—but when that gloom is armed with terrors, and big with dangers, to which the very impossibility of ascertaining their extent adds tenfold in the imagination, then it is that we truly feel the full amount of its awfulness. At last a faint dim glimmer of gray light began to break over the trembling waves.—Again Margaret was at her cottage door. It was barely light enough to show her how mountainous were the billows that dashed and raved upon the shore,—how thick and heavy were the clouds that darkened the sky. The wind howled with unabated fury, and the rain drove against her by fits. She could just discern, by the faint day-break, the white foam that marked the tops of the waves, which were now ebbing from the bay; while a thick rib of sand and sea-weed upon the grass not far from the door, marked how fearfully high they had flowed through the night. She cast an eager glance towards the cliffs. Surely by this time it would be practicable to scramble along their base, and to reach the path on the shore of the fishermen's huts?—She felt as though it were impossible to remain another instant in that state of terrible uncertainty. But then, her infant! She durst not carry it out by so hazardous a path, in the wet, cold, dark dawn; and should she leave it behind, it might wake and miss her! She turned distractedly into the room, and approached its bed. It was still in a sound and tranquil sleep; and with a desperate effort of resolution, she determined to make the attempt. She approached the door, and fastened her plaid firmly around her, ere she stepped forth upon her scarce distinguishable way.

At that moment, ere Margaret could cross the threshold, a strange sensation came across her. A cold air rushed past her, like that occasioned by the rapid approach and still more rapid passing of some undiscernible object. A dimness came over her sight; she could not be said to see—but she felt as if something cold and wet had glided swiftly by her, with a scarce perceptible contact, into the house. A damp dew overspread her forehead; her limbs trembled and bent beneath her, as she instinctively turned round, and looked into the room which she had quitted. The light was so faint, that within the house it scarce vanquished the darkness; but a bright gleam flashing up from the fire, showed every thing in the room distinctly for an instant's space; and by that gleam, Margaret beheld the figure of her husband standing within the door, pale, as it seemed to her, and dim, and shadowy, with the water dripping from his clothes and hair. The fire-flash sunk as instantaneously as it had shone, and all was again obscurity, as she dropped upon the floor in a swoon.

When the unhappy wife again opened her eyes, and recovered her perceptions of what was passing around her, she found herself laid in her own bed. The bright glorious sunshine was beaming in at the cottage window, as though to mock her desolation. Several women, from the neighbouring fishing village, were in the room, one of whom held in her arms the infant of Margaret, whom she was endeavouring to soothe and quiet; and at the moment she raised her head, the door opened, and upon the self-same spot where she had that morning beheld his likeness stand, she saw the lifeless corpse of her drowned husband, borne in the arms of some of his comrades, who had with difficulty rescued it from the devouring waves; yet rescued it too late to save.

Some weeks afterwards, as the household of Andrew Weir, were rising from their evening devotions, a gentle knock was heard at the door of the kitchen in which they were all assembled. The old farmer himself went to open it. A female figure, pale, thin, and wasted, clad in deep mourning, and holding an infant in her arms, stood trembling before him. He gazed on her for a moment in silent uncertainty, then desired her to "come in bye."

"Father," said she, clasping her attenuated hands together, "do ye no ken me?" An electric shock of recognition seemed to run through the old man's face. He sank into a chair that stood by the door, and with averted face waved his hand, as though to bid the intruder be gone.

"Father!" she exclaimed, flinging herself on the ground before him, and clasping his knees, "the hand of the Lord has been upon me, for my fau't, I cam' back to crave your pardon, or I dee. Oh! dinna cast me aff! I hae been sair chasteesed; sair, sair, chasteesed."

A murmur of sympathy and compassion arose from the assembled group of old and attached domestics. The farmer remained silent yet a little space, with his gray head bowed upon his hands, and his whole frame shaking with strong convulsive shudderings. He raised his face at last; and while every feature working with emotion, he stretched forth his hand to the weeping culprit at his knee—

"Rise, Margaret," he said, in a broken voice, "rise, my bairn, the Lord grant ye peace and pardon, as freely as your father dees the nicht." And the penitent and mourning daughter was clasped once more to her parent's heart.

Margaret died not long after in her father's arms, rejoicing with humble faith in her release. The infant son remained with his grandfather; and the cottage which had been the scene of his parents' brief time of wedded love—of his mother's widowed anguish, was left uninhabited, and speedily fell to decay, which was accelerated by the encroachments of the sea upon the Cove. Some broken expressions which escaped from Margaret, regarding the apparition seen by her on the morning of her husband's death, being speedily circulated among the inhabitants of the coast, deterred any one from ever attempting again to fix a habitation in the Cove of Craignavarroch. The place acquired the reputation of being "uncanny;" and at present, there are few fishermen who would willingly put in there after nightfall, however rough the sea, and however distant their destined haven. It stands in the solitude and the desolation befitting the theatre of such a tale.

THE SEAMAN'S GRAVE.—By J. S. Walker.

The moon rode high in the cloudless sky,
The ship o'er the billows rolled,
When silent and slow, we bore from below
The corse of our ship-mate bold.

On the gratings placed, in his hammock laced,
The ensign floating o'er him:
We thought of his worth, but no words found birth,
To tell the love we bore him.

And we weighted him well, with shot and shell,
That far beneath the wave,
His sleep might be, secure and free
In the deep, deep coral cave.

A while we stood, in musing mood,
Then lowered him o'er the side,
And we wistfully took a parting look,
As he sank on the dark blue tide.

Some bubbles arose, from his place of repose,
And as quickly forever fled:
We gave but one tear—but that was sincere—
One sigh—for the honoured dead.

But the sea-bird's wail, and the stormy gale,
And the roar of the ocean wave,
Sang deep and long, the funeral song
O'er the seaman's traceless grave,

ABYSSINIAN ZOOLOGY.

TRAITS OF THE HYENA.

Hyenas generally inhabit caverns and other rocky places, from whence they issue under cover of the night to prowl for food. They are gregarious, not so much from any social principle, as from a greediness of disposition and a gluttonous instinct, which induce many to assemble even over a scanty and insufficient prey. They are said to devour the bodies which they find in cemeteries, and to disinter such as are hastily or imperfectly inhumed. There seems, indeed, to be a peculiar gloominess and malignity of disposition in the aspect of the hyena, and its manners in a state of captivity are savage and untractable. Like every other animal, however, it is perfectly capable of being tamed.—A contradictory feature has been observed in its natural instincts. About Mount Libanus, Syria, the north of Asia, and the vicinity of Algiers, the hyenas, according to Bruce, live mostly upon large succulent bulbous roots, especially those of the fritillaria, &c., and he informs us that he has known large patches of the fields turned up by them, in search for onions and other plants. He adds that these were chosen with such care, that after having been peeled, if any small decayed spot became perceptible, they were left upon the ground.

In Abyssinia, however, and many other countries, their habits are certainly decidedly carniverous; yet the same courage or fierceness, which an animal diet usually produces, does not obviously manifest itself in this species. In Barbary, according to Bruce, the Moors in the daytime seize the hyena by the ears and drag him along, without his resenting that ignominious treatment, otherwise than by attempting to draw himself back; and the hunters, when his cave is large enough to give them entrance, take a torch in their hands and advance straight towards him, pretending at the same time to fascinate him by a senseless jargon. The creature is astounded by the noise and glare, and allowing a blanket to be thrown over him, is thus dragged out. Bruce locked up a goat, a kid and a lamb all day with a Barbary hyena which had fasted, and he found the intended victims in the evening alive, and uninjured. He repeated the experiment, however, on another occasion, during the night, with a young ass, a goat, and a fox, and next morning he was astonished to find the whole of them, not only killed, but actually devoured, with the exception of some of the ass's bones!

ANECDOTE TOLD BY BRUCE.

Many a time in the night, when the king had kept me late in the palace, and it was not my duty to lie there, in going across the square from the king's house, not many hundred yards distant, I have been apprehensive they would bite me in the leg. They grunted in great numbers around me, though I was surrounded with several armed men, who seldom passed a night without wounding or slaughtering some of them. One night in Maitsha, being very intent on observation, I heard something pass behind me towards the bed, but upon looking round could perceive nothing.

Having finished what I was then about, I went out of my tent, resolved directly to return, which I immediately did, when I perceived large blue eyes glaring at me in the dark. I called upon my servant with a light, and there was the hyena standing nigh the head of the bed, with two or three large bunches of candles in his mouth. To have fired at him, I was in danger of breaking my quadrant or other furniture, and he seemed, by keeping the candles steadily in his mouth, to wish for no other prey at that time. As his mouth was full, and he had no claws to tear with, I was not afraid of him, but with a pike struck him as near the heart as I could judge. It was not till then he showed any sign of fierceness; but upon feeling the wound, he let drop the candles, and endeavoured to run up the shaft of the spear to arrive at me; so that, in self-defence, I was obliged to draw a pistol from my girdle and shoot him; and nearly at the same time my servant cleft his scull with a battle-axe.

HIPPOPOTAMUS HUNTING.

Mr. Salt and his party stationed themselves on a high overhanging rock, which commanded one of the favorite pools, and they had not remained long before a hippopotamus rose to the surface, at a distance of not more than 20 yards. He came up at first very confidently, raising his enormous head out of the water, and snoring violently. At the same instant their guns were discharged, the contents of which appeared to strike directly on its forehead; on which it turned its head with an angry scowl, and making a sudden plunge, sank to the bottom, with a peculiar noise, between a grunt and a roar. They for some minutes entertained sanguine hope that he was killed, and momentarily expected to see his body ascend to the surface. But it soon appeared that a hippopotamus is not so easily slain—for he rose again, ere long, close to the same spot, and apparently not much concerned at what had happened, though somewhat more cautious than before. They again discharged their pieces, but with as little effect as formerly; and although some of the party continued firing at every one that made his appearance, they were by no means certain that they produced the slightest impression upon any of them. This they attributed to their having used leaden balls, which are too soft to enter his almost impenetrable scull.

It appears from what they witnessed, that the hippopotamus cannot remain more than five or six minutes under water. One of the most interesting parts of the amusement was to witness the perfect ease with which these animals quietly drop down to the bottom; for the water being exceedingly clear, they could distinctly see them as low as twenty feet below the surface.

RHINOCEROS HUNTING.

The eyes of a Rhinoceros are extremely small; and his neck is stiff, and his head cumbrous; he seldom turns round so as to see any thing that is not directly before him. To this, according to Bruce, he owes his death, as he never escapes if there is as much plain ground as to enable a horse to get in advance. His pride and fury then induce him to lay aside all thoughts of escaping but by victory. He stands for a moment at bay, then starting forward, he suddenly charges the horse, after the manner of the wild boar, which animal he greatly resembles in his mode of action. But the horse easily avoids his ponderous onset, by turning short aside, and this is the fatal instant; for a naked man, armed with a sharp sword, drops from behind the principal hunter, and unperceived by the Rhinoceros, who is seeking to wreak his vengeance on his enemy, he inflicts a tremendous blow across the tendon of the heel, which renders him incapable of either flight or resistance.

In speaking of the large allowance of vegetable matter necessary to support this enormous living mass, we should take into consideration the vast quantity of water which it consumes. No country, according to Bruce, but such as that of the Shangallaga, deluged with six months rain, full of large and deep basins, hewn out by nature in the living rock, which are shaded by dark woods from evaporation, or one watered by extensive rivers which never fall low or to a state of dryness, can supply the vast draughts of its enormous maw. As an article of food he is himself much esteemed by the Shangalla; and the soles of his feet, which are soft, like those of a camel, and of a grisly substance, are peculiarly delicate. The rest of the body resembles that of the hog, but it is coarser, and is pervaded by a smell of musk.

THE MOUNTAIN VULTURE.

On the highest summit of the mountain Lamalmon, while the traveller's servants were refreshing themselves, after the fatigue of a toilsome ascent, and enjoying the pleasures of a delightful climate, and a good dinner of boiled goat's flesh, a Lammergeyer suddenly made his appearance among them. A great shout, or rather cry of distress, attracted Bruce's attention, who, while walking towards the bird, saw it deliberately put its foot into the pan, which contained a huge piece of meat prepared for boiling. Finding the temperature somewhat higher than it was accustomed to, among the pure gushing springs of that romantic region, it suddenly withdrew its foot, but immediately afterwards settled upon two large pieces which lay upon a wooden platter, into which it thrust its claws, and carried them off. It disappeared over the edge of a "steep Tarpeian rock," down which criminals were thrown, and whose remains had probably first induced the bird to select that spot as a place of sojourn. The traveller, in expectation of another visit, immediately loaded his rifle, and it was not long before the gigantic bird reappeared.

As when a vulture on Imaus bred,
Whose snowy ridge the roving Tartar bounds,
Dislodging from a region scarce of prey,
To gorge the flesh of lambs or yearling kids
On hills where flocks are fed, flies to'ards the springs
Of Ganges or Hydaspes, Indian streams;
But in his way lights on the barren plains
Of Sericans, where Chinesse drive
With sails and wind their cany wagons light;

so landed the Lammergeyer within ten yards of the savory mess, but also within an equal distance of Bruce's practised rifle. He instantly sent his ball through his body, and the ponderous bird sank down upon the grass with scarcely a flutter of its outspread wings.

SERPENTS.

There are not many serpents in Upper Abyssinia, and few remarkable animals of that class even in the lower counties; if we except a species of boa, commonly so called, which attains to the length of twenty feet. It feeds upon antelopes and the deer kind, which it swallows entire. Its favorite places of resort are by the sides of grassy pools of stagnant rivers, where it lies in ambuscade, ready to encircle in its horrid folds whatever quadruped approaches.

A remarkable and noted serpent of these parts, is the cerastes, or horned viper. It hides itself all day in holes in the sand, where it lives in little chambers similar and contiguous to those of the jerboa. Bruce kept a pair of them in a glass jar for two years, without any food; they did not appear to sleep even in winter, and cast their skins during the last days of April. This poisonous reptile is very fond of heat; for however warm it might be during the day, whenever Bruce made fire at night it seldom happened that fewer than half a dozen were found burnt to death by approaching too close to the embers.

It seems there are Crocadiles also in Abyssinia, of a greenish color and enormous size. The natives are so exceedingly afraid of them, that in the hottest weather they dare not bathe where they are seen, and will not even wash their hands at the water's edge, without a companion with them to throw stones at the Crocadiles.

The following excellent sketch, full of humor and philosophy, we take from a number of the London Magazine, published many years ago. It is one of the best productions of that rich and tranquil writer, Charles Lamb. The sketch purported to come from the papers of one R—d, a respectable London merchant, of a humorous turn of mind, who was placed in the pillory for some alleged fraud on the revenue. Our readers of course know generally, that in this place of punishment, the culprit is exposed on a scaffold, within a kind of frame, to the missiles, foul and hurtful, of a metropolitan mob; being turned every quarter of an hour, to face different points of the compass. The attendant who manages these turnings of the culprit, goes by the name of Jack Ketch. An address to him from the prisoner, opens the piece.

REFLECTIONS IN THE PILLORY.

SCENE, OPPOSITE THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.

Time,—Twelve to One—Noon.

KETCH, my good fellow, you have a neat hand. Prithee adjust this new collar to my neck gingerly. I am not used to these wooden cravats. There, softly, softly. That seems the exact point between ornament and strangulation. A thought looser on this side. Now it will do. And have a care in turning me, that I present my aspect due vertically. I now face the orient. In a quarter of an hour I shift southward—do you mind? and so on, till I face the east again, travelling with the sun. No half points I beseech you; N. N. by W. or any such elaborate niceties. They become the shipmen's card, but not this mystery. Now leave me a little to my own reflections.

Bless us, what a company is assembled in honor of me! How grand I stand here! I never felt so sensibly the effect of solitude in a crowd. I muse in solemn silence upon the vast miscellaneous rabble in the pit there. From my private box I contemplated with mingled pity and wonder the gaping curiosity of those underlings. Rosemary Lane has emptied herself of the very flower of her citizens to grace my show. Duke's place sits desolate. What is there in my face that strangers should come so far from the east to gaze upon it?—(Here an egg narrowly misses him.) That offering was well meant, but not so cleanly executed. By the tricklings it should not be either myrrh or frankincense. Spare your presents, my friends; I am no-ways mercenary. I desire no massive tokens of your approbation. I am past those valentines. Bestow those coffins of untimely chickens upon mouths that water for them. Comfort your addle spouses with them at home and stop the mouths of your brawling brats with such Olla Podridas; they have need of them. (A brick bat is let fly.)—

Discase not, I pray you, dismantle not your rent and ragged tenements, to furnish me with architectural decorations which I can excuse. This fragment might have stopped a flaw against snow comes. (A coal flies.) Cinders are dear gentlemen. This nubbling might have helped the pot boil, when your cuttings from the shambles at three ha'pence a pound shall stand at cold a simmer. Now, south, about, Ketch. I would enjoy australian popularity.

What, my friends from over the water! Old benchers; flies of a day; ephemeral Romans; welcome! Doth the sight of me draw souls from limbo? Can it dispeople purgatory; ha!

What am I, or what was my father's house, that I should thus be set up a spectacle to gentlemen and others? Why are all faces like Persians at the sunrise, bent singly on mine alone? It wont be esteemed an ordinary visnomy, a quotidian merely. Doubtless these assembled myriads discern some traits of nobleness, gentility, breeding, which hitherto have escaped the common observation,—some intimation, as it were of wisdom, piety, valor, and so-forth. My sight dazzles; and if I am not deceived by the too familiar pressure of this strange neckcloth that envelopes it, my countenance gives out lambent glories. For some painters now, to take me in the lucky point of expression!—the posture so convenient; the head never shifting, but standing quiescent in a sort of natural frame. But these artizans require a westerly aspect. Ketch, turn me.

Something of St. James' air in these new friends. Now if Sir Thomas Lawrence be any where in that group, his fortune is made forever. I think I see some one taking out a crayon. I will compose my whole face to a smile which yet shall not so predominate, but that gravity and gaiety shall contend as it were; you understand me? I will work up my thoughts to some mild rapture; a gentle enthusiasmus; which the artist may transfer in a manner warm to the canvass. I will inwardly apostrophize my tabernacle.

Delectable mansion, hail! House, not made of every wood! Lodging, that pays no rent; airy and commodious: which owing no window tax, art yet all casement out of which men will have such pleasure in peering, that they will sometimes stand an hour together to enjoy thy prospects! Cell, recluse from the vulgar! Quiet retirement from the great Babel, yet affording sufficient glimpses into it! Pulpit, that instructs without note or sermon book, into which the preacher is inducted without tenth or first fruits! Throne, unshared, and single, that disdainest a Brentford competitor! Honor without co-rival! Or hearest thou rather, magnificent theatre, in which the spectator comes to see and to be seen? From the giddy heights I look down upon the herd who stand with eyes upturned, as if a winged messenger hovered over them, and mouth open, as if they expected manna. I feel, I feel the true Episcopal yearnings. Behold in me your flock, your overseer! What, though I cannot lay hands, because my own are laid, yet I can mutter benedictions. True otium cum dignitate! Proud Pisgah eminence! Pinnacle sublime! O Pillory, 'tis thee I sing! Thou young brother to the gallows, without his rough and Esau palms; that with ineffable contempt surveyest beneath thee the grovelling stocks, which claim presumptuously to be of thy great race. Let that low wood know that thou art far higher born! Let that domicile of groundling rogues and earth kissing varlets envy thy preferment, not seldom fated to be the wanton baiting house, the temporary retreat of poet and of patriot. Shades of Bastwich and of Pryme hover o'r thee —Defoe is there, and more greatly daring Shebbeare—from their (little more elevated) stations that look down with recognitions. Ketch, turn me.

I now veer to the north. Open your widest gates, thou proud Exchange of London, that I may look in as proudly!—I stand upon a level with all kings. They and I from equal superciliousness, o'erlook the plodding, money hunting tribe below; who busied in their sordid speculations, scarce elevate their eyes to notice your ancient, or my recent grandeur. The second Charles smiles on me from three pedestals.* He closed the Exchequer; I cheated the Excise. Equal our darings, equal be our lot.

Are those the quarters? 'tis their fatal chime. That the ever winged hours would but stand still! But I must descend, from this dream of greatness. Stay, stay, a little while, importunate hour hand. A moment or two, and I shall walk on foot, with the undistinguished many. The clock speaks one. I return to common life. Ketch, let me out.

Several statues of Charles II., are placed near the London Exchange, without and within.

BEAUTIFUL QUOTATION.—The Rev. D. Griffin, in his speech before the American Education Society, appealed to "the sex, who, like ministering angels, love to hover about the chambers of sickness"—who owe so much to Christianity; and introduced this beautiful quotation:

Not she with trait'rous kiss her Saviour stung,
Not she denied him with unholy tongue;
She, when apostles shrunk, could danger brave,
Last at the cross, and earliest at the grave.

Written for the Casket.

WHAT I'D BE.

I would be a summer cloud
Soaring through the ether proud,
Flitting round the azure sky,
Or in the sunbeams tow'ring high;
Who'd be then as gay as I?
"These have but a transient day,
Summer clouds soon pass away,—
Winter comes with chilling gloom
And sends them shivering to the tomb!"

Then I'd be a blushing rose
That around its fragrance throws,
Blooming on my parent stem,
With brightness like some orient gem;
Who'd be then as gay as I?
"Roses beautiful may bloom
Sending round their rich perfume;
But how soon their beauty fly,
Scarce they're blooming ere they die!"

Then I'd be a little dove,
Soaring thro' the clouds above,
Now to lands remote I'd fly,
Now I'd swell my wood-notes high;
Who'd be then as gay as I?
"Thou on pinions light may'st soar,
And the distant land explore;
Though awhile may'st gaily sing,
But death shall seize thee on the wing!"

Then I'd be a twinkling star,
Seen amid the mists afar;
And though clouds o'erspread the sky,
Still I'd hold my place on high;
Who'd be then as gay as I?
"Mortal, every thing shall pall,
Stars shall from their sockets fall;
And know, while o'er this earth you plod,
All that is shall change but GOD."

INSANITY.

It is difficult to account for the severity of treatment which the insane have received. For many centuries the sentiment seems to have been almost unquestioned, that this class of invalids should be terrified and lashed and goaded to the serene enjoyment of their mental powers. Celsus says, that this unnatural excitement of the mind, must be allayed by starvation, chains, and the lash.

Willis, an eminent English physician, who wrote about two centuries since, recommends manacles, fetters and stripes, and insists upon coarse food, rough clothing, a hard bed, and treatment generally rigid and severe. It mattered not whether the patient was a hardy sailor, or the refined lady, who had been nurtured from the table of dainties, and had reposed on the couch of down.

Savages, who generally suppose that insanity results from demoniacal possession, have a shadow of reason on their side, when they endeavor to whip the demon out of the body into which he has intruded. But it is indeed strange, that civilized nations, with more enlightened views as to the nature of the disease, should so long have followed this cruel, unnatural prescription. Every measure seems to have been adopted which ingenuity could devise to torture and terrify the poor maniac into sanity. Among these instruments of torture 'the bath of surprise' is one, which not unfrequently has proved fatal. The unsuspecting patient, perhaps in feeble health, and with a nervous system highly excited, is blindfolded and led across a room, when he is unsuspectedly plunged into a bath of cold water, the sides of which are carefully guarded with cushions. The sudden shock and fright are so great, that not in a few instances the patient has never recovered from them.

Sometimes the patient would be seated in a chair, and from a trap-door fourteen feet above his head, a large pail of water would suddenly be poured upon him. Enfeebled in body by damp dungeons, degraded by heavy chains, and exasperated by unkind treatment, it is not strange that so few should recover. A farmer in Scotland who kept a private mad-house, was in the habit of yoking a number of the insane in his plough, and goading them on to plough his fields.

There are but few so far lost to self respect as not to feel, and keenly feel, such degradation.

Insanity does not always blunt the sensibilities; it not unfrequently excites them to greater acuteness. A nobleman of England, of fine and cultivated mind, suddenly became insane, and manifested so much violence that it was necessary to confine him with the straight waistcoat. The restraint and imagined insult exasperated him to the highest degree. Offended pride increased his delusion and ravings. One day his physician urged him to walk in the garden for exercise. 'No sir!' he repied, 'I will not while in this degraded condition!' (glancing at the straight waistcoat) 'But, my Lord, no one will see you there.' 'Ah sir!—what a base man you must be to think it is being seen!—No sir, it is not my body's degradation—it is my mind that is degraded and suffers.'

This man while most furiously insane, felt the ignominy to which he was exposed by confinement and restraint.

There are perhaps no institutions in which oppression and abuse may be more easily practised than in asylums for the insane. Persons perfectly sane have not unfrequently been confined for long periods, and subjected to the most rigorous treatment, in consequence of the representations of others, who from motives of interest or revenge desired their seclusion. It has been by no means a difficult task to have a sane man shut up in the wards of a lunatic hospital. A man of slight eccentricities of character has a large fortune which relatives are anxious to secure. They place him in some private institution. The man is indignant at this treatment, and his indignation passes for raving. Perhaps he makes a great effort to control his feelings, and most earnestly denies being the subject of any mental derangement. His very denial is considered as evidence against him, and his moderation is regarded as the proverbial cunning with which the lunatic endeavors to effect his escape.

A man of undisturbed understanding, suddenly surprised by the servants of a lunatic asylum, with hand-cuffs ready, and a coach waiting to carry him off, would infallibly exhibit some signs easily construed into proofs that he was "not right in his head." A man of shy and eccentric habits, if exposed to a similar outrage, would manifest his feelings in moods still more peculiar, and furnish abundant proofs of undeniable madness; and if the attempt were made on an individual of a susceptible nervous system, of irritable temperament, suffering too under some temporary cause of discomposure or affliction, no one who has ever attended to the inequalites of his own mind, can doubt that his mental government would be sufficiently shaken to warrant any restraint or coercion on the part of those who would seldom be found reluctant to restrain and coerce.

Once confined, the very confinement is admitted as the strongest of all proofs, that the man must be mad. When, after suffering so much wrong, he has an opportunity of speaking to the appointed visiters of the house, supposing him to be confined where he can be visited, and supposing him not to give way to his feelings, but to control them,—his entreaties, his anxious representations, his prayers for liberty,—what do they avail. The keeper of the asylum is accustomed to all these things. He knows that the truly and dangerous insane can act in the same way; and from ignorance, in the absence of any bad intention, he entirely disregards the patient's words. The visiters, knowing nothing of the shades of disorderd minds, or not reflecting upon them, are told that they see the 'best of him;' that it is one of his 'good days;' that he is often dreadfully violent; or that if left to himself he will commit suicide; and they shrink from the responsibility of deciding, where they know it is very possible they may be wrong!

It is a much more difficult matter than is generally imagined, for a person suspected of insanity to convince others that he is not insane. In a lunatic asylum you may talk for hours with individual patients, without elicting a single remark which detects their insanity. The most furious maniacs have hours and days of apparent freedom from any unnatural excitement. Many persons are insane upon one subject only. They will converse upon other topics with perfect propriety; their demeanor is consistent and respectful. No one would suspect their mental aberration, as long as the particular object of derangement is not introduced.

In the Hospital at Worcester, an individual was introduced, brought from some distant town, and no account of the peculiarity of his case came with him. For several weeks he gave no exhibition whatever of a disorderd mind. His conduct was correct, his conversation calm and rational. One day he wished to smoke, and being told that it was contrary to the laws of the institution, he was excited to a violent rage; his insanity at once flashed out; he declared that he was high sheriff, and possessed authority paramount to any and all other. Upon this point and this only, the man was insane, and as nothing had previously occurred during his residence in the Hospital, to directly contradict his will, his paticular delusion had not been elicited. Pinel mentions the case of a lunatic, confined in one of the Hospitals in France, who appeared so perfectly sane that the Commissary, after holding a long conversation with him, and detecting no shade of hallucination, ordered him to be discharged. When the certificate was handed the patient, he subscribed himself Jesus Christ, and immediately was lost in reverie and delusion.

A physician was once prosecuted by an insane man for confining him without cause in a madhouse. The lunatic underwent the most rigid examination, and was found remarkable for soundness of mind, until some one asked him about a princess with whom he had corresponded in cherry juice. This touched the chord which awoke all his latent delusions, and he exhibited himself to the court a violent maniac.

Hence a man who is really sane, if once placed in a mad-house by the machinations of others, finds it almost impossible to prove his sanity. He can say nothing which the most furious madmen have not said. He can present no evidence of a sound mind, which has not again and again been presented by those whose delusions are the most frantic and dangerous. And if the mind has been enfeebled by disease, or agitated by calamities, or disturbed and defected by the pressure of care, it is still more difficult to sustain mental composure, under the irritations of unjust confinement and persecution.

The caprices of the human mind are inexplicable and undefinable. Mental delusions are of all kinds and degrees, from the slight shades of eccentricity to the phrenzied laugh and uncontrollable rage of the confirmed maniac. Take any definition of insanity which is laid down in treatises upon this subject, and it will either make one half the world suitable subjects for Bedlam, or it will be so narrow as to set at liberty one half of those who are now inmates of lunatic asylums. Locke says that insanity is reasoning correctly from wrong premises. And is every man who reasons from false premises mad? And does every madman reason correctly from the impression with which he is deluded? The futility of every definition hither to offered, of the morbid conditions of the mind is now very generally admitted. When Dr. Burrow, in an important legal investigation, was asked by the court to define unsoundness of mind, he decidedly declined saying that he had heard the question frequently put to medical men of the greatest eminence, and never heard any one of them, by his explanation, make the subject at all clearer.—Religious Magazine.

DESCRIPTION OF A BALL ON BOARD THE FRIGATE UNITED STATES.

By N. P. Willis.

Trieste.—The guns were run out of the ports; the main and mizen-masts were wound with red and white bunting; the capstan was railed with arms and wreathed with flowers; the wheel was tied with nosegays; the American eagle stood against the mainmast with a star of midshipmen's swords glittering above it; festoons of evergreens were laced through the rigging; the companion way was arched with hoops of green leaves and roses; the decks were tastefully chalked; the Commodore's skylight was piled with cushions and covered with red damask for an ottoman; seats were laid along from one carronade to the other: and the whole was enclosed with a temporary tent lined throughout with showy flags, and studded all over with bouquets of all the flowers of Illyria. Chandeliers made of bayonets, battle lanterns and candles in any quantity were disposed all over the hall. A splendid supper was set out on the gun-deck below, draped in with flags.—Our own and the Constellation's boats were to be at the pier at nine o'clock to bring off the ladies; and at noon every thing promised of the brightest.

First, about four in the afternoon, came up a saucy-looking cloud from the westernmost peak of the Friuli. Then followed from every point towards the north, an extending edge of a broad, solid black sheet which rose with the regularity of a curtain, and began to send down a wind upon us which made us look anxiously to our ballroom bowlines. The midshipmen were all forward, watching it from the forecastle. The lieutenants were in the gangway, watching it from the ladder. The commodore looked seriously out of the larboard cabin port. It was as grave a ship's company as ever looked out for a shipwreck.

The country about Trieste is shaped like a bellows, and the city and harbor lie in the nose. They have a wind that comes down through the valley, called the "bora," which several times in a year is strong enough to lift people from their feet. We could see by the clouds of dust on the mountain roads, that it was coming. At six o'clock the shrouds began to creak; the white tops flew from the waves in showers of spray, and the roof of our sea-palace began to shiver in the wind. There was no more hope. We had waited even too long. All hands were called to take down chandeliers, sword-stars and ottomans, before it was half done, the storm was upon us, the bunting was flying and flapping, the nicely chalked decks were swashed with rain, and strown with leaves of flowers, and the whole structure, the taste and labor of the ship's company for two days, was a watery wreck.

Lieutenant C——, who had had the direction of the whole, was the officer of the deck. He sent for his pea-jacket, and leaving him to pace out his watch among the ruins of his imagination, we went below to get early to bed and forgot our disappointment in sleep.

The next morning the sun rose without a veil.—The "blue Friuli" looked clear and fresh; the southwest wind came over softly from the shore of Italy, and we commenced retrieving our disaster with elastic spirit. Nothing had suffered seriously except the flowers, and boats were dispatched ashore for fresh supplies, while the awnings were lifted higher and wider than before, the bright coloured flags replaced, the arms polished and arranged in improved order, and the decks re-chalked with new devices. At six in the evening every thing was swept up, and the ball-room astonished even ourselves. It was the prettiest place for a dance in the world.

The ship has an admirable band of twenty Italians collected from Naples and other ports, and a fanciful orchestra was raised for them on the larboard side of the mainmast. They struck up a march as the first boatful of ladies stepped upon the deck, and in the course of half an hour, the waltzing commenced with at least two hundred couples, while the ottoman and seats under the hammoc-cloths were filled with spectators. The frigate has a lofty poop, and there was room enough upon it for two quadrilles after it had served as a reception room. It was edged with a temporary ballustrade, wreathed with flowers and studded with lights, and the cabin beneath (on a level with the main ball-room) was set out with card tables. From the gangway entrance the scene was like a brilliant theatrical ballet.

An amusing part of it was the sailors' imitation on the forward decks. They had taken the waste shrubbery and evergreens, of which there was a great quantity, and had formed a sort of grove, extending all round. It was arched with festoons of leaves, with quantities of fruit tied among them; and over the entrance was suspended a rough picture of a frigate with the inscription "Free trade and Sailors' rights." The forecastle was ornamented with cutlasses and one or two nautical transparencies, with pistols and miniature ships interspersed, and the whole lit up handsomely. The men dressed in their white duck trowsers and blue jackets, and sat round on the guns playing at draughts, or listening to the music, or gazing at the ladies constantly promenading fore and aft, and to me this was one of the most interesting parts of the spectacle. Five hundred weather-beaten and manly faces are a fine sight any where.

The dance went gaily on. The reigning belle was an American, but we had lovely women of all nations among your guests. There are several wealthy Jewish families in Trieste, and their dark-eyed daughters, we may say at this distance, are full of the thoughtful loveliness peculiar to the race. Then we had Illyrians and Germans, and Terpischore be our witness —how they danced! My travelling companion the count of Friuli was there; and his little Viennese wife, though she spoke no christian language, danced as neatly as a fairy. Of strangers passing through Trieste we had several of distinction. Among them was a fascinating Milanese marchioness, a relative of Manzoni's the novelist, (and as enthusiastic and eloquent a lover of her country as I ever listened to on the subject of oppressed Italy,) and two handsome young men the counts Neipperg, sons-in-law to Maria Louisa, who amused themselves as if they had seen nothing better in the little duchy of Parma.

We went below at midnight to supper, and the ladies came up with renewed spirit to the dance. It was a brilliant scene indeed. The officers of both ships, in full uniform, the gentlemen from shore, mostly military, in full dress, the gaiety of the bright-red buntings, laced with white and blue, and studded, wherever they would stand, with flowers, and the really uncommon number of beautiful women, with the foreign features and complexions so rich and captivating to our eyes, produced altogether an effect unsurpassed by any thing I have ever seen even at the court fetes of Europe. The daylight gun fired at the close of a gallopade, and the crowded boats pulled ashore with their lovely freight by the broad light of morning.

Unpublished Letters of Robert Burns.

From Burns to James Hoyes, Esq., Gordon Castle.—No. 1.

Sir,—I will defend my conduct in giving you this trouble, on the best of Christian principles—"Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do you even so unto them." I shall certainly, among my legacies, leave my latest curse to that unlucky predicament which hurried—tore me away from Gordon Castle. May that obstinate son of Latin prose be curst to Scotch mile periods, and damn'd to seven league paragraphs, while declension and conjugation, gender, number, and time, under the ragged banners of dissonance and disarrangement, eternally rank against him in hostile array!

Allow me, sir, to strengthen the small claim I have to your acquaintance by the following request. An engraver James Johnson, in Edinburgh, has, not from mercenary views, but from an honest Scotch enthusiasm, set about collecting all our native songs, and setting them to music, particularly those that have never been set before. Clarke, the well known musician, presides over the musical arrangement, and Drs. Beattie and Blacklock, Mr. Tytler, Woodhouselee, and your humble servant to the utmost of his small power, assist in collecting the old poetry, or sometimes, for a fine air, to make a stanza when it has no words. The brats, too tedious to mention, claim a parently pang from my bardship. I suppose it will appear in Johnson's second number—the first was published before my acquaintance with him. "Cauld Kail in Aberdeen," is one intended for this number, and I beg a copy of his Grace of Gordon's words to it, which you were so kind to repeat to me. You may be sure we wont prefix the author's name, except you like, though I look upon it as no small merit to this work that the names of so many authors of old Scotch songs, names almost forgotten, will be inserted. I do not well know where to write to you—I rather write at you but if you will be so obliging immediately on receipt of this, as to write me a few lines, I shall perhaps pay you in kind though not in quality. Johnson's terms are, each number a handsome pocket volume, to consist of at least a hundred Scotch songs with basses for the harpsichord, &c. The price to subscribers five shillings, to non-subs, six shillings. He will have three numbers, I conjecture.

My directions for two or three weeks will be at Mr. William Cruickshank's, St. James'-square, New Town, Edinburgh.

I am, sir, yours to command,
Edinburgh, 30th Oct. 1787. Robt. Burns.

To James Hoyes, Esq. of Gordon Castle.—No. 11.

Dear Sir,—I would have wrote you immediately on receipt of your kind letter, but a mixed impulse of gratitude and esteem whispered to me that I ought to send you something by way of return. When a poet owes any thing, particularly when he is indebted for good offices, the payment that usually recurs to him—the only coin, indeed, in which he probably is conversant—is rhyme. Johnson sends the book by the Fly, as directed, and begs to enclose his most grateful thanks; my return, I intended, should have been one or two poetic bagatelles, which the world have not seen, or perhaps, for obvious reasons cannot see. These I shall send you before I leave Edin. They may make you laugh a little, which, on the whole, is no bad way of spending one's precious hours and still more precious breath. At any rate they will be, though a small, yet a very sincere mark of my respectful esteem, for a gentleman whose farther acquaintance I should look on as a pecuniary obligation.

The Duke's song, independent totally of his Dukeship, charms me. There is I know not what of wild happiness of thought and expression peculiarly beautiful in the old Scottish song style, of which his grace, old venerable Skinner, the author of Tullochgorum, &c., and the late Boss at Lochlee, of true Scottish poetic memory, are the only modern instances, that I recollect, since Ramsay with his contemporaries, and poor Bob Ferguson, went to the world of deathless existence and truly immortal song. The mob of mankind, that many-headed beast, would laugh at so serious a speech about an old song; but, as Job says, "O that mine adversary had written a book!"—Those who think that composing a Scotch song is a trifling business—let them try.

I wish my lord duke would pay a proper attention to the Christian admonition, 'Hide not your candle under a bushel," but "let your light shine before men." I could name half a dozen dukes that I guess are a devilish deal worse employed; nay, I question, if there are half a dozen better. Perhaps there are not half that scanty number whom Heaven has favoured with the tuneful, happy, and, I will say glorious gift.

I am, dear Sir, your obliged humble servant,
ROBERT BURNS.

Sympathy.—There are two neighboring hills near Cumberland, (Eng.) viz: Skiddaw and Skuffiel, of which it is said, that if the former be capt with clouds and mists, it will not be long ere rain falls on the other. They who are contiguous to each other in residence, business, friendship, or the ties of blood, must remember that if adversity is the lot of one, it will be also that of the other. Sympathy is expected and due from all towards each other: for as all are subjects of the same blessings, they are also of similar calamities.

PAGANINI'S FIDDLE.

"Il cantar, che nell anima, si sente.—PETRARCH.

"This must be spirit music, good my Lord!"

TEMPEST.

What traveller who has ever visited "Genoa la Superba," can forget the Strada Balbi, with its marble palaces, its bright frescos, and hanging orange groves? Who can forget that clear blue sky, whose tints are reflected in the Mediterranean, and whose heat is tempered by the "aria marina," which there so greatly refreshes the southern atmosphere? Bright and sunny as the picture is, still, like all others, it has its reverse—and some of the narrow lanes, which lie in the vicinity of this magnificent street, present, as if by way of contrast, scenes of dirt, desolation, and wretchedness, unequalled in any even of the Italian cities.

In one of these miserable byeways, in 1810, the period at which our story commences, Nicolo Paganini, the violinist, "par excellence," whose name has since been borne upon the waters of fame throughout all Europe, and who has been deemed, in the judgment of the musical world, unrivalled and supreme in the arcana of his art, dwelt in poverty, unnoticed and unknown. He was the inhabitant of one of the poorest shops in the Vicolo, or narrow lane, and barely obtained enough by working as a musical instrument maker to support his aged mother, who for many years had been his sole companion. For some time past their circumstances had been gradually declining, and the little patrimony bequeathed to Paganini by his father, had been dissipated and exhausted, so that the poor Genoese had been reduced from comparative independence to obtain his daily bread by his daily labour. This had not always been the case. The little shop of Paganini had at one time exhibited an appearance of comfort, and even wealth; he and his mother Brigitta had been decently clad; and as there were not many tradesmen in Genoa who followed the same occupation, he had obtained a tolerable livelihood. At that period he might regularly have been working cheerfully at the door of his little habitation, gaily humming some of the favourite airs of his native city, and repaying with interest the good-humoured jokes of the Genoese damsels, who often raised their veils in passing to gaze upon his thin ungainly figure, and wild, spirit-like face. But all his bright prospects of independence had been clouded, and one unfortunate calamity seemed to doom him to continual melancholy, and to hopeless poverty—he had become the victim of monomania; a devoted prey to one unchangeable idea, which haunted him night and day, and whose impulses he blindly followed, regardless of the privations he might suffer or give rise to. His poor mother, deeply afflicted at seeing him thus dissipate his substance, in vain entreated him not to reduce her to misery. Her supplications were disregarded, sometimes unheard, and her son continued to neglect his ordinary occupation, so that by degrees all his savings, his stock in trade, his furniture, and even his very clothes, were swallowed up in the expenses incurred by the futile experiments which his monomania induced him to make. It must, however, be confessed, that if there had been any chance of his obtaining his object, Paganini had hit upon an excellent speculation. Having in his possession a violin of the celebrated Mantuan maker, Tartini, for which several amateurs had offered him extravagant prices, the idea of imitating the excellencies of that maker flashed across his mind. He calculated, fairly enough, that if he could produce a violin, copied from this model with mathematical exactness, formed of a similar description of wood, and coloured and varnished in a similar manner, his instrument would fully equal the original in tone and value. In spite, however, of all his endeavours, he always discovered some trifling difference between the copy and the model—some indefinitely slight distinctions which rendered it necessary to commence the work over again. Thus the poor instrument-maker seemed destined to the endless task of constructing new violins, and of making infinitely close approximations to, without ever reaching, the perfection which he aimed at. At last, after many experiments, Paganini's original ideal became somewhat modified; he had completed a violin which, to all appearance, was a perfect copy of the Tartini, and which, nevertheless, was so wholly inferior to it, that Paganini began to suspect that some element of a superior nature, some intellectual essence above his reach, existed in the composition of that chef-d'œuvre of violins. "Who knows," said he, raising his tall, thin figure, and fixing his dark, unhealthy eyes upon a Genoese professor, who endeavoured to solve his problem by some new application of the theory of sound—"Who knows whether I should not seek, out of the pale of this gross material world, the solution of my doubts? Words are the representatives of ideas, are they not? Well, then, when I speak of the soul of music which dwells within my violin, perhaps I may have unwittingly mentioned the obstacle which retards me; perhaps there may be a soul of music? What think you Signor?" The Professor, with an inward conviction of the madness of poor Paganini, only answered by shaking his head in that oracular, Lord Burleigh style, which means every thing or nothing, and left the shop, while Paganini continued soliloquising. "Aye, the soul of music! but how is that spirit to be invoked, and to what incantation will it prove submissive? I have heard of one Mozart, a German, who has effected wondrous music with a zauberflote (a magic flute) why should there not be also a magic violin? Let me consider now." His head sunk on his breast, and he only became the more deeply buried in his speculations.

One day a customer, who brought him a fiddle-bow to have it repaired, forgot in his shop a book, which remained there unreclaimed for some time. Paganini, in his hours of leisure, which were rare, (for when his hands were not engaged in manual labour, his poor visionary brains were at work), turned over the leaves. It was one of those respectable monuments of Florentine patience which the press of Messrs. Giulio Auberti produced in the seventeenth century—the prototype of the modern Encyclopædias and Societies for the Diffusion of Knowledge The author of the work, which thus fell into Paganini's hands, modestly professed his intention to treat "de omnibus rebus, and also of many other things," and certainly did his best to fulfil his profession by making his book, like Lord Brougham's head, a universal repertorium! There a chapter upon the best form of government was to be found beside one upon the Eleven Thousand Virgins of Cologne; and a receipt for making Cypress wine was followed by a dissertation on the Council of Trent. As Paganini indolently turned over its leaves, the words "Transmigration of Souls" suddenly met his eye. He started up in extasy, feeling that his hour was come, and that the great secret which he had so long sought, and sought for in vain, was on the point of being revealed to him. He devoured the chapter, which contained merely an account of the Indian doctrine of the Metempsychosis; and conceiving that a new light had burst in upon him, occupied himself in making preparations for the great physiological experiment, which he hoped would soon crown his efforts.

Three months after Paganini had perused the volume which had so deeply attracted his attention, and had become imbued with the idea of the eternal transmigration of souls, through animate and inanimate bodies, thus convincing himself of the possibility of animating an inanimate violin, the interior of the little shop which he inhabited presented a strange and unusual scene. It was one o'clock in the morning; not a sound was to be heard in the devoted streets of Genoa; and then, in a small apartment behind his shop, whose darkness was only rendered visible by one small lamp, lay Brigitta Paganini, the mother of our artist, in the pangs of her last hour, on the very same black leather bed on which, thirty years before, her son Nicolo had been brought into the world. We would not, however, insinuate for a moment, that Paganini had murdered his mother for the sake of establishing his theory. No; he had not as yet reached so high a degree of apathetic philosophy. The respectable old lady was only dying of a cancer, which she had rendered inveterate by copious doses of rosolia. There she lay, a prey to all the agonies which that torturing disease inflicts upon its victims, speechless, and only giving evidence of her existence by deep and painful groans; and beside the bed stood her son Nicolo, pale but determined,—unnerved by the pangs of which he was witnesss,—not one tear glistening in his eyes,—not one muscle of his face exhibiting an expression of sympathy. No; all his faculties were absorbed in watching the expiring woman, while he applied to her dying lips a long leathern tube connected with the violin lying upon the table.

At fifty-two minutes and some seconds past one, the respiration of poor Brigitta suddenly ceased; her pulse stopped,—her eye became fixed;—and her son, almost shouting for joy, having received her last breath in the tube, hermetically stopped the entrance, and forced the dying sigh down the leathern passage into the body of the violin. This, it is hardly necessary to inform our readers, was the experiment over which Paganini had so long pondered. This was the impious attempt which, with the heartlessness of ambition, he made to imprison the soul of his respectable mother in the bowels of a violin. Happily, however, the superhuman experiment was frustrated. The Indian philosophers, who fancied the last sigh, the anima ultima, to be synonimous with the soul, had misled him through their false system of metaphysics. The human soul has other modes of reaching the region of eternal misery or bliss than through the medium of human respiration; and the result of the experiment was to imprison, not the soul, but the ghost, the surviving human breath of the estimable Brigitta, in the fiddle of her son. It must not, however, be imagined that such audacious tampering with the things of the invisible world were unattended with evil to the bold experimenter. At the moment the great effort was accomplished, and the ghost was heard fluttering for freedom against the sides of the violin, Paganini, exhausted by the efforts which he had made, and the emotions which he had experienced, sunk lifeless upon the floor, and remained there until the sun was already high in the heavens.

When he recovered, it was only by slow degrees that the transactions of the night were presented to his mind. With a slow and trembling step he approached the bed upon which his mother lay. He closed her eyes, which seemed to regard him with a melancholy and reproachful glance; and then, throwing aside all thoughts of repentance, rushed in ecstacy to the table on which the violin lay, and, gently touching the strings, ascertained, from the soothing spiritual sounds which issued from it, that his experiment had not been without effect. His violin had at length become a something more than human!

Gradually, and by awful degrees, did Paganini venture to make use of the magic power which he had thus acquired. The place in which the incantation had been performed grew hateful to him: he quitted Genoa, where he had become an object of suspicion and envy, and went to exhibit his magic violin upon the more extensive theatres of Rome and Naples. Everywhere his music produced the most astonishing effects; everywhere he was heard with the deepest rapture, his performance striking even the most jealous of his rivals dumb with admiration. At Rome he had the honour of a private audience with the Pope at the Quirinal Palace, and had the incredibly religious audacity to perform upon the spirit of his mother for the entertainment of Pius VII. and a select conclave of Cardinals. The Pontiff, after consulting Cardinal Gonsalvi, pronounced the music to be heavenly!—a judgment which the reader must needs regard as a striking proof of Papal fallibility, as the spirit of Brigitta was not in heaven, and, at best, was subject to all the tortures of a musical purgatory,—now groaning in the de profundis of a bass, and now hurried aloft into the aerial wailings of a in altissimo. Her voice is particularly observable in his E flats. However, Paganini departed from Rome covered with honours; and at Naples his success was still more remarkable. The king assigned a suite of apartments in the Caserta Palace for his use. The Lazzaroni, awakened from their usual "dolce far niente," pointed him out to each other in the streets, "Ecco il gran sonatore;" and, better than all, the Opera-house was crowded to suffocation every night of his performance, and crowns and sonnets were showered upon his head. Little did the Roman Pontiff, or the amateurs of the San Carlo, think, while they listened to the unearthly tones of the enchanted instrument, that it was spirit music sounded in their ears,—that it was the injured spirit of the imprisoned Brigitta pleading in plaintive tones for her release.

At length, thanks to the newspapers and M. Laporte, the fame of Paganini reached the good city of London, where higher rewards than even those in the Arabian tale await the inventor of a new pleasure, and where novelty calls down a golden shower more surely than the conductor attracts the electric fluid. Money was all-powerful in the soul of the Italian, and to London he went; passing, however, through Paris, where he had the good fortune of "assisting" at a grand review of the National Guard, by Louis Philippe, one or two "emeutes," and about a dozen concerts. At London Paganini at last arrived; and there his unhallowed thirst for fame and gold was doomed to experience some foretaste of its punishment. It is true that his concerts were well attended; his name was the topic of every tongue; enterprising booksellers puffed his pseudo biographies; grave physiologists wrote essays upon his physical organization; his face and figure disfigured every printshop; and sentimental young ladies (there is no nation more romanesque than the English) laid their bewitching selves, and still more bewitching fortunes, at his feet! Even the barriers of the exclusives fell at his approach! He was fêted at Lady Y——'s and the Duke of D——'s; and, to crown the triumph of his soul, managers vied in offering him the hugest engagements!

"Sed medio de fonte leporum Surgit amari aliquid, quod in ipsis floribus angat."

"Amidst the roses fierce repentance rears her snaky crest.

While the triumph of the violinist was at its highest, the cup of pleasure, for a time, was dashed from his guilty lips. At his last concert in the Haymarket, an old Genoese, the butler of the Sardinian Ambassador, happened to be present. He had known "dans les beaux jours de sa jeunesse," under the bright sky of Italy, Brigitta Paganini; he had known and passionately loved her; and the recollections of his early attachment had never been obliterated from his susceptible bosom. When the first sound of Paganini's violin reached his ears, he started in amazement; a thousand recollections of youth, of home, of happiness, of the smiles and tears of former years, were excited by the plaintive tones of his early love issuing from the fiddle. Human nature could not support the shock, and old Pietro fainted. Some of his fellow-domestics, it is true, accused him of having swallowed at dinner too large a portion of that pernicious potation, so pleasing to Londoners, called gin; but Pietro stoutly maintained the next morning (for on the fatal evening he had been carried to bed in the most affecting state), that his emotion had not been occasioned by any earthly spirit, but by the heavenly spirit of the long-lost Brigitta. He immediately proceeded to 22 Regent street, demanded an interview with Paganini, approached him with tottering steps, and, in a hollow voice, demanded, "Where is the mother?" This question overcome the shattered nerves of the conscience-stricken fiddler. He glared unutterable things,—struck his forehead frantically, rushed from the room, with his fiddle-case under his arm; locked the door upon the astonished Pietro,—ordered post-horses instantly,—and quitted England never to return.

Such, at least was his intention; but the love of gold is stronger than the love of one's mother, or even than the dread of her ghost. At any rate, all the Genoese think so, and some few Englishmen; otherwise so many good lessons in childhood and one's copy-book would not be so soon forgotten by the dealers in bank-notes and fiddle-notes. News was brought to Paganini that Pietro, not many hours after his interview with him, had died of a locked jaw, and that his notion of the maternal spirit had been looked upon by the incredulous English as the fancy of a disordered brain. Paganini sighed; looked at his strong box; gave a few ducats to the church of St. Siri, for the repose of his mother's soul! (so inconsistent is superstition;) and set off again with that very soul in his fiddle-case for England.

"With this sauce," says the Almanach des Gourmands, speaking of we forget what exquisite condiment, "a man might eat his father."

"With this temptation," quoth Paganini, looking at a fresh draft on a banker, with a groan betwixt rapture and remorse, "a man may, and must play the devil with the ghost of his mother."

THE WISHING GATE.

From Fisher's Drawing-room Scrap-book, with Practical Illustrations, by L. E. L.

Wishes, no! I have not one,
Hopes's sweet toil with me is done;
One by one have flitted by
All the rainbows of my sky.
Not a star could now unfold
Aught I once wished to be told.
What have I to seek of thee?
Not a wish remains for me.

Let the soldier pause to ask
Honor on his glorious task;
Let the parting sailor crave
A free wild wind across the wave;
Let the maiden pause to frame
Blessings on some treasured name;
Let them breathe their hopes in thee—
Not a wish remains for me.

Not a wish! beat not my heart,
Thou hast bade thy dreams depart;
They have passed, but left behind
Weary spirit, wasted mind.
Ah! if this old charm were sooth,
One wish yet might tax its truth;
I would ask, however vain,
Never more to wish again.

Seneca has very elegantly said that "malice drinks one half of its own poison."

THE UNIVERSE AND ITS AUTHOR.

From the earliest ages shepherds tending their flocks on the plains of Asia, have been familiar with the more remarkable of those objects which shine by night in the sky, and to which the Persians gave the general name of stars. The word imports in its origin, to rule or direct; those lights being often the guide of the shepherd over the spacious pastures which he had to traverse, and of the husbandman as to the seasons of the year. The stars were long supposed, and still are imagined by a great majority of mankind, to be fixed; but the telescope has enabled us to say with more certainty that many, and with a strong degree of probability that the whole are in a state of motion, although we, borne along in the train of succession ourselves, are not capable of discovering the direction in which they march round the orbit of the universe.

We are, as yet, and doubtless ever shall be, without the means of numbering those tenants of the firmament. Every new improvement of the telescope brings within the range of vision, countless multitudes which human eye had never seen before*. Some stars are double and even triple, that is to say, they appear to us within a barely distinguishable distance of each other. Upwards of three thousand double stars have been already discovered, and it is justly supposed that even this number by no means exhausts the fertility of the heavens in these twin productions, some of which have been actually observed to move round each other in orbits requiring for their entire completion twelve hundred of our years. Such systems as these give the mind a faint glimmer of eternity.

Astronomers conjecture, not without reason, from the analogies of our system, that these suns do not revolve round each other shedding their light in vain; but that each is accompanied by its circle of planets, which being opaque bodies, would of course be forever shrouded from our view by the splendor of their respective orbs of day. This idea leads us to conclude that the stars, which are separated from each other by distances at least as great as that of Uranus from our sun—that is to say, some eighteen hundred millions of miles—have also their respective planets, their Mercuries, their Earths, their Jupiters and Saturns, and are the centres of peculiar systems throughout the whole firmament. If those planets be peopled by intelligent beings, as Earth is, and the other planets of the solar system are supposed to be, the contemplation in thought of such myriads of globes with the inhabitants overwhelms the mind.

We have no mode of ascertaining the distance of any one of the stars from the earth. We have measured the circumference which we describe in our annual journey round the sun; we take the diameter of that circle, and with it form the base of a triangle whose vortex should be at the nearest of those luminous bodies. The angle thus formed, however, at the star, would be unappreciable with the most perfect instrument of human invention. Now an angle of one second of a degree is appreciable; consequently the distance of the nearest fixed star must exceed the radius of a circle, one second of whose circumference measures one hundred and ninety millions of miles; that is, it must exceed two hundred times the diameter of the earth's orbit. If the dove that returned no more to Noah, had been commissioned to bear with her utmost speed, an olive branch to the least remote of the spheres, she would therefore still be on her journey: after towering for forty centuries through the heights of space, she would not, at this moment, have reached the middle of her destined way.

No machinery has yet been invented, indeed it seems at present impossible that we should ever devise any means, by which we might estimate the magnitude of even the least of the stars, since we never behold their discs. We become sensible of their existence by rays of light, which must have taken, in some instances, probably, a thousand years to reach our globe, although light is known to travel at the rate of one hundred and ninety-two thousand miles in a second. Sirius, the brightest, because perhaps the nearest to us of those luminaries, is conjectured by Dr. Wollaston to give as much light as fourteen suns, each as large as ours. Magnificent, therefore, as the system must be of which Sirius forms the centre, yet we behold no part of it. The planet Saturn, with its appendages of rings and satellites, exhibits, when its rings are visible, a spectacle, which, seen through a telescope of moderate power, we imagine that a half-crown piece would cover.† But an individual gazing through a similar instrument from a planet of Sirius to our sun, might suppose, in the same manner, that he could cover our entire system with a spider's thread. He would set down the sun in his map as a fixed star, but to his eye it would present no variation, as the largest of our planets would not intercept much more than a hundredth part of the sun's surface, and could not therefore, produce any loss of its light of which he could take an estimate. For him this globe of ours, immense as to our finate faculties it seems to be, would have actually no existence. It would not find even a point's place on his chart, and if it were blotted out of space to-morrow, it would never be missed by any of the probably

* For instance o in Orion, which is marked in South and Herchel's catalogue as containing two distinct sets of stars, each set triple, as appears in Mr. Barlow's fluid-refracting telescope, is composed of two quadruple sets, with two very fine stars between them, which, as well as the fourth star on each set, had previously escaped the powers of the most finished instruments. Mr. Barlow's telescope has also enabled him to exhtbit s in Perseus, marked double in the same catalogue, as a collection of no fewer than six stars! See Phil. Trans. 1831 p. 10. We trust that Mr. Barlow's efforts for the improvement of his telescope may meet with the support which the importance of the subject demands. Were its powers increased only fifty-fold, it is not improbable that, instead of six he might discover a hundred stars, were only one now appears to the unassisted eye.

fifty worlds that are bathed in the floods of light which Sirius pours forth. Whose eye is it that watches over our sphere? Whose is the ever-extended arm that maintains it?

The star called Omicron, in the constellation Cetus, appears to us only twelve times in eleven years. It is seen in its greatest brightness during a fortnight; it then decreases gradually during three months, when it disappears. After an interval of five months it again becomes visible, and continues increasing during the three remaining months of its period. Another star, that called Algol, or β Persei, continues visible during a period of sixty-two hours, when it suddenly loses its splendor, and, though a star of the second magnitude, becomes reduced to the fourth magnitude in the course of two or three hours. It then begins to increase again, and in three hours and a half it resumes its wonted lustre. Goodricke, who discovered† this remarkable fact in 1782, suggests, and his idea is now generally adopted by astronomers; that this variation must be caused by the revolution around Algol, of some opaque body, a planet of its own, which, when interposed between us and the star, cuts off a large portion of its light. It is highly probable that a similar arrangement periodically affects the light of Omicron, though upon a different scale. There are eleven other stars that exhibit analogous phenomena, some of them at intervals of five hundred years, to which we may look forward without danger of mistake—thus opening a vista of futurity. When we reflect upon these facts; and upon the circumstance that the rays by which we may to-night behold the Pleiads, must have left their sources in the time of our Heptarchy, or before it—we feel that the mind which is in this manner enabled to comprehend the existence of myriads of peopled worlds besides our own, and to glance to the past with more than the speed of light itself, must be the creation of some superior Spirit dwelling in eternity.

Placed as we are, according to the opinion of astronomers, in the middle of the strata of systems which animate all space, and favored though we be by supernatural disclosures and by great scientific acquirements, we are nevertheless prone to question whether such systems exists of their own innate vigor, or whether they have been created by a power extrinsic to to themselves. If they are discovered to be self-existent, it follows that they must be imperishable. But if they are proved to be perishable, it follows that they cannot be self-existent, and then they must have been created by an extrinsic power, which power must be Omnipotent from the very nature of its productions. The same power must be self-existent, therefore, since no agency inferior to Omnipotence could have given such a Being birth; and it must be Eternal, as an Omnipotent, Self-existent Being can know neither infancy nor age. Here then, upon an inquiry of the greatest importance to mankind, astronomical facts come to our assistance, which carry with them a force of conviction as strong as any demonstration in mathematics—and stronger than most of the evidence upon which the history of human transactions is founded. The stamp of mortality, the finger of death itself, had been traced upon some of the brightest worlds which have ever yet been seen in the firmament.

In the year 125, B. C., an extraordinary luminary attracted the attention of Hipparchus, which induced him to frame a catalogue of stars, the earliest on record. That star in his time disappeared from the heavens. In A. D., 389, a star blazed forth near a Aquilæ, remained three weeks as bright as Venus, and then died away. In the year 1572, Tycho Brahe, returning home one evening from his observatory to his dwelling-house, was suprised to see a group of people looking in astonishment at a bright star, which he with all his scrutiny of the heavens had never seen before. It shone in the constellation Cassiopeia, was then as bright as Sirius, and for a while was visible even at midday. It began to fade in December of the same year, and after exhibiting all the changes of conflagration, disappeared in March, 1574. Was this a satellite of some fixed star, which caught fire, and thus prefigured to us the fate, that, according to the declaration of the prophets, awaits our own world?

"Similar phenomena," says Sir J. Herschel, "though of a less splendid character, have taken place more recently, as in the case of the star of the third magnitude, discovered in 1670, by Anthiem, in the head of the Swan; which after becoming completely invisible, re-appeared, and after undergoing one or two singular fluctuations of light, during two years, at last died away entirely, and has not since been seen. On a careful re-examination of the heavens, too, and a comparison of catalogues, many stars are now found to be missing; and although there is no doubt that these losses have often arisen from mistaken entries, yet, in many instances, it is equally certain that there is no mistake in the observation or entry, and that the stars have disappeared from the heavens." [Treatise on Astronomy, p. 384.]

The existence and death of Alexander the Great,—the rise and fall of the Roman Empire,—the destruction, by earthquake or volcano, of cities, which were once the seat of commerce and the arts,—have been handed down to us upon evidence, in no respect whatever better entitled to our belief, than that upon which the astronomical facts here related by Sir John Herschel, stand recorded. Men who have made it their peculiar occupation for years to observe the changes of the firmament, agree in stating that, in many instances, stars, which were once

† The same discovery appears to have been made nearly about the same time by Palitzch, a farmer of Prolits, near Dresden—a peasant by station, an astronomer by nature—who, from his familiar acquaintance with the aspect of the heavens, had been led to notice, among so many thousand stars, this one as distinguished from the rest by its variation, and had ascertained its period. The same Palitzch was also the first to re-discover the predicted comet of Halley in 1759, which he saw nearly a month before any of the astronomers, who, armed with their telescopes, were anxiously watching its return. These anecdotes, bring us back to the age of the Chaldean shepherds. [Sir John Herchel's Treatise on Astronomy, p. 381.]

familiar to the eye, have ceased to appear, and that, too, for periods which clearly indicates their annihilation. The consequence is obvious and inevitable;—those bodies must have been created, otherwise they could not have been liable to decay.‖ They performed their appointed revolutions, and they perished—just as a man lives his predestined number of years, and dies. If created, then there must be some power which gave them existence, and prescribed the laws by which that existence was carried to its close.

The Shepherd's Resolution.

[This fine old song was written by George Wither, a satirical writer of the times of James and Charles the First. It is extracted from one of his long pastoral poems, entitled "The Mistress of Philatrete," published in 1622.]

Shall I, wasting in despair,
Die, because a woman's fair?
Or make pale my cheeks with care,
'Cause another's rosy are?
Be she fairer than the day,
Or the flowery meads in May,
If she be not so to me,
What care I how fair she be?

Shall my foolish heart be pined
'Cause I see a woman kind?
Or a well disposed nature
Joined with a lovely feature?
Be she meeker, kinder, than
The turtle dove or pelican,
If she be not so to me,
What care I how kind she be?

Shall a woman's virtues move
Me to perish for her love?
Or her well deservings known,
Make me quite forget mine own?
Be she with that goodness blest
Which may merit name of best,
If she be not such to me,
What care I how good she be?

'Cause her fortune seems too high,
Shall I play the fool and die?
Those that bear a noble mind,
Where they want of riches find,
Think, what with them, they would do,
That without them, dare not woo:
And unless that mind I see,
What care I how great she be?

Great or good, or kind or fair,
I will ne'er the more despair.—
If she love me, this believe:
I will die ere she shall grieve.
If she slight me when I woo,
I can scorn and let her go.
If she be not fit for me,
What care I for whom she be?

‖ We forget whence we extracted the following quaint but expressive lines:

Quenched volcanoes, rifted mountains,
Ocean driven from land,
Lakes submerged and dried up fountains,
Empires—whelmed in sand;
What?—though her doom be yet untold—
Nature like time is waxing old.

AURÆ SENTENTIÆ,

OR EIGHT SETS OF GOLDEN SENTENCES FROM THE RICHEST MINES OF SPIRITUAL WEALTH.

I.

1. I HAVE taken much pains to know every thing that was esteemed worth knowing among men; but, with all my disquisitions and reading, nothing now remains with me to comfort me, at the close of life, but this passage of St. Paul: "It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." To this I cleave, and herein I find rest.—Selden.

2. What wings are to a bird, oil to wheels, or a load-stone to the needle, such is Christ to the soul of the believer; he gives speed to his devotions, activity to his obedience, and draws him nearer and nearer to God.—Mason.

3. The name of Jesus to a believer, is as honey in the mouth, music in the ears, or a jubilee in the heart.—Ibid.

4. Death-bed repentence is a sacrifice made to God from the devil's leavings.—Dean Swift.

5. The love of Christ hath a height without a top, a depth without a bottom, a length without an end, and a breadth without a limit.—Anon.

6. What we are afraid to do before men, we should be afraid to think before God.—Sibbes.

7. Lowliness of mind is not a flower which grows in the field of nature, but is planted by the finger of God, in a renewed heart, and learned of the lowly Jesus.—Boston.

8. It is safer to be humble with one talent than proud with ten; yea, better to be an humble worm than a proud angel.—Flavel.

9. Men are out of their right minds until they come, by faith and repentence, to Jesus Christ.—Bain.

10. Charity, to the souls of men, is undoubtedly the highest, the noblest, and the most important charity. No one knows how much good he may do by dispersing Bibles and books of piety, which may have a tendency to make men wiser and better. Who can tell but with an expense less than a shilling, you may "convert a sinner from the error of his ways and save a soul from death?" A worse doom than to be condemned to the mines, rests upon that soul who had rather hoard up his money than employ it in such a charity.—Cotton Mather.

II.

1. SPIRITUAL sloth leads to spiritual poverty. Corrupt nature doth not always discover its opposition to that which is good by passionate contradiction, but oftentimes too successfully by sloth and sluggishness.—Anon.

2. If there were no enemy in the world, nor devil in hell, we carry that within us, that if let loose, will trouble us more than all the world beside.—Sibbes.

3. Nothing can be very ill with us when all is well within: we are not hurt till our souls are hurt. If the soul itself be out of tune, outward things will do us no more good than a fair shoe to a gouty foot.—Sibbes.

4. In all worldly joys there is a secret wound.—Owen.

5. Unreasonable fears are the sins of our hearts as truly as they are thorns in our sides; they grieve the Holy Spirit.—Burgess.

6. One rose upon the bush, though but a little one, and though not yet blown, proves that which bears it to be a true rose-tree.—Ibid.

7. He that hath tasted the bitterness of sin, will fear to commit it; and he that hath felt the sweetness of mercy, will fear to offend it.—Charnock.

8. I would rather obey than work miracles.—Luther.

9. God will give the men of the world the blessings of his footstool, but to his children he gives the blessings of his throne.—Augustine.

10. Prayer is chiefly a heart work: God heareth the heart without the mouth, but he never heareth the mouth acceptably without the heart. This is lying unto God, and flattering him with the lips, but no true prayer, and so God considers it.—Marshall.

III.

1. How small a portion of our life is it, that we really enjoy! In youth we are looking forward to things that are to come; in old age we are looking backward to things that are gone past; in manhood, though indeed we appear to be more engaged in things that are present, yet even that is too often absorbed in vague determinations to be vastly happy on some future day, when we have time.—Anon.

2. We will not be convinced how basely and foolishly we are busied, though in the best and most respected employments in the world, as long as we neglect our best and noblest trade of growing rich in grace and the comfortable enjoyment of the love of God.—Leighton.

3. Hope and fear are the strongest passions of the mind. The apostle urges the hope of that glory which the gospel displays, and fear of God as the greatest and most powerful judge. This fear is a holy self-suspicion. The more a Christian believes and loves, the more unwilling he is to displease God.—Leighton.

4. Is the heart yet unbroken? give it to God, with a desire it may be broken: and if he break it, thou shalt not repent thy gift.—Ibid.

5. We may know what Christ has done for us, by what he has done in us.—Mason.

6. In Christ the whole gospel is treasured up; he is the light, the food, and the medicine of the soul.—Ibid.

7. Patient waiting upon God and importunate calling upon God, are twin sisters, found always in company.—Ibid.

8. The law presseth on a man till he flies to Christ; then it says, thou hast gotten a refuge, I forbear to follow thee: thou art wise: thou art safe.—Bengelius.

9. Great care must be taken as to the end of our actions; for this, like the altar, sanctifies the gift; as is the end such is the man. He whose end is worldly, is himself earthly; but if God be a man's end, it makes him Godlike.—Brooks.

10. Faith must be the root of the divine life—that which causes the branches to spread and the fruits to appear. When I take my morning walk in my garden, after the morning sacrifice has been paid for the countless mercies I have received, and the refreshing sleep I have enjoyed in the night past; and at that beauteous season of the year, when all is health and gaiety and life, and see the leaves just beginning to expand, the flowers to blossom, and the fruits to open their infant bud on the trees; after the first impulse of my admiration has subsided, my next and most improving meditation is on the source to which their beauty and luxuriance and existence are to be traced—that without their First Cause, none of the beauty we admire, none of the fragrance we breathe, none of the fruits, so pleasing to the sight and so good for the taste, ever could be! And as in nature, so in religion, which go hand in hand together—mutually borrowing from and throwing light and strength upon each other. But for the tree of faith, the fruits of virtue and holiness would not vegetate upon, and impart beauty and loveliness to, the moral world. Let them both, then, grow together, and live in harmony one with another; God will bless and multiply them on the earth, and cause them to be transplanted into the Eden of his Paradise, and flourish in immortal bloom and beauty! Let it ever be our prayer, "Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief!"

IV.

1. All the snares and temptations of the world are allied to some one or other lusts within us, that suits them as tinder to the fire.—Boston.

2. Reason can never show itself more reasonable, than in ceasing to reason about things which are above reason.—Flavel.

3. He is the best accountant, who can cast up correctly the sum of his own errors.—Dillwyn.

4. Head knowledge and heart experience are not always concomitant.—Ibid.

5. No cloud can overshadow the Christian but his faith will discern a rainbow in it.—Bp. Irvine.

6. Bees never work singly, but always in company, that they may assist each other. A useful hint to Christians.—Ibid.

7. Wisdom prepares for the worst, but folly leaves the worst for that day when it comes.—Cecil.

8. With the talents of an angel a man may be a fool. If he judge amiss in the supreme point, judging right in all else does but aggravate his folly.—Young.

9. A man without discretion, is as a vessel without a helm, which, however rich the cargo, is in continual danger of being wrecked.—Dillwyn.

10. The graces which the Blessed Spirit implants in our hearts, resemble a sun-dial; which is of little service except when the sun shines upon it. The Holy Spirit must shine upon the graces he has given, or they will leave us at a loss, in point of spiritual comfort, and unable to tell whereabouts we are.—Toplady.

V.

1. There is no eloquence so powerful as the address of a holy and consistent life. It shames the accusers. It puts to silence the ignorance of foolish men. It constrains them to admire.—Jay.

2. Grace withereth without adversity.—Rutherford.

3. Faith makes us draw all our comforts from a fountain that will never fail.—Halyburton.

4. Spiritual pleasures only are greater in fruition than expectation.—Dillwyn.

5. Humility of mind is neither arrived at, retained, nor increased, by comparing ourselves with others.—Ibid.

6. Though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so truth be in the field, we do injuriously to misdoubt her strength. Let her and falsehood grapple. Who ever knew truth put to the worst in a free and open encounter?—Milton.

7. The depths of misery are never beyond the depths of mercy.—Sibbes.

8. Only the power that makes a world can make a Christian.—Wesley.

9. The true estimate of being is not taken from age, but action.—Jer. Collier.

10. Faith is the hand by which we embrace, or touch, or reach toward, the garment of Christ's righteousness, for our own justification. A soul who enjoys this, is undoubtedly safe. Assurance I consider as the ring which God puts upon Faith's finger. A soul who enjoys this is not only safe, but also comfortable and happy. Full assurance we may consider as a brilliant, or cluster of brilliants, which adorns the ring, and renders it incomparably more beautiful and valuable. Where the diamond of full assurance is thus set in the gold of faith, it diffuses its rays of love, joy, peace, and holiness, with a lustre which leaves no room for doubt or darkness. While these high and unclouded consolations remain, the believer's felicity is only inferior to that of angels, or of saints made perfect above. 'Covet' this 'best gift, earnestly.' —Toplady.

VI.

1. God in every dispensation is at work for our good. In more prosperous circumstances he tries our contentment: in misfortunes, our submission.—H. More.

2. Faith takes God at his word, and depends upon him for the whole of salvation. God is good, and therefore he will not, he is true and faithful, therefore he cannot, deceive me: I believe he speaks as he means, and will do what he says.—Ryland.

3. God! what more glorious? Flesh! what more base? Than God in flesh! what more marvellous?—"Elle etoit de ce monde ou les plus belles choses
"Ont le pire destin;
Augustine.

4. The Christian's life is in Christ, on Christ, by Christ, to Christ, for Christ, with Christ.—P. Henry.

5. He that enquires what is the just value and worth of CHRIST, asks a question which puts all the men on earth, and the angels in heaven, to an everlasting nonplus.—Flavel.

6. Many things in the course of human life, are grievous for want of rightly pondering this truth: that if we needed them not, we should hardly meet with them; and if we do need them, we ought not to wish exemption from them.—Dillwyn.

7. A man must be deplorably insensible or blind to the depravity of his own heart, who sees not the necessity of supernatural aid to correct its disorders.—Ibid.

8. Glory follows afflictions, not as the day follows night, but as the spring follows winter. Winter prepares the earth for spring, and afflictions, sanctified, prepare the soul for glory.—Sibbes.

9. No books are so plain as the lives of men; no characters so legible as their moral conduct.—Fuller.

10. We may be members of a true church, and yet not true members of the church.—Ibid.

VII.

1. True religion is a refuge inaccessible to either the fraud or the violence of men: happy are they who know it to be their shelter in the day of their trouble.—Dillwyn.

2. Some men will follow Christ on certain conditions—if he will not lead them through rough roads; if he will not enjoin them any painful tasks; if the sun and wind do not annoy them; if he will remit a part of his plan and order. But the true disciple, who has the spirit of Jesus, will say, as Ruth to Naomi, 'whither thou goest I will go;' whatever difficulties and dangers may be in the way.—Cecil.

3. The word of the Lord is a lantern to my path and a light to my feet; and I will not, and dare not for my life, step one foot further than I have the lantern going before me. And so far dare I boldly go, though all the world counsel and command me to the contrary.—John Bradford.

4. Let Christ be your only comfort, who will teach you to think rightly and to live happily. The world indeed accounts this to be mere folly and distraction; yet happy that fool who is wise unto Christ, and miserable folly is it not to know him.—Erasmus.

5. The light of Divine Revelation is the only light which can effectually disperse the gloom of a sick chamber, and irradiate even the countenance of death.—Dr. Reid.

6. The sun shines on the moon and stars, and they shine upon the earth: so doth God shine in his goodness and grace upon us; that we might shine in good works towards all men, especially to them who are of the household of faith.—Sibbe.

7. As the condemnation of the first Adam passeth not to us, except as by generation we are his, so grace and remission pass not from the second Adam to us, except as by regeneration we are his.—Flavel.

8. Prayer and pains, through faith in Christ Jesus, can do any thing.—Elliot.

9. Believers are not promised temporal riches, but they are assured of an aid, which is fully sufficient to reconcile them to their allotment.—Dillwyn.

10. Let us beware of judging ourselves by what others think of us.—Fuller.

VIII.

1. To know what religion has done for an individual, we should consider what he would have been without it.—Fuller

2. A high conceit of one's self is no proof of excellence.—Ibid.

3. Had our heavenly Father intended this world for his children's portion, their accomodations would be better; but they are strangers and pilgrims travelling to a distant home, therefore they must expect traveller's fare—which will make home more desirable.—Anon.

4. Until we can make a clear distinction between head knowledge and heart experience, we may easily mistake our own works for the work of religion; which, though wrought in us, is not of us.—Dillwyn.

5. In religious concerns, every thing which we do of ourselves, independently of divine aid, has a tendency to stop us short of the object we are aiming at; and whatever be the substitute we rely on, whether outward or mental, it is an idol at the time.—Ibid.

6. What a mercy it is that no one ever sincerely desires to know the state of his own soul in vain! In the pursuit of all other knowledge, our motives may be too arrogant and selfish to be gratified; but in this, the deeper the research, the more we are humbled, and consequently the better prepared to receive the desired instruction.—Ibid.

7. Prayer is this—to look into the bible and see what God has promised; to look into our hearts and ask ourselves what we want, and then, for Christ's sake, ask and expect the promise to be fulfilled.—Anon.

8. Paul had three wishes, and they were all about Christ; that he might be found in Christ, that he might be with Christ, and that he might magnify Christ.—Anon.

9. Persons may go far, and yet not far enough; they may be convinced, yet not converted; like king Saul, have another heart, and yet not a new one.—Jay.

10. Those who depend on God, shall not want even in a desart.—Bishop Hall.

REMEMBRANCES OF AN OLD MAN.

"At our cottage door
There was a well—the water sweet and clear,
Far in an old brown bucket was drawn up;
No other draught in after life has been
To my parched lips, like that which oft I took Out of the bucket! Oh! how cold it was!
How sweet the labor was to draw it up!
And when 't was drawn, how oft with eager hand
'T was thrown away to find some cooler still.

—I've been to France and quaffed
The rich and noble juice of the pressed grape;
In every clime and country I have drank
What other men call nectar; but I still
Have often quenched my thirst at some rude well,
Hoping to find it like the one so dear
To mem'ry! But never have I found it—
And never shall I! There are not two wells
On earth like that at our dear cottage door—
'T is said the cottage is in sad decay—
Ah! when I was a boy, I never thought
That either that dear cottage or myself
Could e'er grow old!"

DEATH OF CICERO.

Cicero was at his Tusculan villa, with his brother and nephew, when he first received the news of the proscription, and of their being included in it. It was the design of the triumvirate to keep it a secret, if possible, to the moment of execution; in order to surprise those whom they had destined to destruction before they were aware of the danger, or had time to escape. But some of Cicero's friends found means to give him early notice of it; on which he set forward presently, with his brother and nephew, towards Astura, the nearest villa which he had on the sea, with intent to transport themselves directly out of the reach of their enemies But Quintus being wholly unprepared for so sudden a voyage, resolved to turn back with his son to Rome, in confidence of lying concealed till they could provide money and necessaries for their support abroad. Cicero, in the mean while, found a vessel ready for him at Astura, in which he presently embarked: but the winds being cross and turbulent, and the sea wholly uneasy to him, after he had sailed two leagues along the coast, he landed at Circæum, and spent a night near that place, in great anxiety and irresolution: the question was, what course he should steer, and whether he should fly to Brutus, or to Cassius, or to S. Pompey; but after all his deliberations, none of them pleased him so much as the expedient of dying; so that, as Plutarch says, he had some thoughts of returning to the city, and killing himself in Cæsar's house, in order to leave the guilt and curse of his blood on Cæsar's perfidy and ingratitude: but the importunity of his servants prevailed with him to set sail forward to Cajeta, where he went again on shore, to repose himself in his Formian villa, about a mile from the coast, weary of life and the sea, and declaring that he would die in that country which he had so often saved. Here he slept soundly for several hours; though, as some writers tell us, a great number of crows were fluttering all the while, and making a strange noise about his windows, as if to rouse and warn him of his approaching fate; and that one of them made its way into the chamber, and pulled away his very bed-clothes; till his slaves, admonished by this prodigy, and ashamed to see brute creatures more solicitous for his safety than themselves, forced him into his litter or portable chair, and carried him away towards the ship, through private ways and walks of his woods; having just heard that soldiers were already come into the country in quest of him, and not far from the villa. As soon as they were gone, the soldiers arrived at the house, and, perceiving him to be fled, pursued immediately towards the sea, and overtook him in the wood. Their leader was one Popilius Lænas, a tribune or colonel of the army, whom Cicero had formerly defended in a capital cause. As soon as the soldiers appeared, the servants prepared themselves to fight, being resolved to defend their master's life at the hazard of their own: but Cicero commanded them to set him down, and to make no resistance: then looking on his executioners with a presence and firmness which almost daunted them, and thrusting his neck as forwardly as he could out of the litter, he bade them do their work, and take what they wanted: on which they presently cut off his head, and both his hands, and returned with them, in haste and great joy, towards Rome, as the most agreeable present which they could possibly carry to Antony. Popilius charged himself with the conveyance, without reflecting on the infamy of carrying that head which had saved his own: he found Antony in the forum, surrounded with guards and crowds of people: but on showing from a distance the spoils which he brought, he was rewarded on the spot with the honour of a crown, and about eight thousand pounds sterling. Antony ordered the head to be fixed on the rostar, between the two hands; a sad spectacle to the city, and what drew tears from every eye, to see those mangled members, which used to exert themselves so gloriously from that place, in defence of the lives, fortunes, and liberties of the Roman people, so lamentably exposed to the scorn of sycophants and traitors. The deaths of the rest, says an historian of that age, caused only a private and particular sorrow, but Cicero's a universal one: it was a triumph over the republic itself; and seemed to confirm and establish the perpetual slavery of Rome. Antony considered it as such; and, satiated with Cicero's blood, declared the proscription at an end.

He was killed on the 7th of December, about ten days from the settlement of the triumvirate, after he had lived sixty-three years, eleven months and five days.

BIOGRAPHY.

Marshal Ney was perhaps, next to Napoleon, the greatest of the generals produced by the French Revolution. When the French people, goaded to desperation by the minions of a long line of besotted and voluptuous monarchs, the oppression of an overbearing and privileged aristocracy, and the arrogance of a proud and dissolute hierarchy, at length threw off the yoke under which they had groaned during so many centuries, and proclaimed an equality of political rights, all the other powers of Europe united to put down the principles which had led to this event. The revolutionary spirit, thus pressed upon and hemmed in on all sides, acquired tenfold energy, and burst like a torrent through the barriers opposed to it, over-running the whole of continental Europe, throwing down the longest established thrones, and sweeping away, in its impetuous course, the very foundations of the most ancient social edifices. This ill-judged opposition to the rights of between twenty and thirty millions of people, changed the aspect of the whole civilized world, and from it sprang a race of warriors who, seconded by the military spirit inherent in the French nation, subdued every country in Europe, save only Great Britain, protected by her navies and her insular situation. Among the "first and foremost" of these warriors stood Michael Ney, the son of a cooper at Sarrelous, a small town on the Rhine. He was born in 1769, when the debauchery of Louis XV. had exhausted the finances of his country—when the mistresses of this monarch appointed his ministers, his ambassadors, and his generals, and made the government of a great and high-minded people pander to their profligacy. Ney became a soldier in 1787, a short time before the meeting of the States-General, and the wonders effected by the astounding eloquence of Mirabeau.

From the moment the privileges of the aristocracy were abolished, and military promotion was opened to all classes of the community, Ney's career was as rapid as it was brilliant. He gave proof of surpassing genius throughout the French campaigns in Germany and in Switzerland; he displayed diplomatic talents of a high order, under the guidance and the instructions of the celebrated Charles Maurice Talleyrand, then minister for foreign affairs to the French Republic—and certainly the greatest diplomatist of this or perhaps any former age.

Michael Ney was appointed Marshal of the French Empire, in his thirty-fifth year; and from that period he shared, day by day, in all the glories and perils of Napoleon. As he was no party man, but devoted wholly to his country, whatever its form of government, he lent his sword and talents to the chief whom it had chosen. This was his principle through life, and it accounts for his serving Louis XVIII. in 1814, as well as for his joining his former master and friend when he found his efforts to oppose him unavailing—when the whole of his army had gone over to Napoleon, and the positive will of the nation, afterwards put down by the united armies of Europe, recalled the exile of Elba to the imperial throne.

The talents, the dauntless valour, the high-minded generosity, and the considerate kindness of Ney, are proverbial in the French army; and he dwells in the memory of the veterans who served under him, like one of the heroes or demigods of old.

From Ney's activity and daring spirit, combined with consummate skill and prudence, and from his particuliar tnlent in providing for the wants of the troops, without oppressing the inhabitants of the countries overrun by the French armies, he was generally employed by the vanguard—a circumstance which had led to the error, in which even many of his own countrymen share, that he was a mere soldier of action, excellent in leading an attack, but devoid of the high acquirements, extensive knowledge, and strategic skill so necessary to wield and manœuvre large masses of soldiers. This mistaken notion has been strengthened by some of his old companions in arms, who now attempt to vituperate his memory, because he would not allow them, when under his command to practise that system of robbery and plunder which disgraced the French armies in the countries through which they passed, whether as friends or foes, and by means of which some of Napoleon's generals acquired immense wealth. These men, since Ney's death, have attempted to undervalue his talents as a commander. Others, with a view of elevating themselves, have sought to found a military reputation at the expense of his; and among the latter, is a certain General Jomini, aid-de-camp to the late Emperor Alexander, a Swiss by birth, and a flippant writer about compaigns and battles. Ney, having met with him in Switzerland in an almost destitute condition, made him enter the French service, brought him rapidly forward, and ultimately placed him at the head of his staff. Jomini now pretends that while filling this situation, he was Marshal Ney's providence; that he constantly directed all the brilliant achievements of which his general obtained the credit, and got Ney out of all the scrapes into which his deficiencies as a commander were continually leading him. Now, supposing this contemptible rhodomontade to be true, how happens it that this same General Jomini has never distinguished himself by his military talents since he left Ney to enter the service of Russia? His name is quite unknown, even among the third and fourth-rate generals of the day. Surely he cannot allege the want of opportunity; for in the service of no European state is high military talent made more available than in that of Russia.

The truth is, Ney never asked the advice either of his staff collectively, or of its officers in particular, on those grand and extraordinary movements by which he often baffled and defeated an enemy of vastly superior force. They were the rapid inspirations of his own instructive genius, and to this may perhaps be attributed the almost unvaried success that attended them. With regard to his skill as a theoretical as well as a practical warrior, he was unquestionably superior to every other officer in the French service, even to Massena, by many considered the best of Napoleon's generals. This may appear, to some, a very hazardous assertion; it is nevertheless true. Marshal Ney was second only to the Emperor, who on many important occasions, even yielded to his opinions.

Ney's retreat from Russia, in 1813, was a masterpiece of strategy; it is equal to any thing of the kind ever performed by the greatest generals of ancient or modern times, and will hold a prominent place in the military annals of the nineteenth century. That Ney united profound science to the experience of a life of active warfare, is placed beyond a doubt by the manuscripts left in his own hand writing, containing his observations upon the various campaigns in which he served, and also his military studies for the use of his own officers, when he commanded the camp of Montreuil. To this we may add, that he first improved upon the old system of military tactics, and founded the system now followed by the French armies.

In defiance of a solemn capitulation, Marshal Ney was imprisoned as a traitor, and adjudged to die by the members of a faction who had sold their country. These men had fixed his doom before they came to the judgment seat; it was sealed by their iniquitous sentence, and "the bravest of the brave" was judicially murdered at the back of the Luxembourg, on the 7th of December, 1815. He died as he had lived, a man of heroic courage and unshaken firmness. His death will ever remain a foul blot, not only upon the then government of his country, but upon those foreign governments which might and ought to have interfered to prevent such a catastrophe. This view of the case will doubtless be declared erroneous by men of the present day, imbued with the blind vindictiveness of party feeling; but it will surely be the one taken in after ages, when time shall have effaced every vestige of such feeling. Then will the name of Marshal Ney rise pure and imperishable, and justice be done by the whole world to the memory of one who died a felon's death, only because he loved his country too well, and the person of its king less.

DEATH OF MOHAMMED.

Until his sixty-third year, Mohammed had sustained with unabated vigour the temporal and spiritual fatigues of his mission. The infirmities of age had not impaired his constitution, though his health had suffered a gradual decline. His mortal disease was a fever, of which he was seized in the house of Zainab, one of his wives, while giving directions to Asama to lead an expedition into Palestine to avenge the death of Zaid, who had earned the crown of martyrdom at the battle of Muta. Finding his malady increase, he requested to be conveyed to the mansion of his favorite Ayesha, whose tenderness might sooth his last moments. To her he expressed his serious conviction that he owed the cause of his distemper to the poisoned mutton at Khaiber. For three days he suffered the tortures of an intense and insupportable heat, which deprived him at intervals of the use of reason. This paroxysm was succeeded by a more favorable crisis, and he recovered so far as to officiate at prayers in the mosque.—His audience were edified by a penitential acknowledgment of his willingness to make restitution to such as he might have unconsciously wronged. "If there be any man whom I have unjustly scourged, I offer my back to the lash of retaliation. If I have aspersed his reputation, let him proclaim my faults. If I have taken his money, or despoiled him of his goods, I am ready to give the little I possess to compensate his loss.—Let my accuser make his demand; it is not my disposition to resent the claims of justice." "Yes," exclaimed a voice from the crowd, "you owe me three drachms of silver." Mohammed immediately discharged the debt, and thanked his creditor for accusing him in this world rather than at the day of judgment. To his latest hour, and amidst sorrow and suffering, he continued to act the character of the Prophet; evincing at the closing scene of mortality the same remarkable fortitude and presence of mind that he had displayed on the field of battle. In one instance only did the violence of disease betray his wandering faculties into a momentary illusion, when he called for pen and ink, that he might write a book for the better instruction of his followers and therein to consummate the work of revelation.—The proposal was startling, and met with opposition, as the Koran was deemed sufficient; the chamber of sickness was disturbed by an unseasonable dispute, until the dying Prophet was forced to reprimand the indecent vehemence of his disciples. Unwilling that his attendants should witness the recurrence of his infirmities, he ordered all persons to be excluded from his apartment; and the last three days of his existence were spent in the exclusive society of Ayesha.—Tradition, which disfigured his life with romance, has left us to contemplate the circumstances of his death through a cloud of superstitious incense. If we are to place the slighest credit on the evidence of his only companion, he received more incontestible proofs to establish the truth of his mission at its termination than in any former period.—Gabriel made regular visits of condolence and inquiry after his health. The angel of death was not permitted to separate his soul from his body till he had respectfully solicited permission to enter his chamber. The request was granted, and the last office performed with all the deference of a servant to the command of his master. When the moment of his departure approached, his head was reclined on the lap of Ayesha; he fainted in the agony of pain, but recovering his spirits, and raising his eyes with a steady look towards the roof of the apartment, he uttered with a faltering voice the following broken and scarcely articulate expressions:—"O God!——pardon me——have pity——Yes——receive me——among my fellow citizens on high!" and immediately expired on a carpet spread on the floor. The particular year of his death has been disputed; but the best authors fix it to the 12th, of Rebiah I, in the eleventh year of the Hejira, corresponding to the 17th June, A. D. 632.—Edinburgh Cabinet Library, No. XIII. History of Arabia, Ancient and Modern Vol1.

THE DEEP BLUE SEA.

The deep blue Sea! how fair it seems,
When gleaming in the morning beams,
And silver clouds, like sunny dreams,
Glide o'er its placid breast.
The breeze sighs softly o'er the wave,
As silent as the banks they lave,
For every wind sleeps in its cave,
Each billow is at rest!

The dark blue Sea! how pure and bright,
When resting in the hush of night,
Bathed in the radiance of moonlight,
So fair and yet so cold.
The twinkling stars, far downward peep,
Reflected in the tranquil deep,
Whose bosom glows in quiet sleep,
Like mantle decked with gold!

The proud blue Sea! when winds are high,
And darkness gathers o'er the sky,
And the frail bark unconsciously
Is swiftly onward borne;
Then like a lion roused, at length
It strikes its mane in pride of strength,
And its wild roar, from shore to shore,
Resounds, as if in scorn!

The wild blue Sea! how fearful now
To gaze upon its furious brow,
And list the dreary waves that plough
Its billows mountains high!
Now death and danger seem to ride,
Presiding o'er the foaming tide,
And Ocean drowns, with voice of pride,
The seaman's strangling cry!

The calm blue Sea! how still the wave,
Soft breathes the wind through rock and cave,
A dirge o'er many a victim's grave,
Far 'mongst the waters free!
O how sublime must be the power
Of Him who bids the tempest lower,
Yet sways thee, in thy wildest hour,
Thou glorious dark blue Sea!

FABLES OF THE ANCIENTS.

ÆNEAS, THE TROJAN PRINCE.—This celebrated personage was said to be the son of Venus, although his father was a Trojan by the name of Anchises. During the ten years' siege of Troy by the Greeks, Æneas behaved with great valour in defence of his country; and when the city was finally taken and in flames, he carried away upon his shoulders his aged father, and the statues of his household gods, leading in his hand his son Ascanius, and leaving his wife to follow behind. He afterwards equipped a fleet of twenty ships, in which he embarked, with the fugitives from Troy, in search of a new country. After a seven years' cruise, they finally landed in Italy, and founded the Italian nation. His filial piety has rendered him more celebrated than even his martial achievements.

"More valour, mix'd with greater piety.
Than was in him, the world could ne'er descry;
Who on his shoulders, with triumphant joy,
Bore his old father from the flames of Troy."

Moral—Filial affection and duty are evidence of a great mind.

ARACHNE'S NEEDLE-WORK.—The fair Arachne, a female of Colophon, was the daughter of Idmon, a dyer. She challenged Minerva to a trial of skill with the needle, and represented on her work the amours of Jupiter with Europa, Antiope, Leda, Asteria, Danæ, Alcmena, &c. But though her piece was perfect and masterly, she was defeated by Minerva, and hanged herself in despair, and was changed into a spider by the goddess. It is probable that she still continues her favourite vocation of making curious webs. Let our fair votaries of the needle be careful how they challenge goddesses to a trial of skill.

"To whom Minerva gave a fatal doom,
For her contending at the skilful loom,
The nymphs of Tmolus off their vines forsook,
The sweet Pactolian nymphs their streams, to look
On her rare work, nor more delight in viewing
The done (done with such grace) than when adoing."

ARGUS, THE WATCHFUL.—As this celebrated personage had an hundred eyes, of which only two were ever asleep at one time, Juno commissioned him to watch Io, with whom Jupiter was enamoured. The vigilance of Argus being somewhat annoying to Jupiter, he caused him to be slain by Mercury, who first lulled all his eyes to sleep with the sound of his lyre. After this Juno put his eyes on the tail of her favorite bird, the peacock, where they can be seen to this day. Such is the brief history of Argus, of whom the poet says,

——"Io's jealous guard,
Whose hundred eyes his head's large circuit starr'd;
Whereof at once, by turns, two only slept,
The others watch'd, and still their stations kept."

ACHILLES, THE WARRIOR.—This intrepid chief is represented as the bravest of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. During his infancy, his mother, Thetis, is said to have plunged him into the waters of the river Styx, and thereby made every part of his body invulnerable, except the heel, by which she held him. His education was entrusted to the centaur Chiron, who taught him the art of war, and made him master of music; and, by feeding him with the marrow of wild beasts, rendered him vigorous and active. Vulcan, at the entreaties of Achilles's mother, made the young hero a strong suit of armour, which was proof against all weapons. He slew Hector, the bulwark of Troy, tied the corpse by the heels to his chariot, and dragged it three times round the walls of Troy. In the tenth year of the war, Achilles was charmed with Polyxena; and, as he solicited her hand in the temple of Minerva, it is said that Paris aimed an arrow at his vulnerable heel, which inflicted a wound that caused his death.—Thus perished the brave Achilles—

"He whom the silver-footed goddess bore,
That brave attemptive spirit, that could feel
Death's wounding stroke at no place but his heel;
Swift as the dart he cast, as arrows fleet,
Who, though he best could, least would use his feet,
He, for whose arms, such stern debate did rise,
That Ajax would not live without the prize."

Moral—Never make love in church.

APOLLO, GOD OF MUSIC.—This deity is generally represented with a lyre or a bow in his hand, and a quiver of arrows suspended at his back. He was worshipped as the god of medicine, music, poetry and the fine arts, and was supposed to be the son of Jupiter and Latona, born in the floating island of Delos. The chaste Diana was his sister, and the fable probably alludes to the sun and moon. The poets have called him the "laureat god," the "unshorn deity," the Delian god; the Lycian, Delphian, Clarian, Leucadian deity. Also, the "master of the Delphian oracle," the president of verse, &c.

———"By whose instinctive rays are seen
What is, what shall be, or hath ever been,
Immortal verse from his invention springs,
And how to strike the well-concording strings."

ANGER.—It was a memorable saying of Peter the Great, "I have civilized my country, but I cannot civilize myself." He was at times vehement and impetuous, and committed, under the impulse of his fury, the most unwarrantable excesses; yet we learn that even he was known to tame his anger, and to rise superior to the violence of his passions. Being one evening in a select company, when something was said which gave him great offence, his rage suddenly kindled, and rose to its utmost pitch; though he could not command his first emotions, he had resolution enough to quit the company. He walked bare-headed for some time, under the most violent agitation, in an intense frosty air, stamping on the ground, and beating his head with all the marks of the greatest fury and passion; and did not return to the company until he was quite composed.

Lord Somers was naturally of a choleric disposition; and the most striking part of his character was the power of controlling his passion at the moment when it seemed ready to burst forth. Swift, in his "Four last years of Queen Anne," has in vain endeavoured to blacken this amiable part of that great man's character; as what the dean mistook for a severe censure, has proved the greatest panegyric. "Lord Somers being sensible how subject he is to violent passions, avoids all incitements to them, by teaching those whom he converses with, from his own example, to keep within the bounds of decency; and it is indeed true, that no man is more apt to take fire upon the least appearance of provocation; which temper he strives to subdue, with the utmost violence to himself; so that his breast has been seen to heave, and his eyes to sparkle with rage, in those very moments when his words and the cadence of his voice were in the humblest and softest manner."

An Arabian merchant, having hired a waterman's boat, refused to pay the freitage. The waterman, in a violent passion, appealed several times to the governor of Mashat for justice: the governor as often ordered him to come again; but observing him one day present his petition with coolness, he immediately granted his suit. The waterman surprised at this conduct, demanded the reason why he did not sooner grant his petition. "Because," said the judge, "you were always drunk when I saw you." But the waterman declaring he had not been overtaken with wine for several years, the judge replied, "the drunkenness with which you were overtaken, is the most dangerous of all—it is the drunkenness of ANGER."

What is a Love Match? A love match is like that childish toy which consists of various boxes enclosed one within another, and yet contains nothing, after all. I wonder where experience got its reputation! It has been very easily obtained, but it does not deserve it. They say it teaches fools; it may teach them, but they do not learn. Every year one sees a young woman in a white gown, and a young man in a blue coat, adventuring on what is called "the happiest day of one's life;" so called, perhaps, as they are never very particularly happy afterwards. Equally, every year, does one witness couples who in like manner begin in blue and white continue in green and yellow melancholy; yet no one takes warning by the example; all seem to expect a miracle from fate in their own favor—what business they have to expect it I don't know; but we do flatter ourselves strangely. I must, however, do fate the justice to acknowledge its strict impartiality—all are disappointed alike.—Fisher's Drawing Room Scrap Book for 1834.

COURAGE AND FIDELITY OF A DOG.—Some winters back, in a part of the vast forest that stretches along the Upper Norwegian frontier, were travelling two gentlemen—one a native, the other an Englishman. They had gone on the day many weary miles through the waste of snow and forest, when climbing a steep ascent, some two hours' ride from the place of their destination, they left the sledge and walked, thereby relieving the horse, and at the same time stretching their own cramped limbs. A large dog (a cross of the bull and mastiff, and English born) trotted slowly at their heels, and appeared to share with them the gloom which the monotonous gloom of a winter forest never fails to cast over even the most volatile disposition. Having attained the hill top, the travellers, at the moment of re-entering the sledge, perceived a wolf of gigantic size following in their track. They dragged the dog, who was a great favourite, into the sledge with them, and put the horse to his full speed. As, by inconceivable imprudence, they had ventured unarmed in the forest, their only chance of safety was flight, and, while the descent was in their favour, they outstripped their pursuer; but the horse, though winged by fear, as his dropped ears and quivering limbs too plainly told, was already jaded: he soon slackened his speed, and faint and trembling he staggered feebly onward, his strength rapidly deserting him. One only resource now remained, which was to slip the dog, who might possibly hold the wolf in check sufficient time to allow of their escape. However reluctant to consign the poor animal to certain death, self-preservation forced them to adopt this last and only expedient. The wolf was within a few yards when they loosed him, and instantly the two had grappled, and rolled struggling on the snow. As if he knew that life was at stake, the horse now sprang forward desperately, and never paused in his career until he fell expiring in the court yard of ———. That night, while in ease and security the travellers were forgetting their danger, a faint moan was heard at the gate. It was the dog. Covered with blood and wounds, the faithful creature crawled to his master's feet and expired. The wood was searched next morning, and in a spot where the up-torn snow attested the length and fierceness of the conflict, the wolf was found dead. He was the largest seen in those parts within the memory of man.

The Gallery of Algaby, Simplon Road.

The Simplon Road across the Alps, from Geneva to Milan, is one of the most glorious monuments of Napoleon's enterprise. The route eminently claims the attention of all travellers by the novelty, variety, and grandeur, of the objects which it incessantly presents to the view. It would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to select another tract of equal extent, in which he would find such diversity of scenery, embracing all that is wild, awful and sublime in the polar regions of everlasting snow; and all that is beautiful, picturesque and magnificent in the mountains, forests and waters of more temperate regions. This road was began in 1801, by M. Consil, author of the plan. Imagination can scarcely conceive the obstacles opposed to this undertaking. The road was required to cross rivers and precipices, and perforate hard rocks; but in many places it was to rest on crags, undermined by time and torrents, which it was necessary to support and consolidate. The execution of these works, however, fully answered the expectations formed from the talents of the engineers. From Brieg to Domo D'Ossola, the road passes twenty-two bridges, through seven galleries, one seven hundred feet in length, rises 4814 feet, and descends 5,225 feet. The Gallery of Algaby may be considered one of the most remarkable views on the whole route. The Gallery, or Tunnel, is 215 feet long, and is cut entirely through an immense mass of solid granite. The sombre appearance of the interior of the Gallery is well contrasted with the cheerfulness of the objects beyond it. The road is seen winding in various directions in the distance. The Gallery is, perhaps, less affected by changes of the weather than most others, in consequence, perhaps, of the peculiar solidity of the materials of which it is composed. It now and then happens, however, that the species of cement which unites the masses of granite gives way after severe frosts, and in consequence large fragments fall and obstruct the passage.

Remains of the Temple of Concord, &c.

All that now remains of the Temple of Concord at Rome, is eight pillars of oriental granite. Scarcely any thing is left above the architrave; all that exists is of brick; and there are arches in it over the intercolumniations. This temple was destroyed by fire, and was probably repaired in haste; the materials employed had probably belonged to different buildings, for neither the diameter of the pillars nor the intercolumniations are equal. One of them has evidently been made up of fragments of two different pillars, so that the diameter is perceptibly greater near the summit than in the middle. The bases are composed of Doric and Ionic, mixed. The bases and capitals are of white marble, and with the exception above mentioned are formed each of one block of granite; they are altogether 43 feet in height, and 13 feet in circumference.

It was long supposed that the edifice to which these pillars belonged, was that temple of Concord where Tully assembled the Senate on Catiline's conspiracy. In fact, the Temple went by this name for a long period, but now, that it has become the fashion with Roman antiquaries to call into dispute the names given to ancient buildings, the Temple of Concord has been obliged to change its name, and is now conjectured to be a Temple of Fortune; there seems to be no direct evidence for the change.

In front of these fine ruins is the remains of the Temple of Jupiter Tonaus (the thunderer,) erected by Augustus, in gratitude for his escape from the lightning which killed one of his attendants preceding his litter. The pillars on the left of the picture overgrown with moss, are of great size, four feet four inches in diameter; and appear to have been tinged with a purple colour, which may still be clearly observed in the fluting near the capitals. Upon the lateral frieze are sculptured several ornaments connected with sacrifices.

The church of Santa Martina also on the left of the picture, is now dedicated to St. Luke, and one of the oldest churches in Rome still in repair. It was given to the Academy of Painters who dedicated it to their patron St. Luke. Its subterranean vaults are well worth seeing; annexed to the church is the gallery belonging to the Academy of St. Luke. It contains the portraits of a number of the most celebrated painters; among others that of Raphael, and a portrait of the saint by that master.

The general reader never tires of reading of Rome and its antiquities; the Coliseum, the Capitol, the Forum, St. Peter's and the Vatican never fail to gratify the enthusiasm of the classical enthusiast. The pensive reflections inspired by the recollections of the historic past are more freely called up in Rome than elsewhere. Our readers who desire to pursue the subject are referred to a most charming book, entitled "Rome in the Nineteenth Century," written by a lady of fine taste and talent, with all the playfulness of a female pen, light, graceful, and interesting, and yet filled with desirable information, which all should possess, and yet few attain, because the generality of books on the subject of Rome are filled only with dry details. Rome in the Nineteenth Century, on the contrary, will delight every reader with the least pretentions to taste.

WOMAN.

A Song—By Barry Cornwall.

Be gentle with woman, our heart of hearts,
Who loveth us even while life departs;
Oh, call her not fickle, nor false, nor vain;
Oh, touch not so tender a heart with pain!

What, woman, the treasure, the gem, the flower?
The star that is bright in the wildest hour?
The bird that comes singing to sterner breast?
Ah! should we not teach it to love its nest?

Come on! let us vow that they all are fair;
Let's shout of their virtues to earth and air!
Let's soothe them, and guard them, and so repay
The love that they lend in our darker day!

Oh, value their gifts beyond gifts of gold,
All you of the sterner and courser mould;
And learn that their love, amidst toil and strife,
Is the spirit that calmeth and crowneth life.

A TALE OF MEXICAN LIFE.

It was a fine-looking, but deadly-broiling noon on the sea coast of Vera Cruz, when the jolly boat of the Mexican frigate "Libertad" pushed off for the ominous island of Sacrificios. What condition this miserable patch of distempered sand may be in now, we cannot say: at the period we allude to, it was a most wretched place, whose only inhabitants were lizards, turkey-buzzards, vermin of all classes and grades, a "garrison" of half a score of ragged Mexican soldiers, and several negroes, who kept huts, where fiery aquadiente drams and rank Campeachy cigars were vended. It was a glorious place for the orgies of yellow fever. Human bones were strewn about in all directions.

The boat of the national frigate, that was now pulling for the island, was like anything but a British man-of-war's boat. A midshipman in a broad straw hat, with one side of the brim bent down and held between his teeth to keep off the sun's rays that glared upon the sea, was lolling in the stern sheets, puffing a long cigar from the other end of his mouth. He seemed to be thinking as little of the "sickly season," as of his present duty. His blue jacket was like those worn in our own service, except the Mexican eagle and serpent upon the button; but there was a profusion of gold lace upon his white kerseymere trowsers, whose purity was in a rapid way of defacement from the hot ashes of the cigar which continued to fall as the boat rode over the unequal waves occasioned by a coming "norther." His boat's crew consisted of an English cockswain and three half-naked costas. It spoke volumes for the state of the Mexican navy. At the bottom of the boat lay two Mexican marines at full length, and guarded by four others, with loaded muskets, and a serjeant.—One of the prisoners was amusing himself with certain small and interesting intruders in the region of his dark matted locks, the other was fast asleep. They had been found guilty of insubordination and mutiny against an officer, and were ordered ashore to be shot.

Their ostensible offence was not, however, the only cause of their present sentence. There was a secret cause that had excited the officer's most deadly enmity against them. Availing himself of the very lax morality of the country, the said officer, partly by bribes to her parents, but more by promises that were poetically magnificent, and equally fabulous of result, had possessed himself of a pretty coal-eyed nina from the interior, who had now been under his fostering wing some six months. Pablo, her lover, who was a young paysano, had quickly followed and entered the national marine, in the hope of discovering some day, by watching the movements of his officer, in what quarter of Vera Crux his lost fair one was secreted. This he was not long in effecting, as the town is small, and at this period was very thinly inhabited, owing to the sickly season, and also to the frequent firing of the Castle of St. Juan Ulloa which was not then subjugated. The officer not being then aware of the previous acquaintance of Pablo with his beautiful Indian, though he was well aware that his bribe to her parents had rendered some young suitor miserable as well as herself, took no measures to keep him out of the town by extra duties on board gun boats or other vessels, so that frequent meetings of the lovers ensued.

Don Jose, the captain of marines, was a man very much addicted to falling in love; and though by no means intending to return his first fair one to her parents, had recently become desperately enamoured of the wife of one of his men, named Perez, who had been long in the service, but was descended from some old Castilian "stock" or "blade" in the Spanish armies. Don Jose, finding the object of his new passion impregnable to all his assaults, scornfully refusing his bribes, and laughing at his lies, made an end of the siege one fine dark windy night, and carried her off by force to a distant quarter of the town. Meantime he took especial care to keep her husband afloat, "on duty."

Perez, however, with all the acuteness of Argus-eyed jealousy, soon discovered what was transpiring ashore. He meditated sundry schemes of signal revenge; but upon mature reflection not finding any of them to his mind, he determined, with all the patience of one who has a fixed purpose, to wait till he could effect it entirely to his wish.

Perez and Pablo were shortly after transferred, with a few other marines, on board the schooner Tampico; when accidentally becoming acquainted with their mutual wrongs, they agreed to take the next opportunity, when ashore, of way-laying our sea-landsman Lothario. The consequence was, that Don Jose narrowly escaped with his life from the hand of the justly vindictive Perez; and seeking refuge and consolation a short time after at the abode of his first youthful victim, was met at the door by her lover, Pablo, who threatened certain death if he attempted to enter then—or at any future period. Don Jose drew his sword fiercely; but, recollecting that his rank made its use unnecessary in this case, retired to the guard-house, and sending a party of his men to seize Pablo, had him quickly shipped off to the Libertad frigate as prisoner. Here he was joined by Perez, who was in a similar predicament; and a summary court-martial having tried them, without any weight being attached to their half-heard defence, they were ordered the punishment of death, for offering violence to the person of their commanding officer.

In pursuance of this sentence, they were now being conveyed to Sacrificios for execution next morning at day-break. The boat landed them with their guards, and then pulled off again for the frigate.

The crew of the Libertad (though the naval officers were all English) was composed of an ungainly mixture of Portuguese, French and Mexicans; some called "marinorns," others in the shape of marines, and British seamen. A party of the latter had been to Sacrificios in the morning with the launch, and having given their officer "the slip," had congregated into the negro huts, and there treated themselves and Mexican ragamuffin soldiers from the dilapidated guard-house, with plentiful potations of aguadiente, to drink King George's health! When the prisoners arrived, the "soldiery" were in a very disorderly state; staggering about proudly, striking their breasts and exclaiming, "Mejicano! Mejicano!" and occasionally, by way of gratitude for their exhilerated condition, mingling the name of his Britannic majesty, pronounced ad libitum. The interference of the new comers, who claimed more authority than was due to their rank, upon the impertinent score of being quite sober, gradually induced a disturbance and broil, during which the two prisoners escaped, and made off to a remote part of the island.

Upon such a place as Sacrificios it was scarcely possible that they could remain long undiscovered; and to leave it was equally beyond hope. The two men, however, hid themselves in a hole under the lee of a hot and crumbling sand bank. Here, in hoarse whispers, they spoke of their approaching fate, and at sunset they had come to the following determination.

Though sentence of death had been passed, it had nevertheless been left at the option of Don Jose to pardon either, or both, if he pleased; the offence, though not investigated, being evidently of a private and not a public nature. If, therefore, one of them could kill him when he came to Sacrificios to enforce their sentence, the other taking care previously to surrender himself at the guard-house, so as to prevent his implication, it was very probable that the latter would be pardoned, and the former only suffer. Who should do the deed was settled in a most characteristic manner. The Mexicans are most confirmed gamblers; and as to death, they are as careless about it as can be imagined of any people. Perez drew forth a very small and dirty pack of Spanish cards, and they agreed to play for every thing they possessed: (this may seem "forced and unnatural" to the Great Cockaigne;) when the one who lost all his money, silver buttons, trinkets, cigars, and clothes, though the latter only were not to be taken, should kill Don Jose by any means he could, either secretly that night, or if he came there, openly the next morning.

And thus in ghastly silence, at the dusk of evening, while the sound of the sea upon the near shore came surging low upon the ear, exchanging nods and looks at each other, indicative of the progress of the game—oft pausing to listen if those who were searching for them were approaching their hiding place—did those men sit crouching in the sand hole, with their knees touching each other, and their eyes bent close down upon the obscure oracular cards, to decipher their fate as they alternately displayed them in the fast-fading light.

By the time the moon was an hour high, Perez had won every thing belonging to his comrade. He accordingly rose, and receiving from him his money, consisting of a quarter of a dollar and sundry medios, his buttons, tobacco, half a pack of cards, three gilt rings, and two rosarios, ornamented with tinsel and little green silk tassels, they embraced each other several times, with looks of sensibility and affectionate intelligence—that perhaps had never before been expressed upon their features—and parted.

Perez immediately betook himself, by a short cut, to the guard-house, and surrendered himself to the three half-drunk dancing soldiers, and a sedate, towering-drunk corporal. The rest, who could stand, were all out in pursuit, headed by Don Jose, who had subsequently arrived on the island.

Meanwhile, Pablo, after a pause to collect himself for the accomplishment of the deed that had thus devolved upon him, slowly and cautiously moved forth to reconnoitre. He had not proceeded far, when he heard the sound of approaching men, forming one of the parties, that were in search of him and his comrade. As he came nearer, he clearly distinguished the shrill voice of Don Jose. The young Mexican made a rapid, yet noiseless, descent to the sea-shore, along which the party were approaching, and heading them before they were well in sight, stole himself into the sea, and swam, or rather floated, as low in the water as possible, till they had passed. He purposed following them, in order to watch his opportunity when Don Jose might be separated a short distance from his men; but the former manœuvre was rendered unnecessary by Don Jose seating himself upon a stone to rest, giving orders to the soldiers as to the direction in which they were to search before rejoining him.

They were no sooner out of sight, than Pablo issued from the sea and advanced rapidly towards Don Jose. The latter thought at first that it was a messenger with news of the fugitive; but seeing the glitter of a drawn blade, added to a peculiarity of manner in the approaching figure, he started up and placed himself in a posture of defence. The young Mexican, though new to the service of arms, was most expert, like many of his countrymen from the interior, in the use of the knife; and grasping his bayonet in the same style, it became a dreadful weapon in his hand, which nothing but an equal skill in his antagonist's sword could withstand. Don Jose had scarcely time to recognize and call upon him to surrender himself, ere Pablo attacked him with a spirit and vigor that precluded all further parley, not even giving him breath to call for assistance.

The contest was not of long duration. Don Jose wounded Pablo slightly several times, but fearing to make a thorough-going lunge, because, if it failed, his own fate was pretty certain, he continued to retire backwards a step at a time, till stumbling, he fell at his length, and his antagonist, striking the sword from his hand, stood over him with his uplifted weapon.

Don Jose instantly rose upon his knees with his hands elevated to avert the descending point, and begged his life. Pablo paused a moment, indecisive; when, remembering his faith plighted to his comrade, he exclaimed:—"No—you shall die as you deserve; but I will not kill you in that attitude. Rise, and take your sword once more, and be quick about it, lest your men return." As he said this, the young Mexican drew himself up with that degree of abstraction and dignity which generally accompanies the sudden transition of feeling in a magnanimous action; when the wily Don Jose sprung upon him like a tiger-cat, and snatching the bayonet from his relaxed hand, thrust it deep into his breast, and Pablo, with one long convulsive gasp reeled and fell lifeless upon the sand.

Don Jose quickly returned to the guard-house. Finding the other prisoner already in custody, he gave the strictest and most peremptory injunctions as to his safe keeping, and chuckling with bitter glee at the further satisfaction he should have in the morning, betook himself to rest.

When Perez understood the fate of his comrade, he as readily saw his own, and with one shrug of the shoulders reconciled himself as well as he could to the unlucky disappointment and its consequences. In the course of the night he drew forth his tattered pack of cards, and offered to play with the soldiers who were guarding him for all he had; they thought it would be very easy to win every thing from a man who was to die in the morning, and of course could have no need for, and must be equally careless about losing his money and "valuables." They were deceived. Perez never played with so much skill as upon this occasion, and his luck, by a freak of fortune common enough in such cases, was unfailing. He made the most hazardous bets, and won them; he gave any odds upon any card, and still won. Having nearly possessed himself of all the money, ornaments and other trumpery of the soldiers, he was obliged to desist, as the dawn was breaking; he therefore gave them in charge to one whom he could depend upon, to be conveyed to his wife in Vera Cruz, together with a short message between an adieu and an injunction.

At gun-fire aboard the Libertad—from which the "garrison" of Sacrificios generally took their time—Perez was led forth to execution, with a cigar in his mouth. We do not say that he was insensible to the end that awaited him; but knowing that it was inevitable, his presence of mind was disturbed by no hopes, and his nerves were not of a kind to be shaken by fears. The only thing that superseded indifference, was a bitter sense of the injustice of his fate. Though a Mexican by birth and parentage, his grandfather had been a soldier of some small rank in Old Spain, and Perez seeing nothing but Mexicans around him, thought he could not show his own contempt of death sufficiently without including the people of the country he was about to "quit" and who were to fire at him, he laid his hand upon his breast, with an air of hauteur, as though he had descended from a grandee, exclaiming—"Soy Espanol; Castellano! y no Mejicana mestizo."*

Don Jose, with an enraged voice, ordered the foremost party, who were marines, to load.—While they were doing so with their usual awkwardness, Perez addressed the officer with scornful composure, holding his cigar between a finger and thumb.

"Don Jose, you are a coward. I know it by your having killed Pablo. He was far more expert with his weapon than you with yours: his death must have been effected by some foul trick or promise."

With a furious execration, Don Jose snatched a musket from the hand of the marine nearest to him, and fired at his victim. The ball missed him, and Perez, with a grim smile, taking a whiff of his cigar, spoke again:

"Don Jose, you were a brutal piocaroon to carry off my wife by force; but you were a fool before that, to suppose that she, or any other woman, would have left me, Espanol! Castillano! for such a lizard-faced spider-limbed thing as you! As those noisy barrels pointing at me ——."

At this moment a volley from the marines silenced him forever. The ghastly hue of death overspread his countenance, and the blood issued from several parts of his white dress, trilling down in long branching rills into the sand. With eyes fixed on Don Jose, he stood a moment—tossed his cigar scornfully upon the ground—and folding his arms, fell backwards stone dead without a groan.

Don Jose returned to his marine corps in Vera Cruz, exulting in the end of his rivals. He did not long enjoy his ill-gotten triumph over his unfortunate men; for, a few weeks after, he was found murdered in the streets of Vera Cruz, close by the Santa Febarrier. The deed was traced, without much difficulty, or the lazy "authorities" would never have traced it at all—to the wife of Perez. She was accordingly fined five dollars, and ordered to be imprisoned a fortnight; the triviality of which punishment was not owing to any sense of political or moral justice—that being about the average estimate of the value of a life in Mexico.

*I am a Spaniard!—a Castillian!—not a mongrel Mexican!

LOVE ME!

Love me—Love me—like the stars
That love to shine at night,
With sparkling eyes
In joy arise
To kiss the gloom and make it bright.

My heart—My heart is a gloomy veil,
That time has darkened o'er;
But come with the light
Of thine eyes, star-bright,
And darkness shall be no more.

Love me—Love me—like the sun
That warms while it lightens too;
Brings flowers to life
With sweetness rife,
I care not for life without flowers to view.

My heart—My heart's a garden wild,
Its flowers are left to perish;
But come like the sun,
And smile upon
The heart's garden roses, and cherish.

Love me—Love me—like the moon,
For the moon is chaste and bright;
And love to endure,
Must, like moonlight, be pure,
And holiness be in its light.

My heart—My heart's like a placid brook
That lies in a garden fair;
And the sun-rays at noon,
And the stars and the moon,
Must beam on and brighten there.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MATHEW CAREY.

LETTER IV.

In October, 1786, I commenced, in partnership with T. Siddons, Charles Cist, C. Talbot, W. Spotswood, and J. Trenchard,* the Columbian Magazine. In the first number, I wrote four pieces, "The Life of General Greene," "The Shipwreck, a Lamentable Story, Founded on Fact," "A Philosophical Dream," and "Hard Times, a Fragment."

The Philosophical Dream was an anticipation of the state of the country in the year 1850, on the plan of Mercier's celebrated work, "The Year 2500." Some of the predictions, which at that period must have been regarded as farcical, have been wonderfully fulfilled, and others are likely to be realized previous to the arrival of the year 1850. I annex a few of them, which may serve to amuse the reader.

"Pittsburg, Jan. 15, 1850. The canal which is making from the river Ohio, to the Susquehanna, and thence to the Delaware, will be of immense advantage to the United States. If the same progress continues to be made hereafter as has been for some time past, it will be completed in less than two years."

This was probably the first suggestion of the grand project of uniting the waters of the Delaware with those of the Ohio. It preceded by four years the project of the financier, Robert Morris, and his friends, to unite the Delaware with the Schuylkill and the Susquehanna, which was broached in 1790.

"Pittsburg, Jan. 15. Delegates from the thirtieth new state, laid off a few months since by order of Congress, lately arrived at Columbia; and on producing their credentials, were received into the Federal Council.

"The Agricultural Society of this town, have offered premiums to the amount of £1000, for the improvement of husbandry.

"In the assembly of this state, it was lately ordered that the salaries of public school-masters shall hereafter be £200 per annum.

"Ezekiel Jones was lately convicted of not sending his son to school, although five years old. The time ordered by law is at four years. He was sentenced to stand in a white sheet, three successive Sundays, in his parish church.

"Charleston, April 15. No less than 10,000 blacks have been transported from this state and Virginia, during the last two years to Africa, where they have formed a settlement near the mouth of the river Goree. Very few blacks remain in this country now; and we sincerely hope that in a few years every vestige of the infamous traffic carried on by our ancestors in the human species, will be done away.

"Richmond, April 30. By authentic advices from Kentucky, we are informed, that "no less than 150 vessels have been built on the river Ohio, during the last year, and sent down that river and the Mississippi, laden with valuable produce, which has been carried to the West Indies, where the vessels and their cargoes have been disposed of to great advantage.

"Boston, April 30. At length the canal across the isthmus of Darien is completed. It is about sixty miles long. First-rate vessels of war can with ease sail through. Two vessels belonging to this port, two to Philadelphia, and one to New York, sailed through on the 20th of January last, bound for Canton, in China.†

"Columbia, May 1. Extract from the Journals of Congress.—"Ordered that there be twenty professors in the University of Columbia, in this city; viz: of Divinity, of Church History, of Hebrew, of Greek, of Humanity, of Logic, of Moral Philosophy, of Natural Philosophy, of Mathematics, of Civil History, of Natural History, of Common and Civil Law, of the Law of Nature and Nations, of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, of Botany, of Materia Medica, of Physic, of Chemistry, of Anatomy, and of Midwifery."

Philadelphia, Oct. 1, 1786.

The discomfort arising from the discordant views of the different partners—the utter improbability of such a work producing any profit, worth the attention of five persons, and other considerations, determined me to withdraw from the Columbian Magazine, which I did in December, 1786. And in January, 1787, I issued the first number of the American Museum, intended to preserve the valuable fugitive essays, that appeared in the newspapers, which I continued for six years, ending Dec. 1792.

The first number, which contained a mass of most excellent matter, attracted great attention. It was eagerly sought after; and as I sold it separately, the edition, 1000 copies, was soon exhausted. I had not means to reprint it. This was a very serious injury; many persons who intended to subscribe, declining, as I could not furnish the whole of the numbers. I applied for a loan of $150 to half a dozen or a dozen wealthy persons, but for a considerable time my applications were wholly in vain.‡ At length I procured the requisite sum from Mr. George Fox, to whom I gave bond and judgment for the amount. He passed the bond to his grocer, in payment for family supplies, and the grocer was indemnified by instalments, as I found it convenient.

Never was more labour bestowed on a work, with less reward. During the whole six years, I was in a state of intense penury. I never at any one time, possessed 400 dollars,—and rarely three or two hundred. My difficulties were of the most embarrasing kind. I was, times without number, obliged to borrow money to go to market, and was often unable to pay my journeymen on Saturday; which sent me to bed sick with vexation. One resolute negro pressman, who had not received his wages on Saturday night, refused to go to work on Monday morning. "He was not," he said boldly, "going to starve in the midst of the fat of the land."

The strongest instance of my extreme poverty, was in the case of a German paper maker, named Conrad Hindersheets, to whom I had given a note for 37 dollars, which I paid at five instalments, one of which was a French crown! Be it observed, that I was then as willing and ready to pay my debts, as I have ever been, or am at present; and what renders the case more remarkable, is, that the man lived, as far as I recollect, 15 or 20 miles out of town; and there is always more scruple about putting off a country dun, than one who lives in the same city with the debtor.

My embarrassments arose from three sources. The subscription was too low. It was only two dollars

*After I quitted the concern, a general title was engraved for the first volume, which contained the names of the proprietors at that period—viz: T. Siddons, W. Spotswood, C. Cist and J. Trenchard.

†Utterly ignorant of canalling at that period, I made a most miserable calculation of the width and expense of such an improvement. I have therefore omitted both, to escape ridicule. This, be it observed, is the only variation from the original.

‡What a contrast between this conduct and that of the Marquis de la Fayette! In the one case, I was a poor, friendless, forlorn stranger; in the other I was engaged in a very useful occupation, which, for aught the parties knew, might prove highly profitable, and therefore had a tenfold claim. Moreover, the sum required as a loan, was not much more than a third of the amount of the Marquis's gift.

and forty cents per annum, for which I gave two volumes containing each from 500 to 550 pages; a quantity that now commands $5. This was an immense disadvantage, and enough of itself, to keep me constantly in a crippled state.

Another source of difficulty arose from the fact, that more than half of my subscribers lived in remote situations, 2, 3, 4 and 500 miles from me; and their remittances were so extremely irregular that I was obliged to hire collectors to dun them, at a heavy expense, which averaged at least 30 per cent. of the slender modicum I was entitled to receive! It is painful to relate that wealthy citizens of Philadelphia, were in many cases guilty of the gross impropriety, of obliging me to send half a dozen or a dozen times for the paltry annual subscription.

I printed, moreover, quite too many copies, in the vain hope of ultimately procuring a large increase of subscribers. In a word, my pecuniary embarrassments were so great, and so constant, that I am now astonished, how I was able to muster perseverance and fortitude to struggle through them.

I was much attached to the work, and had great reluctance to abandon it, unproductive and vexatious as was the management of it; but at length I sang its requiem, as I have said, at the close of the year 1792. That it had considerable merit is universally acknowledged; and there is no vanity in the declaration, as the work did not contain a single essay of my own. The whole of my labour consisted in the selection of its contents from newspapers, and the addition, occasionally, of a few notes of little importance.

The American Museum met with the most unqualified approbation of some of the most distinguished citizens of the United States—of Gen. Washington; John Dickinson; Gov. Livingston; Dr. Rush, Bishop White, Judge Hopkinson, Dr. Dwight, &c. &c.

"I believe the American Museum has met with extensive, I may say, with universal approbation from competent judges; for I am of opinion that the work is not only eminently calculated to disseminate political, agricultural, philosophical, and other valuable information; but that it has been uniformly conducted with taste, attention and propriety. If to these important objects, be superadded the more immediate design, of rescuing public documents from oblivion; I will venture to pronounce as my sentiment, that a more useful literary plan has never been undertaken in America, or one more deserving of public encouragement."—Gen. Washington, June 25, 1788.

"With very great pleasure I have observed, that it has been conducted in a manner highly deserving encouragement. As I do not doubt but it will be continued with the same diligence, prudence, and zeal for advancing the welfare of these states, that have hitherto so eminently distinguished its direction, I fervently wish, and firmly trust, that a generous and enlightened people, will justly estimate the merits of a work carried on with such a variety of exertions, and such a fidelity of intentions for the publick good."—Hon. John Dickinson, July 19, 1788.

"Perusing one of your Museums, lent me by a friend, I hesitated not a moment to subscribe to the work. Since that, I have read all the preceding numbers, and can say, without flattery, (which I always detested) that it far exceeds in my opinion, every attempt of the kind, which, from any other American press, ever came to my hands."—Gov. Livingston, August 8, 1788.

"I cheerfully concur in adding the testimony of my name in favor of the usefulness of your Museum together with my best wishes for its extensive circulation, while it continues to be the vehicle of essays that are calculated to advance the interest of science and virtue, and of the agriculture, manufactures, and national government of the United States."—B. Rush, M. D.

To the married state I had long looked forward, as the most elegible condition in life, even before my adventure with Miss Boys. But I was so chivalric, that I had determined never to marry till I could support a wife genteelly, or at least comfortably. But in this case, as in many others, in which I had resolved, as I thought, irrevocably, fortune or destiny crossed my purpose; for when I married at 31, my whole property consisted in cart loads of odd volumes, and odd numbers of the American Museum, which, when I finally abandoned the work, proved almost valueless; and also a most slender supply of furniture, which would not sell for one hundred dollars. My wife was as poor as myself. I did not receive a dollar with her: all her fortune was a quantity of furniture, not much more valuable than my own. So far as fortune is concerned, it rarely happens that a more imprudent marriage takes place—or one in which sordid views of interest have less influence. I was obviously not a fortune hunter.

I married Miss B. Flahavan, the daughter of a highly respectable citizen, ruined by the revolution. He sold his stock in trade for continental money; and, being inactive and indolent, took no means to realize it; and it finally perished nearly altogether in his hands.

My wife was about ten years younger than me. She was industrious, prudent, and economical, and well calculated to save whatever I made. She had a large fund of good sense. We early formed a determination to indulge in no unnecessary expense—and to mount the ladder so slowly, as to run no risk of having to descend. Happy, thrice happy would it be, for thousands and tens of thousands, if they adopted and persevered in this salutary and saving course! What masses of misery would it not prevent! But a large portion of young people at present, crowd into a few years, enjoyments which might last for life; and hence, it too often happens, that daughters, tenderly reared, and who have brought handsome fortunes to their husbands, are obliged to return home to their aged parents, who have to maintain them, their husbands, and an increasing brood of children; a deplorable fate for old age. The young men are highly culpable, who, through their imprudence or extravagance, make such a return to the parents of their wives, for their cares and anxieties and expenditures. To avoid this calamity, no pains, no sacrifice of enjoyment or even of comfort or convenience ought to be spared. Some idea may be formed of the fidelity with which we observed this rule, when I state that at a time when I did business to the amount of 40 or 50,000 dollars per annum, I hesitated for four or five years about changing my gig for a one-horse four-wheel carriage—and nearly as long about purchasing a carriage and pair. And during the whole period of our marriage, I never, as far as I recollect, entered a tavern except on a jury, or arbitration, or to see a customer, or at a public dinner, or on my travels; never in a single instance for the purpose of drinking.

My wife and I lived together happily for nearly thirty nine years. We had nine children, of whom three have died, two in infancy, and one, a daughter, of the most angelic character, at about seventeen years. Of her I can truly say, that to the best of my recollection, she never gave her mother or me a single moment's uneasiness by ill temper or ill humour. She was placidity and gentleness personified. M. CAREY.

LETTER V.

When I relinquished the ill-fated Museum, I commenced book-selling and printing on a small scale. My store, or rather my shop, was of very moderate dimensions; but, small as it was, I had not full-bound books enough to fill the shelves—a considerable portion of them were occupied by spelling-books. I procured a credit at Bank, which enabled me to extend my business; and by care, indefatigable industry, the most rigid punctuality, and frugality, I gradually advanced in the world. Some idea may be formed of my devotion to business, from the fact, that for above twenty-five years, I was present, winter and summer, at the opening of my store; and my parlor being close to the store, I always left my meals, when business of any importance was being transacted.

In 1793, I was a member of the Committee of Health, appointed to devise the best course to be pursued for the relief of the sick of the Yellow Fever, and of the orphans, who had been and might be bereft of their parents or other protectors. While the committee were deliberating on the appointment of managers of Bush Hill hospital, (a villa belonging to William Hamilton, Esq. of which possession had been taken, in the absence of the proprietor, from the impossibility of procuring any other place as well situated;) while, I say, they were thus deliberating, they were inexpressibly delighted by the offer of Stephen Girard, one of the members, to officiate in the capacity of superintendent. Stimulated by this noble offering of himself, as a sort of forlorn hope in the cause of humanity, in a situation which was generally regarded as dooming the party to destruction, Peter Helm, a plain German, came forward, and offered his services in the same perilous office. They both performed the duty most faithfully. Mr. Girard helped to dress the sores, and perform all the menial offices for the sick. This part of the duty was not, I believe, so much attended to by Mr. Helm, who had the general superintendence of the house and all its concerns.

I wrote a full account of the rise, progress, effects, and termination of this dreadful calamity, of which I published four editions. The chief part of one of them, the second, was sent to Europe, for the information of correspondents. Hundreds of them were sent by debtors to creditors in that quarter, to account for deficiency of remittance.

The following extract from this pamphlet may prove interesting to the reader:—

"The consternation of the people of Philadelphia, at this period, September, 1793, was beyond all bounds. Dismay and affright were visible in almost every person's countenance. Most of those who could, by any means, make it convenient, fled from the city. Of those who remained, many shut themselves up in their houses, being afraid to walk the streets. The smoke of tobacco being regarded as a preventive, many persons, even women and small boys, had cigars almost constantly in their mouths. Others, placing full confidence in garlic, chewed it almost the whole day; some kept it in their pockets and shoes. Many were afraid to allow the barbers or hair-dressers to come near them, as instances had occurred of some of them having shaved the dead, and many having engaged as bleeders. Some, who carried their caution pretty far, bought lancets for themselves, not daring to allow themselves to be bled with the lancets of the bleeders. Many houses were scarcely a moment in the day free from the smell of gunpowder, burnt tobacco, nitre, sprinkled vinegar, &c. Some of the churches were almost deserted, and others wholly closed. The coffee-house was shut up, as was the city library, and most of the public offices; three out of the four daily papers, were discontinued, as were some of the others. Many devoted no small portion of their time to purifying, scouring, and whitewashing their rooms. Those who ventured abroad, had handkerchiefs or sponges, impregnated with vinegar or camphor, at their noses, or smelling-bottles full of thieves' vinegar. Others carried pieces of tarred rope in their hands or pockets, or camphor bags tied round their necks. The corpses of the most respectable citizens, even of those who had not died of the epidemic, were carried to the grave on the shafts of a chair, the horse driven by a negro, unattended by a friend or relation, and without any sort of ceremony. People uniformly and hastily shifted their course at the sight of a hearse coming towards them. Many never walked on the foot-path, but went into the middle of the streets to avoid being infected in passing houses wherein people had died. Acquaintances and friends avoided each other in the streets, and only signified their regard by a cold nod. The old custom of shaking hands, fell into such general disuse, that many shrunk back with affright at even the offer of the hand. A person with a crape, or any appearance of mourning, was shunned like a viper; and many valued themselves highly on the skill and address with which they got to windward of every person whom they met. Indeed, it is not probable that London, at the last stage of the plague, exhibited stronger marks of terror, than were to be seen in Philadelphia, from the twenty-fifth or twenty-sixth of August, till late in September. When the citizens summoned resolution to walk abroad, and take the air, the sick cart conveying patients to the hospital, or the hearse, carrying the dead to the grave, which were travelling almost the whole day, soon damped their spirits, and plunged them again into despondency.

"While affairs were in this deplorable state, and people at the lowest ebb of despair, we cannot be astonished at the frightful scenes that were acted, which seemed to indicate a total dissolution of the bonds of society in the nearest and dearest connexion. Who, without horror, can reflect on a husband, married perhaps for twenty years, deserting his wife in the last agony—a wife, unfeelingly abandoning her husband on his death-bed—parents forsaking their children—children ungratefully flying from their parents, and resigning them to chance, often without an inquiry after their health or safety—masters hurrying off their faithful servants to Bush Hill, even on suspicion of the fever, and that at a time, when, almost like Tartarus, it was open to every visitant, but rarely returned any—servants abandoning tender and humane masters, who only wanted a little care to restore them to health and usefulness—who, I say, can think of these things without horror?"

It is a curious fact, which I leave physiologists to account for, that some of the most tranquil and happy hours of my existence were passed during the prevalence of this pestilence. And the feelings of my colleagues generally, were pretty much the same. I was, for the first time for ten years, wholly free from the cares of business—had no money to borrow—no notes to pay—and my mind was fully occupied by the duties to which I had devoted myself. We generally breakfasted at home, at an early hour, and mustered immediately at the state-house, where we remained till late in the evening. We had a sideboard plentifully provided with ham, round of beef, cheese, bread, wine, and porter; and we freely enjoyed the good things provided for us—became a band of brothers, attached to each other—and were in some degree callous to the scenes, which daily and hourly took place, and of some of which we were eye-witnesses. The only drawback on our enjoyment, was when some friend or relation was swept away suddenly—when we had information that one of our colleagues shared that fate*—or when some person had become a corpse,

* Four of our members, among the most valuable citizens that Philadelphia could boast of, died of the fever—Jonathan Dickinson Sergeant, the father of our estimable fellow citizen, John Sergeant, Esq.; Andrew Adgate, Daniel Offley, and Joseph Inskeep. Mr. Sergeant left ten children, one of them posthumous. Seven of them were under thirteen years of age. What a whom we had seen or known to be in good health a few hours before.

One day I rode with Caleb Lowndes towards Bush Hill, where we stopped to speak to the physician, Dr. B. Duffield, who was standing at the gate. He asked us to alight, which we complied with. After we had conversed together for a few minutes, he invited us to come in, and examine the house. Lowndes had the prudence to refuse. But although I saw the impropriety of a wanton exposure of myself to danger, without any possible good to arise from it, I had not courage to refuse (a failing which has often cost me dear;) I entered the building, and went through every room in the house. The atmosphere was fetid, for it was just after Messrs. Girard & Helm had undertaken the management of it, and before there was opportunity to purify the rooms from the pestilential air that had accumulated, previous to that epoch, when dead and putrefying bodies remained for days collected in the rooms, the attendants having been inadequate to inter them. When I returned home, I found, or perhaps only fancied, myself affected with what are always regarded as incipient symptoms—lassitude—pains in the head and back—and an icy coldness over the surface of my body. I was, as may be readily supposed, considerably alarmed—and obstare principiis being my maxim, I took immediate measures to arrest the fell destroyer in his career. I bathed my feet in warm water—took large draughts of warm centaury tea—and went early to bed, covered with as many blankets as I could well bear. I had a strong presentiment that a sound sleep and copious perspiration would completely put the enemy to flight. For three or four hours I could neither sleep nor perspire. But, at length, I fell into as sound a sleep as if I had been drenched with laudanum; and, when I awoke, was covered with a profuse perspiration, and found myself as well as I had ever been.

Let me here insert two or three banking anecdotes, although one of them, at least, is rather out of time.

The Bank of North-America was regarded pretty much as a Quaker bank,—its most influential directors being Friends. I had a small account there, and was sufficiently accommodated. When that interesting comedy, Wild Oats, came to this country, I published it. There is introduced among the dramatis personæ a hypocritical Quaker, Ephraim Smooth, at which the Quakers very naturally took offence. Simultaneously with this publication, I met with several unusual rejections at this Bank. It being a novelty, I was, from the coincidence, led to believe it was in consequence of the publication of Wild Oats, which the good followers of the illustrious Penn, I supposed, took in high dudgeon. How far this idea was correct, I never had any opportunity to decide. I was probably quite mistaken.

During the yellow fever of 1798, died my excellent friend, Isaac Price, than whom a better, more zealous, more ardent, or public spirited man never lived. I was indorser for him at the Bank of Pennsylvania to the amount of probably six or seven thousand dollars, and he for me, for five or six thousand dollars. I offered two names of perfectly unexceptionable character, James Gallagher, and John Carrell, to supply his place, each for about one half the total sum. The Bank demanded both names on each note. I felt indignant, refused, and set them at defiance. I wrote them a long and strong letter, in which I distinctly stated, that I would not sanction such a libel on my credit, as to admit that my name, with the addition of that of one of those citizens, was not good for the amount; and that "I could not, if I would—and would not if I could," give two indorsers to each note—meaning, that the confession of the necessity of two names would alarm the parties, and produce a refusal from both. I was in a considerable quandary; and, had the Bank persisted, I really knew not what to do. But I had the pleasure of seeing the president, S. M. Fox, come to me in the evening, with the information, that the Bank had receded from its demand—that I had the privilege of withdrawing my letter—and that I might, in the morning, send in the notes on my own plan. Mr. Fox, who was, in the fullest sense of the word, a complete gentleman, of the most amiable manners, spoke to me so kindly, that he brought tears to my eyes—a result which has never been produced on me by harshness, but frequently by kindness and sympathy.

THE TRUMPETER OF ZION.

There was once a wild tradition among the Tyrol mountains that on one of the inaccessible summits a terrible trumpeter had taken his stand, and that the course of the world rolled on prosperously or the contrary according to the fearful tunes which he played. After blowing through the gloom and glory of this world it was said that he would blow a dirge so mournfully solemn for himself, that death would refuse for a time to execute his last commission upon him, hoping that his trumpet would wail again among the mountains.

A blast is on the hills,
A roar upon the sea,
A searching echo thrills
Like trumps of victory,—
And louder—broader—swells the song
That rolls in stormy chords along.

Tremendous, heard at night,
A moral trumpet blows,
And dead men wake in fright,
Rending their damp grave clothes—
Staring with eyes of fire, toward
The outspread banner of the Lord.

Blow, trumpeter, again!
Up-break old monuments,
And flashing o'er the plain
Blaze unexplained portents,—
While earth upon her mountain throne
Gives from her mighty heart a groan.

Blow, trumpeter, once more!
Ten thousand legions come
Without the cannon's roar
Or beat of stirring drum—
Grim war turns pale before a host
The proudest captains ne'er could boast.

The rush of wings is heard,
The lutes of heaven play,
The storm creation feared
Hath passed in peace away,—
And glory like an unbound sea
Sweeps proudly round immensity.

Blow, trumpeter, in power!
The earth beneath the blast
In changing every hour;
Its iron age hath passed,
And golden eras sweetly rise
Like daylight over summer skies.

The mellow east is red,
The sun of glory nigh;
Uncover now thy head
Beneath a crimson sky,

Which blushes all a Saviour's love
To gild thy canopy above.

Blow, trumpeter, a peal
Before the solemn knell
Thy death-note shall reveal,
And ring thy sad farewell:—
Blow, wild trumpeter, in thunder
And break the jaws of death asunder!

Blow trumpet—clarion—horn!
Like many waters crying,
The doomed one to warn
And save a soul from dying—
Blow rock and mountain rampart round
Till glory echoes back the sound.

Blow with your dying breath!
Fling on the midnight air
The swan-notes of your death
And leave their echo there:
The last shout of your sounding shell
Shall blend with angel harpers well.

The trumpeter is dead,
His trumpet speaks no more,
The gravel for his bed
Was dug upon the shore—
Yet signet, sceptre, harp and crown,
Upon his dying couch came down.

JOHN NEWLAND MAFFITT.

Baltimore, 1833.

COUNSELLOR COSTELLO.

While the celebrated Costello was in his zenith, at the Irish bar, he was unrivalled for wit, acuteness and propensity for brogue. His practice lay considerably in the criminal courts, where by his ingenuity, he enabled many a deserving culprit to evade the punishment of the law. He was one day summoned to Newgate in a great hurry, and in a case of great emergency. The safe or strong box of the bank of Glendower & co. had been plundered to an immense amount. Suspicion had fallen upon the deputy cashier, who was in consequence arrested and sent to prison, inside the walls of which he had not been ten minutes, before he was advised by his fellow prisoner to send for Counsellor Costello, who would, if any man could, save his life. It was in obedience to this summons, that the Counsellor repaired to Newgate.

"I am told you are committed for purloining ten thousand guineas, my dear sir?" said the Counsellor, as he entered the cell.

"I am."

"Are you guilty?"

"Sir."

"Have you the Aragoun cheese?"

"I don't understand you."

"Did you do the thing?"

"Sir, you insult me by your suspicions!"

"Then you'll be hanged!" and the Counsellor took his hat.

"Hold, sir," said the prisoner—who after a little hesitation confessed that he was able to pay the Counsellor a thousand guineas, if he should procure his acquittal. The bargain was struck, and the Counsellor then took his leave.

Costello immediately repaired to the Crown Office, as it was then called, in Dublin, from which his client had been committed. The sitting magistrate was still on the Bench.

"Good morrow, Mr. Alderman," said the Counsellor, as he entered, "is there any news to day—any thing stirring in my way?"

"Yes, a most extraordinary case has occurred. One of Glendower's clerks has abstracted from the strong box of the bank, ten bags, each containing one thousand guineas in gold. He was arrested this morning; some of the property was found on him, and has been sworn to. I sent him to Newgate about half an hour since, and he'll certainly swing after the next commission." (Old Bailey Sessions.)

"The property sworn to! Why zounds! how can that be? One guinea is like another, and—

"True, true, but with the guineas, the fellow stole some foreign gold coin, one of which, a broad Dutch piece was found on him when he was arrested—it has been identified by the chief cashier; so you will admit he has no chance of escape. Here it is"—and he handed the coin to the Counsellor.

Costello took the piece of money into his hand, looked at it most attentively, turned it in his hand and after considering it with an air of virtuoso, returned it to the Alderman, with "Upon my conscience, as clear a case as I ever met." After some unimportant conversation, he withdrew, went home, and by the packet which sailed, that night, he despatched a trusty messenger to Amsterdam with certain instructions, and a strict injunction to be back in Dublin, within three weeks, at the end of which, the commission of Oyer and Terminer was to commence. The man succeeded in the object of his mission, and returned to Dublin on the morning of the day appointed for the trial of his master's client.

The prisoner was put upon trial. The principal cashier of Glendower & Co. proved the circumstance of the robbery as narrated by the Alderman, to Costello; adding that the robber (who could be none but the prisoner) had substituted ten bags of half pence for those of gold, which he had stolen. The Dutch piece was then handed to the witness by the counsel for the prosecution; he unhesitatingly identified it as the property of his employers. This evidence was deemed conclusive—the prisoner's countenance changed; the jury indicated by their gestures that they were satisfied; the witness was descending from the table, when Costello exclaimed—

"Stop, young man, a word with you. I will thank you for that gold piece, Mr. ——," (to the counsel for the prosecution, who handed it to him.) He looked at it, rubbed it on the sleeve of his well worn coat, and then turning to the witness, said, holding the piece of money in his fingers—"and you positively swear this is the identical piece of gold which was in the strong box of Glendower & Co?"

"I do."

"Have a care young man, look at it again, said Costello, offering it to the witness, but letting it fall into his hat which lay before him on the table. "I beg your pardon," said he, taking it up and handing the coin to the witness—

"You are sure that this is the identical piece of money?"

"I am."

"You are positive? Look at it again."

"I do swear this is the identical piece."

"And this? said the Counsellor, taking another and similar one from his hat.

The witness was petrified.

Costello had at the Crown office impressed upon his mind the date and effigies of the gold piece shown him, and it was to procure some similar coin, that he had sent to Holland.

"And this?" continued he—"and this? and this?" taking a fresh piece from his hat at each question.

The witness was struck dumb. The prisoner was immediately acquitted.

The Fight of Hell-Kettle.

BY TYRONE POWER.

Author of the "Lost Heir," "The King's Secret," &c.

Never let it be said the days of chivalry are fled: heralds may have ceased to record good blows stricken, to the tune of "a largesse worthie knights,"—pennon and banner, square and swallow-tail'd, sleeve and scarf, with all the trumpery of chivalry, are long since dead, 'tis true; but the lofty generous feeling with which that term has become synonymous, is yet burning clear and bright within ten thousand bosoms, not one of which ever throbbed at the recollections of the word itself inspires in "gentil-heartes," or could tell the difference between Or and Gules, or Vert and Sable, as the following narration of a combat between two "churles," or "villains," as the herald would term my worthies, will, I trust, go nigh to prove.

It was the fair night at Donard, a small village in the very heart of the mountains of Wicklow, when at the turn of a corner leading out of the Dunlavin road, towards the middle of the fair, two ancient foemen abruptly encountered. They eyed one another for a moment without moving a step, when the youngest, a huge six-foot mountaineer, in a long top-coat, having his shirt open from breast to ear, displaying, on the least movement, a brawny chest, that was hairy enough for a trunk, growing rather impatient, said in a quick under-tone, that a listener would have set down for the extreme of politeness,

"You'll lave the wall, Johnny Evans?"

To which civil request came reply, in a tone equally bland,

"Not at your biddin', if you stand there till till next fair day, Mat. Dolan."

"You know well I could fling you neck and heels, into that gutter, in one minute, Johnny, mo bouchil."

"You might, indeed, if you call up twenty of the Dunlavin faction at your back," coolly replied Evans.

"I mane, here's the two empty hands could do all that, and never ax help, 'ather," retorted Dolan, thrusting forth two huge paws from under his coat.

"In the name o'heaven, thin, thry it," said Evans, flinging the alpeen* he had up to this time been balancing curiously, over the roof of the cottage by which they stood; adding, here's a pair of fists, with as little in thim as your own!"

"It's aisy to brag by your own barn, Johnny Evans," said Dolan, pointing with a sneer to the police guard-house, on the opposite side of the way, a hundred yards lower down; "the peelers would not be likely to look on, and see a black orangeman, like yourself, quilted in his own town, under their noses, by one Mat. Dolan, from Dunlavin, all the way!"

"There's raison in that, any way, Matty," replied John, glancing in the direction indicated. "It's not likely thim that's paid by government to keep the peace, would stand by and see it broke, by papist or protestant: but I'll make a bargain wid you; if your blood's over hot for your skin, which I think, to say the truth it has long been—come off at once to Hell-kettle wid me, and in the light of this blessed moon, I'll fight it out wid you, toe to toe; and we'll both be the aisier after, which ever's bate."

"There's my hand to that, at a word, Johnny," cried Dolan, suiting the action to the word—and the hands of the foes clasped freely and frankly together.

"But are we to be only ourselves, do ye mane?" inquired Matthew.

"And enuff, too," answered Evans; "we could'nt pick a friend out of any tint above, without raisin a hulabaloo the divil wou'd'nt quiet without blows. Here, now, I'll give you the wall, only you jump the hedge into Charles Faucett's meadow, and cut across the hill, by Holy-well, into the road, where you'll meet me; divil a soul else will you meet that way to-night; and I want to call at home for the tools."

"Keep the wall," cried Dolan, as Evans stepped aside, springing himself at the same time into the road, ankle-deep in mud; I'll wait for you at the bridge, on the Holy-wood glin road. Good bye."

A moment after, Dolan had cleared the hedge leading out of the land into Mr. Faucett's paddock, and Evans was quietly plodding his way homeward. To reach his cottage, he had to run the gauntlet through the very throng of the fair, amidst the crowded tents, whence resounded the ill-according sounds of the bagpipe and fiddle, and the loud whoo! of the jig-dancers, as they beat with active feet the temporary floor, that rattled with their tread. Johnny made short greetings with those of his friends he encountered, and on entering his house, plucked a couple of black, business-like looking sticks from the chimney, hefted them carefully, and measured them together with an eye as strict as ever gallant paired rapier with, till satisfied of their equality, he put his top-coat over his shoulders, and departing by the back door, rapidly cleared two or three small gardens, and made at once for the fields. As Dolan dropped from the high bank into the lane near the bridge on one side, Evans leaped the gate opposite.

"You've lost no time, fegs," observed Matthew, as they drew together, shoulder to shoulder, stalking rapidly on.

"I'd bin vexed to keep you waitin' this time, any how," replied Johnny—and few other words passed.

Just beyond the bridge, they left the road together, and mounting the course of the little stream, in a few minutes were shut out from the possibility of observance in a wild narrow glen, at whose head was a water-fall of some eighteen feet. The pool which received this little cascade was exceeding deep, and having but one narrow outlet, between the huge stones, the pent waters were forced round and round, boiling and chafing for release; and hence the not unpoetic name of Hell-kettle, given to this spot. The ground immediately about it was wild, bare and stony, and in no way derogated from this fearful title.

Near the fall is a little plafond or level of some twenty yards square, the place designated by Evans for the battle-ground. Arrived here, the parties halted; and as Dolan stooped to raise a little of the pure stream in his hand to his lips, Evans cast his coats and vest on the gray stone, close by, and pulling his shirt over his head, stood armed for the fight, not so heavy or so tall a man as his antagonist Dolan, but wiry as a terrier, and having, in agility and training, advantages that more than balanced the difference of weight and age.

"I've been thinkin, Johnny Evans," cried Dolan, as he leisurely stripped in turn, "we must have two thrys after all, to show who's the best man; you've got your alpeens wid you, I see, and I'm not the boy to say no to thim, but I expect you'll ha' the best ind o' the stick, for its well known, there's not your match in Wicklow if there is in Wexford itself."

"That day's past, Matty Dolan," replied Evans. "It's five years since you and me first had words, at the Pattern o' the Seven-churches, and that was the last stroke I struck with a stick. There's eight years betune our ages, and you're the heavier man by two stone or near it, what more 'ud yez have, man alive?"

"Oh, never fear me, John, we'll never split about trifles," quietly replied Dolan; "but, see here, let's dress one another, as they do potatoes, both ways. Stand fairly up to me, for half a dozen rounds, fist to fist, and I'll hould the alpeen till you're tired, after id."

"Why look you here Matty, you worked over long on George's Quay, and were over friendly with the great boxer, Mister Donalan, for me to be able for yez wid the fists," cried Evans. "But we'll split the difference; I'll give you a quarter of an hour out o' me wid the fists, and you'll give me the same time, if I'm able, with the alpeen after; and we'll toss head or harp, which comes first."

Evans turned a copper flat on the back of his hand, as he ended his proposal, and in the same moment Dolan cried,

"Harp for ever."

"Harp it is," echoed Evans, holding the coin up in the moon's ray, which shone out but fitfully, as dark clouds kept slowly passing over her cold face.

In the next moment they were toe to toe, in the centre of the little plain, both looking determined and confident; though an amateur would have at once decided in favor of Dolan's pose.

To describe the fight scientifically would be too long an affair; suffice it, that although Johnny's agility gave him the best of a couple of severe falls, yet his antagonist's straight hitting and superior weight left him the thing hollow: till five quick rounds left Evans deaf to time and tune, and as sick as though he had swallowed a glass of antimonial wine instead of potteen.

Dolan carried his senseless foe to the pool and dashed water over him by the hatfull.

"Look at my watch," was Johnny's first word, on gaining breath.

"I can't tell the time by watch," cried Dolan, a little sheepish.

"Give it here, man," cried Johnny, adding, as he rubbed his left eye, the other being fast closed, "by the Boyne, this is the longest quarter of an hour I ever knew—it wants three minutes yet," and as he spoke again he rose up before his man.

"Sit still, Johnny," exclaimed Matthew; "I'll forgive you the three minutes, any how."

"Well, thank ye for that," said Johnny; "I wish I may be able to return the compliment presently; but, by St. Donagh, I've mighty little concait left in myself, just now."

Within five minutes, armed with the well-seasoned twigs Johnny had brought with him, those honest fellows again stood front to front, and although Evans had lost much of the elasticity of carriage, which had ever been his characteristic when the alpeen was in his hand and the shamrock under his foot, in times past; although his left eye was closed, and the whole of that side of his physiognomy was swollen and disfigured through the mauling he had received at the hands of Dolan, who opposed him, to all appearance, fresh as the first, yet was his confidence in himself unshaken, and in the twinkling of his right eye, a close observer might have read a sure anticipation of the victory a contest of five minutes gave to him, for it was full that time before Johnny struck a good-will blow, and when it took effect, a second was uncalled for. The point of the stick had caught Dolan fairly on the right temple, and laying open the whole of the face down to the chin, as if done by a sabre stroke, felling him senseless.

After some attempts at recalling his antagonist to perception by the brook-side without success, Evans began to feel a little alarmed for his life, and hoisting him on his back, retraced his steps to the village, without ever halting by the way, and bore his insensible burthen into the first house he came to, where, as the devil would have it, a sister of Dolan's was sitting, having a goster with the owner, one widow Donovan, over a "rakin-pot o' tay."

"God save all here," said Johnny, crossing the floor without ceremony, and depositing Mat on the widow's bed, "Wid'y, by your lave, let Mat Dolan lie quiet here a bit, till I run down town for the doctor."

"Dolan!" screamed the sister and the widow, in a breath, "Mat, is it Mat Dolan! that's lying a corse here, and I his own sister, not to know he was in trouble?"

Loud and long were the lamentations that followed this unlucky discovery. The sister rushed frantically out into the middle of the road, screaming and calling on the friends of Dolan, to revenge his murder on Evans and the orangemen that had decoyed and slain him. The words passed from lip to lip, soon reaching down to the heart of the fair, where most of the parties were about this time corn'd for any thing.

"Johnny Evans," cried the widow Donovan, as he made in few words the story known to her, "true or not true, this is no place for you now, the whole of his faction will be up here in a minute, and you'll be killed like a dog on the flure; out wid you, and down to the guard-house while the coast's clear."

"I'd best, maybe," cried Evans; "and I'll send the doctor up the quicker—but mind, widow, if that boy ever spakes, he'll say a fairer fight was never faught—get that out of him, for the love o' heaven, Mrs. Donovan."

"He hasn't a word in him, I fear," cried the widow, as Johnny left the door, and with the readiness of her sex, assisted by one or two elderly gossips, who were by this time called in, she bathed the wound with spirits, and used every device which much experience in cracked crowns, acquired during the lifetime of Willy Donovan, her departed lord, suggested to her. Meantime Evans, whilst making his way down through the village, had been met, and recognized by the half frantic sister of Dolan and her infuriated friends, who had been all for some time puzzled at the absence of him who was proverbial as

"Best foot on the flure,
First stick in the fight."

"There's the murderer of Mat Dolan, boys," cried the woman, as some ten or twelve yards off she recognized Johnny, who was conspicuous enough, wearing his shirt like a herald's tabard, as in his haste he had drawn it on at Hell-kettle. With a yell that might have scared the devil, thirty athletic fellows sprang forward at full speed after Evans, who wisely never stayed to remonstrate, but made one pair of heels serve, where the hands of Briareus, had he possessed as many, would not have availed him. He arrived at Mrs. Donovan's door before his pursuers; he raised the latch, but it gave no way, the bar was drawn within, and had his strength been equal to it, further flight was become impracticable—turning with his back to the door, there stood Johnny like a lion at bay, uttering no word, since he well knew that words would not prevail against the fury of his foes. Forward with wild cries and loud imprecations rushed the foremost of the pursuers, and Evan's life was not worth one moment's purchase; a dozen sticks already clattered like hail upon his guard, and on the wall over his head, when the door suddenly opening inwards, back tumbled Johnny, and into the space he thus left vacant stepped a gaunt figure, naked to the waist, pale and marked with a stream of blood yet flowing from the temple. With wild cries the mob pressed back.

"It's a ghost! it's Dolan's ghost?" shouted twenty voices, above all of which was heard that of the presumed spirit, crying in good Irish, "That's a lie, boys, it's Mat Dolan himself! able and willing to make a ghost of the first man that lifts a hand agin Johnny Evans; who bate me at Hell-kettle like a man, and brought me here after, on his back, like a brother."

"Was it a true fight, Mat?" demanded one or two of the foremost, recovering confidence enough to approach Dolan, who, faint from the exertion he had made, was now resting his head against the door-post.

"A pause and the silence of death followed. The brows of the men began to darken, as they drew close to Dolan. Evans saw his life depended on the reply of his antagonist, who already seemed lapsed into insensibility.

"Answer, Mat Dolan?" he cried impressively, "for the love o' heaven, answer me—was it a true fight?"

The voice appeared to rouse the fainting man. He raised himself in the door-way, and stretched his right hand towards Evans, exclaiming,

"True as the cross, by the blessed virgin!" and as he spoke, fell back into the arms of his friends.

Evans was now safe. Half a dozen of the soberest of the party escorted him down to the police station, where they knew he would be secure; and Dolan's friends, bearing him with them on a car, departed, without attempting any riot or retaliation.

This chance took place sixteen years ago; but since that day, there never was a fair at Dunlavin that the orangeman Evans was not the guest of Dolan; nor is there a fair-night at Donard that Mat Dolan does not pass under the humble roof of Johnny Evans. I give the tale as it occurred, having always looked upon it as an event creditable to the parties, both of whom are alive and well, or were a year ago; for it is little more since Evans, now nigh sixty years old, walked me off my legs on a day's grousing over Church-mountain, and through Oram's-hole, carrying my kit into the bargain. Adieu. It will be a long day ere I forget the pool of "Hell-kettle," or the angels in whose company I first stood by its bubbling brim.

We have Lived and Loved Together.

We have lived and loved together
Through many changing years;
We have shared each other's gladness,
And wept each other's tears.
I have never known a sorrow
That was long unsoothed by thee;
For thy smile can make a summer,
Where darkness else would be.

Like the leaves that fall around us,
In autum's fading hours,
And the traitor smiles that darken
When the cloud of sorrow lowers;
And, though many such we've known, love,
Too prone, alas! to range,
We both can speak of one, love,
Whom time could never change.

We have lived and loved together
Through many changing years;
We have shared each other's gladness,
And wept each other's tears;
And let us hope the future
As the past hath been will be;
I will share with thee thy sorrows,
And thou thy smiles with me.

THE MISERIES OF A NEW MEMBER OF THE YACHT CLUB.

Somebody has somewhere very sensibly remarked "that men are never ridiculous for not possessing any particular accomplishment. It is the endeavour to seem that which they are not, which justly exposes them to ridicule."

No man ever learnt from experience the truth of this axiom more thoroughly than myself; and I am about to expose my own weakness, and the miseries that resulted from them for the benefit of mankind.

My father was a respectable professional gentleman, who resided in an inland county, and being a younger son, my allowance was small, and my expectations were not very great. It so happened, however, that I was fortunate enough to win the affections of a young lady of very large property; and after all the usual impediments offered by the relatives of a rich young lady who has set her heart upon marrying a poor young gentleman had been surmounted or set at defiance, (for she was of age and under no control,) we were married by one of my brothers at the church of my native parish, and after an elegant dejeune a la fourchette, we set off in a travelling carriage and four to spend our honeymoon at Brighton.

My young wife had been educated at a fashionable boarding-school near the metropolis, and she had acquired notions of fashions and style that were perfectly astonishing to her less sophisticated husband.

I can't imagine what made her first think of marrying me; I had led so quiet a life in my somewhat retired country town in the inland county before alluded to, that her accomplishments and fascinations dazzled and bewildered me, and had she not smiled in a most encouraging manner, I never should have thought of popping the question. I believe she thought, and still thinks me remarkably good looking, and ladies being the best judges on such subjects, I am by no means inclined to affirm that she is mistaken.

When the residents of an inland county first look upon "the sea, the sea, the open sea," the event becomes an era in their existence. Never shall I forget the day of our arrival in Brighton; the vast deep lay before us, exceedingly blue, radiant with sunbeams, and so calm, that the pretty little pleasure-boats seemed to slumber on its bosom.

We drove to "The Ship;" none of your York and Brunswick hotels for us; such places may be found in inland towns, and we were determined that, for the time being, we would be exclusively maritime. We therefore took a house on the Marine Parade, walked before breakfast on the chain-pier, and, neglecting our own carriage and horses, we took daily drives in a fly, (except "the Mermaid."

Said Mrs. Cockle to me one morning—(I forget whether I have already informed the reader that my name is Cockle) said Mrs. Cockle to me,—"my dear, I am quite delighted with the sea, let us take a marine mansion."

"With all my heart," said I.

"And," added my fair bride, "as our wealth will enable us to move in the first circles of fashion, you must become a member of the Royal Yacht Club. There is nothing so stylish as a yacht; the club is entirely composed of noblemen and members of Parliament, and Cockle, my love, you must become a member.

When a wife, who has enriched a husband, proposes agreeable ways of spending her own money, where is the man who could refuse her? I had never yet put my foot in a boat, and therefore could not flatter myself that I was quite fit to undertake the management of a large vessel. But, thought I, "the sea looks a mighty agreeable, sunshiny place, and the motion of a ship must be quite a lullaby to the nerves—as to the names of the ropes and those things, I shall soon learn them; and by the end of the season, I shall be as good and practical a naval commander as any in the club." At the wane of our honeymoon we left Brighton, proceeded to Portsmouth, embarked in a steam-vessel, and were soon landed at West Cowes, the head-quarters of the association of amateur nautical noblemen and gentlemen. Mrs. Cockle has a cousin, a Mr. Lorimer Lomax, an exquisite of a certain age, who is well known "about town," and piques himself on his dress and personal appearance. He is always to be found at the haunts of fashionable persons, at Melton, at Newmarket, at Brighton during the court season, in London during the spring months; and now it fortunately happened that he was residing at Cowes, and living constantly with the leading members of the club.

He was charmed to hear of my seafaring propensities, readily offered to introduce me to the commodore, and declared that a very excellent first-rate yacht was to be sold, the property of a young gentleman, who had found it convenient to sell off, and retire for a time to the continent.

My arrangements were soon made; I became master and commander of the cutter "Waterwagtail," of 100 tons burden, and also of her crew, and I made my appearance on the parade in a straw hat, a blue check shirt, large rough blue trowsers, and a sailor's jacket ornamented with the button of the club.

I confess I felt rather like a mountebank, but my dear wife admired me, and indeed kept me in countenance, for she too had cloth trowsers, and upon her head a very unladylike cap.

When I enter on a new pursuit, I like to be given time to settle down calmly and gradually into the habits to which I have been hitherto unaccustomed; as a new member of the yacht club I should have preferred being left to myself, to feel my way as it were, and like a cat on a wet floor, to put out one paw, and then the other, ere I too rashly ventured from dry land. I should have liked to have remained at anchor for the first month or so, and indeed had it been possible to draw up the "Waterwagtail" high and dry upon the beach, I should have infinitely preferred that arrangement, and should thus have got accustomed to the smell of pitch, before I was called upon to encounter the motion of the vessel.

But friends are always injudicious; and I had now unfortunately enlisted at an inauspicious moment. The whole squadron was on the eve of departure to Cherbourg, and I was congratulated on having joined them when an opportunity offered for at once enjoying a delightful voyage, visiting a French port, and looking at a French king and all the royal family.

I confess that a little qualm came over me as I listened to the enumeration of these promised joys; but my wife was in an ecstacy, and her cousin, Mr. Lorimer Lomax, kindly offered to accompany us. The next morning we were to put to sea; we were therefore in no small bustle making preparations, and laying in stores for our first voyage.

"The dawn was overcast, the morning lowered," and when I looked out of my window, and saw the clouds, and heard the wind whistle, I at once decided that there would be no embarkation that day. But I was no longer my own master. Every body but myself seemed to exult in the fairness of the wind; to me it sounded very foul, and when I looked at the sea, and saw a quantity of what us landsmen call "white horses," I felt as if something had disagreed with me, and said in a supplicating tone to a "brother sailor," who stood near me, "Of course, we shall not sail to-day?" "Not sail!" he replied "to be sure we shall, this is just the breeze we wanted."

It was too late to retreat; I believe I had got some orders from the commodore about the time and order of sailing, and the exact place allotted to the "Waterwagtail;" but of all this I knew nothing, my people on board had the management of my vessel, and now came my time for going on board, with my wife and her cousin.

It now really blew hard, I do not mean in my estimation alone, for it had done that all the morning; but all people about me cast ominous looks at the skies, and seemed to my nervously excited imagination to consider us doomed creatures. When we got to the steps in front of the club-house, we found the little boat which was to convey us to our "Waterwagtail," tossing about like a mad thing, now up, now down, and the water splashing over her. "It is a tempting of Providence to thing of getting into her," said I; and my wife clinging to my arm, said "Had we not better go back?" But Lorimer Lomax, though no sailor himself seemed desperately bent on destruction to himself and us, and almost unconsciously he and my boatmen hurried us into the danger, and enveloped us in cloaks.

The boatmen seized their oars and away we went, rolling and tossing in a terrible manner, the shore receded, and the happy people walking on the immoveable parade grew less and less, and I now longed to tread the deck of my newly-purchased yacht, thinking that, of two evils, the big ship would be better than the diminutive punt.

We now got into fearfully rough water; a strong current of the tide, which, I believe, met the wind, and caused commotion; I am not sure about this, but I think I heard somebody say so; but whatever might be the causes, I am sure that I can answer for the effects. My wife screamed, and leant upon me; and Lorimer Lomax pinched my arm black and blue. "Luff! luff!" said the man who steered the boat, and thinking that he looked at me, and that very probably our safety depended on my instantly doing something that he desired, I almost shouted in reply—"In the name of heaven what do you mean by luff? Mary, my dear, luff, if you please; Lomax, pray luff, if you happen to know how." The steersman (I think you call him) gave a grim smile, and addressing my wife, said, "Trim the boat, if you please, Ma'am."

"Mary," said I, "the man speaks to you."

"What, sir?" cried Mrs. Cockle.

"Trim the boat," said the man.

"Mercy on us," I cried, "he talks as if he were desiring her to trim a bonnet!"

"Sit there!" said the sailor.

And thankful that at last he spoke intelligibly, without saying a word, I took my wife by the shoulders, and placed her in the identical spot to which he had pointed. We were now nearing the "Waterwagtail," and the sailor said, "There's your yacht, your Honour, they'll soon bear down upon us."

"Down upon us!" cried I looking at the great black body that came nearer and nearer every moment; "Oh, how shocking! to be run over by one's own Waterwagtail!"

We were now tossed about worse than ever. A rope was thrown to us, which hit me in the right eye, the boat bumped against the side of the yacht, and Lomax lay prostrate on the flat of his back. My wife fainted, and was borne up in a state of insensibility, and I followed, holding two slippery ropes, and with difficulty keeping my feet upon what, I believe, they called the accommodation-ladder. A pretty accommodation, indeed!

I stood upon my own deck, I leant against my own mast, and my own sailors pushed me about, and seemed to consider me in the way. I felt as if an illness was coming over me—my legs lost all strength—cold drops stood upon my forehead—I sank upon a seat—my head dangled over the side of the vessel—I was sea-sick!

All fears left me, and with them all natural affections. I cared not three straws about my inestimable wife,—I heeded not her cousin, who was my guest and fellow-sufferer,—I gave no orders,—I knew nothing that was going on. I was conscious the weather was getting worse; but I was getting worse and worse myself, and what is the weather to a dying man?

I knew nothing about the commodore,—I knew nothing about the squadron. All night I lay on my berth in the cabin, opposite to my wife, who also lay upon hers; and our beds being on something like shelves let into the wall, and we being pale and motionless, I thought we resembled bodies in a mausoleum.

One lamp, suspended from the ceiling, cast on us a melancholy light. Oh, how it swung to and fro! and the chairs, how they tumbled about! and the horrid clamour that I heard of shouting men, and flapping sails, and creaking masts, and howling winds, and rushing waters. I speak nothing but the truth, when I declare that I expected every minute that we should go to the bottom.

One of my men came down to us occasionally, and gave me brandy, which I passively swallowed, and then gave brandy to Mrs. Cockle. I had just sense enough left to observe that she drank it passively too.

Once I ventured to whisper, "Is there any hope? I trust we're near land."

"Near land!" he replied. "No, no; we must keep clear of land. Land is the worst place we could see, such a night as this."

How people may be mistaken! Land was what I had been longing for.

"Could we not go ashore?" said I.

"Aye; if we don't keep a good look-out we shall go ashore," he answered.

"Well?" said I.

"And in ten minutes the vessel would go to pieces, and every soul on board would perish."

My wife groaned, and so did I, and I heard an echoing groan from Lorimer Lomax, whose body had been laid out in a sort of closet which served many purposes, and, being lined with plate glass, among others, as a place to dress in.

Little need had we now of dress. Day dawned, but still the storm roared on; and the vessel pitched so much, that, had my sickness permitted me to rise from my bed, I should have found it impossible to stand or walk.

Of Lorimer Lomax I heard nothing but the oft-repeated groan. He was a bachelor of sixty, and ever anxious to appear to the best advantage. He always "made himself up," as the phrase goes, and was the very worst subject in the world for a sea voyage like the present.—The chances were, that his outward man would be entirely washed away, and that, when we did meet, I should not recognise him.

But I thought not of this; I thought of nothing but impending destruction. Again came the horrid night, with the swinging lamp, and the din of many noises, and another day passed, and another; and at length, feeling the improbability of her having survived so long, I sometimes spoke faintly to my wife, that I might, from her answering or remaining silent, judge whether she was alive or dead.

One morning I heard guns firing, and people buzzing, and was informed that, the weather having abated, we had ventured nearer the French coast, and that we were now off Cherbourg. My mate was a communicative person, and he told me all that was going on. We had arrived too late for great part of the festivities, a sort of awkward squad to the squadron. But the sailor told me, with great glee, that we were at that moment going through evolutions for the amusement of the great people on shore, where I was invited, with the other members of the R. Y. C., to dine with French royalty.

"Dine!" said I, shaking my head convulsively, as a sick person always does when you talk to him of dainties. However, I rose, for the first time, from my bed, and reeled across the cabin to kiss the extended hand of my still surviving Mary.

Dining on shore was entirely out of the question; but as we shortly got into smooth water, we both refreshed ourselves with a change of dress, and sent to beg Lomax would join us at dinner.

After a long pause he tottered forth from his plate-glass dormitory; and it was evident, from his appearance, that he had been for some time employed repairing "the ravages of time" misspent on board a vessel in a storm.

No painter can command a steady hand in a rough sea, and poor Lorimer's had evidently shaken sadly. His wig was awry, one whisker was darker than its fellow, and his artificial eyebrows were carefully pencilled a quarter of an inch above his real ones. His dress, too, lacked his usual taste and finish; and the Lorimer Lomax on whom I now gazed, might have passed for the grandfather of the beau who embarked with us at Cowes.

Our dinner was a brief repast. We were soon obliged to betake ourselves again to our beds; and there we lay, kept wide awake by the guns fired in honour of the gay party enjoying themselves on shore.

The next morning we were all considerably better, and ordered the sailors to row us to the shore. The king and royal family had just left Cherbourg; the members of the Yacht Club had all gone on board their vessels, and were preparing to set sail for the Isle of Wight.

We saw in fact, nothing but a French town, involved in that extreme state of dullness which invariably follows a period of unusual gayety and excitement.

I told my captain and crew to make the best of their way to the Isle of Wight in the "Waterwagtail," on board which never will I again set foot; and Monsieur and Madame Cockle, with Monsieur Lorimer Lomax, were soon reckoned among the "departures" from Cherbourg, having hired a carriage to take them to Calais, from which place they steamed safely to Dover in three hours and a half.

A party of pleasure is proverbially a painful undertaking; but its annoyances are generally petty ones,—an al fresco dejune under an umbrella, or a July day passed with five or six people in a closed landau, with the windows up.

Such dilemmas are farcical; but my party of pleasure was very nearly ending in a tragedy; for I have been given to understand by real sailors, that a storm so sudden and so severe has been of rare occurrence at such a season.

I now print my miseries as a warning to all uninitiated fresh-men, whose minds are bent on salt-water excursions. Let them dabble about within the Isle of Wight as long as they please; but if then pass the Needles—my mind (ay, and my body) sickens at the dangers that await them. 'Tis rash for children to play with edge-tools; but it is ten times more rash for a landsman, like myself, to try to make a plaything of a vessel in a gale of wind. T. H. B.

MISERRIMUS was a pious clergyman named Morris, who for non-conformity, was deprived of his benefice soon after the accession of William III. He was therefore a "sufferer for conscience-sake," not a person of flagitious conduct. He was destitute, to the end of a long life, of all means of support, except what were supplied by the charity of the Jacobites, and it was in compliance with his own request, but in allusion to this misery, that the sole word "Miserrimus," was inscribed on his grave-stone.

An accomplished woman, in common parlance, means one who sings and dances well, knows a little French, a little Italian, a little drawing, a little embroidery, and not much of any thing, excepting fashionable novels; in which she is a great adept.

THE ADVENTUROUS BOY.

While the fleet lay at anchor, one of the most heart-thrilling scenes occurred on board the Commodore's vessel, that my eyes ever witnessed. In addition to the usual appendages of a ship of war, there was a large and mischievous monkey on board, named Jocko, retained for the amusement and diversion of the ship's company. It was my watch on deck; and having retired to the side of the vessel, I was musing on the beautiful appearance of the fleet, when a loud and merry laugh burst upon my ear.

On turning to ascertain the cause of such an unusual sound on the frigate's deck, I perceived the Commodore's little son, whom the crew nicknamed "little Bob Stay," standing half way up the main hatch-ladder, clapping his hands, and looking aloft upon some object that inspired him with a deal of glee. A single glance explained the occasion of the merriment. As Bob was coming up from the gun deck, Jocko, the monkey, perceiving him on the ladder, and dropping suddenly from the rigging, leaped upon his shoulder, seized his cap, and running up the main-top-sail-sheet, seated himself on the main-yard.

Here he sat picking the tassel of his prize to pieces, occasionally scratching his sides, and chattering as if in exultation for the success of his mischief. Bob being a sprightly, active fellow, did not like to lose his cap without an effort to regain it. Perhaps he was the more strongly incited to make the chase after Jocko, from observing me smile at his plight, and hearing the loud laugh of Cato, a black man, who seemed inexpressibly delighted at the occurrence.

"Ha, you rascal, Jocko," said the black man, "hab you no respec for de young officer, den to steal his cap? We bring you to de gang-way, you black nigger, and gib you a dozen on de bare back, for a tief." The monkey looked down from his perch, as if he understood the threat of the negro, and chattered a sort of defiance in answer. "Ha, ha, Massa Bob, he say you mus' ketch him, 'fore you flog him; and 'tis no easy matter for midshipman in boots to ketch a monkey barefoot."

The cheeks of little Bob looked red, as he cast a glance of offended pride at Cato; and, springing across the deck, in a moment he was half way up the rigging. The monkey quietly watched his motions, and, when nearly up, suddenly put the cap on his own head, and ascended to the top cross-trees, and quietly seating himself, resumed his work of picking the tassel.

In this manner, the mischievous animal succeeded in enticing Bob as high as the royal-mast-head, when suddenly springing on the rigging, he again descended to the fore-top, and running out on the fore-yard, hung the cap on the end of the studding-sail-boom, where, taking his seat, he raised a loud and exulting chattering. By this time Bob was completely exhausted; and not liking to return to the deck to be laughed at, he sat down on the cross-trees.

The spectators, presuming that the boy would not follow the monkey, but descend to the deck, paid no further attention to them. I also had turned away, and had been engaged some minutes, when I was suddenly started by a cry from Cato, exclaiming that "Massa Bob was on the main-truck!" A cold shudder ran through my veins, as the word reached my ears; I cast my eyes up—it was too true.

The adventurous boy, after having rested a little, had climbed the sky-sail pole, and the moment of my looking up, was actually standing on that circular piece of wood, on the very summit of the loftiest mast, at a height so great that my brain turned dizzy as I looked up at him. There was nothing above him, or around him, but empty space; and beneath him nothing but a small unstable wheel.

Dreadful temerity! If he had attempted to stoop, what could he take hold of to steady his motion! His feet covered up the small and fearful platform on which he stood; and beneath that, a long smooth pole that seemed to bend beneath his weight, was all that upheld him from destruction. In endeavouring to get down, he would enevitably lose his balance, and be precipitated to the deck, a crushed and shapeless mass.

In this terrible exigency, what was to be done? To hail him, and inform him of his danger, it was thought, would ensure his ruin. Every moment I expected to see the dreadful catastrophe. I could not bear to look at him; and yet could not withdraw my gaze. A film came over my eyes, and a faintness over my heart. By this time the deck was covered with officers and crew, to witness this appalling, this heart-rending spectacle. All seemed mute. Every feeling, every faculty, seemed absorbed in one deep, intense emotion of agony.

At this moment, a stir was made among the crew about the gangway, when the Commodore, the boy's father, made his appearance. He had come on board without being noticed by a single eye. The Commodore asked not a question, uttered not a syllable. He was an austere man; and it was thought by some that he had not a very strong affection for his son. All eyes were now fixed on him, endeavoring to read his emotion in his countenance.

The scrutiny, however, was vain—his eyes retained its severe expression; his brow the slight frown it usually wore; and his lip its haughty curl. In short, no outward sign indicated what was passing within. Immediately on reaching the deck, he ordered a marine to hand a musket; when, stepping aft, and leaping upon the look out block, he raised it to his shoulder, and took a deliberate aim at his son, at the same time hailing him with his trumpet, in a voice of thunder.

"Robert," cried he "jump! jump overboard! or I'll fire at you!" The boy seemed to hesitate, and it was plain that he was tottering; for his arms were thrown about like one endeavering to balance himself. The Commodore raised his voice again, and in a quicker and more energeric tone, cried—"Jump! 'tis your only chance for life!" The words were scarcely out of his mouth, before he left the truck, and sprung out into the air. A sound between a shriek and a groan burst from many lips.

The father spoke not—sighed not; indeed, he seemed not to breathe. For a moment of intense agony, a pin might have been heard to have dropped on the deck. With a rush like that of a cannon ball the body descended to the water; and before the waves closed over it, twenty stout fellows, among them several officers, had dived from the bulwark. Another short period of suspense ensued. The body rose! he was alive! his arm was seen to move—he struck out towards the ship.

In spite of the discipline of a man-of-war, three hurras, the outburst of unfeigned joy from the hearts of five hundred men, pealed through the air, and made the welkin ring. Till this moment, the old Commodore had stood unmoved. His face was now ashy pale. He attempted to descend from the block, but his knees bent under him; he seemed to gasp for breath, and attempted to tear open his vest; but in the attempt he staggered, and would have fallen, had he not been caught by the bystanders.

He was borne to his cabin, where the surgeon attended him, whose utmost skill was required to restore his mind to its usual equilibrity and self-command, in which he at last happily succeeded. As soon as he recovered from the dreadful shock, he sent for Bob, and had a long confidential conference with him; and it was noticed, when the little fellow left the cabin, he was in tears.

The German Tale of PETER KLAUS, the Goatherd, by the German writer Otmar, contains the original outline of Rip Van Winkle, or the Legend of the Sleepy Hollow, and which the pen of Washington Irving, has poutrayed with additional charms. Whether Mr. Irving was acquainted with this tradition and adapted it for the ground-work of his tale of Van Winkle, we cannot determine, but the German author ought to have the credit of originating the idea.

In the village of Littendorf, at the foot of a mountain, lived Peter Klaus, a Goatherd, who was in the habit of pasturing his flock upon the Kyffhausen hills. Towards evening he generally let them browse upon a green plot not far off, surrounded with an old ruined wall, from which he could take a muster of his whole flock.

For some days past he had observed that one of his prettiest goats, soon after his arrival at this spot, usually disappeared, nor joined the fold again until late in the evening. He watched her again and again and at last found that she slipped through a gap in the old wall, whither he followed her. It led into a passage which widened as he went into a cavern; and here he saw the goats employed in picking up the oats that fell through some crevices in the place above. He looked up, shook his ears at this odd shower of corn, but could discover nothing. Where the deuce could it come from? At length he heard over head the neighing and stamping of horses; he listened, and concluded that the oats must have fallen through the manger when they were fed. The poor goatherd was sadly puzzled, what to think of these horses in this uninhabited part of the mountain; but so it was, for the groom making his appearance, without saying a word beckoned him to follow him. Peter obeyed, and followed him up some steps which brought him into an open court-yard, surrounded by old walls. At the side of this was a still more spacious cavern, surrounded by rocky heights which only admitted a kind of twilight through the overhanging trees and shrubs. He went on, and came to a smooth shaven green, when he saw twelve ancient knights, none of whom spoke a word, engaged in playing at nine-pins. His guide now beckoned to Peter, in silence, to pick up the ninepins, and went his way. Trembling in every joint, Peter did not venture to disobey; and at times he cast a stolen glance at the players, whose long beards and slashed doublets were not at all in the present fashion. By degrees his looks grew bolder; he took particular notice of every thing round him; among other things observing a tankard near him filled with wine, whose odor was excellent, he took a good draught. It seemed to inspire him with life; and when he began to feel tired of running, he applied with fresh ardor to the tankard, which always renewed his strength. But finally it quite overpowered him, and he fell asleep.

When he next opened his eyes he found himself on the grass-plot again, in the old spot where he was in the habit of feeding his goats. He rubbed his eyes, he looked round, but could see neither dog nor flock; he was surprised at the long rank grass that grew about him, and at trees and bushes which he had never before seen. He shook his head and walked a little further, looking at the old sheep path and the hillocks and roads where he used daily to drive his flock; but he could find no traces of them left. Yet he saw the village just before him; it was the same Littendorff, and scratching his head he hastened at a quick pace down the hill to inquire after his flock.

All the people whom he met going into the place were strangers to him, were differently dressed, and even spoke in a different style to his old neighbors.—When he asked about his goats, they only stared at him, and fixed their eyes upon his chin. He put his hand unconsciously to his mouth, and to his great surprise found that he had got a beard, at least a foot long. He now began to think that both he and all the world about him were in a dream; and yet he knew the mountain for that of the Kyffhausen (for he had just come down it) well enough. And there were the cottages with their gardens and grass-plots, much as he had left them. Besides, the lads, who had all collected round him, answered to the inquiry of a passenger, what place it was, "Littendorf, sir."

Still shaking his head, he went farther into the village to look for his own house. He found it, but greatly altered for the worse; a strange goatherd in an old tattered frock lay before the door, and near him his old dog, which growled and showed its teeth at Peter when he called him.

He went through the entrance which had once a door, but all within was empty and deserted; Peter staggered like a drunken man out of the house, and called for his wife and children by their names. But no one heard him, and no one gave him any answer.

Soon, however, a crowd of women and children got round the inquisitive stranger, with the long hoary beard; and asked him what it was he wanted?

Now Peter thought it was such a strange kind of thing, to stand before his own house, inquiring for his own wife and children, as well as about himself, that evading these inquiries, he pronounced the first name that came into his head; "Kurt Steffen, the blacksmith?" Most of the spectators were silent, and only looked at him wistfully, till an old woman at last said: "Why, for these twelve years he has been at Sachsenburg, whence I suppose you are not come today." "Where is Valentine Meier, the tailor?"—"The Lord rest his soul," cried another old woman, leaning upon her crutch, "he has been lying more than these fifteen years in a house he will never leave."

Peter recognized in the speakers, two of his young neighbors, who seemed to have grown old very suddenly, but he had no inclination to inquire any further.

At this moment there appeared, making her way through the crowd of spectators, a sprightly young woman with a year old baby in her arms, and a girl about four, taking hold of her hand, all three as like his wife he was seeking for as possible. "What are your names?" he inquired in a tone of great surprise. "Mine is Maria." "And your father's?" continued Peter. "God rest his soul! Peter Klaus to be sure. It is now twenty years ago since we were all looking for him, day and night, upon the Kyff hausen; for his flock came home without him; and I was then," continued the woman, "only seven years old."

The goatherd could no longer bear this: "I am Peter Klaus," he said, "Peter and no other," and he took his daughter's child and kissed it. The spectators appeared struck dumb with astonishment, until first one, and then another began to say, "Yes, indeed, this is Peter Klaus! Welcome, good neighbor, after twenty years' absence, welcome home."

CHILDHOOD.

"Oh, give me still the memories
That hallow every scene,
Which stirred my bounding bosom,
When existence all was green!"

I LOVE children. I delight to listen to their innocent prattle, and to take part in their little amusements—to feel a community of interest with them, in their little enjoyments and recreations. There is nothing on earth so unaffected, so open, so frank as childhood. How the light laugh gurgles up from their young and unsophisticated hearts! They have not been out into the world—they have not yet learned to disguise their emotions—to dissemble—to smile, when their hearts are rankling with envy or hate, or to weep, when they secretly rejoice. They are as an open book, in which one may read all that they are—all that they feel.

There are not wanting those, who have an utter aversion to children—who well nigh hate them. For myself, I want little better evidence of a bad ungenerous heart—and prone as I am to think kindly of my species, I could almost say, "Let no such man be trusted." He can have small enjoyment in himself, and is certainly little calculated to contribute to the happiness of others, who cannot look with pure pleasure upon the innocence, and artlessness, and hilarity of youth. To me, the playful sports, the laughing countenances, the beaming eyes of children, unpractised, as yet, in the busy world upon which they are entering with such light hearts,—are a complete antidote against ennui, or depression of spirits.

I remember, that during a residence of one summer in the city many years ago—for gentle reader, I am declining into the vale of years—was, for a few of the first weeks, exceeding lonely. There is no solitude like the solitude which a stranger feels in a large and populous city. You meet thousands in the thronging streets, all passing on, intent upon their own amusements and avocations—and it is a thousand times more cheerless than to be in the still and solemn forests of the wilderness, or by the solitary shore of the "great and wide sea." You have there the communings of your own heart, and the almost visible presence of the Maker of the World. But in the city, your thoughts are confused,—their variety leaves you no time to reflect—and they weary you into the very depths of gloom.

One Saturday afternoon, when despondency sat heavy at my heart, I sallied out into the streets. It was the holiday from the thraldom of the schools—and their young inmates, neatly dressed, and happier than the king on his throne, were taking their pastime, and rambling with their parents, or elder brothers and sisters, about the streets. I was soon inoculated with their visible happiness, as I met them in my lonely walk. How many bright faces gleamed upon me! You look kindly upon a child, and how soon do they understand you! How their young eyes will beam upon you, and how they will turn,—especially little girls—and look at you, and blush, and smile—and pass on a little, and turn, and smile, and blush and look again!

I know not how it is, but in gazing upon children, I am actually invested as with a spell.—Time and space are annihilated—I am carried back to the morning of life, and, for the moment, live over again the early days of the past.

Before I had reached my room again, I had all the familiar places of my childhood before me. It was, 'as if I had seized the hour glass of Time, inverted it, and rolled back again the sands which had marked the weary lapse of years.' I was again in the meadow—in the field—about the fire-side hearth. My departed father's voice was again in my dreaming ear—my mother's hand was upon my young head. Again I saw my paper kite, in the gentle south wind, cleaving the upper air—and I gazed upon the same ample sky which spread over my boyhood—

"And marked the passing clouds that dimmed its blue,
Like my own sorrows then, as fleeting and as few!"

It is my earnest prayer, that as I glide slowly down the declivity of years, it will please God to preserve in me that freshness of feeling, which enables me to look upon childhood and youth, with such purity of enjoyment. It beguiles life of its sombre spirit, "and the weariness of the flesh,"—and while it teaches us, that we are receding farther from the shore of youth, it reminds us, also, that we are approaching that other shore, where we shall renew an existence of immortal youth. Let all, then, cultivate and cherish these emotions. Let—

"The bright thoughts of early days
Still gather in our memories now
And not the later cares, whose trace
Is stamp'd so deeply on the brow:
What though these days return no more?
The sweet remembrance is not vain—
For heaven is waiting to restore
The childhood of the soul again!"

WASHINGTON.

No matter what may be the birth place of such a man as Washington, no climate can claim, no country can appropriate him—the boon of Providence to the human race—his fame is eternity, and his residence creation. In the production of Washington it does really appear as if Nature was endeavouring to improve upon herself, and that all the virtues of the ancient world were but so many studies preparatory to the new. Individual instances no doubt there were, splendid exemplifications, of some single qualification.—Cæsar was merciful—Scipio was mild—Hannibal was patient—but it was reserved for Washington to blend them all in one, and like the lovely chef d'œuvre of the Grecian artist, to exhibit in one glow of associated beauty, the pride of every model, and the perfection of every master. As a general, he marshalled the peasant into a veteran, and supplied by discipline the absence of experience. As a statesman, he enlarged the policy of the cabinet into the most comprehensive system of general advantage; and such was the wisdom of his views, and the philosophy of his councils, that to the soldier and statesmen, he added the character of the sage. A conqueror, he was untainted with the crime of blood—a revolutionist, he was free from any stain of treason; for aggression commenced the contest, and his country called him to the command. Liberty unsheathed the sword—necessity stained—victory returned it. If he had paused, history might doubt what station to assign him; whether at the head of her citizens or soldiers—her heroes or her patriots. But the last glorious act crowned his career, and banishes hesitation. Who, like Washington, after having freed his country, resigned her crown and retired to a cottage, rather than reign in a capitol! Immortal man! He took from the lamb its crime, and from the serpent its sting—he left the victorious the glory of his self-denial, and turned upon the vanquished only the retribution of his mercy. Happy America: the lightnings of Heaven could not resist your sage—the temptations of earth could not corrupt your soldier.

OVER THE WAY.

"I sat over against a window where there stood a pot with very pretty flowers; and I had my eyes fixed on it, when on a sudden the window opened, and a young lady appeared whose beauty struck me." [Arabian Nights.

Alas! the flames of an unhappy lover
About my heart and on my vitals prey:
I've caught a fever; that I can't get over,
Over the way!

Oh! why are eyes of hazel? noses Grecian?
I've lost my rest by night, my peace by day,
For the want of some brown Holland or Venetian,
Over the way!

I've gazed too often till my heart's as lost
As any needle in a stack of hay:
Cousins belong to love, and mine is crossed
Over the way!

I cannot read or write, or thoughts relax—
Of what avail Lord Althorp or Earl Grey?
They cannot ease me of my window-tax
Over the way!

Even on Sunday my devotions vary,
And from St. Bonnet Fink they go astray
To dear St. Mary Overy—the Mary
Over the way!

Oh! if my grandmother were but a fairy,
With magic wand, how I would beg and pray
That she would change me into that canary
Over the way!

I envy every thing that's near Miss Lindo,
A pug, a poll, a squirrel, or a jay—
Blest blue-bottles! that buzz about the window
Over the way!

Even at even, for there be no shutters,
I see her reading on, from gray to gay,
Some tale or poem, till the candle gutters
Over the way!

And then—oh! then—while the clear waxen taper
Emits, two stories high, a starlike ray,
I see twelve auburn curls put into paper
Over the way!

But how breathe unto her my soft regards,
Or ask her for a whispered aye or nay,—
Or offer her my hand, some thirty yards
Over the way!

Cold as the pole she is to my adoring;—
Like Captain Lyon at Repulse's Bay,
I meet an icy end to my exploring
Over the way!

Each dirty little Savoyard that dances
She looks on—Punch—or chimney-sweeps in May,
Zounds! wherefore cannot I attract her glances
Over the way?

Half out she leans to watch a tumbling brat,
Or yelping cur, run over by a dray;
But I'm in love—she never pities that!
Over the way!

I go to the same church—a love lost labor;
Haunt all her walks, and dodge her at the play:
She does not seem to know she has a neighbor
Over the way!

Associates she has not—she never sups;
No Chloes and Dianas her fancy sway;
She nurses visiting gentlemen with trusts
Over the way!

The billets-doux by post she shows no favor—
In short, there is no plot that I can lay
To break my window-pains to my enslaver
Over the way!

I play the flute—she heeds not my chromatics—
No friend an introduction can purvey;
I wish a fire would break out in the attics
Over the way!

My wasted form ought of itself to touch her!
My baker feels my appetite's decay;
And as for the butcher's meat—oh! she's my butcher
Over the way!

At beef I turn; at lamb or veal I pout;
I never ring now to bring up the tray,
My stomach grumbles at my dining out
Over the way!

I'm weary of my life—without regret
I could resign this miserable clay
To lie within that box of mignonette
Over the way!

I've fitted bullets to my pistol-bore;
I've vowed at times to rush where trumpets bray,
Quite sick of number one—and number four
Over the way!

Sometimes my fancy would build up castles airy,
Sometimes it only paints a ferme ornee,
A horse—a cow—six fowls—a pig—and Mary
Over the way!

Sometimes I dream of her in bridal white,
Standing before the altar, like a fay;
Sometimes of balls, and neighborly invite
Over the way!

I've cod'd with her in dreams, like any turtle,
I've snatched her from the Clyde, the Tweed, and Tay;
Thrice I have made a grove of that one myrtle
Over the way!

Thrice I have rowed her in a fairy shallop,
Thrice raced to Gretna in a neat "po-shay,"
And shower'd crowns to make the horses gallop
Over the way!

And thrice I've started up from dreams appalling,
Of killing rivals in a bloody fray—
There is a young man very fond of calling
Over the way!

Oh! happy man—above all Kings in glory,
Whoever in her ear may say his say,
And add a tale of love to that one story
Over the way!

Nabob of Arcot—Despot of Japan—
Sultan of Persia—Emperor of Cathay—
Much rather would I be the happy man
Over the way!

With such a lot my heart would be in clover—
But what—O horror!—what do I survey!
Postillions and white favors—all is over
Over the way!

T. HOOD.

Every man ought to endeavour at eminence, not by pulling others down, but by raising himself, and enjoy the pleasure of his own superiority, whether imaginary or real, without interrupting others in the same felicity.

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

WHAT IS GLORY!

What is glory? Ask the Printer
Laboring hard, both night and day;
Stew'd in Summer—froze in winter;
He would tell you—better pay.
Ask delinquents, What is glory?
They'll reply, with scoffs and sneers,
'Tis like printers—tell a story—
Promise pay for many years!

Short vs. Long.—Says Long to Short, "how are ye, Top?" "Top," repeated Short, "I had rather be as small as a Top, than long enough to require six hours to get asleep all over." "You had, ha? Well, I had rather be ten hours getting to sleep, than so short as to be obliged to mount a cabbage-leaf to hiccup."

Bass.—Our friend Bass recently had a severe touch of the rheumatism. Our anxiety for him, induced us to send our devil to inquire the state of his health. "My form," says he, "is plaguily battered, and if I don't get better soon, I shall have to be lifted."—Boston Tyro.

An Infidel Village.—It is told, as a well-known jest, that a beggar-woman, repulsed from door to door, as she solicited quarters through the village of Annandale, asked in her despair, if there were no Christians in the place. To which the hearers, concluding that she inquired for some persons so surnamed, answered, "Na, na, there are no Christians here; we are a' Johnstones and Jardines."—Notes to Guy Mannering.

The Last Promise.—"You will, of course, immediately join the mess, Mr. ——," said the adjutant to ensign —— on the day of his arrival at the regiment. "You are very kind, sir," stammered out the incipient hero, "but the last promise which I made to my father was to avoid getting into any mess whatever."

"Please to give me some cold victuals," said a little girl with a basket on her arm, to a servant whom her ringing had summoned to the door. "What do you do with cold victuals, my little girl?" asked the servant as she put some meat and bread into the child's basket. "Father feeds his pigs with it," was the reply.

Puffing.—John Kemble and Lewis chancing to be at Dublin at the same time, were both engaged by the manager for a night's performance in Leon and the Copper Captain. The announcement was coupled with the following delectable passage:

"They never performed together in the same piece, and in all human probability they never will again; this evening is the summit of the manager's chimera. He has constantly gone higher in his endeavors to delight the public; beyond this it is not in nature to go."

Original Anecdote.—Several years since, a celebrated juggler "held forth" some of his tricks of legerdemain in this village; and among other put a watch into a bag, "smashed it all to pieces," and by saying presto, restored the watch, uninjured, to its owner. A young lad who was present, thinking it a very pretty, as well as a very easy trick, took advantage of his father's absence the next day, placed his gold repeater in a pillow-case, and smashed it effectually. To his no small chagrin, in spite of presto, it "staid smashed."

Curious Letter.—A Quaker, who had sent his watch to one of the same belief three or four times to be repaired, but which was not at all benefitted in the end, despatched the following characteristic epistle to the watch repairer:—"Friend John,—I once more send thee my erroneous pocket-clock. The last time she was at thy board, she was in no ways benefitted by thine instructions. I find, from the wavering of her hands and the index of her mind, she is not right in her inward man,—I mean the mainspring. Therefore, take her, and purge her with thy adjusting tool of truth; and, if possible, drive her from the error of her ways. Let her visit the Sun's motion—the true calculation table, and the Equator; and when thou hast brought her conformable to the Standard of Truth, send her home with the bill of moderation, which shall be remitted to thee by thy friend, Obadiah B——.

Dated this second day of the week, commonly called Monday.

A negro's Answer.—A planter in St. Domingo, was one day disposing of a horse to a neighbour, and being questioned by the purchaser regarding its qualities, among the rest, whether it kicked, the disposer replied it was the quietest animal imaginable. He had, however, hardly used the expression when it flung up its heels, to the danger of the by-standers. The purchaser, being irritated at the duplicity of the other, reproached him with his intended deception, when, to substantiate the peaceful character of the animal, he called one of his slaves, and demanded of him if he ever saw this horse kick before? "O, no massa," smartly answered the negro, "me never saw him kick before—always saw him kick behind."

A Sailor's Description of Hunting.—Going to see my father the other day, he ax'd me to take a voyage a hunting with him. So when the swabber had rigg'd the horses, they brought me one to stow myself on board of—one that they told me was in such right trim, she would go as fast on any tack as a Faulksome cutter. So I got aloft, and clapped myself athwart ship, and made as much way as the best on 'em; and on the windward of a gravel pit, we espied a hare at anchor; and so we weighed and bore away, and just as I had overtaken her, my horse came plump ashore upon a rock—the back stay broke—she pitched me over the forecastle, came keel upwards, and unshipped my shoulder, and hang me if I ever sail on land privateering again.

An old lady, speaking of a remarkably slim man with whom she was once acquainted, declared he was so thin, that when he turned sideways he could not be seen at all! If the good lady spoke the truth—and she certainly cannot be accused of stretching the story—this fellow would have made a rare duellist. A charmed bullet couldn't hit him.

Wit of a Gourmand.—Your true gourmand is, generally speaking, without much wit. Mr. G——, invited to dine with a lady, a scrupulous observer of etiquette, offered his service to cut up a brace of partridges. Instead, however, of doing so on the dish, he put them, for the purpose, on his own plate. "For whom do you intend your leavings?" asked the lady in surprise: "Madam," replied he, "I do not intend to leave any."

Polite Visiter.—"What will you take, sir—tea or coffee?" said a waiter at a fashionable hotel, to a western merchant, who was seated at the breakfast table, munching a sandwich. "Why, I dont know," was the reply, "what are you going to take yourself?"

'TAKING THE RESPONSIBILITY.'—Clem contracted with a wharfinger to complete a job in his perfeshan.', Clem was a contractor, and instead of "liftin, ob de saw," himself, engaged Cuff to do the labourious part of the business, paying him therefor at a rate which would afford the contractor a profit. When Cuff ascertained this fact, he blubbered, "Wha for you keepa any back you do no work?"

"Wha for! Why you nigger don you know I take-a de responsibility?"

ANECDOTE FOR THE TIMES.—The Salem Gazette relates, as apposite at this moment, that when a pressure for money existed some years ago in England, an old lady took a hackney coach and proceeded to London, on business. Happening to pass the banking house of Sir John Lubbuck, a wheel of the coach broke just before the door. She was extricated with difficulty, and a crowd immediately collected around the coach, and the door of the banking house, which soon became so dense that few could ascertain the cause. In answer however, to one of the quidnuncs, it was replied by a quizzer that there was a run upon Sir John's Bank. The report flew like wildfire, and in a few hours, almost every outstanding note of the house was poured into the Bank; and before the people could be undeceived, it cost the establishment a sacrifice of £30,000 sterling on property to raise the requisite specie to meet the demand consequent upon the simple accident of an old woman's broken coach wheel!—Transcript.

DYING FOR ANOTHER MAN'S WIFE.—Mr. L resides in Henry-st. His wife who is an economical body had sent a costly silk gown to a French dyer. The dyer himself brought the dress home, and unluckily as it happened, met the husband of the lady at the door, "Is madame within," asked the Frenchman. The husband, who is of a jealous disposition, replied, "And suppose she is, what do you want with her." "I dying for her sir." "You dying for my wife—get out of my house you scoundrel!" and he had just raised his foot to kick the honest mechanic into the street, when the lady made her appearance and set the matter to rights.

AN UNPLEASANT BED FELLOW.—A boy once complained of his brother, for taking half the bed. "And why not?" said his mother; "he's entitled to half, aint he?" "Yes, ma'am," said the boy; "but how should you like to have him take out all the soft for his half? He will have his half out of the middle! and I have to sleep both sides of him!"

A poet was noticing how sometimes the most trivial and unforeseen accident overturns an author's hopes. A thing said he, once happened to me which was enough to make a man forswear ever taking a pen in hand. I had a tragedy—Garrick performed in it—I must confess the principal incident was a little similar to Lear's abdication of the throne in favor of his daughters. Mine were two daughters; and the king—after giving them a lesson fraught with legislative advantages that might have done honor to Solon or Lycurgus—finished his harangue by saying, "and now I divide this crown between you." Sir, a malicious scoundrel peeping over the spikes of the orchestra, and staring Garrick in the face, cried out, "Ah, that's just half a crown a piece." Sir, an incessant laugh immediately prevailed, and if it had been to have saved your soul, another syllable could not be heard.

A clever servant is almost invariably quick tempered. The reason is obvious: superior talent is always accompanied by pride, which must meet with many petty annoyances in the menial state.

DIS-AFFECTION—EXEMPLIFIED.

The experiences of physicians have lately been often detailed in print; formerly they held themselves bound not to tell the "secrets of the prison-house." A couple of anecdotes, never before published, were related to us the other day:—

Dr. C——, as celebrated for humanity, address, and penetration, as for his professional skill, attended the last illness of a gentleman, the profligate levity of whose "son and heir" hastened his decease. Meeting the young parricide on the stairs, the doctor, without assuming the least caution or delicacy, said, coolly, "Sir, your father has just expired." "Indeed!" exclaimed the youth, starting; "this is very sudden—had you not better open the body immediately, to ascertain?" "Oh, sir," interrupted his hearer, with cutting severity, "you need not give yourself the slightest alarm—I assure you he is quite dead."

Ought the wretch to have survived such a reproof?

At another time this doctor was called in to the abrupt and fatal indisposition of a very rich old man, who left behind him a curiously ignorant yet handsome young widow, apparently unsolaced by the prospect of wealth, a year's freedom, and then—the lady let down her hair to tear it, raving wildly, "I'll not believe that the dear man could die, and leave me! No!—he lives! I'm sure he's alive! Doctor, tell me, don't you think he will come to life again?" "Why, madam," replied the physician, solemnly, "since you are so pressing, I confess that we have means. Shall I galvanize him?—you will soon see him jump up then." "No, doctor, no!" screamed the widow, in pious horror, "I'll have none of your experiments—they are downright witchcraft—none of your experiments. Jump up—against the law of nature! Heaven forbid, dear man! Hard as it is to bear my fate—let us have no experiments!—Comic Offering.

EVERY MAN TO HIS TRADE.—A soldier, while coming up Leith Walk on a wet day lately, had his pure white inexpressibles, which seemed to be the very pride of his heart, completely destroyed, for one day at least, by a splash of mud from a cart going down. The man of war did not much relish the salute, and insisted that the carter must pay the damage done or fight him. "Fight!" said the carter, with a look of supreme contempt, "D—n it, fightin's your trade; but I'll ca' a hoose wi' ony o' ye—hup, Charlie, hup!"

A lady entered a Store, a few weeks since in the town of N—I— in N. H. where Dry Goods and Groceries were sold, and after making sundry purchases, amounting to the enormous sum of five cents, and occupying the attention of the Clerk for at least one hour—she inquired if he had any wine of very superior quality. He told her that he could furnish her with some of super-excellent quality, at $3 per gallon. The Lady thought the price high—and repeatedly asked if that was the lowest—and being assured that it could not be offered for less—she opened her purse, took out a piece of coin and handed it to the Clerk, saying that she believed she would take a CENT's worth!—adding that she did not know what her husband would say to her for spending so much money!

A gentleman being asked how old the Siamese twins were, replied, very artlessly, that he thought the eldest was about twenty, and the other, two years younger.

A diminutive Highlander boasted to a son of the Emerald Isle that he was descended from a race of giants. "Och, by the powers," says Pat, "if that's true, my little fellow, you have had a descent, indeed, and a devil of a one too."

MARCH OF REFINEMENT.

Verses for the year 1933.

Tell John to set the kettle on,
I mean to take a drive;
I only want to go to Rome,
And shall be back by five.

Tell cook to dress those humming birds
I shot in Mexico;
They've now been killed at least two days,
They'll be un peu trop haut.

And, Tom, take you the gold-leaf wings,
And start for Spain at three;
I want some Seville oranges
'Twixt dinner time and tea.

Fly round by France, and bring a new
Perpetual motion gun;
To-morrow, with some friends, I go
A-hunting in the Sun.

The trip I took the other day,
To breakfast in the Moon,
Thanks to that awkward Lord Bellaire,
Has spoiled my new balloon;

For steering through the milky way,
He ran against a star;
And turning round again too soon,
Came jolt against my car.

But, Tom, get you the car repaired,
And then let Dan and Dick
Inflate with ten square miles of gas—
I mean to travel quick.

My steam is surely up by now,
Put the high pressure on;
Give me the breath-bag for the way;
All right—hey—whiz—I'm gone.—

MATRIMONY.

"Disguise thyself as thou wilt, still, slavery! thou art a bitter draught."

To die, some wicked rascals tell us,
Is a mere joke—a bagatelle,
Whether we're partial to a gallows,
Or choose to walk into a well;
But, from a paltry love of life,
Say the same rogues, not over-civil,
To take unto yourself a wife,
Alas! a spouse—O! that's the d—l!
Who, cry these wags, would ever cumber
His house with such a dull, insipid,
Useless, heartless piece of lumber,
A mere machine—a moving biped?
And then they speak of Eve and Adam,
And Sampson's wife, and Lot's sad dame,
And poor Job's breeches-wearing madame,
And hundreds more than I can name.
Pandora with her poisonous box,
And Ellen who to Asseran,
And she who had the art to hoax
Poor Socrates, unhappy man!
Yet, after all, I still maintain
That women, on the whole, increase
Man's happiness; and can't refrain
From saying they're a useful piece
Of household furniture, a kind,
Domestic animal, that knows
All the vagaries of your mind,
And makes your tea, and mends your clothes.
But marriage is, no doubt, a sea,
With many a rock that one may split on,
With many a hidden shoal that we
Will soon or late be sure to get on.
Who ever saw a genuine tear
Stand in a widow'd husband's eye?
Who ever had the luck to hear,
At such a time, a genuine sigh?
Look at the widower, when he goes
Accoutred in his best black clothes;
Is there no smile about his face,
No air of freedom in his pace?
No scorn about the glance he throws
In proud security on those Whose looks inform you well enough
Their mates "are made of sterner stuff?"
This puts a story in my head,
I somewhere either heard or read:

A messenger, in breathless haste,
With hair erected on his head,
Into Cornaro's chamber press'd,
And rush'd up to the sleeper's bed;
The sleeper lay in sweet repose,
The wasted strength of his restoring,
Lull'd by the music of his nose,
Which mortals vulgarly call snoring.
The stranger shook him pretty roughly,
And tweak'd his nose and pull'd his hair.
At last Cornaro, rather gruffly,
Ask'd, "what the d—l brought him there?"
The messenger, in great distress,
At length, in broken accents, said,
"O! sir, they've sent me here express,
To tell you that your wife is dead!"
"Indeed!" the widow'd man replied,
Turning upon his other side,
And pulling o'er his eyes his cap,
In hopes of finishing his nap—
"To-morrow, when I wake, you'll see How very sorry I shall be."

Dr. Reid says—"I have been credibly informed, that a monkey, having once been intoxicated with strong drink, in consequence of which it burnt its fou: in the fire, and had a severe fit of sickness, could not after be induced to drink any think but pure water. I believe this is the utmost pitch which the faculties of brutes reach."

A gentleman was distinguished for his attachment to the society of females. Where ladies were present one evening, the subject of conversation was the doctrine of Pythagoras. The gentleman remained silent. One of the party, (remarkable for the whiteness of her neck,) asked his opinion. "Do you believe in the transmigration of souls, sir?"

"O yes, madam!"

"And pray, may I inquire what creature's form you would prefer hereafter to inhabit?"

"A fly's, madam."

"A fly?"

"Yes; that I might have the pleasure, at some future day of resting on your ladyship's neck."

An English writer suggests a plan of naturalizing the fire fly, which abounds not only in America but in the Vaudois of Piedmont. The people of the Vaudois, he suggests would deliver any number of these insects in Paris, at ten shillings a dozen in boxes properly contrived, in every stage of their existence, and even in the egg, should that be desired; and that if twenty dozen were turned out in different parts of England, there could not remain a doubt, that, in a few years, they would be common through the country, to the great embellishment of English summer evenings.

CASKET

OR GEMS OF

LITERATURE, WIT AND SENTIMENT.

For noble youth, there is no thing so meet
As learning is, to know the good from ill:
To know the tongues, and perfectly indite,
And of the laws to have a perfect skill,
Things to reform as right and justice will:
For honour is ordained for no cause,
But to see right maintained by the laws.

No. 5.] PHILADELPHIA.—MAY. [1834.

THE GIRARD COLLEGE.

It is with no common feeling of satisfaction that we present to the readers of the Casket, the first engraved view of this magnificent monument of human philanthropy. If the public attention has been anxiously directed to the subject of the College, it was worthy that it should be, as it is seldom called on to contemplate an object so deserving. The architect, THOMAS U. WALTER, Esq. is a gentleman who has already distinguished himself by the erection of the Wills Hospital for the Blind and Lame, an institution which had its origin in a legacy to the corporation of Philadelphia, from the late JAMES WILLS of this city, and by the erection of a Prison for the County of Philadelphia, which is now rapidly approaching its completion.

The Girard College will be constructed in exact compliance with the will of Mr. Girard, with the Single exception of increasing the thickness of the walls, which as directed by him, were found to be insufficient for the safety and permanency of the vast stricture they were destined to support. Mr. Girard having caused a large number of stores and dwelling houses to be built, naturally became well versed in all the details of building, and in his will laid down a plan for the construction of his College, in which he directed the walls, after a certain height, to be made of only two feet thickness. This thickness was found, by more practical men, to be insufficient to make it a "permanent and durable" edifice, an injunction on which great stress was laid in his will; the thickness of the walls was therefore increased in the parts considered as needing it. The College is 111 feet east and west, and 169 feet north and south. *It is built on "lines parallel with the east and west city streets," deviating from a parallel with the north and south streets only as much as said streets deviate from a right angle. The design adopted by the councils, and now being executed, makes the house "three stories high; each story is fifteen feet high, in the clear from the floor to the cornice." The elevation of the arch, together with the thickness of the floor and arch, makes each story twenty five feet from floor to floor. "The whole building will be fire proof inside and outside."

"The floors and the roof are to be formed of solid materials, on arches turned on proper centres, so that no wood will be used except for doors, windows, and shutters."

"Cellars are made under the whole building; the doors to them from the outside, are on the east and west of the building, and access to them from the inside will be by steps descending to the cellar floor, from each of the entries or halls hereinafter mentioned, and the inside cellar doors are to open under the stairs on the north east, and north west corners of the northern entry, and under the stairs on the south east and south west corners of the southern entry."

"There is a cellar window, under, and in a line with each window of the first story. They are built 3 feet below, and 3 feet above the surface of the ground. The sashes are to open inside on hinges, like doors, and there is to be strong iron bars outside of each window," placed securely in the portico floor; the "windows inside and outside are 4 feet wide in the clear."

"There are in each story 4 rooms, each room being 50 feet square in the clear."

"The four rooms on each floor occupy the whole space east and west, on such floor or story, and the middle of the building north and south, so that in the north of the building, and in the south thereof, their remains a space" of 26 feet, "for an entry or hall in each, for stairs and landings."

"In the north east, and in the north west corners of the northern entry or hall on the first floor, stairs are to be made so as to form a double staircase, which are to be carried up through the several stories; and in the like manner, in the southeast and southwest corners of the southern entry or hall, stairs are to be made on the first floor, so as to form a double staircase, to be carried up through the several stories; the steps of the stairs are to be made of smooth white marble with plain square edges," each step is to be 7 1-2 inches rise, and 12 inches on the tread.

The outside and inside foundation walls, are 14 feet high in the clear from the ground to the ceiling, (or under side of the arches) the first floor is eight feet above the level of the ground, around the building after such ground shall have been properly regulated.

Arrangements have been made for chaining or banding the walls in the manner that Mr. Girard has directed.

* The quotations used in describing the College are from the Will of Mr. Girard.

The elevation of the roof is one-ninth of the whole span, this being "as nearly horizontal as may be, consistently with the easy passage of water to the eaves;" "the outside walls" are to be caried up of the thickness of two feet, to the height of two feet above the roof, and to "have a marble capping, with a strong and neat iron railing thereon."

"The outside walls" are to "be faced with slabs or blocks of marble," the thickness of none of the courses "being less than two feet," understanding by the thickness, the vertical dimensions, these blocks are to be "fastened together with clamps, securely sunk therein."

"The floors and landings as well as the roof, are to be covered with marble slabs, securely laid in mortar; the thickness of the marbie on the roof, will be double that of the floors."

"In constructing the walls, as well as turning the arches, and laying the floors, landing and roof, good and strong mortar and grout, are to be used, so that no cavity whatever may any where remain."

Provision is made for a large furnace, in each end of the cellar, "for the generation of heated air," and flues are to be constructed in the walls, for the purpose of conducting the warm air thus generated, to all the rooms in the house.

"There are two principal doors of entrance into the College, one into the entry or hall on the first floor in the North, and one in the South of the building, and in the centre, between the East and West walls; these doors are proportioned according to the size of the building, the purpose of the doors and the size of the entry."

The same principle has governed in deciding upon the size and position of all the interior doors and windows.

"All the doors are to be double, those opening into the rooms to be what are termed glass doors, and those opening outward to be of substantial wood work, well lined and secured."

"The windows of the second and third stories," are "to be made in the style of those in the first and second stories of Mr. Girard's late dwelling, in North Water street;" that is to say, they are to be made to open in the centre, and hung on hinges the same as doors; "the windows of the first story, to be in the same style except that they are not to descend to the floor, but so far as the surbace, up to which the wall is to be carried, in the same manner as Mr. Girard's house in Passyunk Township."

The whole building is to be surrounded with a portico, twenty-one feet in width, with columns of the Grecian Corinthian order, this portico is essentially necessary, inasmuch, as it affords strength and stability to the third story arches. This additional strength is not obtained from the columns as props or shores to the building, but these columns support the entablature, ceiling of portico, &c. from which the requisite strength is obtained.

As it regards the arching of the first and second stories, there will be no difficulty, inasmuch, as the superincumbent weight will create a resistance to lateral pressure, and prevent any swerving that might occur from the tremendous pressure of the arches, but the third story arches not having the advantage of superior weight, must be secured by some other method.

All the arches will be banded with iron, (in the words of Mr. Girard) they will "be secured with iron chains," but these chains cannot embrace all that portion of the wall that is subjected to outward pressure, all the force cannot be positively resolved upon one horizontal line; the chains are of great importance it is true, but something more than chains is requisite. As a dernier resort therefore, a colonnade around the whole building was adopted.

The weight of the materials used in the construction of the entablature, portico—ceiling, roof, &c. is supported, one half on the columns, and one half on the walls of the building; this additional weight applied directly to that part of the wall, receiving the thrust of the third story arches, will prevent any "cracking or swerving," and give "strength and durability" to the whole work.

In addition to the strength gained by the weight on the walls at the spring of the arches, the ceiling of the portico and the entablature will be securely clamped together with iron; by this means a band will be formed around the whole building, which will give permanency and durability to the edifice.

All the marble required in the construction of this magnificent edifice, is now under contract, and a large quantity has already been delivered at the College, and prepared for placing on the walls; it is all of a very superior quality, and that intended for the porticoes, is clear white.

We understand that the carving of the corinthian capitals for the exterior, is also under contract, and the contractors have commenced the work; it is all to be executed on the land surrounding the College.

The whole of the marble is obtained in the state of Pennsylvania, and within 26 miles of Philadelphia.

The cost of the whole establishment is estimated at $900,000, and from six to eight years will be required to finish it. By the will of Mr. Girard, two millions of dollars are set aside for the construction and future support, while the balance of his vast estate is in reality a mere reserve fund, from which as much more may be drawn for the use of this College as may be found necessary. When this stupendous edifice is completed, it will be, without exception, the most splendid work on the American continent. All that taste, skill, money, and materials of surpassing excellence can do, will be united to form a monument worthy of the man who so munificently endowed it, and of which not only Philadelphia, but the country at large may well be proud.

The devotion of his wealth to charitable and useful purposes, seems to give the finishing stroke to the character of this remarkable man. By patient and laborious attention to his business, united with a shrewdness and sagacity which are seldom found to blend in a single individual, Girard accumulated a fortune which was even more than princely. In obtaining it, he wronged no man by overreaching, deception, or any of the dishonourable tricks of trade. No reproach of that kind has ever been brought against him. It is true that he was parsimonious, and it is said, unkind to his relations, as it is certain he was brutal in his treatment of those employed under him. On occasions too, he was liberal in the extreme. Of his religious life we dare not judge, as well because we have no knowledge of his secret devotions, their extent or their sincerity, as because it is no man's province to pass upon that which is the prorogative of Almighty Power alone. When dying, his wealth was not given to appease the horrors of a death bed, because his end was calm and tranquil; but having provided liberally for all the members of his family, in this country as well as in France, he bequeathed the remainder of his vast estate for the accomplishment of objects which after ages will unite, as we do, in pronouncing the most exalted and eminently beneficial to the human family.

POLITENESS.—A polite behavior can never be long maintained without a real wish to please; and such a wish is a proof of good-nature. No ill-natured man can be long well-bred. No good-natured man, however unpolished in his manners, can ever be essentially ill-bred.

LOVE, LUCK AND HORSEMANSHIP, OR MY FIRST STEEPLE-CHASE.

By the Author of Wild Sports of the West.

It was the first week in July, when, having taken the honours of a graduate, after a five years sojourn within the classical courts of old Alma Mater, I strolled into the repository in Stephen's-green, to bid adieu to old H——, who for thirty years had horsed us of Trinty. It was a sale-day, and a blank one too; the world was out of town. There were few to sell, and fewer yet to buy. A hack not worth a hay-band, was knocked down to an aspiring linen-draper, who wanted "something smart" whereon to dust himself occasionally. I saw him regularly jockeyed with infinite satisfaction, as he had once dunned me, even unto payment, for "a beggarly account" of gloves and pocket handkerchiefs. Although he did not venture to invite me to be of the multitude of his counsellors, as I had broken his windows upon the evening I had paid his bill, that did not prevent me from pointing out certain beauties in the quadruped then beneath the hammer, which even had escaped the auctioneer himself. Indeed, according to my showing, the cardinal virtues of horseflesh were concentrated in that matchless animal. Yet human judgment is fallible, and the steed did not realize the qualifications ascribed to him by the puffer and myself; for, as the Evening Post soon afterwards announced, Mr. Lawrence Lutestring was run away with upon the rocky road, and the excited courser, not content with demolishing sundry ribs of the unfortunate cavalier, had, from an infirmity of vision, come in contact with a loaded jaunting-car, and the concussion was so awful, that the company were deposited in a wet ditch, and the vehicle rendered hors du combat.

I was about to leave the yard, when old Phil, prime-minister to the repository, jogged me on the elbow. "Stop a minute—it's worth while, sir. There's a queer one coming out—he's the devil, to be sure. Och, if he had but temper; but here he is." While he spoke, a rattling high-bred dark bay horse issued from the stables.—He was in the lowest condition imaginable; but, notwithstanding his poverty, he was the ruin of a noble animal—he was far from being handsome; the head was coarse, the shoulder thick; but he embodied some good points, and, though cross-made, to an experienced eye his "ensemble" was excellent. Archy, my best man—as honest a groom as ever won a living, whispered, "if he had not the go in him, he was the biggest villain under the canopy" and before the animal had made the third turn down the run, I had come to a similar conclusion.

The groom stopped when he had gained the vantage ground. "There, gentlemen," said the auctioneer, "there's what I call youth and beauty; there's the maker of a fortune, and no mistake. The lady who could refuse any thing to a man with such a daisy cutter under him would be hard to please indeed—run him down, Lanty—that's action and elegance—come, sir," to a tall, raw-boned young grocer—"that horse was foaled for you—a gentleman of your figure should never cross any thing but blood—this here horse is young Selim: he's own brother to Mouse-catcher; cousin to Morgiana, and up to fourteen stone with any fox-hounds in the kingdom"—but Selim appeared likely to profit little by his respectable relationship; he had a ree look, a blemished knee, was fired behind, and had killed a man into the bargain; for he had run off with a drunken helper, and broke the rider's neck against the frame-work of the stable-door—no, in company of sober cits, requiring "steady roadsters," and "useful family horses," Selim found little favour; and the young grocer, even to become a lady-killer, would not bid a sixpence.

"Gentlemen, I put him up at fifty," said he of the hammer—"no reserve in this case—none, upon honour—owner gone to the Peninsula, and orders for sale absolute. Selim is a beautiful charger; steady with arms," and here he addressed a corpulent personage, who, as it appeared, was in the yeomanry; "he would carry you upon parade delightfully; his courage is only equalled by his training; his late master would ride him to a battery." A battery—may heaven forgive him! Selim had never seen a corporal's guard relieved in his life; a cracker would raise him sky-high, and a squib send him across the broadest part of Sackville-street.—Still, not a whisper from the company, and the auctioneer proceeded—"gentlemen, we must sacrifice him—orders peremptory, say forty for the beautiful and gentle animal:" "gentle," ejaculated the grocer, "and that after killing a groom." This was indeed a home hit—the auctioneer coughed—"hem—hem—rather unfortunate, but mere accident after all—say thirty, gentlemen—twenty—ten—do, give me a bid." "Five," roared a jingle owner—"ten," said Archy—"fifteen" shouted the puffer—"twenty cried I—the hammer fell—and the brother of Mouse-catcher was mine.

Now, I verily believe, that the whole history of Selim was apocryphal, except the solitary fact of his having finished a stable-boy. In one thing, however, Archy and I were unanimous—that to a herring-cadger he was worth the money, provided he would carry the basket. We brought him in the country—bled, fed, blistered, and physicked him, "secundum artem," turned him out upon a fine salt marsh, and left him "to fulfil his destinies."

At this memorable period of my life, the north of Ireland was celebrated for its sporting associations. The Boyne, the Doagh, the Newtownbreda hunts were all in full force; and few of the larger towns wanted their own particular club. Many private gentlemen were also masters of hounds, and kept their establishments nobly. Then the glory of "The Rangers" was in its zenith—their county and members were alike extensive; and no gentleman attached to field sports within thirty miles, whose rank and fortune would authorize his admission, but was enrolled in this celebrated club. The members met annually in the country town, attended by a pack of fox hounds, and "a gallant following." They lived liked "Irish kings," played high, drank deep, seldom went to bed, gave dashing balls, and set the country in a blaze weeks before, and months afterwards. Alas! all this is over; the club is no more; the pack is scattered; the kennel a ruin; "The Rangers fill the narrow house:" and where in Ireland could rank, and wealth, and influence, be congregated now?

Into "The Rangers" I had been recently admitted; their meeting was fixed for the middle of October, and the cup, with other valuable plates, were then to be contested. The cup had excited unusual interest, and had been challenged by a dozen members, good men and true, and each having, or believing he had, an excellent chance of winning it. The race was three miles, over Hibernice a sporting, Anglice a break-neck country—the weights thirteen stone. There were already eight candidates in full preparation. Six depended on their own horses—good, fat, honest, weight-carriers—but two had gone to considerable expense, and had secured at "a large figure," celebrated racing-hunters "for the nonce."

"What will not young ambition?" In spite of this mighty array, I boldly added my name to the list of challengers. I had a slashing four-year-old mare, whose stride and action were extraordinary. As there were no allowance for the age or sex, the weights were certainly against her; but I was not the one to despair, and even to name her in the match was an honour more than worth the entrance-money.

August came; Miranda was in beautiful condition: and Archy exhausted upon her training all the arcana of the racing-stable, and the experience of a life; while I dreamed of nothing but cups and conquest. Alas! these youthful visions were rudely dispelled, for, one morning, Miranda was found halter-cast in the stable.—She was dead lame, and lame she continued for many a month afterwards. To me and my master of the horse this was a sad disappointment. I took myself to the grouse-shooting, and Archy to whiskey and religion. Poor Archy, in the hours of business, was an indifferent catholic, as the priest declared, but from the moment a horse was put in training, he never "darkened a chapel door."

August passed, and I would have willingly continued absent. To witness the downfall of my ambition was painful, as Miranda was incurably lame. Other feelings where paramount; I was deep in love, and at twenty-one that is a desperate concern.

Rosa lived near me. I would have forgotten her, but that was impossible. She was an heiress, gentle, and timid to a degree, and fearful of hearing she was beloved. Yet there were times when, if my advances were not encouraged, at least my suit was listened to, and an ill-concealed satisfaction told, that she was not indifferent to my suit. Her coldness piqued me for the moment, and yet I left her, persuaded that of all her sex she was the best worthy of being wooed and won.

I arrived home for a late dinner, discussed some old port, listened to a long story, and was musing over the misfortune of my mare, when Archy popped in his head to ask "if I would look into the stables." I followed him, and one glance told me that Miranda was not to figure in the field. My eyes passed over the stalls, and rested on a stranger in the corner, sheeted with my own covers. Archy, with a knowing look, stripped the new comer, and the brother of Mouse-catcher was before me; and could this be he? The rakish, tattered, rejected man-killer of the Repository, changed into as fine a horse as ever followed a fox-hound! The mystery was quickly solved—Archy had visited the salt-marsh—found Selim so altered as scarcely to be recognized; took him up and got him through physic, and ready for training. For this, indeed, there was but little time; but Archy swore "slight training was best for a half-breed," and Archy was right.

For my part, I could scarce believe my eyes, and examined Selim carefully, to assure myself of his identity. Every scratch upon his legs had disappeared; the blemish on his knee was hardly visible; he was now a sporting looking horse, and Archy swore, "better than he looked."

Time flew, and every thing increased my confidence in the cousin of Morgiana. His speed was easily ascertained, but of his fencing qualities we knew nothing. Any thing we took him at he executed well, and intricate leaps were for obvious reasons avoided. I had secured a gentleman to ride for me, who in steeple-chasing had covered himself with glory, and, with a reasonable hope of success, waited the result.

And yet I never caused my competitors a thought. With the lameness of Miranda, it had pleased them to conclude my racing history.

They heard, accidentally, that I had purchased a horse in town, and all they knew of him was, that he had killed a man and been bought for a song. With this information they rested satisfied, and decided that myself and man-killer were of "no consideration." I kept my own counsel, and when it was necessary to remove to the vicinity of the race-ground, I procured accommodation for my establishment at an obscure farm-house, and our incognito was as perfect as if we had never left our stables.

But there was one to whom my proceedings were not indifferent, and that one was my gentle Rosa. With all a woman's tenderness, she had sympathized in my disappointment; she knew my secret, for ours were young hearts, and what agitated one breast could not but interest the other.

The evening before the eventful day, I stole from the club-room, to exchange the jargon of the field for a tête-à-tête with my pretty mistress. "Hot with the Tuscan grape," I urged my passion with more than common ardour, and Rosa listened. Just then her maid disturbed us, and brought me a letter that had been forwarded by express. I broke the seal—death to my hopes! My rider had been thrown from a coach-box, and lay with a broken arm at a country inn some ten miles distant.

Rosa remarked my agitation.

"Is there any thing wrong, Arthur?"

"Yes, dearest, I am indeed a luckless cavalier; H——— has met with an accident, and Selim is consequently without a rider."

"And will he not run, then?"

Half a minute determines, frequently, as well as the consideration of half a year, and in that brief space I had formed my resolution.

"He will run, Rosa, but with me upon his back, what chance can he have with the best riders in the kingdom opposed?"

"But the danger, dear Arthur—"

"Is not greater than fox-hunters encounter thrice a week."

"And is there really no more?"

I assured her there was not, and shortly afterward bade her good night. This trifling occurrence elicited more from Rosa than all my studied efforts; and when I left her, for the first time I pressed her to my bosom, and heard her murmur a prayer for my safety.

Whether it was that unforseen events call forth the latent energies of the mind, or the consciousness that I was beloved by her for whom I would sacrifice a world, that roused the ardour of my spirits I knew not, but I entered the crowded club-room with a buoyant and excited feeling. The accident to my rider had transpired, and from some I received sincere, from others ironical, condolence.

"I hope notwithstanding, that the homicide will run," said the president.

"The homicide, as you are pleased to term him will run; and, for want of a better horseman, his owner will ride, and win—if he can."

My tone and manner were not unmarked; and while some were recommending me to effect a life insurance, I was coolly booking heavy odds, and so continued till every gentleman inclined to bet them had been heartily satisfied. The joking at my expense subsided fast-people began to look suspiciously, and Jemmy Joyce whispered his next neighbour, that the sooner he hedged the better, as the race was not quite so sure, I being, according to his parlance, "very like a lad who would make a spoon or spoil a horn." Having balanced my book, I borrowed an old blue jacket from the huntsman, left the club, visited the stable, and went quietly to rest, to be ready for the morrow.

Morning came, and I felt rather queer: I began to discover that it is no joke for a nervous gentleman to ride steeple-chases for the first time, under the critical examination of thirty thousand spectators. But an incident restored my hardiesse. At breakfast, a sealed parcel was handed me by the waiter; it contanied a beautiful pink and yellow jacket. No note accompanied it, but to the cap a scroll was attached, bearing in a female hand, the motto, "may this be foremost!" Whose might the fair favour be? My heart whispered the name and I was not mistaken.

The ground selected for the race was chosen, with excellent judgment, as it afforded to the mighty multitude an uninterrupted view of the race, from its commencement to its close: from a circular valley the surface undulated gently, and the course, nearly elliptical, stretched across the rising ground. In the same field the starting and winning posts were placed. This was a favourite stand; a long line of carriages of every description occupied it. Ladies were there "thick as leaves in Vall'ombrosa," for every thing distingué and beautiful for counties round was on the ground.

At twelve o'clock a warning bugle was heard, and from their respective cantonments the horses slowly approached the same point; each, as he entered the field, was scrutinized by a crowd of horsemen, who were assembled for that purpose at the gate. With short intervals, a brown, a gray and two bays passed review; they had their respective admirers, but caused no great sensation, and expectation "was still on the tiptoe;" presently a buz was heard, a horse approached, and Firebrand, a noted racing hunter from Roscommon, appeared. He looked to be in capital condition, and from having won four cups already, his character was deservedly first-rate.

"But louder yet the clamour grew," as the pet of the day, the far-famed English horse, Comet, appeared. He was a splendid, thorough-bred chesnut, full sixteen hands high, and looking every inch like a racer, I felt my cheek blanch as I examined him: he was indeed a formidable opponent; and as his late owner, Capt. M——, reputed justly to be the best field horseman in the kingdom, was to ride him, no wonder that I began to dread the contest.

He was led off, and my forlorn charger was impatiently expected. In the few minutes which elapsed before his entrée, I and my man-killer were subjected to many a sporting jest; at length the brother of Mouse-catcher appeared, and on he came with a careless toss of the head, as if he had never finished a stable-boy; closely sheeted as he was, his appearance was very different from what had been anticipated: the knowing ones looked more knowing; and Jemmy Joyce exclaimed with a grin, that he seemed "mighty like a Tartar!"

While the horses were leading to the starting-post, I galloped up to the hill to the place my pretty mistress occupied in an open carriage; "tell me, pray you," said her cousin, "what spell is over Rosa; know you the secret that robs her of the roses?" "Shall I restore them?" I replied; and unclosing my top-coat, displayed my handsome jacket. When it met her eyes, her cheeks were dyed with blushes, and left me at no loss to conjecture whence my fancy favour came.

Again the bugle sounded; Comet and Firebrand occupied the attention of the crowd, while Selim was stripped and saddled behind a large marquee; to assume my gay cap and doff my coat was the business of a minute; my competitors were already mounted, and I was impatiently called for, when from behind the tent a dashing horse and gallant rider issued. Our appearance elicited a murmur of applause; the owners of Comet and Firebrand looked blank enough; and faith they had good reason.

As we drew up in line, I thought the English racer appeared not to be in full force; but the determined countenance of the inimitable jockey, dressed in his black and buff stripes, looked alarming; nor was Firebrand without his friends; and the green cap was offered fully against every thing but Comet; as to me, people seemed afraid to back or bet against me; and those who had laid the odds last night pretty heavily, were hedging now as fast as they could meet with customers.

Off we went in a bunch; the bays, brown, and gray making the running. I saw at once that the pace, though severe for them, was nothing to Comet, Firebrand, and my friend the Man-killer. After a mile we tailed them off, and had the race to ourselves.

One moiety of the ground was broken into tillage fields and enclosures; the other was open meadow, affording excellent galloping, and interspersed with stiff fences. Here, having cleared the poddocks, we increased the speed, and came out at a killing pace.

On entering the grass-lands, I found my rivals could not conveniently go faster, and that I was up to it well; the race was indeed beautiful; for the next mile a sheet would cover us; the fences were taken in line; and none could tell whether black, yellow, or green was foremost.

Half a mile from home, there was a fence of tremendous size; it was a ditch with a drain at either side, and the place that we approached was stoccaded with stumped thorns. It was, in truth, a "regular rasper," and was distinguished by the country people "par excellence," as the big-leap; as we neared it, my companions gathered the energies of the horses for the trial, and Selim looked as if he were half-inclined to decline it; and yet with a glorious effort he cleared this formidable barrier in a style that drew from the multitude a thunder of applause: not so my rivals; Firebrand fell, and staked himself; while Comet, by his rider's horsemanship, was indifferently brought across, but staggering, he came down on landing, and in the mistake lost ground he could never recover; during the run home, he did make a wonderful struggle to pull up; it was in vain, for after we crossed the break-neck fence, I had the race hollow.

Amid deafening cheers, I was carried from the scales in triumph; I was declared, even by Jemmy Joyce, a youth of promise, and my man-killer the best weight-carrier in the kingdom.

Every tale has its moral; so has mine. Never condemn a horse untried; for many a good one has thus been sacrificed. I saved Selim from slavery and a jingle; and he won me four cups, and carried me four seasons as I was never carried afterward: nay more, I owe my connubial happiness mainly to "my bonny bay." Rosa was an heiress, and I a younger son; a rich rival was encouraged by her guardian, and in a few days he was expected to make his addresses in form. I was flushed with victory, and she flattered to see her fairy favourite foremost in the field. At the ball that night, my eloquence was irresistible; she smiled upon my suit; and, to end uncertainty, and save her guardian future trouble, eloped with me to Grenta the next morning.

Years of happiness have proved how fortunate our union was; and if some reminiscences of early indiscretion will sometimes intrude upon my memory, on two eras I can look back with unalloyed delight—the morning when I rode my first steeple-chase, and the evening that made Rosa mine.—Dublin University Magazine.

If you wish to make yourself agreeable to any one, talk as much as you please about his or her affairs, and as little as possible about your own. People are such downright egotists themselves, that they cannot tolerate egotism in others.

PECULIARITIES OF AUTHORS.—The habits and peculiarities of authors in almost every branch of literature have, in many instances, been sufficiently ridiculous. Rousseau, for instance, could write only when dressed in the highest style of refinement, and with crow pens, on tinted or gilt paper. Dr. Samuel Johnson was almost the only author of the last century who could write at any time and under any circumstances. In recent times, and in the present day, we find the greater proportion of authors free of the peculiarities which were fashionable among their predecessors; occupying half their time with some ordinary pursuit, and taking up the pen in most cases in the intervals of business. The chief composers of music were in general still more affected and impassioned in their feelings than the authors of the last century, and were apparently unable to compose, unless under great excitement. It is seen from a recent article in the Harmonicon, that Gluck, in order to warm his imagination, and transport himself in idea to Aulis, or Sparta, was accustomed to place himself in the middle of a beautiful meadow. In this situation, with a piano before him, and a bottle of champagne by his side, he wrote his two Iphigenias, his Orpheus, and other works. Sarti, on the contrary, required a spacious dark room, dimly illuminated by a lamp suspended from the ceiling; and it was only in the most silent hours of night that he could summon musical ideas. Cimarosa, it seems, was fond of noise; he liked to have his friends about him when he composed. Frequently, in the course of a single night, he wrote the subjects of eight or ten charming airs, which he afterwards finished in the midst of his friends. Cherubini was also in the habit of composing when surrounded with company. If his ideas did not flow very freely, he would borrow a pack of playing cards from any party engaged with them, and fill up the pips with faces caricatured, and all kinds of humorous devices, for he was as ready with his pencil as his pen, though certainly not equally great with both. Sacchini could not write a passage except when his wife was at his side, and unless his cats, whose playfulness he admired, were gamboling about him. Paisiello composed in bed; and it was there that he planned Il Barbiere de Seviglia, La Molinara and other chef-d' œuvre of ease and gracefulness. Zingarelli would dictate his music after reading a passage in one of the fathers of the church, or in some Latin classic. Haydn, who was lofty in his conceptions, required a peculiar, but a harmless species of excitement. Solitary and sober as Newton, putting on his finger the ring sent him by Frederick II., and which, he said, was necessary to inspire his imagination, he sat down to his piano, and in a few moments soared among the choirs. Nothing disturbed him at Eisenstadt, the seat of Prince Esterhazy; he lived wholly for his art, exempt from worldly cares, and often said that he always enjoyed himself most when he was at work.

In the first ages of the world, the year was distinguished by two seasons only. Moses mentions seed-time and harvest, summer and winter. In process of time, the exertions of industry marked out other periods; but all that the Germans wanted of the earth was corn and grain, and the harvest being over, they had no fruits to expect in autumn. Brotier says, the Germans at this day have no distinct word in their language for the autumnal season. The term that satisfies them is Herbst, harvest. Beyond that period, the Ancient Germans knew no productions of the earth, having neither orchards nor fruit trees; and accordingly the Anglo-Saxon language has no name for autumn. The word in English was borrowed from the Latin.

LAURA LOVEL.

A SKETCH—FOR LADIES ONLY.

BY MISS LESLIE.

The world is still deceived with ornament.—Shakspeare.

Laura Lovel was the eldest surviving daughter of a clergyman settled in a retired and beautiful village at the western extremity of the state of Massachusetts. Between Laura and her two youngest sisters, three other children had died. Being so much their senior, it was in her power to assist her father materially in the instruction of Ella and Rosa; as after his family had become small, Mr. Lovel thought it best that the two little girls should receive all their education at home, and never were children that conferred more credit on their teachers. Mrs. Lovel was a plain, good woman, of excellent practical sense, a notable seamstress, and a first rate housewife. Few families were more perfectly happy, notwithstanding that the limited income of Mr. Lovel (though sufficient for comfort) left them little or nothing for superfluities.

They had a very neat house standing in the centre of a flourishing garden, in which, utility had been the first consideration, though blended as far as possible with beauty. The stone fence looked like a hedge of nasturitans. The pillars supporting the rustic piazza that surrounded the house, were the rough trunks of small trees with a sufficient portion of the chief branches remaining, to afford resting places for the luxuriant masses of scarlet beans that ran over them; furnishing, when the blossoms were off, and the green pods full grown, an excellent vegetable-dish for the table. The house was shaded with fruit-trees exclusively, the garden shrubs were all raspberry, currant, and gooseberry, and the flowers were chiefly those that had medicinal properties, or could be turned to culinary purposes—with the exception of some that were cultivated purposely for the bees. A meadow which pastured two cows and a horse, completed the little domain.

About the time that Laura Lovel had finished her seventeenth year, there came to the village of Rosebrook an old friend of her father's whom he had long since lost sight of. They had received their early education at the same school, they had met again at college, and had some years after performed together a voyage to India; Mr. Brantley as supercargo, Mr. Lovel as a missionary. Mr. Brantley had been very successful in business, and was now a merchant of wealth and respectability, with a handsome establishment in Boston. Mr. Lovel had settled down as pastor of the principal church in his native village.

The object of Mr. Brantley's present visit to Rosebrook, was to enquire personally into the state of some property he still retained there. Mr. Lovel would not allow his old friend to remain at the tavern, but insisted that his house should be his abiding place; and they had much pleasure in comparing their reminiscences of former times. As their chief conversation was on topics common to both, Mr. Lovel did not perceive that, except upon mercantile subjects, Mr. Brantley had acquired few new ideas since they had last met, and that his reading was confined exclusively to the newspaper. But he saw that in quiet good-nature, and easiness of disposition, his old friend was still the same as in early life.

Mr. Brantley was so pleased with every member of the Lovel family, and liked his visit so much, that he was induced to prolong it two days beyond his first intention; and he expressed an earnest desire to take Laura home with him, to pass a few weeks with his wife and daughter. This proposal, however, was declined, with sincere acknowledgements for its kindness; Mr. Lovel's delicacy making him unwilling to send his daughter as a guest to a lady who as yet was ignorant of her existence, and Laura sharing in her father's scruples.

Mr. Brantley took his leave: and three months afterwards, he paid a second visit to Rosebrook, for the purpose of selling his property in that neighborhood. He brought with him a short but very polite letter from his wife to Mr. and Mrs. Lovel, renewing the invitation for Laura, and pressing it in a manner that could scarcely be withstood. Mr. Lovel began to waver; Mrs. Lovel thought it was time that Laura should see a little of the world, and Laura's speaking looks told how much pleasure she anticipated from the excursion. The two little girls, though their eyes filled at the idea of being separated from their beloved sister, most magnanimously joined in entreating permission for her to go, as they saw that she wished it. Finally, Mr. Lovel consented; and Laura seemed to tread on air while making her preparations for the journey.

That evening, at the hour of family worship, her father laid his hand on Laura's head, and uttered a fervent prayer for the preservation of her health and happiness during her absence from the paternal roof. Mrs. Lovel and all her daughters were deeply affected, and Mr. Brantley looked very much inclined to participate in their emotion.

Early next morning, Mr. Brantley's chaise was at the door, and Laura took leave of the family with almost as many tears and kisses as if she had been going to cross the Atlantic. Little Ella, who was about eight years old, presented her, at parting, with a very ingenious needle-book of her own making, and Rosa, who was just seven, gave her a keepsake, an equally clever pincushion. She promised to bring them new books and other little presents from Boston, a place in which they supposed every thing, that the world produced, could be obtained without difficulty.

Finally, the last farewell was uttered, the last kiss was given, and Laura Lovel took her seat in the chaise beside Mr. Brantley, who drove off at a rapid pace; and in a few moments, a turn in the road hid from her view the house of her father, and the affectionate group that still lingered at its gate to catch the latest glimpse of the vehicle that was bearing away from them the daughter and the sister.

As they proceeded on their journey, Laura's spirits gradually revived, and she soon became interested or delighted with every thing she beheld; for she had a quick perception, with a mind of much intelligence and depth of observation.

The second day of their journey had nearly closed before the spires of the Boston churches, and the majestic dome of the State House, met the intense gaze of our heroine. Thousands of lights soon twinkled over the city of the three hills, and the long vistas of lamps that illuminated the bridges, seemed to the unpractised eyes of Laura Lovel to realize the glories of the Arabian Nights. "Oh!" she involuntarily exclaimed, "if my dear little sister could only be with me now."

As they entered by the western avenue, and as Mr. Brantley's residence was situated in the eastern part of the city, Laura had an opportunity of seeing as she passed, a vast number of lofty, spacious, and noble-looking dwelling-houses, in the erection of which the patrician families of Boston have, perhaps, surpassed all the other aristocracies of the union; for sternly republican as are our laws and institutions, it cannot be denied that in private life every section of our commonwealth has its aristocracy.

At length they stopped at Mr. Brantley's door, and Laura had a very polite reception from the lady of the mansion, an indolent, good natured, insipid woman, the chief business of whose life was dress and company. Mr. Brantley had purchased a large and handsome house in the western part of the town, to which the family were to remove in the course of the autumn, and it was Mrs. Brantley's intention when they were settled in their new and elegant establishment to get into a higher circle, and to have weekly soirees. To make her parties the more attractive, she was desirous of engaging some very pretty young lady (a stranger with a new face) to pass the winter with her. She had but one child, a pert, forward girl, about fourteen, thin, pale, and seeming "as if she suffered a great deal in order to look pretty." She sat, stood, and moved, as if in constant pain from the tightness of her corsets, the smallness of her sleeve-holes, and the narrowness of her shoes. Her hair, having been kept long during the whole period of her childhood, was exhausted with incessant tying, brushing, and curling, and she was already obliged to make artificial additions to it. It was at this time a mountain of bows, plaits and puffs, and her costume was in every respect that of a woman of twenty. She was extremely anxious to "come out," as it is called, but her father insisted on her staying in, till she had finished her education; and her mother had been told that it was very impolite to allow young ladies to "appear in society" at too early an age, as they were always supposed to be older than they really were, and therefore, would be the sooner considered passed.

After tea, Mrs. Brantley reclined herself idly in one of the rocking-chairs, Mr. Brantley retired to the back parlour to read undisturbed the evening papers, and Augusta took up some bead-work, while Laura looked over the souvenirs with which the centre-table was strewed.

"How happy you must be, Miss Brantly," said Laura, "to have in your power to read so many new books."

"As to reading," replied Augusta, "I never have any time to spare for that purpose, what with my music, and my dancing, and my lessons in French conversation, and my worsted-work, and my bead-work; then I have every day to go out shopping, for I always will choose every thing for myself. Mamma has not the least idea of my taste; at least, she never remembers it. And then there is always some business with the mantua-makers and milliners. And I have so many morning visits to pay with mamma—and in the afternoon I am generally so tired that I can do nothing but put on a wrapper, and throw myself on the bed, and sleep till it is time to dress for evening."

"Oh!" thought Laura Lovel, "how differently do we pass our time at Rosebrook! Is not this a beautiful engraving?" she continued, holding one of the open souvenirs towards Augusta.

"Yes—pretty enough," replied Augusta, scarcely moving her head to look at it—"mamma, do not you think I had better have my green pelerine cut in scollops rather than in points?"

"I think," replied Mrs. Brantley, "that scollops are the prettiest."

"Really, mamma," said Augusta, petulantly, "it is very peculiar in you to say so, when you ought to know that scollops have had their day, and that points have come round again."

"Very well then, my love," replied Mrs. Brantley indolently, "consult your own taste."

"That I always do," said Augusta, half aside to Laura, who addressing herself to Mrs. Brantley, made some inquiry about the last new novel.

"I cannot say that I have read it," answered Mrs. Brantley, "at least, I don't know that I have. Augusta, my love, do you recollect if you have heard me say any thing about the last new book—the—a—the—what is it you call it, Miss Lovel?"

"La! mamma," said Augusta, "I should as soon expect to write a book as to read one."

There was a pause for a minute or two. Augusta then leaning back towards her mother, exclaimed—"Upon second thought, I think I will have the green pelerine scolloped, and the blue one pointed. But the points shall be squared at the ends—on that I am determined."

Laura now took up a volume of the juvenile annual entitled the Pearl, and said to Augusta—"You have, most probably, a complete set of the Pearl."

"After all, mamma," pursued Augusta, "butterfly bows are much prettier than shell bows. What were you saying just now, Miss Lovel, about my having a set of pearls?—you may well ask,"—looking spitefully towards the back parlor, in which her father was sitting. Papa holds out that he will not give me a set till I am eighteen—and as to gold chains, and corals and cornelians, I am sick of them, and I wont wear them at all—so you see me without any ornaments whatever, which you must think very peculiar."

Laura had tact enough to perceive that any further attempt at conversation on books, would be unavailing; and she made some inquiry about the annual exhibition of pictures at the Athenæum.

"I believe it is a very good one," replied

Mrs. Brantley. "We stopped there one day on our way to dine with some friends out of town. But as the carriage was waiting, and the horses were impatient, we only staid a few minutes, just long enough to walk round."

"Oh! yes, mamma," cried Augusta, "and don't you recollect we saw Miss Darford there in a new dress of lavender colored grenadine, though grenadines have been over these hundred years. And there was pretty Mrs. Lenham, as the gentlemen call her, in a puce-colored italianet, though italianets have been out for ages. And don't you remember Miss Grover's canary-colored reps bonnet, that looked as if it had been made in the ark. The idea of any one wearing reps!—a thing that has not been seen since the flood! Only think of reps!"

Laura Lovel wondered what reps could possibly be. "Now I talk of bonnets," pursued Augusta; "pray, mamma, did you tell Miss Pipincord that I would have my Tuscan leghorn trimmed with the lilac and green riband, instead of the blue and yellow?"

"Indeed," replied Mrs. Brantley, "I found your cousin Mary so extremely ill this afternoon when I went to see her, and my sister so very uneasy on her account, that I absolutely forgot to call at the milliner's, as I had promised you."

"Was there ever any thing so vexatious!" exclaimed Augusta, throwing down her beadwork. "Really, mamma, there is no trusting you at all. You never remember to do any thing you are desired." And flying to the bell she rang it with violence.

"I could think of nothing but poor Mary's danger," said Mrs. Brantley, "and the twenty-five leeches that I saw on her forehead."

"Dreadful!" ejaculated Augusta. "But you might have supposed that the leeches would do her good, as of course they will. Here, William," addressing the servant man that had just entered; "run as if you were running for your life to Miss Pipincord, the milliner, and tell her upon no account, whatever, to trim Miss Brantley's Tuscan Leghorn with the blue and yellow riband that was decided on yesterday. Tell her I have changed my mind, and resolved upon the lilac and green. Fly as if you had not another moment to live, or Miss Pipincord will have already trimmed the bonnet with the blue and yellow."

"And then," said Mrs. Brantley, "go to Mrs. Ashmore's, and inquire how Miss Mary is this evening."

"Why, mamma," exclaimed Augusta, "aunt Ashmore lives so far from Miss Pipincord's that it will be ten or eleven o'clock before William gets back, and I shall be all that time on thorns to know if she has already disfigured my bonnet with the vile blue and yellow."

"Yesterday," said Mrs. Brantley, "you admired that very riband extremely."

"So I did," replied Augusta, "but I have been thinking about it since, and as I tell you, I have changed my mind. And now that I have set my heart upon the lilac and green, I absolutely detest the blue and yellow."

"But I am really very anxious to know how Mary is to-night," said Mrs. Brantley.

"Oh!" replied Augusta, "I dare say the leeches have relieved her. And if they have not, no doubt Dr. Warren will order twenty-five more—or something else that will answer the purpose. She is in very good hands—I am certain that in the morning we shall hear that she is considerably better. At all events I will not wear the hateful blue and yellow riband—William what are you standing for?"

The man turned to leave the room, but Mrs. Brantley called him back. "William," said she, "tell one of the women to go to Mrs. Ashmore's and inquire how Miss Mary is."

"Eliza and Matilda are both out," said William, "and Louisa is crying with the tooth ache, and steaming her face over hot yerbs—I guess she won't be willing to walk so far in the night air, just out of the steam."

"William!" exclaimed Augusta, stamping with her foot, "don't stand here talking, but go at once; there's not a moment to lose. Tell Miss Pipincord if she has put on that horrid riband, she must take it off again, and charge it in the bill, if she pretends she can't afford to lose it, as I dare say she will—and tell her to be sure and send the bonnet home early in the morning—I am dying to see it."

To all this Laura Lovel had sat listening in amazement, and could scarcely conceive the possibility of the mind of so young a girl being totally absorbed in things that concerned nothing but external appearance. She had yet to learn that a passion for dress, when thoroughly excited in the female bosom, and carried to excess, has a direct tendency to cloud the understanding, injure the temper, and harden the heart.

Till the return of William, Augusta seemed indeed to be on thorns. At last he came, and brought with him the bonnet, trimmed with blue and yellow. Augusta snatched it out of the bandbox, and stood speechless with passion, and William thus delivered his message from the milliner—

"Miss Pipincord sends word that she had riband'd the bonnet afore I come for it—she says she has used up all her laylock green for another lady's bonnet, as she chose it this afternoon; and she guesses you won't stand no chance of finding no more of it, if you sarch Boston through; and you chose the yellow and blue yourself, and she han't got no more ribands as you'd be likely to like. Them's her very words."

"How I do hate milliners!" exclaimed Augusta, and ringing for the maid that always assisted her in undressing, she flounced out of the room and went to bed.

"Miss Lovel," said Mrs. Brantley, smiling, "you must excuse dear Augusta. She is extremely sensitive about every thing, and that is the reason she is apt to give way to these little fits of irritation."

Laura retired to her room, grieving to think how unamiable a young girl might be made, by the indulgence of an inordinate passion for dress.

Augusta's cousin Mary did not die.

The following day was to have been devoted to shopping, and to making some additions to the simple wardrobe of Laura Lovel, for which purpose her father had given her as much money as he could possibly spare. But it rained till late in the afternoon, and Mrs. Brantley's coach was out of order, and the Brantley's (like many other families that keep carriages of their own) could not conceive the possibility of hiring a similar vehicle upon any exigency whatever.

It is true that the present case was in reality no exigency at all; but Mrs. Brantley and her daughter seemed to consider it as such, from the one watching the clouds all day as she sat at the window, in her rocking-chair, and the other wandering about like a troubled spirit, fretting all the time, and complaining of the weather. Laura got through the hours very well, between reading Souvenirs, (almost the only book in the house,) and writing a letter to inform her family of her safe arrival, and to describe her journey. Towards evening, a coach was heard to stop at the door, and there was a violent ringing, followed by a loud sharp voice in the entry, inquiring for Mrs. Brantley, who started from her rocking-chair as Augusta exclaimed, "Miss Frampton! —I know 'tis Miss Frampton!" The young lady rushed into the hall, while her mother advanced a few steps, and Mr. Brantley threw down his paper, and hastened to the front-parlor with a look that expressed any thing but satisfaction.

There was no time for comment or preparation. The sound was heard of baggage depositing, and in a few moments Augusta returned to the parlor, hanging lovingly on the arm of a lady in a very handsome travelling dress, who flew to Mrs. Brantley and kissed her familiarly, and then shook hands with her husband, and was introduced by him to our heroine.

Miss Frampton was a fashionable looking woman of no particular age. Her figure was good, but her features were the contrary, and the expression of her eye was strikingly bad. She had no relations, but she talked incessantly of her friends—for so she called every person whom she ever knew by sight, provided always they were presentable people. She had some property, on the income of which she lived, exercising close economy on every thing but dress. Sometimes she boarded out, and sometimes she billeted herself on one or the other of these said friends, having no scruples of delicacy to deter her from eagerly availing herself of the slightest hint that might be construed into the semblance of an invitation. In short, she was assiduous in trying to get acquainted with every body from whom any thing was to be gained, flattering them to their faces, though she abused them behind their backs. Still, strange to tell, she had succeeded in forcing way into the outworks of what is called society. She dress well, professed to know every body, and to go every where, was au fait to all the gossip of the day, and could always furnish ample food for the too prevailing appetite for scandal. Therefore, though every one disliked Miss Frampton, so every one tolerated her; and though a notorious calumniator, she excited so much fear, that it was generally thought safer to keep up some slight intercourse with her, than to affront her by throwing her off entirely.

Philadelphia was her usual place of residence; but she had met the Brantley family at the Saratoga Springs, had managed to accompany them to New York on their way home, had boarded at Bunker's during the week they stayed at that house, had assisted them in their shopping expeditions, and professed a violent regard for Augusta, who professed the same for her. Mrs. Brantley's slight intimation "that she should be glad to see her if ever she came to Boston," Miss Frampton had now taken advantage of, on pretext of benefitting by change of air. Conscious of her faded looks, but still hoping to pass for a young woman, she pretended always to be in precarious health, though of this there was seldom any proof positive.

On being introduced to Laura Lovel, as to a young lady on a visit to the family, Miss Frampton, who at once considered her an interloper, surveyed our heroine from head to foot, with something like a sneer, and exchanged significant glances with Augusta.

As soon as Miss Frampton had taken her seat, "My dear Mrs. Brantley," said she, "how delighted I am to see you! And my sweet Augusta too! Why she has grown a perfect sylph!"

After hearing this, Augusta could not keep her seat five minutes together, but was gliding and flitting about all the remainder of the evening, and hovering round Miss Frampton's chair.

Miss Frampton continued, "Yes, my dear Mrs. Brantley, my health has, as usual, been extremely delicate. My friends have been seriously alarmed for me, and all my physicians have been quite miserable on my account. Dr. Dengue has been seen driving through the streets like a madman, in his haste to get to me. Poor man—you must have heard the report of his suffering Mrs. Smith's baby to die with the croup, from neglecting to visit it, which, if true, was certainly in very bad taste. However, Dr. Dengue is one of my oldest friends, and a most charming man.

"But, as I was saying, my health still continued delicate, and excitement was unanimously recommended by the medical gentlemen—excitement and ice-cream. And as soon as this was known in society, it is incredible how many parties were made for me, and how many excursions were made on my account. I had carriages at my door day and night. My friends were absolutely dragging me from each other's arms. Finally, they all suggested entire change of air, and total change of scene. So I consented to tear myself awhile from my beloved Philadelphia, and pay you my promised visit in Boston."

"We are much obliged to you," said Mrs. Brantley. "And really," pursued Miss Frampton, "I had so many engagements on my hands, that I had fixed five different days for starting, and disappointed five different escorts. My receiving-room was like a levee every morning at visiting hours, with young gentlemen of fashion, coming to press their services, as is always the case when it is reported in Philadelphia that Miss Frampton has a disposition to travel. A whole procession of my friends accompanied me to the steamboat, and I believe I had more than a dozen elegant smelling-bot-ties presented to me—as it is universally known how much I always suffer during a journey, being deadly sick on the water, and in a constant state of nervous agitation while riding."

"And who did you come with at last?" asked Mrs. Brantley.

"Oh! with my friends, the Twamberleys, of your city," replied Miss Frampton. "The whole family had been at Washington, and as soon as I heard they were in Philadelphia on their return home, I sent to inquire—that is, or rather, I mean, they sent to inquire as soon as they came to town, and heard that I intended visiting Boston—they sent to inquire if I would make them happy by joining their party."

"Well," observed Mr. Brantley, "I cannot imagine how you got along with the Twamberleys. Mr. Twamberley, besides being a clumsy, fat man, upwards of seventy years old, and lame with the gout, and nearly quite deaf, and having cataracts coming on both eyes, is always obliged to travel with his silly young wife, and the eight children of her first husband, and I should think he had enough to do in taking care of himself and them. I wonder you did not prefer availing yourself of the politeness of some of the single gentlemen you mentioned."

"Oh!" replied Miss Frampton, "any of them would be too happy as they politely expressed it, to have had the pleasure of waiting on me to Boston. Indeed, I knew not how to make a selection, being unwilling to offend any of them by a preference. And then again, it is always in better taste for young ladies to travel, and indeed to go every where, under the wing of a married woman. I dote upon chaperons; and by coming with this family, I had Mrs. Twamberley to matronize me. I have just parted with them all at their own door, where they were set down."

Mr. Brantley smiled when he thought of Mrs. Twamberley (who had been married to her first husband at fifteen, and was still a blooming girlish looking woman) matronizing the faded Miss Frampton, so evidently by many years her senior.

Laura Lovel, though new to the world, had sufficient good sense and penetration to perceive almost immediately, that Miss Frampton was a woman of much vanity and pretension, and that she was in the habit of talking with great exaggeration; and in a short time she more than suspected that many of her assertions were arrant falsehoods—a fact that was well known to all those numerous persons that Miss Frampton called her friends.

Tea was now brought in, and Miss Frampton took occasion to relate in what manner she had discovered that the famous silver urn of that charming family, the Sam Kettlethorpe, was in reality, only plated—that her particular favourites, the Joe Sowerbys, showed such bad taste at their terrapin supper, as to have green hock-glasses for the champaign; and that those delightful people, the Bob Skutterbys, the first time they attempted the new style of heaters at a venison dinner, had them filled with spirits of turpentine, instead of spirits of wine.

Next morning, Miss Frampton did not appear at the breakfast table, but had her first meal carried into her room, and Augusta breakfasted with her.

Between them, Laura Lovel was discussed at full length, and their conclusion was, that she had not a single good feature—that her complexion was nothing, her figure nothing, and her dress worse than nothing.

"I don't suppose," said Augusta, "that her father has given her much money to bring to town with her."

"To be sure he has not," replied Miss Frampton, "if he is only a poor country clergyman. I think it was in very bad taste for him to let her come at all."

"Well," said Augusta, "we must take her a shopping this morning, and try to get her fitted out, so as to make a decent appearance at Nahant, as we are going thither in a few days."

"Then I have come just in the right time," said Miss Frampton. "Nahant is the very place I wish to visit—my sweet friend Mrs. Dick Pewsey has given me such an account of it. She passed a week at Nahant when she came to Boston last summer."

"Oh! I remember her," cried Augusta. "She was a mountain of blonde lace."

"Yes," observed Miss Frampton, "and not an inch of that blonde has yet been paid for, or ever will be. I know it from good authority."

They went a shopping, and Augusta took them to the most fashionable store in Washington street, where Laura was surprised and confused at the sight of the various beautiful articles shown to them. Even their names perplexed her. She knew very well what gros de Naples was, (or gro de nap, as it is commonly called,) but she was at a loss to distinguish gros de Berlin, gros de Suisse, gros de Zane, and all the other gros. Augusta, however, was au fait to the whole, and talked and flitted, and glided, producing, as she supposed, great effect among the young salesmen at the counters. Miss Frampton examined every thing with scrutinizing eye, undervalued them all, and took frequent occasions to say that they were far inferior to similar articles in Philadelphia.

At length, a very light-coloured figured silk, with a very new name, was selected for Laura. The price appeared to her extremely high, and when she heard the number of yards that were considered necessary, she faintly asked "if less would not do." Miss Frampton sneered, and Augusta laughed out, saying, "Don't you see that the silk is very narrow, and that it has a wrong side and a right side, and that the flowers have a top and a bottom. So as it cannot be turned every way, a large quantity will be required."

"Had I not better choose a plain silk," said Laura; "one that is wider, and that can be turned any way."

"Oh! plain silks are so common," replied Augusta; "though for a change they are well enough. I have four. But this will be the best for Nahant. We always dress to go there, and, of course, we expect all our party to do the same."

"But really, this silk is so expensive," whispered Laura.

"Let the dress be cut off," said Miss Frampton, in a peremptory tone. "I am tired of such hesitation. 'Tis in very bad taste."

The dress was cut off, and Laura on calculating the amount, found that it would make a sad inroad on her little modicum. Being told that she must have also a new printed muslin, one was chosen for her with a beautiful sky blue for the predominant colour, and Laura found that this also was a very costly dress. She was next informed that she could not be presentable without a French pelerine of embroidered muslin. Pelerines in great variety were then produced, and Laura found, to her dismay, that the prices were from ten to twenty-five dollars. She declined taking one, and Miss Frampton and Augusta exchanged looks which said, as plainly as looks can speak, "I suppose that she has not money enough."

Laura coloured—hesitated—at last false pride got the better of her scruples. The salesman commended the beauty of the pelerines; particularly of one tied up at the front, and ornamented on the shoulders with bows of blue ribbon—and our heroine yielded, and took it at fifteen dollars; those at ten dollars, being voted by Miss Frampton "absolutely mean."

After this Laura was induced to supply herself with silk stockings and white silk gloves, "of a new style," and was also persuaded to give five dollars for a small scarf, also a new style. And when all these purchases were made, she found that three quarters of a dollar were all that remained in her purse. Augusta also bought several new articles; but Miss Frampton got nothing. However, she insisted afterwards on going into every fancy store in Washington street—not to buy, but "to see what they had," and gave much trouble in causing the salesmen needlessly to display their goods to her, and some offence by making invidious comparisons between their merchandize and that of Philadelphia.

By the time all this shopping was over, the clock of the Old South had struck two, and it was found expedient to postpone till next day, the intended visit to the milliner and mantua-maker, Miss Frampton and Augusta declaring that of afternoons they were never fit for any thing but to throw themselves on the bed and go to sleep. Laura Lovel, fatigued both in body and mind, and feeling much dissatisfied with herself, was glad of a respite from the pursuit of finery though it was only till next morning; and she was almost "at her wit's end" to know in what way she was to pay for having her dress made—much less for the fashionable bonnet which her companions insisted on her getting—Augusta giving more than hints, that if she went with the family to Nahant, they should expect her "to look like other people;" and Miss Frampton signifying in loud whispers, that "those who were unable to make an appearance, had always better stay at home."

In the evening there were some visitors, none of whom were very entertaining or agreeable, though all the ladies were excessively dressed. Laura was reminded of the homely proverb, "Birds of a feather flock together." The chief entertainment was listening to Augusta's music, who considered herself to sing and play with wonderful execution. But to the unpractised ears and eyes of our heroine, it seemed nothing more than an alternate succession of high shrieks and low murmurs, accompanied by various contortions of the face, sundry bowings and wavings of the body, great elevation of the shoulders, squaring of the elbows, and incessant quivering of the fingers, and throwing back of the hand. Miss Frampton talked all the while in a low voice to a lady that sat next to her, and turned round at intervals to assure Augusta that her singing was divine, and that she reminded her of Madame Fearon.

Augusta had just finished a very great song, and was turning over her music books in search of another, when a slight ring was heard at the street door, and as William opened it, a weak hesitating voice inquired for Miss Laura Lovel, adding, "I hope to be excused, I know I ought not to make so free; but I heard this afternoon, that Miss Laura, eldest daughter of the reverend Edward Lovel, of Rosebrook, Massachusetts, is now in this house, and I have walked five miles into town for the purpose of seeing the young lady. However, I ought not to consider the walk as any thing, and it was improper in me to speak of it at all. The young lady is an old friend of mine, if I may be so bold as to say so."

"There's company in the parlour," said William, in a tone not over respectful—"very particular company."

"I won't meddle with any of the company," proceeded the voice. "I am very careful never to make myself disagreeable. But I just wish, (if I am not taking too great a liberty,) to see Miss Laura Lovel."

"Shall I call her out?" said William.

"I would not for the world give her the trouble," replied the stranger. "It is certainly my place to go to the young lady, and not her's to come to me. I always try to be polite. I hope you don't find me unpleasant."

"Miss Lovel," said Miss Frampton sneeringly, "this must certainly be your beau."

The parlor door being open, the whole of the preceding dialogue had been heard by the company, and Miss Frampton from the place in which she sat, had a view of the stranger, as he stood in the entry.

William then, with an unsuppressed grin, ushered into the room a little thin, weak-looking man, who had a whitish face, and dead light hair, cut straight across his forehead.

His dress was scrupulously neat, but very unfashionable. He wore a full suit of yellowish brown cloth, with all the gloss on. His legs were covered with smooth cotton-stockings, and he had little silver knee-buckles. His shirt collar and his cravat were stiff and blue, the latter being tied in front with very long ends, and in his hand he held a blue bandanna handkerchief, carefully folded up. His whole deportment was stiff and awkward.

On entering the room, he bowed very low with a peculiar jerk of the head, and his whole appearance and manner denoted the very acme of humility. The company regarded him with amazement, and Miss Frampton began to whisper, keeping her eye fixed on him all the time.

Laura started from her chair, hastened to him, and holding out her hand, addressed him by the name of Pyam Dodge. He took the proffered hand, after a moment of hesitation, and said, "I hope I am properly sensible of your kindness, Miss Laura Lovel, in allowing me to take your hand, now that you are grown. Many a time have I led you to my school, when I boarded at your respected father's, who, I trust, is well. But now, I would not, on any account, be too familiar."

(Laura pointed to a chair.)

"But which is the mistress of the house? I know perfectly well that it is proper for me to pay my respects to her before I take the liberty of sitting down under her roof. If I may presume to say that I understand any thing thoroughly, it is certainly good manners. In my school, manners were always perfectly well taught—my own manners, I learnt chiefly from my revered uncle, Deacon Ironskirt, formerly of Wicketiquock, but now of Popsquish."

Laura then introduced Pyam Dodge to the lady of the house, who received him civilly, and then to Mr. Brantley, who, perceiving that the poor school-master was what is called a character, found his curiosity excited to know what he would do next.

This ceremony over, Pyam Dodge bowed round to each of the company separately. Laura saw at once that he was an object of ridicule; and his entire want of tact, and his pitiable simplicity had never before struck her so forcibly. She was glad, when, at last, he took a seat beside her, and in a low voice she endeavored to engage him in a conversation that should prevent him from talking to any one else. She found that he was master of a district school about five miles from Boston, and that he was perfectly contented—for more than that he never had aspired to be.

But vain were the efforts of our heroine to keep Pyam Dodge to herself, and to prevent him from manifesting his peculiarities to the rest of the company. Perceiving that Augusta had turned round on her music-stool to listen, and to look at him, the school-master rose on his feet, and bowing first to the young lady, and then to her mother, he said, "Madam, I am afraid that I have disturbed the child in striking on her pyano-forty. I would on no account cause any interruption—for that might be making myself disagreeable. On the contrary, it would give me satisfaction for the child to continue her exercise, and I shall esteem it a privilege to hear how she plays her music. I have taught singing myself."

Augusta then, by desire of her mother, commenced a new bravura, which ran somehow thus:—

Oh! drop a tear, a tender tear—oh! drop a tear, a tender, tear. Oh! drop, oh! drop, oh! dro-o-op a te-en-der te-e-ear—a tender tear—a a tear for me a tear for me; a tender tear for me.

When I, when I, when I-I-I am wand'ring, wand'ring, wand'ring, wand'ring, far, far from thee—fa-a-ar, far, far, far from thee—from thee.

For sadness in—for sadness in, my heart, my heart shall reign—shall re-e-e-ign—my hee-e-art—for sa-a-adness in my heart shall reign—shall reign.

Until—until—unti-i-il we fondly meet again, we fondly meet, we-fo-o-ondly me-e-et—until we fondly, fondly, fondly meet—meet, meet, meet, again—we meet again.

This song (in which the silliness of the words was increased ten-fold by the incessant repetition of them), after various alternations of high and low, fast and slow, finished in thunder. Augusta striking the concluding notes with an energy that made the piano tremble.

When the Bravura was over, Pyam Dodge, who had stood listening in amazement, looked at Mrs. Brantley, and said "Madam, your child must doubtless sing that song very well when she gets the right tune."

"The right tune," interrupted Augusta, indignantly.

"The right tune!" echoed Mrs. Brantley and Miss Frampton.

"Yes," said Pyam Dodge, solemnly—"and the right words also. For what I have just heard, is, of course, neither the regular tune nor the proper words, as they seem to go every how—therefore I conclude that all this wandering and confusion, was caused by the presence of these strangers; myself in all probability being the greatest stranger, if I may be so bold as to say so. This is doubtless the reason why she mixed up the words at random, and repeated the same so often, and why her actions at the pyano-forty are so strange. I trust that at other times she plays and sings so as to give the proper sense."

Augusta violently shut down the lid of her piano, and gave her father a look that implied, "Won't you turn him out of the house." But Mr. Brantley was much diverted, and laughed audibly.

Pyam Dodge surveyed himself from head to foot, ascertained that his knee-buckles were fast, and his cravat not untied, and finding all his clothes in complete order, he said, looking round to the company, "I hope there is nothing ridiculous about me—it is my endeavor to appear as well as possible; but the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong."

"Upon my word," said Miss Frampton, leaning across the centre-table to Mrs. Brantley, "your protegee seems to have a strange taste in her acquaintances. However, that is always the case with people who have never been in society, as my friend Mrs. Tom Spradlington justly remarks."

A waiter with refreshments was now brought in, and handed round to the company. When it came to Pyam Dodge, he rose on his feet and thanked the man for handing it to him—then taking the smallest possible quantity of each of the different articles, he put all on the same plate, and unfolding his blue bandana, he spread it carefully and smoothly over his knees, and commenced eating with the smallest possible mouthfuls, praising every thing as he tasted it. The wine being offered to him, he respectfully declined, signifying that he belonged to the Temperance Society. But he afterwards took a glass of lemonade, on being assured that it was not punch, and again rising on his feet, he drank the health of each of the company separately, and not knowing their names, he designated them as the lady in the blue gown, the lady in the white gown, the gentleman in the black coat, &c.

This ceremony over, Pyam Dodge took an old-fashioned silver watch, of a shape almost globular, and looking at the hour, he made many apologies for going away so soon, having five miles to walk, and requested that his departure might not break up the company. He then bowed all round again—told Laura he would thank her for her hand, which on her giving him, he shook high, and awkwardly, walked backwards to the door and ran against it, trusted that he had made himself agreeable, and at last departed.

The front door had scarcely closed after him when a general laugh took place, which even Laura could scarcely refrain from joining in.

"Upon my word, Miss Lovel," said Augusta, "this friend of yours, is the most peculiar person I ever beheld."

"I never saw a man in worse taste," remarked Miss Frampton.

In a moment another ring was heard at the door, and on its being opened, Pyam Dodge again made his appearance in the parlour, to beg pardon of the lady of the house, for not having returned thanks for his entertainment, and also to the young lady for her music, which, he said, "was, doubtless, well meant." He then repeated his bows and withdrew.

"What an intolerable fool!" exclaimed Augusta.

"Indeed," replied Laura Lovel, "he is, after all, not deficient in understanding, though his total want of tact, and his entire ignorance of the customs of the world, give an absurdity to his manner, which I confess it is difficult to witness without a smile. I have heard my father say that Pyam Dodge is one of the best classical scholars he ever knew, and he is certainly a man of good feelings, and of irreproachable character."

"I never knew a bore that was not," remarked Miss Frampton.

There was again a ring at the door, and again Pyam Dodge was ushered in. His business now, was to inform Miss Laura Lovel, that if she did not see him every day during her residence in Boston, she must not impute the unfrequency of his visits to any disrespect on his part, but rather to his close confinement to the duties of his school—besides which, his leisure time was much occupied in studying Arabic; but he hoped to make his arrangements so as to be able to come to town, and spend at least three evenings with her every week.

At this intimation, there were such evident tokens of disapproval, on the part of the Brantley family and Miss Frampton, and of embarrassment on that of Laura, that poor Pyam Dodge, obtuse as he was to the things of this world, saw that the announcement of his visits was not perfectly well received. He looked amazed at this discovery, but bowed lower than ever, hoped he was not disgusting, and again retreated.

Once more was heard the faint ring that announced the schoolmaster. "Assuredly," observed a gentleman present, "this must be the original Return Strong."

This time, however, poor Pyam Dodge did not venture into the parlour, but was heard meekly to inquire of the servant, if he had not dropped his handkerchief in the hall. The handkerchief was picked up, and he finally departed, humbly hoping "that the gentleman attending the door, had not found him troublesome." The moment that he was gone, the gentleman who attended the door, was heard audibly to put up the dead-latch.

Next day, Augusta Brantley gave a standing order to the servants, that whenever Miss Lovel's school-master came, he was to be told that the whole family were out of town.

In the morning, Laura was conveyed by Augusta and Miss Frampton, to the mantua-maker's, and Miss Boxpleat demurred a long time about undertaking the two dresses, and longer still about finishing them that week, in consequence of the vast quantity of work she had now on hand. Finally she consented, assuring Laura Lovel that she only did so to oblige Miss Brantley.

Laura then asked what would be the charge for making the dresses. Miss Boxpleat reddened, and vouchsafed no reply. Miss Frampton laughed out, and Augusta twitched Laura's sleeve, who wondered what faux pas she had committed, till she learned in a whisper that it was an affront to the dress-maker to attempt a bargain with her before-hand, and our heroine, much disconcerted, passively allowed herself to be fitted for the dresses.

Laura had a very pretty bonnet of the finest and whitest split straw, modestly trimmed with broad white satin ribbon; but her companions told her that there was no existing without a dress hat, and she was accordingly carried to Miss Pipincord's. Here they found that all the handsomest articles of this description, were already engaged, but they made her bespeak one of a very expensive silk, trimmed with flowers and gauze ribbon, and when she objected to the front, as exposing her whole face to the summer-sun, she was told that of course she must have a blonde-veil. "We will stop at Whitaker's," said Augusta, "and see his assortment, and you can make the purchase at once." Laura knew that she could not, and steadily persisted in her refusal, saying that she must depend on her parasol for screening her face.

Several other superfluities were pressed upon our poor heroine, as they proceeded along Washington street, Augusta really thinking it indispensable to be fashionably and expensively drest, and Miss Frampton feeling a malignant pleasure in observing how much these importunities confused and distressed her.

Laura sat down to dinner with an aching head, and no appetite, and afterwards retired to her room, and endeavoured to allay her uneasiness with a book.

"So," said Miss Frampton to Mrs. Brantley, "this is the girl that dear Augusta tells me you think of inviting to pass the winter with you."

"Why, is she not very pretty?" replied Mrs. Brantley.

"Not in my eye," answered Miss Frampton, "wait but two years, till my sweet Augusta is old enough, and tall enough to come out, and you will have no occasion to invite beauties, for the purpose of drawing company to your house—for, of course, I cannot but understand the motive; and pray how can the father of this girl, enable her to make a proper appearance? When she has got through the two dresses that we had so much difficulty in persuading her to venture upon, is she to return to her black marcelline? You certainly do not intend to wrong your own child by going to the expense of dressing out this parson's daughter yourself. And after all, these green young girls do not draw company half so well as ladies a few years older—decided women of tone, who are familiar with the whole routine of society, and have the veritable air distingue. One of that description would do more for your soirees, next winter, than twenty of these village beauties."

Next day our heroine's new bonnet came home, accompanied by a bill of twelve dollars. She had supposed that the price would not exceed seven or eight. She had not the money, and her embarrassment was increased by Miss Frampton's examining the bill, and reminding her that there was a receipt to it. Laura's confusion was so palpable, that Mrs. Brantley felt some compassion for her, and said to the milliner's girl, "The young lady will call at Miss Pipincord's, and pay for her hat." And the girl departed, first asking to have the bill returned to her, as it was receipted.

When our heroine and her companions were out next morning, they passed the milliner's, and Laura instinctively turned away her head. "You can now call at Miss Pipincord's and pay her bill," said Miss Frampton. "It is here that she lives—don't you see her name on the door?"

"I have not the money about me," said Laura, in a faultering voice—"I have left my purse at home." This was the first attempt at a subterfuge, and conscience-struck, she could not say another word during the walk.

On the last day of the week, her dresses were sent home, with a bill of ten dollars and a half for making the two, including what are called the trimmings, all of which were charged at about four times their real cost. Laura was more confounded than ever. Neither Mrs. Brantley nor Augusta happened to be present, but Miss Frampton was, and understood it all. —"Can't you tell the girl you will call and settle Miss Boxpleat's bill," said she. "Don't look so confused," adding in a somewhat lower voice. "She will suspect you have no money to pay with—really your behaviour is in very bad taste."

Laura's lip quivered, and her cheek grew pale. Miss Frampton could scarcely help laughing, to see her so new in the world, and at last deigned to relieve her by telling Miss Boxpleat's girl that Miss Lovel would call and settle the bill.

The girl was scarcely out of the room, when poor Laura, unable to restrain herself another moment, hid her face against one of the cushions of the ottoman, and burst into tears. The flinty heart of Miss Frampton underwent a momentary softening. She looked awhile in silence at Laura, and then said to her, "Why, you seem to take this very much to heart."

"No wonder," replied Laura, sobbing,—"I have expended all my money; all that my father gave at departing from home. At least, I have only the merest trifle left: and how am I to pay either the milliner's bill or the mantua-maker's?"

Miss Frampton deliberated for a few moments, walked to the window, and stood there awhile—then approached the still weeping Laura, and said to her, "What would you say, if a friend was to come forward to relieve you from this embarrassment?"

"I have no friend," replied Laura in a half-choked voice—"at least none here. Oh! how I wish that I had never left home!"

Miss Frampton paused again, and finally offered Laura the loan of twenty-five dollars, till she could get money from her father. "I know not how to ask my father so soon for any more money. I am convinced he gave me all he could possibly spare. I have done very wrong in allowing myself to incur expenses which I am unable to meet. I can never forgive myself. Oh! how miserable I am!" And she again covered her face and cried bitterly.

Miss Frampton hesitated—but she had heard Mr. Brantley speak of Mr. Lovel as a man of the strictest integrity, and she was certain that he would strain every nerve, and redouble the economy of his family expenditure, rather than to allow his daughter to remain long under pecuniary obligations to a stranger. She felt that she ran no risk in taking from her pocket-book notes to the amount of twenty-five dollars, and putting them into the hands of Laura, who had thought at one time of applying to Mr. Brantley for the loan of a sufficient sum to help her out of her present difficulties, but was deterred by a feeling of invincible repugnance to taxing any further the kindness of her host, conceiving herself already under sufficient obligations to him as his guest, and partaker of his hospitality. However, had she known more of the world and had a greater insight into the varieties of the human character, she would have infinitely preferred throwing herself on the generosity of Mr. Brantley, to becoming the debtor of Miss Frampton. As it was, she gratefully accepted the proffered kindness of that lady, feeling it a respite. Drying her tears, she immediately equipped herself for walking, hastened both to the milliner and mantua-maker, and paying their bills she returned home with a lightened heart.

Laura Lovel already began to find her visit to the Brantley family less agreeable than she had anticipated. They had nothing in common with herself; their conversation was neither edifying nor entertaining. They had few books, except the annuals; and though she passed the Circulating Libraries with longing eyes, she did not consider that she was sufficiently in funds to avail herself of their contents. No opportunities were afforded her of seeing any of the lions of the city, and of those that casually fell in her way, she found her companions generally more ignorant than herself. They did not conceive that a stranger could be amused or interested with things that, having always been within their own reach, had failed to awaken in them the slightest curiosity. Mr. Brantley was infinitely the best of the family; but he was immersed in business all day, and in the newspapers all the evening. Mrs. Brantley was nothing, and Augusta's petulance and heartlessness, and Miss Frampton's impertinence, (which somewhat increased after she lent the money to Laura,) were equally annoying. The visiters of the family were nearly of the same stamp as themselves.

Laura, however, had looked forward with much anticipated pleasure to the long-talked of visit to the sea-shore, and in the mean time her chief enjoyment was derived from the afternoon rides that were occasionally taken in Mr. Brantley's carriage, and which gave our heroine an opportunity of seeing something of the beautiful environs of Boston.

Miss Frampton's fits of kindness were always very transient, and Laura's deep mortification at having been necessitated to accept a favour from such a woman, was rendered still more poignant by unavoidably overhearing (as she was dressing at a toilet-table that stood between two open windows,) the following dialogue; the speakers being two of Mrs. Brantley's servant girls that were ironing in the kitchen porch, and who in talking to each other of the young ladies, always dropped the title of Miss:

"Matilda," said one of them, "don't you hear Laura's bell! Didn't she tell you arter dinner, that she would ring for you arter a while, to come up stairs and hook the back of her dress?"

"Yes," replied Matilda—"I hear it as plain as you do, Eliza; but I guess I shan't go till it suits me. I'm quite beat out with running up stairs from morning till night to wait on that there Philadelphy women, as she takes such high airs. Who but she indeed! Any how, I'm not a going to hurry. I shall just act as if I did'nt hear no bell at all—for as to this here Laura, I guess she an't much. Augusta told me this morning, when she got me to fix her hair, that Miss Frampton told her that Laura axed and begged her amost on her bare knees, to lend her some money to pay for her frocks and bonnet."

"Why, how could she act so!" exclaimed Eliza.

"Because," resumed Matilda, "her people sent her here without a copper in her pocket. So I guess they're a pretty shabby set, after all."

"I was judging as much," said Eliza, "by her not taking no airs, and always acting so polite to every body."

"Well now," observed Matilda, "Mr. Scourbrass, the gentleman as lives with old Madam Montgomery, at the big house, in Bowdin Square, and helps to do her work, always stands out that very great people of the rale sort, act much better and an't so apt to take airs as them that are upstarts."

"Doctors differ," sagely remarked Eliza. "However, as you say, I don't believe this here Laura is much; and I'm thinking how she'll get along at Nahant. Miss Lathersoap, the lady as washes her clothes, told me, among other things, that Laura's pocket handkerchers are all quite plain—not a worked or laced one among them. Now our Augusta would scorn to carry a plain handkercher, and so would her mother."

"I've taken notice of Laura's handkerchers myself," said Matilda, "and I don't see why we young ladies as lives out, and does people's work to oblige them, should be expected to run at the beck and call of any strangers they may choose to take into the house; let alone when they're not no great things."

Laura retreated from the open window, that she might hear no more of a conversation so painful to her. She would at once have written to her father, told him all, and begged him, if possible, to send her money enough to repay Miss Frampton, but she had found by a letter received the day before, that he had gone on some business to the interior of Maine, and would not be home in less than a fortnight.

Next day was the one finally appointed for their removal to Nahant, and our heroine felt her spirits revive at the idea of beholding for the first time in her life, "the sea, the sea, the open sea." They went in Mr. Brantley's carriage, and Laura understood that she might ride in her black silk dress, and her straw bonnet.

They crossed at the Winnisimmet Ferry, rode through Chelsea, and soon arrived at the flourishing town of Lynn, where every man was making shoes, and every woman binding them. The last sunbeams were glowing in the west, when they came to the beautiful Long Beach, that connects the rocks of Lynn with those of Nahant, the sand being so firm and smooth, that the shadow of every object is reflected in it downwards. The tide was so high that they drove along the verge of the surf, the horses' feet splashing through the water, and trampling on the shells and sea-weed left by the retiring waves. Cattle, as they went home, were cooling themselves by wading breast high in the breakers; and the little sand-birds were sporting on the crests of the billows, sometimes flying low and dipping into the water the white edges of their wings, and sometimes seeming with their slender feet to walk on the surface of the foam. Beyond the everlasting breakers rolled the unbounded ocean, the haze of evening coming fast upon it, and the full moon rising broad and red through the misty veil of the eastern horizon.

Laura Lovel felt as if she could have viewed this scene forever, and, at times, she could not refrain from audibly expressing her delight. The other ladies were deeply engaged in listening to Miss Frampton's account of a ball and supper given by her intimate friend, that lovely woman, Mrs. Ben Derrydown, the evening before Mr. Ben Derrydown's last failure, and which ball and supper exceeded in splendour any thing she had ever witnessed, except the wedding party of her sweet love, Mrs. Nick Rearsby, whose furniture was seized by the sheriff a few months after, and the birth-night concert of the coming out of her darling little pet, Kate Bolderhurst, who ran away next morning with her music master.

Our party now arrived at the Nahant Hotel, which as full of visiters, with some of whom the Brantleys were acquainted. After tea, when the company adjourned to the lower drawing-rooms, the extraordinary beauty of Laura Lovel drew the majority of the gentlemen to that side of the apartment on which the Brantley family were seated. Many introductions took place, and Mrs. Brantley felt in paradise at seeing that her party had attracted the greatest number of beaux. Miss Frampton generally made a point of answering every thing that was addressed to Laura, and Augusta glided and flitted, and chattered much impertinent nonsense to the gentlemen on the outskirts of the group, that were waiting for an opportunity of saying something to Miss Lovel.

Our heroine was much confused at finding herself an object of much general attention, and was also overwhelmed by the officious volubility of Miss Frampton, though none of it was addressed to her. Mrs. Maitland, a lady as unlike Mrs. Brantley as possible, was seated on the other side of Laura Lovel, and was at once prepossessed in her favour, not only from the beauty of her features, but from the intelligence of her countenance. Desirous of being better acquainted, and seeing that Laura's present position was any thing but pleasant to her, Mrs. Maitland proposed that they should take a turn in the veranda that runs round the second story of the hotel. To this suggestion Laura gladly assented—for she felt at once that Mrs. Maitland was just the sort of woman she would like to know. There was a refinement and dignity in her appearance and manner that showed her to be "every inch a lady;" but that dignity was tempered with a frankness and courtesy that put every one round her immediately at their ease. Though now in the autumn of life, her figure was still good—her features still handsome, but they derived their charm from the sensible and benevolent expression of her fine open countenance. Her attire was admirably suited to her face and person; but she was not over-drest, and she was evidently one of those fortunate women who without bestowing much time and attention upon it, are au fait to all that constitutes a correct and tasteful costume.

Mrs. Maitland took Laura's arm within hers, and telling Mrs. Brantley that she was going to carry off Miss Lovel for half an hour, she made a sign to a fine looking young man on the other side of the room, and introduced him as her son, Mr. Aubray Maitland. He conducted the two ladies up stairs to the veranda, and in a few moments our heroine felt as if she had been acquainted with the Maitlands for years. No longer kept down and oppressed by the nightmare influence of fools, her spirits expanded, and breathed once more. She expressed without hesitation, her delight at the scene that presented itself before her—for she felt that she was understood.

The moon now "high in heaven," threw a solemn light on the trembling expanse of the ocean, and glittered on the spray that foamed and murmured for ever round the rocks that environed the little peninsula, their deep recesses slumbering in shade, while their crags and points came out in silver brightness. Around lay the numerous islands that are scattered over Boston harbour, and far apart glowed the fires of two lighthouses, like immense stars beaming on the verge of the horizon, one of them a revolving light, alternately shining out, and disappearing. As a contrast to the still repose that reigned around, was the billiard-room, (resembling a little Grecian temple,) on a promontory that overlooked the sea—the lamp that shone through its windows, mingling with the moon-beams, and the rolling sound of the billiard-balls, uniting with the murmurs of the eternal waters.

Mrs. Maitland listened with corresponding interest to the animated and original comments of her new friend, whose young and enthusiastic imagintion had never been more vividly excited; and she drew her out, till Laura suddenly stopped, blushing with fear that she had been saying too much. Before they returned to the drawing-room, Aubray was decidedly and deeply in love.

When Laura retired to her apartment, she left the window open, that she might from her pillow look out upon the moonlight-sea, and be fanned by the cool night breeze that gently rippled its waters; and when she was at last lulled to repose by the monotonous dashing of the surf against the rocks beneath her casement, she had a dream of the peninsula of Nahant; not as it is, covered with new and tasteful buildings, and a favourite resort of the fashion and opulence of Boston, but as it must have looked two centuries ago, when the seals made their homes among its caverned rocks, and when the only human habitations were the rude huts of the Indian fishers, and the only boats, their canoes of bark and skins.

When she awoke from her dream she saw the morning-star sparkling high in the east, and casting on the dark surface of the sea a line of light which seemed to mimic that of the moon, long since gone down beyond the opposite horizon. Laura rose at the earliest glimpse of dawn to watch the approaches of the coming day. A hazy vapour had spread itself over the water, and through its gauze veil she first beheld the red rim of the rising sun seeming to emerge from its ocean bed. As the sun ascended, the mist slowly rolled away, and "the light of morning smiled upon the wave," and tinted the white sails of a little fleet of outward-bound fishing-boats.

At the breakfast table the majority of the company consisted of ladies only: most of the gentlemen (including Aubray Maitland,) having gone in the early steamboat to attend to their business in the city. After breakfast, Laura proposed a walk, and Augusta and Miss Frampton not knowing what else to do with themselves, consented to accompany her. A certain Miss Blunsdon, (who being an heiress, and of a patrician family, conceived herself privileged to do as she pleased, and therefore made it her pleasure to be a hoyden and a slattern,) volunteered to pioneer them, boasting of her intimate knowledge of every nook and corner of the neighbourhood. Our heroine, by particular desire of Augusta and Miss Frampton, had arrayed herself that morning in her new French muslin, with what they called its proper accompaniments.

Miss Blunsdon conducted the party to that singular cleft in the rocks, known by the name of the Swallow's Cave, in consequence of its having been formerly the resort of those birds, whose nests covered its walls. Miss Frampton stopped as soon as they came in sight of it, declaring that it was in bad taste for ladies to scramble about such rugged places, and Augusta agreeing that a fancy for wet slippery rocks was certainly very peculiar. So the two friends sat down on the most level spot they could find, while Miss Blunsdon insisted on Laura's following her to the utmost extent of the cave, and our heroine's desire to explore this wild and picturesque recess, made her forgetful of the probable consequences to her dress.

Miss Blunsdon and Laura descended into the cleft, which as they proceeded, became so narrow as almost to close above their heads; its lofty and irregular walls seeming to lose themselves in the blue sky. The passage at the bottom was in some places scarcely wide enough to allow them to squeeze through it. The tide was low, yet still the stepping stones, loosely imbedded in the sand and sea-weed, were nearly covered with water. But Laura followed her guide to the utmost extent of the passage, till they looked again upon the sea.

When they rejoined their companions—"Oh! look at your new French muslin," exclaimed Augusta to Laura. "It is draggled half way up to your knees, and the salt water has already taken the colour out of it—and your pelerine is split down the back—and your shoes are half off your feet, and your stockings are all over wet and sand. How very peculiar you look!"

Laura was now extremely sorry to find her dress so much injured, and Miss Frampton comforted her by the assurance that it would never again be fit to be seen. They returned to the hotel, where they found Mrs. Maitland reading on one of the sofas in the upper hall, Laura hastily running up stairs, but Augusta called out—"Mrs. Maitland, do look at Miss Lovel—did you ever see such a figure? She has demolished her new dress, scrambling through the Swallow's Cave with Miss Blunsdon." And she ran into the Ladies' drawing-room to repeat the story at full length, while Laura retired to her own room to try some means of remedying her disasters, and to regret that she had not been permitted to bring with her to Nahant some of her gingham morning dresses. The French muslin, however, was incurable; its blue, though very beautiful, being of that peculiar cast which always fades into a dull white when wet with water.

Miss Frampton remained a while in the hall; and taking her seat beside Mrs. Maitland, said to her in a low confidential voice—"Have you not observed, Mrs. Maitland, that when people, who are nobody, attempt to dress, they always overdo it? Only think of a country clergyman's daughter coming to breakfast in so expensive a French muslin, and then going out in it to clamber about the rocks, and paddle among the wet sea-weed. Now you will see what a show she will make at dinner in a dress, the cost of which would keep her whole family in comfortable calico gowns for two years. I was with her when she did her shopping, and though as a friend, I could not forbear entreating her to get things that were suitable to her circumstances and to her station in life, she turned a deaf ear to every thing I said, (which was certainly in very bad taste) and she would buy nothing but the most expensive and useless frippery. I suppose she expects to catch the beaux by it. But when they find out who she is, I rather think they will only nibble at the bait—Heavens! what a wife she will make? And then such a want of self-respect, and even of common integrity. Of course you will not mention it—for I would on no consideration that it should go any further—but between ourselves, I was actually obliged to lend her money to pay her bills."

Mrs. Maitland, thoroughly disgusted with her companion, and disbelieving the whole of her gratuitous communication, rose from the sofa and departed without vouchsafing a reply.

At dinner, Laura Lovel appeared in her new silk, and really looked beautifully. Miss Frampton observing our heroine attracted the attention of several gentlemen who had just arrived from the city, took an opportunity while she was receiving a plate of chowder from one of the waiters to spill part of it on Laura's dress.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Lovel," said she, "when I took the soup I did not perceive that you and your new silk were beside me."

Laura began to wipe her dress with her pocket handkerchief. "Now don't look so disconcerted," pursued Miss Frampton, in a loud whisper. "It is in very bad taste to appear annoyed when an accident happens to your dress. People in society always pass off such things, as of no consequence whatever. I have apologized for spilling the soup, and what more can I do?"

Poor Laura was not in society, and she knew that to her the accident was of consequence. However, she rallied, and tried to appear as if she thought no more of the mischance that had spoiled the handsomest and most expensive dress she had ever possessed. After dinner she tried to remove the immense grease-spot by every application within her reach, but had no success.

When she returned to the drawing-room, she was invited to join a party that was going to visit the Spouting Horn, as it is generally denominated. She had heard this remarkable place much talked of since her arrival at Nahant, and she certainly felt a great desire to see it. Mrs. Maitland had letters to write, and Mrs. Brantley and Miss Frampton were engaged in their siesta; but Augusta was eager for the walk as she found that several gentlemen were going, among them Aubray Maitland, who had just arrived in the afternoon boat. His eyes sparkled at the sight of our heroine, and offering her his arm, they proceeded with the rest of the party to the Spouting Horn. This is a deep cavity at the botton of a steep ledge of rocks, and the waves as they rush successively into it with the tide, are immediately thrown out again by the action of a current of air which comes through a small opening in the back of the recess, the spray falling round like that of a cascade or fountain. The tide and wind were both high, and Laura was told that the Spouting Horn would be seen to great advantage.

Aubray Maitland conducted her carefully down the least rugged declivity of the rock, and gave her his hand to assist her in springing from point to point. They at length descended to the bottom of the crag. Laura was bending forward with eager curiosity, and looking steadfastly into the wave-worn cavern, much interested in the explosions of foaming water, which were sometimes greater and sometimes less. Suddenly a gust of wind twisted her light dress-bonnet completely round, and broke the sewing of one of the strings, and the bonnet was directly whirled before her into the cavity of the rock, and the next moment thrown back again amidst a shower of sea-froth. Laura cried out involuntarily, and Aubray sprung forward, and snatched it out of the water.

"I fear," said he, "Miss Lovel, your bonnet is irreparably injured. "It is, indeed," replied Laura; and remembering Miss Frampton's lecture, she tried to say that the destruction of her bonnet was of no consequence, but unaccustomed to falsehood, the words died away on her lips.

The ladies now gathered round our heroine, who held in her hand the dripping wreck of the once elegant bonnet; and they gave it as their unanimous opinion, that nothing could possibly be done to restore it to any form that would make it wearable. Laura then tied her scarf over her head, and Aubray Maitland thought she looked prettier than ever.

Late in the evening, Mr. Brantley arrived from town in his chaise, bringing from the post-office a letter from her little sister, or rather two letters written on the same sheet. They ran thus:—

Rosebrook, August 9th, 18—.

"Dearest Sister—We hope you are having a great deal of pleasure in Boston. How many novels you must be reading—I wish I was grown up as you are—I am eight years old, and I have never yet read a novel. We miss you all the time. There is still a chair placed for you at the table, and Rosa and I take turns in sitting next to it. But we can no longer hear your pleasant talk with our dear father. You know Rosa and I always listened so attentively that we frequently forgot to eat our dinners. I see advertised a large new book of Fairy Tales. How much you will have to tell us when you come home. Since you were so kind as to promise to bring me a book, I think, upon second thought, I would rather have the Tales of the Castle than Miss Edgeworth's Moral Tales.

"Dear mother has now to make all the pies and puddings herself. We miss you every way. The Children's Friend must be a charming book—so must the Friend of Youth.

Yesterday we had a pair of fowls killed for dinner. Of course, they were not Rosa's chickens, nor mine—they were only Billy and Bobby. But still Rosa and I cried very much, as they were fowls that we were acquainted with. Dear father reasoned with us about it for a long time; but still, though the fowls were made into a pie, we could eat nothing but the crust. I think I should like very much to read the Robins, and also Keeper's Travels in search of his Master.

"I hope, dear Laura, you will be able to remember every thing you have seen and heard in Boston, that you may have the more to tell us when you come home. I think, after all, there is no book I would prefer to the Arabian Nights—no doubt the Tales of the Genii are also excellent. Dear Laura, how I long to see you again. Paul and Virginia must be very delightful.

Yours affectionately,

"Ella Lovel."

"Dear sister Laura,—I cried for a long time after you left us, but at last I wiped my eyes, and played with Ponto, and was happy. I have concluded not to want the canary-bird I asked you to get for me, as I think it best to be satisfied by hearing the birds sing on the trees, in the garden, and in the woods. Last night I heard a screech owl—I would rather have a young fig-tree in a tub—or else a great quantity of new flower-seeds. If you do not get either the fig-tree or the flower-seeds, I should like a blue cat, such as I have read of—you know those cats are not sky-blue, but only a bluish gray. If a blue cat is not to be had, I should be glad of a pair of white English rabbits; and yet, I think I would quite as willingly have a pair of doves. I never saw a real dove—but if doves are scarce, or cost too much, I shall be satisfied with a pair of fantailed pigeons, if they are quite white, their tails fan very much. If you had a great deal of money to spare, I should like a kid or a fawn, but I know that it is impossible; so I will not think of it. Perhaps, when I grow up, I may be a president's wife—if so, I will buy an elephant.

Your affectionate sister,

"Rosa Lovel."

"I send kisses to all the people in Boston that love you."

How gladly would Laura, had it been in her power, have made every purchase mentioned in the letters of the two innocent girls. And her heart swelled and her eyes overflowed when she thought how happy she might have made them at a small part of the expense she had been persuaded to lavish on the finery that had given her so little pleasure, and that was now nearly all spoiled.

Next day was Sunday; and they went to church and heard Mr. Taylor, the celebrated mariner clergyman, with whose deep pathos and simple good sense, Laura was much interested, while she was at the same time amused with his originality and quaintness.

On returning to the hotel, they found that the morning boat had arrived, and on looking up at the veranda, the first object Laura saw there was Pyam Dodge, standing stiffly, with his hands on the railing.

"Miss Lovel," said Augusta, "there's your friend, the schoolmaster."

"Mercy upon us," screamed Miss Frampton, "has that horrid fellow come after you? Really, Miss Lovel, it was in very bad taste to invite him to Nahant."

"I did not invite him," replied Laura, colour-ng; "I know not how he discovered that I was here."

"The only way then," said Miss Frampton, "is to cut him dead, and then perhaps he'll clear off."

"Pho," said Augusta, "do you suppose he can understand cutting—why he won't know whether he is cut or not."

"May I ask who this person is?" said Aubray Maitland, in a low voice, to Laura. "Is there any stain or any suspicion attached to him?"

"Oh! no, indeed," replied Laura, earnestly. And, in a few words, as they ascended the stairs, she gave him an outline of the schoolmaster and his character.

"Then do not cut him at all," said Aubray. "Let me take the liberty of suggesting to you how to receive him." They had now come out into the veranda, and Maitland immediately led Laura up to Pyam Dodge, who bowed profoundly on being introduced to him, and then turned to our heroine, asked permission to shake hands with her, hoped his company would be found agreeable, and signified that he had been unable to learn where she was from Mr. Brantley's servants; but that the evening before a gentleman from Boston, had told him that Mr. Brantley and all his family were at Nahant. Therefore, he had come thither to-day, purposely to see her, and to inform her that the summer vacation having commenced, he was going to pay a visit to his friends in Rosebrook, and would be very thankful if she would honour him with a letter or message to her family.

All this was said with much bowing, and prosing and apologizing. When it was finished, Maitland invited Pyam Dodge to take a turn round the veranda, with Miss Lovel and himself, and the poor schoolmaster expressed the most profound gratitude. When they were going to dinner, Aubray introduced him to Mrs. Maitland, placed him next to himself at the table, and engaged him in a conversation on the Greek classics, in which Pyam Dodge, finding himself precisely in his element, forgot his humility, and being less embarrassed, was therefore less awkward and absurd than usual.

Laura Lovel had thought Aubray Maitland the handsomest and most elegant young man she had ever seen. She now thought him the most amiable. In the afternoon there was a mirage, in which the far off rocks in the vicinity of Marblehead, appeared almost in the immediate neighbourhood of Nahant, coming out in full relief, their forms and colours well-defined, and their height and breadth seemingly much increased. While all the company were assembled to look at this singular optical phenomenon, (Aubray Maitland being earnestly engaged in explaining it to our heroine,) Miss Frampton whispered to Laura that she wished particularly to speak with her, and accordingly drew her away to another part of the veranda.

Laura turned pale, for she had a presentiment of what was coming. Miss Frampton then told her, that presuming she heard from home, she concluded that it would, of course, be convenient to return the trifle she had lent her; adding that she wished to give a small commission to a lady that was going to town the next morning.

Poor Laura knew not what to say. She changed colour, trembled with nervous agitation, and at last faultered out, that in consequence of knowing her father was from home, she had not yet written to him on the subject, but that she would do so immediately, and hoped that Miss Frampton would not find it very inconvenient to wait a few days.

"Why really I dont know how I can," replied Miss Frampton, "I want a shawl exactly like Mrs. Horton's. She tells me they are only to be had at one store in Boston, and that when she got her's the other day, there was only two left. They are really quite a new style, strange as it is to see any thing in Boston, that is not quite old fashioned in Philadelphia. The money I lent you is precisely the sum for this purpose. Of course I am in no want of a shawl—thank heaven, I have more than I know what to do with—but, as I told you, these are quite a new style—"

"Oh! how gladly would I pay you if I could!" exclaimed Laura, covering her face with her hands. "What would I give at this moment for twenty-five dollars!"—

"I hope I am not inconvenient," said the voice of Pyam Dodge, close at Laura's back; "but I have been looking for Laura Lovel, that I may take my leave, and return to town in the next boat."

Miss Frampton tossed her head and walked away to tell Mrs. Horton confidentially, that Miss Lovel had borrowed twenty-five dollars of her to buy finery, but not to add that she had just been asking her for payment.

"If I may venture to use such freedom," pursued Pyam Dodge: "I think Miss Laura Lovel, I overheard you just now grieving that you could not pay some money. Now, my good child, (if you will forgive me for calling you so,) why should you be at any loss for money, when I have just received my quarter's salary, and when I have more about me than I know what to do with. I heard you mention twenty-five dollars—here it is, (taking some notes out of an enormous pocket-book,) and if you want any more, as I hope you do—"

"Oh! no, indeed—no," interrupted Laura. "I cannot take it—I would not on any consideration."

"I know too well," continued Pyam Dodge, "I am not worthy to offer it, and I hope I am not making myself disagreeable. But if Miss Laura Lovel, you would only have the goodness to accept it, you may be sure I will never ask you for it as long as I live. I would even take a book oath not to do so."

Laura steadily refused the proffered kindness of the poor schoolmaster, and begged Pyam Dodge to mention the subject to her no more. She told him that she now wished to go home, and that she would write by him to her family, begging that her father would come for her (as he had promised at parting,) and take her back to Rosebrook, as soon as he could. She quitted Pyam Dodge, she was evidently much mortified, and retired to write her letter, which she gave to him as soon as it was finished, finding him in the hall, taking a ceremonious leave of the Maitlands. He departed, and Laura's spirits were gradually revived during the evening, by the gratifying attentions and agreeable conversation of Mrs. Maitland and her son.

When our heroine retired for the night, she found on her table a letter, in a singularly uncouth hand, if hand it could be called, where every word was differently written. It enclosed two ten dollar notes and a five, and was conceived in the following words—

"This is to inform Miss Laura, eldest daughter to the reverend Edward Lovel, of Rosebrook, Massachusetts, that an unknown friend of her's whose name it will be impossible for her to guess, (and therefore to make the attempt will doubtless be entire loss of time, and time is always precious,) having accidentally heard (though by what means is a profound secret,) that she, at this present time, is in some little difficulty for want of a small sum of money—he, therefore—this unknown friend, offers to her acceptance the before-mentioned sum; hoping that she will find nothing disgusting in his using so great a liberty."

"Oh! poor Pyam Dodge!" exclaimed Laura, "why did you take this trouble to disguise and disfigure your excellent hand-writing." And she felt, after all, what a relief it was to transfer debt from Miss Frampton to the good schoolmaster. Reluctant to have any further personal discussion on this painful subject, she enclosed the notes in a short billet to Miss Frampton, and sent it immediately to that lady's apartment. She then went to bed, comparatively happy, slept soundly, and dreamed of Aubray Maitland.

About the end of the week, Laura Lovel was delighted to see her father arrive with Mr. Brantley. As soon as they were alone, she threw herself into his arms, and with a flood of tears explained to him the particulars of all that had passed since she left home; and deeply lamented that she had allowed herself to be drawn into expenses beyond her means of defraying, and which her father could ill afford to supply, to say nothing of the pain and mortification they had occasioned to herself.

"My beloved child," said Mr. Lovel, "I have been much to blame for entrusting you at an age so early and inexperienced, and with no knowledge of a town life and its habits, to the guidance example of a family of whom I knew nothing, except that they were reputable and opulent."

Mr. Lovel then gave his daughter the agreeable intelligence, that the tract of land which was the object of his visit to Maine, and which had been left him in his youth by an old aunt, and was then considered of little or no account, had greatly increased in value by a new and flourishing town having sprung up in its immediate vicinity. This tract he had recently been able to sell for ten thousand dollars, and the interest of that sum would now make a most acceptable addition to his little income.

He also informed her that Pyam Dodge was then at the village of Rosebrook, where he was "visiting round," as he called it, and that the good schoolmaster had faithfully kept the secret of the twenty-five dollars which he had pressed upon Laura, and which Mr. Lovel had now heard, for the first time, from herself.

While this conversation was going on between the father and daughter, Mrs. Maitland and her son was engaged in discussing the beauty and the apparent merits of our heroine. "I should like extremely," said Mrs. Maitland, "to invite Miss Lovel to pass the winter with me. But you know we live much in the world, and I fear the limited state of her father's finances could not allow her to appear as she would wish. Yet perhaps I might manage to assist her, in that respect, without wounding her delicacy. I think with regret of so fair a flower being 'born to blush unseen, and waste its sweetness on the desart air.'"

"There is one way," said Aubray Maitland, smiling, and colouring, "by which we might have Miss Lovel to spend next winter in Boston, without any danger of offending her delicacy, or subjecting her to embarrassment on account of her personal expenses—a way which would enable her to appear as she deserves, and to move in a sphere that she is well calculated to adorn, though not as Miss Lovel."

"I cannot but understand you, Aubray," replied Mrs. Maitland, who had always been not only mother, but the sympathising and confidential friend of her son—"yet be not too precipitate. Know more of this young lady, before you go so far that you cannot in honour recede."

"I know her sufficiently," said Aubray with animation. "She is to be understood at once, and though I flatter myself that I may have already excited some interest in her heart, yet I have no reason to suppose that she entertains for me such feelings as would induce her at this time to accept my offer. She is extremely anxious to get home; she may have left a lover there. But let me be once assured that her affections are disengaged, and that she is really inclined to bestow them on me, and a declaration shall immediately follow the discovery. A man, who after being convinced of the regard of the woman he loves, can trifle with her feelings and hesitate about securing her hand, does not deserve to obtain her."

Laura had few preparations to make for her departure, which took place the next morning, Aubray Maitland and Mr. Brantley accompanying her and her father to town, in the early boat. Mr. Maitland took leave of her affectionately, Mrs. Brantley smilingly, Agusta coldly, and Miss Frampton not at all.

Mr. Lovel and his daughter passed that day in Boston, staying at a hotel. Laura showed her father the childrens letter. All the books that Ella mentioned were purchased for her, and quite a little menagerie of animals was procured for Rosa.

They arrived safely at Rosebrook. And when Mr. Lovel was invoking a blessing on their evening repast, he referred to the return of his daughter and to his happiness on seeing her once more in her accustomed seat at the table, in a manner that drew tears into the eyes of every member of the family.

Pyam Dodge was there; only waiting for Lau-ra's arrival to set out next morning on a visit to his relations in Vermont. With his usual want of tact, and his usual kindness of heart, he made so many objections to receiving the money with which he had accommodated our heroine, that Mr. Lovel was obliged to slip it privately into his trunk before his departure.

In a few days, Aubray Maitland came to Rosebrook and established himself at the principal inn, from whence he visited Laura the evening of his arrival. Next day he came both morning and evening. On the third day he paid her three visits, and after that it was not worth while to count them.

The marriage of Aubray and Laura took place at the close of the autumn, and they immediately went into the possession of an elegant residence of their own, adjoining the mansion of the elder Mrs. Maitland. They are now living in as much happiness as can fall to the lot of human beings.

Before the Nahant season was over, Miss Frampton had quarrelled with or offended nearly every lady at the hotel, and Mr. Brantley privately insisted that his wife should not invite her to pass the winter with them. However, she protracted her stay as long as she possibly could with any appearance of decency, and then returned to Philadelphia under the escort of one of Mr. Brantley's clerks. After she came home, her visit to Boston afforded her a new subject of conversation, in which the predominant features were general ridicule of the Yankees, (as she called them,) circumstantial slanders of the family to whose hospitality she had been indebted for more than three months, and particular abuse of "that little wretch, Augusta."

SONG.

BY ROSA L. DERWOOD.

Oh! beauty's daughter! maiden thou
Of jetty locks, and moonlight brow—
And eyes, so like the Heav'ns above
As brightly blue! where art thou love?
Thou erst wert gath'ring wild flow'rs here,
To deck thy soft luxuriant hair;
Away, away o'er the silv'ry tide
Thy lover's come to bear his bride!
Come love! come to the cypress tree
Thy Gerard's bark but waits for thee!

And merrily, merrily shall we glide;
Now o'er the blue waves lightly ride—
On—on we'll hie by the moon's soft light,
And the starry beams of thine eye so bright!
Thy free and boundless home shall be,
On the waters of the deep blue sea!—
And thou shalt have a gentle maid
A Nereide, thy locks to braid—
Then, come, love, to the cypress tree,
Thy Gerard's bark still waits for thee!

The moonbeams o'er the waters play—
Why ling'rest thou? oh! Ada say?
(She comes not still! kind Heav'n! but throw
Her shadow in the tide below!)
I've wov'n thee, love, a coronal—
The flow'rs will fade—the dew-drops fall!
Each sunny clime, each coral cave,
Shall yield thee treasures on the wave!
She comes! farewell dark cypress tree—
My bark but waits, my love, for thee.

HONOUR AND INTEGRITY.

Honour and integrity ought to be the leading principles of every transaction of life. These are virtues highly requisite, notwithstanding they are too frequently disregarded. Whatever pursuit individuals are engaged in, sincerity in profession, steadfastness, promptness, and punctuality in discharging engagements, are indispensably incumbent. A man of honest integrity, and uprightness in his dealings with his fellow creatures, is sure to gain the confidence and applause of all good men; whilst he who acts from dishonest or designing motives obtains deserved contempt. Dishonest proceedings in word or deed, are very offensive to, and unjustifiable in the sight of God and man, even in trivial, but much more so in consequential affairs. The most perfect uprightness is highly requisite between man and man, though it is too often disregarded; and is much more so between the sexes. Every profession of regard should be made without dissembling, every promise preserved inviolate, and every engagement faithfully discharged. No one ought to make any offers or pretentions to a lady before he is, in a great measure, certain her person, her temper, and qualifications, suit his circumstances, and agree perfectly with his own temper and way of thinking. For a similarity of mind and manners is very necessary to render the bonds of love permanent, and those of marriage happy.

"Marriage the happiest state of life would be,
If hands were only joined where hearts agree."

The man of uprightness and integrity of heart, will not only observe the beauties of the mind, the goodness of the heart, the dignity of sentiment and delicacy of wit, but will strive to fix his affections on such permanent endowments, before he pledges his faith to a lady. He looks upon marriage as a business of the greatest importance in life, and a change of condition that cannot be taken with too much reverence and deliberation. Therefore he will not undertake it at random, lest he should precipitately involve himself in the greatest difficulties. He wishes to act a conscientious part, and consequently cannot think (notwithstanding it is too much countenanced by custom) of sporting with the affections of the fair sex, nor even of paying his addresses to any one, till he is perfectly convinced that his own are fixed on just principles. All imaginable caution is certainly necessary, but after a man's profession of regard, and kind service and solicitations have made an impression on a female heart, it is no longer a matter of indifference whether he perseveres in, or breaks off his engagements. For he then is particularly dear to her, and reason, honour, justice, all unite to oblige him to make good his engagement. When the matter is brought to such a crisis, there is no retreating without manifestly disturbing her quiet and tranquillity of mind; nor can any thing but her loss of virtue, justify his desertion. Whether marriage has been expressly promised or not, it is of little signification. For if he has solicited and obtained her affection, on supposition that he intended to marry her, the contract is, in the sight of Heaven, sufficiently binding. In short, the man who basely imposes upon the honest heart of an unsuspecting girl, and after winning her affection, by the prevailing rhetoric of courtship, ungenerously leaves her to bitter sorrow and complaining, acts a very dishonourable part, and is more to be detested than a common robber. For private treachery is much more heinous than open force; and money must not be put in competition with happiness. S. B.

Digitized by Google

From "Hours of Devotion."

"MATRIMONY.—With what sordid motives do parents sometimes compel their children to enter into the married life; and that too, with those whom they may regard with cold indifference or even disgust.—Mutual affection is seldom made the subject of inquiry. It is enough to know that their wealth or power will be increased, and for that they are ready to make every sacrifice. They heed not the grief or sorrow that they bring upon their devoted offspring.—They little think of the tears of anguish that they cause to flow. Sooner than be disconcerted in their ambitious schemes, they will doom them to unmitigated wretchedness—to all the glowing agonies of despair. Remember, there is an eternal and all-seeing God who is watching over you! He hears the groans which you are extorting by your cruelty. You may accomplish your designs, but you will not escape the dread retribution of punishment. When you are stretched upon the bed of death, you will not forget the wrongs you have inflicted upon those who should be dearer to you than all the world beside, and these reflections will torment you like so many fiends, until the last pulses of life have ceased.

"UNMARRIED LIFE.—Why will you increase the misery of her who has renounced the happiness of a matrimonial life? Are you qualified to judge of her motives? Do you know what disgust she may have felt for the deceitfulness of man? Were you a witness of her agony—her burning tears—the grief that secretly devoured her, when the spell of her affections was broken? when the vows of love proved a deceiving and lying oracle? when the joys of life fled quickly away, and existence became to her a curse—a torment? And yet, you despise her—you do not possess an atom of her nobleness of soul—you, whose passions, whose lusts, are all unrestrained.

"THE WARRIOR.—He may be compared to the splendors of a sunset, that succeeds a gloomy and tempestuous day. He requires no idle ceremonies—no high soundings epithets—no jargon of senseless and unmeaning praise—no proud monument, to perpetuate his name, or keep him alive in the remembrance of the people. He has been consecrated by his own blood—and his death becomes the pride and glory of the whole nation. The recollection of his valor adds to its further security. Enemies will respect a people who have had such a fearless champion of their rights. His virtues never die—they are transmitted from one generation to another.

"FAMILY DEVOTION.—It is a beautiful thing to behold a family at their devotions. Who would not be moved by the tear that trembles in the mother's eye, as she looks to heaven, and pours forth her fervent supplications, for the welfare of her children? Who can look with indifference upon the venerable father surrounded by his family, with his uncovered locks kneeling in the presence of Almighty God, and praying for their happiness and prosperity? In whose bosom is not awakened the finest feelings, on beholding a tender child, in the beauty of its innocence, folding its little hands in prayer, and imploring the invisible, yet eternal father, to bless its parents, its brothers and sisters, and its playmates.

EARLY POETRY.

The most ancient specimen of oral literature on record we find in the oldest book, which is itself the most ancient specimen of written literature. This is the speech of Lamech to his two wives (in the fourth chapter of Genesis,) which, though consisting of six hemistichs only, nevertheless exemplifies all the peculiarities of Hebrew verse—parallelism, amplification, and antithesis. The passage is exceedingly obscure, and I shall not attempt to interpret it: the mere collocation of words, as they stand in the authorized English Bible, will answer our present purpose:—

"Adah and Zillah! hear my voice:
Ye wives of Lamech! hearken unto my speech."

This is a parallelism, the meaning of both lines being synonymous, though the phraseology is varied, and the two limbs of each correspond to those of the other.—

"Adah and Zillah! | hear my voice;
Ye wives of Lamech, | hearken unto my speech,
"For I have slain a man to my wounding,
And a young man to my hurt."

Here is amplification: concerning the man slain in the first clause, we have the additional information in the second that he was "a young man."

"If Cain shall be avenged seven fold, Truly Lamech seventy and seven fold."

The antithesis in this couplet consists, not in contrary, but in aggravation of the opposing terms—seven fold contrasted with seventy and seven fold.

The context of this passage has a peculiar interest at this time, when the proscription of everlasting ignorance is taken off from the multitude, and knowledge is become as much the birthright of the people of Britain as liberty. This Lamech, who, if not the inventor of poetry, was one of the earliest of poets, had three sons; of whom Jabal, the father of such as dwell in tents, followed agriculture; Jubal the father of all such as handle the harp and organ, cultivated music; while Tubal-Cain, an instructer of every artificer in brass and iron, practised handicraft. Thus, in the seventh generation of man, in one family we find poetry, music, agriculture, and the mechanical arts.

The next specimen which occurs in Sacred Writ are the words of Noah, when he awoke from his wine, and knew what his children had respectively done unto him:—

"Cursed be Canaan;
A servant of servants shall he be to his brethren:
Blessed be the Lord God of Shem;
And Canaan shall be his servant:
God shall enlarge Japheth,
And he shall dwell in the tents of Shem,
And Canaan shall be his servant."

This quotation, in the closing triplet, rises into genuine poetry, by the introduction of a fine pastoral metaphor illustrative of the manner of living among the ancient patriarchs:—

"God shall enlarge Japheth,
And he shall dwell in the tents of Shem.

But these lines are more striking, as exhibiting the first example of the union of poesy and prophecy; for in those primitive days,

———"the sacred name
Of prophet and of poet were the same."
Cowper.

I have passed over the reputed prophecies of Enoch before the flood, because, though we have a quotation from them in the Epistle of St. Jude, the original language in which they were uttered is either itself extinct, or, if it were the Hebrew, has lost the words that imbodied them. It may be observed, however, that the translated extract in the Greek Testament, bears tokens of the original having been rhythmical, which is specially indicated by the use of one emphatical word four times in as many lines—a pleonasm that would hardly have occurred in prose composition, even in the age of Adam, but might be gracefully adapted to the cadence and character of the most ancient mode of verse.

Isaac's benedictions upon Esau and Jacob are at least presumptive evidence of the advanced state of oral literature (for writing was probably not yet invented) in his age. The critics, I believe, do not allow the language to have the decided marks of Hebrew rhythm. If so, the passage may be, without hesitation, set down as the oldest specimen of prose in the world.

Of the words of dying Jacob, however, there is no question that the structure of them is verse, and the substance of them at once poetry and prophecy of the highest order. It might seem, from the power of the sentiments and the brilliancy of the illustrations, as though the patriarch on his dying couch, surrounded by his mourning family, were again caught up into the visions of God—as when in his youth, he lay alone on the earth in the wilderness and saw the angels of God ascending upon a ladder, that reached from his stone pillow into the heavens; for here, in his last accents, it is even as if he had learned the language, and spake with the tongues of angels—so fervent, pure, and abundant in wisdom and grace are the words of his lips and the aspirations of his heart. One extract will suffice:—

"Judah is a lion's whelp; from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up?"

"The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and to him shall the gathering of the people be."

"Binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes with the blood of grapes."

"His eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk."

The whole of this imagery might be engraved in hieroglyphics; but not one of the sister arts alone can do it justice, for it combines the excellencies of all three—picture to the eye, music to the ear, poetry to the mind.

HANNAH MORE.—The celibacy of this excellent lady, which gave her so much time to bend her powers to humanity, has been a subject of surprise. A writer in a recent Scottish periodical relates as authentic, the following circumstances: She was early engaged to be married to a gentleman of family and fortune. The wedding day was fixed. The bride and her party moved off gaily to the church, where the ceremony was to be performed, and the groom was to make his appearance. The lady was first upon the ground. Her lover was not there. "The laggard comes late," thought the attendants. They miscalculated. He never came at all. A horseman rode up to the church door, and handed Miss More a letter, written by her faithless swain, declaring, with many apologies, he could not "take the responsibility" of making her his bride. At the same time, he offered her any pecuniary renumeration in his power!—Whether the lady fainted or only pouted, is not mentioned, but the male relatives followed the business up with such promptness and spirit, that the "dastard in love" made a settlement upon the slighted lady of £400 sterling, a year, for life.—Albany Adv.

HOW TO RULE.—They that govern must make least noise. You see when they row a barge, they that do the drudgery work, slash, and puff, and sweat; but he that governs sits quietly at the stern and scarce is seen to stir.

MUNCHAUSEN.—Many doubts have been expressed whether such a person ever existed: the following brief sketch, by Mr. Lieber, a learned German, sets the matter at rest; Jerome Charles Frederic Von Munchausen, the original of the well known narrator of wonders, was a German officer who served several campaigns against the Turks, in the Russian service. He was a passionate lover of horses and hounds; of which, and of his adventures among the Turks, he told the most extravagant stories; and his fancy, finally, so completely got the better of his memory, that he really believed his most improbable and impossible fictions, and was very much offended if any doubt was expressed on the subject. In relating these monstrous lies, his eyes would shine and stare out of his head, his face became flushed, the sweat rolled down from his forehead, and he used the most violent gestures, as if he were really cutting off the heads of the Turks, or fighting the bears and wolves that figure in his stories. Having become acquainted with the poet Burger, at Pyrmont, and being pleased with his society, Munchausen used to relate those waking dreams to him; and the poet afterwards published them, with his own improvements, under the title of Wunderbare Abenthener und Reisen des Herrn Von Munchausen, translated from the English, 1787. A part of them had already appeared in the third volume of the Delicise Academicæ under the title of Mendacia ridicula. The wit and humor of the work gave it great success, and it was translated into several foreign languages. When it appeared in England, the British reviewers laboured hard to show that it was a satire upon the ministry. Munchausen was very angry with the liberty thus taken with his name, and Burger became involved in some difficulties in consequence. An enlarged edition was published in four volumes. Munchausen when quite advanced in years, married a very young wife, who, to the astonishment of every one, presented him with a son, the consequence of which was a suit prosecuted by his relations after his death, in 1797, in support of their claims to his estate.

BYRON ON THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.—"Of the immortality of the soul," says Lord Byron, in a paper written toward the termination of his life, "it appears to me that there can be little doubt, if we attend for a moment to the action of the mind: it is in perpetual activity. I used to doubt of it, but reflection has taught me better. It acts also so very independent of body. In dreams, for instance; incoherently and madly, I grant you, but still it is mind, and much more mind than when we are awake. Now, that this should not act separately, as well as jointly, who can pronounce? The stoics, Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius, call the present state 'a soul which drags a carcass'—a heavy chain, to be sure; but all chains, being material, may be shaken off. How far our future life will be individual, or rather, how far it will resemble our present existence, is another question; but that the mind is eternal, seems as probable as that the body is not so. But the whole thing is inscrutable."

PULPIT ROCKS, PENNSYLVANIA.

These remarkable rocks, of which the opposite plate furnishes a very correct view, are found in what is called the Bald Eagle or Sinking Spring Valley, on the frontiers of Bedford county, Pa. The valley is bordered on the east by a chain of high, rugged mountains, anciently called the Canoe Ridge, and on the west by the Warrior Mountains. The Pulpit Rocks are situated about 200 miles from the city of Philadelphia, in a mild country, distinguished by many singular natural objects. They assume various striking forms and shapes, and parts are designated as pulpits, bowls, teapots, &c. from the resemblance they bear to such articles. They are unquestionably an object of great curiosity, and no traveller should visit that section of the country without seeing them.

Sinking Valley was made remarkable during the revolutionary war, on account of numerous lead mines found there, over which extensive works were established. The lead ore was of many kinds, some in broad shining flakes, and others of the steely texture, and was found in great quantities. Owing, however, to frequent molestation from the Indians, and the inexperience of the miners, who were old countrymen, unused to such labour, the mines were soon entirely abandoned.

Among other curiosities of this place, the swallows (which absorb several of the largest streams of the valley, and, after conveying them for several miles under ground, in a subterraneous course, then return them upon the surface) are not the most inconsiderable. These, and the number this place contains, have given rise to its general name. Among the most remarkable of them, that called the Arch Spring may be particularized, as it runs close upon the road from the town to the fort. It is a deep hollow, formed in the limestone rock; about thirty feet in width, with a rude arch of stone hanging over it, forming a passage for the water, which it throws out with some degree of violence, and in such plenty as to form a fine stream, which at length buries itself again in the bowels of the earth. Some of these pits are near three hundred feet deep; the water at the bottom seems in rapid motion, and is apparently of a colour as deep as ink, though, in truth, it is as pure as the finest springs can produce. Many of these pits are placed along the course of this subterraneous river, which soon after takes an opportunity of an opening to a descent, and keeps along the surface among rocky hills for a few rods, then enters the mouth of a large cave, whose exterior aperture was sufficient to admit a shallop with her sail full spread. In the inside it keeps from eighteen to twenty feet wide. The roof declines as you advance, and a ledge of loose rugged rocks keeps in tolerable order upon one side, affording means to scramble along. In the midst of this cave is much timber, bodies of trees, branches, &c. and are to be seen lodged quite up to the roof of this passage, which affords a proof of the water being swelled up to the very top, during the time of freshes, &c.; its mode of escaping being, perhaps, inadequate to the prodigious quantities which sometimes must fall from the mountains into this channel, swelling it up to the very surface, as several places over the side seemed to evince the escape of water at times, into the lower country. This opening in the hill continues about four hundred yards, when the cave widens, after you have got round a sudden turn, which prevents it being discovered till you are within it, to a spacious room, at the bottom of which is a vortex, the water that falls into it whirling round with amazing force; sticks, or even pieces of timber, are immediately absorbed, and carried out of sight, the water boiling up with excessive violence, which soon subsides until the experiment is renewed.

Viaduct across the Sankey Valley, England.

The Liverpool and Manchester Rail-way, certainly one of the most stupendous undertakings ever commenced in England, is now in successful operation, and affords great facilities in the transportation of passengers and merchandise. The road extends thirty-one miles, and in its construction more than ordinary difficulties, owing to the unfavourable situation of the country, were surmounted, involving an expense far more extensive than was anticipated in the original estimates. The bridges cost 108,565 pounds 11s. 9d., and the sum of 105,282 pounds 14s. 3d. was paid for land. These two items alone exceed the whole estimated cost of the Pennsylvania rail-road from Columbia to Philadelphia, which is eighty-one miles in length.

One of the most interesting portions of the Manchester Rail-way, is that referred to in the accompanying engraving, giving a view of the splendid Viaduct across the Sankey Valley, about fifteen miles from Liverpool. The following description of this magnificent work is furnished in a late minute account of the Rail-way. The writer says—

"Leaving Parr Moss, we soon approach the great valley of the Sankey, about half way between Liverpool and Manchester, with its Canal at the bottom, and its flats or barges in full sail passing to and fro, between the River Mersey, near Warrington, and the great coal districts, near St. Helen's. Over the valley and canal, and over the topmasts and high peaks of the barges, the Rail-way is carried along a magnificent viaduct of wire arches, each 50 feet span, built principally of brick, with stone padings, the length from the top of the parapets to the water in the canal being 70 feet, and the width of the Rail-way between the parapets 25 feet. The approach of this great structure is along a stupendous embankment; formed principally of clay, dug out from the high lands on the borders of the valley. Looking over the battlements there is a fine view down to the south—Winwick spire rising in the distance, and below you, the little stream of the Sankey running parallel with the canal; while the masts and sails of the vessels, seen at intervals in the landscape where the Canal is no longer visible, present a vivid specimen of inland navigation. Immediately below you, the barges, as they approach the bridge, escape from view for a few minutes, till, having sailed under your feet, they become again visible on the opposite side of the viaduct."

THE FLOOD.—A SONNET.

Earth's groans are heard afar; the air's deep sleep
Is broken. Springs gush out and sparkle high;
The silver streamlets swell and howling leap,
While swift the ocean foam invades the sky;
Dark seas in fury lash the sounding shore,
And howl defiance to the world of men;
The rains descend and swell the deaf'ning roar
That raves o'er field and forest, hill and glen;
The seething waters storm in phalanx wide
And whelm the living in their whirling tide;
A shoreless ocean now enwraps the globe;
The roar of waves in solemn might prevail;
Wild clouds, are spread for nature's funeral robe,
And loud winds o'er the lost creation wail.

Autobiography of Mathew Carey.

LETTER VI.

In 1792 or 1793, feeling for the sufferings and wretchedness of the numerous Irish emigrants who arrived in this city, many of them pennyless, and in a most forlorn situation in every respect, I called a meeting at the Coffee house, of a number of the most respectable and influential Irishmen in the city—and, having previously prepared a constitution, submitted it to the meeting, by which it was adopted, an association being formed, under the title of "The Hibernian Society for the relief of emigrants from Ireland." Hugh Holmes, a man of as kind and friendly a heart, and of as amiable a temper and manners, and withal as jovial and festive a companion, as any native of the Emerald Isle, that ever lived, to whose friendship and kindness I was frequently indebted, was elected President, and I was at the same time elected Secretary, in which office I officiated for a number of years. This society exists in full and beneficent operation at the present day. It has been extremely useful to many hundreds of emigrants—some of whom are now in easy and affluent circumstances, who, but for their aid and advice, might have pined in penury. The treasury has a handsome fund, the interests of which is adequate to the current demands on the society.

There was at that period, a society of Irishmen in Philadelphia, under the title of "The Friendly Sons of St. Patrick." Although their object was solely a jovial celebration of the anniversary of the patron saint of the island, and there could, therefore, be no real ground of rivalship between the two societies, the old society was somewhat jealous of the new. And two eminent merchants, belonging to the two societies, having met at the door of one of them, they had angry words on the subject, which, both being high tempered and passionate, soon eventuated in a pitched battle, wherein the advocate of the Hibernian Society came off victorious. The name of the latter was Robert Rainey—long since dead, without leaving any relations behind in this country; but I withhold the name of his antagonist, out of respect to his son, now living.

In 1793 and 1794, I was seized with a theatrical mania, and used to attend in Chesnut street, particularly in the former year, about twice for every three times the theatre was open. I wrote in each year a set of Dramatic criticisms, which induced Wignal and Reinagle to send Mr. Rowson, the prompter, (now employed in the Boston Custom House) to offer me the freedom of the house, which I declined for the reasons assigned in the annexed letter.

"Gentlemen, while I am duly sensible of your kindness, I am obliged decline its acceptance, for reasons which you must deem satisfactory. If I accepted it, and praised the performers and performances, as I am well disposed to do, whenever I can with justice and propriety, it would be said that I was paying for my seat by puffing. On the other hand, should I exercise any severity, as would sometimes be proper (but which I shall always do with reluctance) I would be charged with ingratitude for making so ill a return for your kindness. To avoid all such ill natured observations, I will hold myself free to censure or praise as the case may require.

Yours, &c. M. CAREY."

In the fall of 1796, I was zealously engaged with half a dozen or more citizens in the formation of a Sunday School Society, the first, I believe, ever established in this country, of which the Right Rev. Bishop White was and is President. This led to the formation of the many hundreds, that exist at present in the United States.

About the year 1796, William Cobbet, who had previously written and published anonymously, came before the public in propria persona, as a writer and publisher.

In the account of his life, published about that period, he made mention of me in rather favorable terms.—Some sorry scribblers, who did not dare to attack him themselves, strove to embroil us together; and the most practicable means they could devise to accomplish this sinister and unworthy purpose, was, to hold out the idea, that he was afraid of me. This was distinctly stated in four pamphlets and several newspapers.

This was copying the example set by children, in a crowd of their fellows, who, when any little bickering takes place between two of their companions, pat each on the back, and encourage him to begin the onset, by persuading him that his antagonist is afraid of him. Of this very humane and honorable propensity, Smollet availed himself in Peregrine Pickle, where, in a duel between Jolter and Pallet, both consummate cowards, to prevent them from running away, to which denouement both were inclined, they were pushed towards each other by Pickle and Tom Pipes. One of these doughty heroes, having uttered something like an Indian yell, so terrified the other, that he ran off, as if a roaring lion was at his heels.

I have no hesitation in acknowledging that I was very much afraid of Cobbet, and dreaded to enter the lists with such a powerful adversary, a controversy with whom I regarded as a most serious evil. He had displayed his talents as a formidable antagonist both before and after laying aside his incognito. It is not wonderful, therefore, that I sought to avoid polemics with him, knowing the extreme severity of his pen—the great influence he had on public opinion—and the danger of his injuring me in my business and in my standing in society—as there is no character, however pure or sacred, that is not more or less impaired by a succession of attacks by a powerful writer. The case of General Washington affords a pregnant proof of the correctness of this theory; for notwithstanding his inestimable services, his immaculate character, and the veneration in which he was held, not merely by the great body of his fellow citizens, but by the civilized world, his standing was temporarily impaired among a large portion of his fellow citizens, by the reiterated abuse he received during the effervescence that took place in consequence of his signature of Jay's Treaty. When such was the fate of this mighty Cedar of Lebanon, what chance would such a slender reed as I stand, under similar circumstances?

One of those scribblers, a certain Joseph Scott, wrote a pamphlet against Cobbet, entitled the Blue Shop, in allusion to the colour of his windows and shutters. In the preface he made some kind mention of me, and brought it and the title to me previously to publication, to inquire whether, in common with other booksellers, I would allow it to be advertised for sale in my store. I urged and prayed him to omit the part in question, lest it might commit me with Cobbet.

But the malishness of all the mules in Andalusia, could not exceed that of Scott. He would not alter an iota, although I solemnly declared that on no other terms would I allow it to enter my store. Be it known that I had not seen the pamphlet, or known any thing of its having been in the press, or even written, before that moment. During the time he was engaged on it, I was absent from Philadelphia in Boston.

Being always of opinion, that prevention is far better than cure, I wrote Cobbet the following letter, to countervail the efforts of those who sought to array us against each other.

"SEPTEMBER 6, 1796.

"Sir,—I regret exceedingly the introduction of my name into your Life; not that I have any reason to complain of the manner in which it is done; for, without any affectation of modesty, I think the compliments paid me are rather greater than I deserve.

"My regret arises from the occasion it has since given to no less than four writers to couple our names together—and apparently with a view to lead to a literary warfare between us.

"I feel no hesitation about declaring, that this would, for various reasons, be to me highly disagreeable. My wish is to live peaceably; therefore I am desirous to avoid controversies of every kind. My business demands my whole attention; therefore I want the leisure such an irksome affair would require; and moreover, every prudent man would sedulously seek to avoid, while it could be avoided without dishonour, the probable issue of a controversy carried on, as, I believe, ours would be.

"For these, and other reasons, I am induced to take this step, as a precautionary measure; according to the old adage, 'an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.'

"I therefore inform you, that I have never written or published a line or sentence respecting you; and that it is my determination to pursue the same line of conduct, unless (which I hope will not be the case) I am driven to a different course by unprovoked aggression. I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

MATHEW CAREY."

"Mr. William Cobbet."

To this he made the following courteous reply:

PHILAD. 7th Sept. 1796.

"Sir,—Hurry has prevented me from answering your polite note sooner. Be assured, that you cannot have a greater aversion to a paper war than I have, or a greater contempt for the miserable wretches who have manifested the malicious desire of involving us in one. It is my sincere desire to live in peace with all the booksellers—and towards none does this desire direct itself [more] than towards Mr. Carey.

I am your most humble and obedient servant,

"Mr. M. Carey." W. COBBET."

LETTER VII.

Some months afterwards I was attacked in the United States Gazette, by John Ward Fenno, a rash, thoughtless, and imprudent young man, who had succeeded his father in the proprietorship and management of that paper. Cobbet, who patronized Fenno, copied into "the Porcupine's Gazette" some of that young man's abuse.

Still desirous of avoiding, if possible, an open collision with a man whom I justly regarded as a most formidable antagonist, I wrote him the following letter.

"Mr COBBET,—I am concerned to find that you appear disposed to force me into a paper warfare with you, whether I will or no. This does not correspond with the declaration in your billet of September 7, '96—'It is my sincere desire to live in peace with all the booksellers—and towards none does this desire direct itself [more] than towards Mr. Carey.'

"The aversion I formerly expressed to this warfare has not diminished. On the contrary, it is stronger than ever. I therefore make this one more effort to avoid it. Should we be engaged in it, I am determined to be able to exculpate myself from its consequences, whatever they may be.

"I have merited no ill treatment at your hands, except for the sin of differing from you, toto cœlo, in political opinions. I have done you no injury. In the account of your Life, you professed your gratitude towards me; what has cancelled this debt?

"I have, you must acknowledge, taken no common pains to escape a contest with you. To me it would be as irksome, as can well be conceived. For if you slander and abuse me, what am I to do? Very unfortunately, in bodily strength I am far your inferior.—Were I, as, in my humble opinion, every man ought, in such a case, to attempt to procure redress by the cudgel, for the injuries of the pen, it is more than probable I should only meet with an aggravation of the injury. But it is no reason, because I am weaker than you, that I am therefore to be subject to your unprovoked attacks.

"Shall I return slander for slander, abuse for abuse? In this line I am unpractised. I despise a recurrence to those weapons. Besides, the utmost of my ingenuity could devise nothing to add to what has been written against you ineffectually. I scorn to borrow scurrility from any man. I hope there is no vanity in the declaration, that in fair, open, gentlemanly controversy, there lives not a man from whom I would shrink—but abuse I have never employed, and never shall willingly.

"Should I sue you for damages?—Poor satisfaction to be derived from dancing attendance in courts, to have perhaps a few hundred dollars damages decreed, after an expense of time worth probably double the amount!

"What other alternative remains? You fight no duels. In this latter mode, the inequality arising from a disparity of strength and size, and from my lameness, is done away. But to this ultima ratio there are strong objections. Arms have been your trade for years: I have never drawn but two triggers in my life. Here, therefore, the inequality returns, though not in so great a degree. But this is not my only objection. I have a wife and four small children to support. On my industry they depend. I owe it to them to incur no honourably-avoidable risque: this motive, and a decent regard for the laws of the state, induce me to take every step that can be taken with propriety, to avert a commencement of hostilities. But powerful as these motives are, and powerful they must surely be allowed, no man shall abuse or insult me with impunity.

"I once more, sir, in the same spirit as dictated my former letter, declare, that I have never written or published a line or sentence against you. I have long done writing on politics. I have no concern in nor control over the Daily Advertiser; and cannot, therefore, be responsible for its contents. In fact, although I regard it as extremely well conducted in general, yet articles have appeared in it, which I disapprove as much as any thing that has ever appeared in your paper.

"I should be extremely sorry to have this letter ascribed, on the one hand, to a desire of intimidating you, or, on the other, to any fear of you. They are both equally remote from my heart. My wish is peace. I have done nothing to provoke hostility. As long as in my power, I shall avoid it—when it comes, I shall know how to meet it.

"This letter, like my former, is intended for your own perusal. The other, contrary, to my wishes, was divulged. Some anonymous miscreant scoundrel, whom perhaps I may discover and repay, stated it to be a deprecation of your wrath, for injuries I had offered. Heaven and hell are not more opposed to each other, than this idea is to truth.

MATHEW CAREY."

To this he made a harsh and angry reply, and continued to copy Fenno's squibs. I then sought to intimidate him, and wrote him the most severe letter I ever penned, of which I annex a specimen.

"Wretch as you are, accursed by God, and hated by man, the most tremendous scourge that hell ever vomited forth to curse a people, by sowing discord among them, I desire not the honour or credit of being abused or vilified by you. I have not leisure to attend to a controversy, unless I am driven to recommence the trade of newspaper printing, and make a profession of scribbling; this, if I cannot escape your coarse, low-lived abuse, I shall certainly and infallibly do—and then I will hold you up to the execration of mankind.

"But no; I will never disgrace my paper with your detested name. Callous and case-hardened, you draw subsistence from your infamy and notoriety. "Hiss'd and hooted by the pointing crowd," you care not, provided you can amass money enough to secure you a competence at the close of your dishonorable career.

But your writings I shall so cut up, and strip of their sophistry, as to make 'Folly's self to stare' and wonder how she could possibly have been so long duped by you.

* * * * *

"To send a challenge to a blasted, posted, loathsome coward, who, a disgrace to the name of a soldier, when he was called to account for his villainy, hen-heartedly took refuge under the strong arm of the law, and swore his life against the challenger, would sink me almost to a level with yourself. But, detested miscreant, if ever you dare approach the throne of heaven, pour out thanksgivings that I am so far inferior to you in bodily strength. Were I able to grapple with you single-handed, I swear by all my hopes of happiness, the inmost recesses of your dungeon-like labyrinths should not screen you from my vengeance! Heavens! what pride! what pleasure! I should feel in dragging you reeking from your den, and cow-skinning you, till Argus himself should not be able to perceive a hair's breadth upon your carcase but sore upon sore; so that were you and Lazarus candidates for the commiseration of the public, you would carry off the palm."*

DECEMBER 22d, 1798.

It has been generally supposed, and with some appearance of justice, that I was in a violent passion when I wrote this letter This is a great error.—Mrs. Carey sat opposite to me, while I was writing; and, as I wrote a dozen or twenty lines, I read them to her, and we burst into a fit of laughter at the extreme severity of the style—after which I resumed my pen.

This letter did not produce the effect of silencing him. However he seemed undetermined for some days what to do. The letter was sent on a Monday, and unnoticed by him till the following Saturday, whon he opened his batteries on me—and his attacks became more virulent than before. This induced me to publish a "Plumb Pudding for Peter Porcupine," in which I handled him with great severity in his own abusive style, and therein published our correspondence.

To turn this publication into ridicule, he sent his servant with some venison and jelly between two plates, in return for the Plumb Pudding. I did not feel disposed to let the affair pass sub silentio—and sent back his present by a stout Irish porter, above six feet high, with directions to let the plates fall in the middle of Cobbet's store, and, if possible, in his presence, and to be ready to defend himself in the event of aggression, pledging myself that I would, as far as the nature of the case permitted, bear him harmless. He performed the service faithfully, as he said—gave a scowling look of defiance at Cobbet, and came away unmolested.

This publication gave rise to a slight altercation with Robert Goodloe Harper. On the day of publication, he came to my store in company with Messrs. Swift, Coit and Dana, three members of Congress, and observed—"I understand you have been giving it to Cobbet."—"Yes," says I, "I have treated him in his own style I have no idea of fighting a man with a small sword, who has a wheelbarrow full of brickbats to knock my brains out. I have given him brickbat for brickbat." After some further conversation, "Give me," says he, "a copy; for I like to read all these blackguard things." Irritated by this rudeness, I said, "then, sir, you must like to read your own speeches; for by —— they are among the most blackguard things that have appeared in this country." He bit his lip, changed colour, and appeared undetermined whether or not to knock me down, which he could readily have done. At length, he walked off quietly, with tarnished laurels. I was, as may be supposed, tickled with the result, and mentioned the affair to all who came to my store in the afternoon. It made its way to the beer houses in the evening; to the Aurora in the morning; and into a large portion of the Democratic papers throughout the Union in due course.

LOVE NEVER SLEEPS.

"Love never sleeps!" The mother's eye
Bends o'er her dying infant's bed;
And as she marks the moments fly,
While death creeps on with noiseless tread,
Faint and distress'd, she sits and weeps,
With beating heart! "Love never sleeps!"

Yet, e'en that sad and fragile form
Forgets the tumult of her breast;
Despite the horrors of the storm,
O'erburthen'd nature sinks to rest;
But o'er them both another keeps
His midnight watch—"Love never sleeps!"

Around—above—the angel bands
Stoop o'er the care-worn sons of men;
With pitying eyes, and eager hands
They raise the soul to hope again;
Free as the air, their pity sweeps
The storms of time! "Love never sleeps!"

And round—beneath—and over all,
O'er men and angels, earth and heaven,
A higher bends! The slightest call
Is answer'd; and relief is given:
In hours of wo, when sorrow steeps
The heart in pain—"He never sleeps!"

Oh! God of love! our eyes to thee,
Tired of the world's false radiance, turn!
And as we view thy purity
We feel our hearts within us burn;
Convinced, that in the lowest deeps
Of human ill—"Love never sleeps."

MAN.—The nature of man, in one point of view, is so rich, so varied,—in another, so enigmatical, so incomprehensible, that it may well excite our fears.—The depth of the ocean furnishes forests of coral and beds of pearls; but they also are the abode of the most hideous monsters.

* I should have some reluctance about republishing these extracts and letters, but that all the abuse ever levelled at me by Cobbet is embalmed in "Cobbet's works" published in London in the year 1801, in 12 vols. and will be read when I am dead and gone. It is therefore not improper to record some portion of the off set matter.

CONVERSATION ON HUMAN NATURE AND KNOWLEDGE.

As steel by steel is polish'd and refined,
So mind is brighten'd by its kindred mind,
By conversation half our bliss is given;
And social meeting made an earthly Heaven;
A mutual benefit is thus bestowed—
And mutual power is gain'd for doing good.

"I have my own opinion concerning all things," said Mr. Wiseacre, as he seated himself in the garret of a literary student, and picked up one of the periodical publications of the day. "I have my opinion of all things, and I never yet could see the use of so much printing and publishing. The world is inundated with books—the shelves of our libraries groan with thousands of volumes, which are never read, and is the world any wiser now than in ancient times, when books were written with the pen and consequently, were so high in price, and so scarce that few could obtain them?"

Student. "The world has, perhaps, been ever nearly the same in virtue, and the mind of man from time immemorial, has been active in the dissemination of knowledge. If ancient books were scarce, philosophers were plenty to illuminate the world, by their lectures and conversations. Many of them travelled from Greece into distant regions to enlighten the ignorant, and consequently to increase their happiness. It is my opinion that the world has ever been the same, both in virtue and intelligence, though the wheel of fortune has been continually turning. As it is in society where some families once opulent became poor, and vice versa, so it has been with the world in matters of learning and virtue. Countries which once shone on the list of fame, have long since gone down to Gothic ignorance and barbarian darkness, while others have risen from obscurity and the long night of time, to splendour and glory. The mind of man will ever be active, hence idleness is the parent of crime; for if the mind has not the resource of learning, it will engage itself in reflections upon ignoble and vicious objects."

Wiseacre. "I infer from your reasoning, that you think all men happy in proportion to their knowledge. You certainly cannot mean it for the most ignorant are, in my opinion, the most happy."

Student. "Your proposition ends almost in a paradox. It is true that small things give pleasure to the ignorant mind, upon which the wise man would look down upon in contempt. On the contrary, having little sensibility, and being unconscious of his deficiency, the ignorant man feels not the neglect of the world, and writhes not beneath the envy of cotemporary rivals. But then his happiness is only negative, a mere case originating in the absence of sensibility. Like the brute, he eats and sleeps without pain, but is entirely ignorant of that exquisite happiness which springs in the mind capable of reflecting and feeling the sublime delights of life and learning. In the one happiness is negative, and in the other positive."

Wiseacre. "I must confess I am one of those who believe that the human race, would be happier in a state of nature. You must confess that whenever civilization and christianity have been carried into a nation of barbarians, they have become more vicious and wretched. Witness the North American Indians."

Student. "Ay, witness the North American Indians. But has it been the introduction of the arts, and moral principles of civilization—has it been the introduction of the glorious gospel, teaching humility, love, and good fellowship to all men, which has degraded the condition of the North American Indians? No, sir, it has been the introduction of our vices, not our virtues. To them drunkenness has been more fatal than Capua was to Hannibal, or the Syrens to the mariners of Ulysses."

Wiseacre. "Are you prepared to say that the introduction of civilization and christianity never injured a nation or degraded a people?"

Student. "I am: and I am equally prepared to say, that the downfall of christianity would be the ruin of all. Take away the restraints imposed by religion, and where would the unbridled passions of man lead him? Witness the fatal anarchy which skepticism introduced into France. The very moment that christianity was abolished, the reign of terror commenced, and no sooner did the bloody Robespiere become a skeptic, than he also become a tyrant. So much was Napoleon Bonaparte convinced that skepticism paved the way for the revolution in France, that he once observed, while standing by his tomb, that it would have been better for France, had Jean Jacques Rosseau never lived. The doctrines of the French Illuminati, the doctrines of Voltaire, of Mirabeau, D'Aleumbert, Maupertuis and a hundred others, had a direct tendency to throw off that restraint which chains man to his duty, and to stimulate the the worst passions of his nature."

Wiseacre. "Do you not believe that there were other and greater causes which led to the French Revolution?"

Student. "I do not; for the first spread of skepticism changed men into tigers. No sooner did they throw off their allegiance to God, and their fears of futurity, than they were prepared for crime; and ready to baptize the land in the blood of their fathers and brothers."

Wiseacre. "Then you are in favour of christianity, even putting aside future rewards and punishments?"

Student. "Yes, sir; I believe that christianity makes better society, and better men, and even admitting that there were no futurity, I would still give my vote in favour of its being upheld and retained."

Wiseacre. "In your zeal you forget how many oceans of blood have been shed by, and how many wars have been the consequence of the spirit of christianity. Witness the Crusades, the fires of Smithfield, and ——"

Student. "But you must recollect that they sprung not from the spirit of christianity, but from a mistaken notion of it. Christianity possesses inherent virtue, and cannot be charged with the follies of man, neither can those follies bring disgrace upon it. Christ only died for, or to redeem the sins of mankind; he was not chargeable with them."

Wiseacre. "Well, I must confess that I am in some degree skeptically inclined, more from principle, however, than through pride. I am sometimes inclined to doubt the existence of the Supreme Being."

Student. "No man in his senses can do that. I would advise you never to acknowledge it, for the greater mass of mankind are against you, and consequently you will gain an unenvied fame. Can you be blind to the evidences around you? All nature cries aloud, and declares the existence of a God. There is not a fruit that reddens in the sun, there is not a flower that blushes in the light, nor a blade of grass that waves in the wind but that testifies to the great architect divine. Who but a Superior Being could form the flower, and paint it with its delicate tints? Who but God, could have formed the complicated creature, man, and united two such dissimilar natures as mind and matter, making each dependant on the other?"

Wiseacre. "I do not believe in the union of mind and matter. I am a firm believer in the doctrines of Dr. Priestly, and other materialists, who tell us that the fibres of the brain when moving give us our ideas, and constitute what we call mind. In other words, I believe that the soul or mind is the life, and consequently that it pervades the whole body and ceases with its vitality."

Student. "Then if a man have the misfortune to have his arm or leg amputated, he looses a corresponding part of his soul. It matters not, however, as you believe in annihilation."

Wiseacre. "You mistake me, sir; permit me to explain. Scripture tells us that God approached Adam in the garden of Eden, and breathed into him the breath of life, and he became a living soul. Now we are told by some of the best scholars, that this is a wrong translation; and that it should have been 'the breath of lives.' Now according to a great writer, this breath of lives signifies the five senses, without which, or at the cessation of which, man instantly ceases to exist. Through the five senses we gain all our ideas; for it is utterly impossible to imagine any thing that we have not previously seen, heard of, smelt, tasted or felt. You mistake in supposing I doubt the immortality of the soul."

Student. "Then your doctrine seems inconsistent. If your soul is a part of, and dependant upon your body, it cannot leave it after death. How can you reconcile this?"

Wiseacre. "You have not a proper idea, sir, of the doctrine of materialism. When a common machine, stops the substance which it manufactures stops also; so it is with the machine called man. The brain, aided by the external power of the senses, manufactures ideas or thoughts, or in other words the mind. Now, sir, it is evident, that so soon as the brain and the senses become quiescent, the mind must also cease."

Student. "No doubt you think your reasoning ingenious; but it is mere theory at last, without proof."

Wiseacre. "Not so, sir; I will prove it. Suppose a man to receive a fracture of the arm, thigh or leg, you will observe that his mind is still clear and unobscured; but suppose his skull is fractured so as to obstruct the movement of the fibres of the brain, where then is the mind? Suppose a man drowned and taken from the water lifeless; his heart is still, his body is cold, and would never recover without the aid of artificial means. His heart is again set in motion, the brain goes on, the senses are awakened, and he is again a living soul. Ask him where his soul was during the period he was dead, and he will tell you he has no consciousness of the elapse of time. A man dies and lies in the grave thousands of years, without any consciousness of the elapse of time. When we have slept a number of hours, the time appears but as a moment, though we are still living, and if we have a little consciousness in our sleep, what idea of time's flight can we have in the grave."

Student. "I object to your proof. In the first place, the drowned man is not dead, the vital principle is still there, and we know not where life leaves off, and death begins. We have no proof of death but putrefaction; and no man was ever resuscitated after putrefaction had taken place. In the second place, your theory runs counter to Holy Writ, which positively declares that the soul not only leaves the body after death, but, that it goes to happiness or misery. Your theory of materialism is at best but an Utopian dream, which can be productive of no benefit either to the living or the dead. It is a subject which we never can fathom until death sets the prisoner free. I will agree with you that there are some parts of knowledge which are useless. God has given us sufficient intellect to understand all in this world that can be of use to us; but when we undertake to go beyond our limit, all is darkness and confusion. A finite mind cannot comprehend infinite things, and when we dive into the origin of first causes we seek knowledge which is useless, and beyond our reach. Still an increase of ordinary knowledge is an increase of happiness. The cultivated mind is happy in its own reflections—whether in solitude or the crowded hall, while the vacant mind must seek for recreation and amusement in external objects. How listless, how uneasy is the ignorant mind when left alone—while to the cultivated one, every flower, and every charm of nature is ripe with happiness."

Wiseacre. "I hold in my hand one of the common periodicals of the day—filled with poetry, anecdotes, and tales of love and life. Of what benefit to mankind are such writings?"

Student. "Of the greatest benefits, as I shall prove. Polite literature, and light reading, have a tendency to refine, to exalt and elevate the tone of society. Who has not noticed the powerful effect of ridicule on the follies of a whole community or nation, and what melancholy mind has not reaped the advantage of wit in many a hearty laugh. The Spectator of Addison revolutionized the corrupt society of London. Poetry and tales of which you speak contemptibly, have had their advantages in all ages. He who has read most poetry, knows the most of refined feelings, for it has a direct tendency to refine the heart. What an unbounded influence have national songs and ballads over the patriotic feelings of the people. What wanderer on the shores of Europe has not shed tears while listening to the plaintive air of "Home, sweet Home?" What patriotic heart has not leaped, listening to the "Star Spangled Banner?" Literary fiction cultivates in us the finest principles, stimulating us to the practice of virtue, benevolence, gratitude, friendship, and many other duties, without the observance of which, life is but a misanthropic pilgrimage, and society a desert or wilderness."

Wiseacre. "But do you not think that one active benefactor bestows on mankind more benefits than all the sciences? For instance, Robert Fulton, the inventor of the steam boat, or Dr. Franklin."

Student. "If you have reflected a moment, you would have seen that these men owed more than half their usefulness to their knowledge of the sciences. What would either of them have done without an acquaintance with mathematics and natural philosophy? What would commerce be without that little instrument, the compass, the offspring of science? Mankind do not know how much they are indebted to the sciences. The cook who is making bread, and the man whom you see from the window putting a tire on a wheel, do not know that they are performing chymical operations. He heats the iron, places it upon the wheel, and then pours water on it, though he is not acquainted with the grand law in nature that cold contracts, and heat expands all bodies. He does not know that he is operating under the same law when he heats the steel tool red hot, and plunges it into cold water or oil to make it hard. Neither does he who carbonizes iron, to convert it into steel, know the nature of carbon, or that it is one of the few grand principles of nature. The good housewife, also, makes her soap without any idea that she is so much indebted to science."

Wiseacre. "I will agree with you that some of the sciences, particularly, those upon which the arts are founded and dependent, have been useful to mankind. But there is Natural History ——"

Student. "Natural History is of the greatest use to mankind in many points of view. Without its aid we never should have known the strength and fleetness of the horse, or the luxury of the patient cow. Without the study of Natural History, we could not have known the fidelity of the dog, and the friendship of the dignified and familiar cat. We should also have remained strangers to the useful sheep, and never have known the luxury of animal food. Of the qualities of game, we should have known nothing—to our palates, the innumerable luxuries of the sea would have been locked up. Nothing more strongly convinces us of the existence of a Supreme Being, than the study of Natural History. Look at the operations of the Silk Worm, and the Bee, and you will at once acknowledge that chance never created them. See the ingenuity displayed in the Lobster. He is so firmly incased in his shell, that he cannot slip out of it, and yet if it remain upon him, he cannot grow. So avoid this dilemma, at a certain period the shell bursts, and the naked animal is liberated. How wisely has God distributed the various animals over the earth, to benefit man! On the great deserts where man has no fixed habitation, he has placed the Camel, which is capable of enduring fatigue, where the horse would expire for want of water and food. In Lapland, where eternal snows covers the earth, the Rein Deer is placed, to the eye of which is fitted a skin, in the centre of which is a small aperture, through which the animal may see without having his eye injured by the drifting flakes of frozen snow. The horse would perish in either situation; for he has neither the water reservoir of the Camel to supply him on the desert, nor the eye shield of the Rein Deer to protect his eye from the frozen snow. Here you see the evident intention of the Diety; for if chance had formed them, it is more than probable that they would have chanced to have been stationed in the wrong place, or the qualities of one given to another."

Wiseacre. "If a knowledge of science points out and proves the existence of the Diety, why are so many learned men skeptics? Why were Voltaire, Volney, and Rosseau, among the French; and Hume, Gibbon, and others among the English, unbelievers? Can you fathom the mystery?"

Student. "Fashion governs every thing. Many learned men, ashamed of old established opinions, wish to dazzle the world with something new—and to attract attention by the singularity of their doctrines. Neither Voltaire nor Gibbon, neither Hume nor Paine, would ever have been so universally known, had they not struck at, and attempted to overthrow the established opinions of the religious world. We are told by the ancient historians, that Ærostratus set fire to the Temple of Diana, at Ephesus, to immortalize his name, he having despaired by honorable means of transmitting his reputation to posterity. Pride no doubt instigated men in the first instances to become skeptics—and many afterwards were actuated by pride in patterning after them. The French school of Deists and Atheists, attempted to propagate their doctrines in England, and succeeded in corrupting a few of the profligate,—but they were met by such men as Addison, Cowper, and Johnson, and put to flight. When the talented and pious Addison was on his death bed, he sent for his son-in-law, a wild young infidel, and after bearing witness of the purity of the christian religion, he added in a triumphant tone—"see how a christian can die!" A strong proof that all learned skeptics affect their doctrines through pride, is the fact that those doctrines will not support them in the hour of death. Voltaire's pride supported him on his death bed whenever his pupils were present, and he cried—"Crush the wretch," meaning Jesus Christ; but so soon as they were absent he cried to his offended God, to have mercy upon him. Many men have become skeptics merely through a low desire to imitate others, whom they have considered their superiors. Nothing is more contemptible than to affect to imitate the follies and weaknesses of great or distinguished men."

Wiseacre. "Do you not believe the world is governed too much by Priestcraft and delusion?"

Student. "That is the old cry among infidels. Yet it must be admitted that there is too much superstition, bigotry and fanaticism—but they are all paliated by the fact that they originate in ignorance. The christian religion is not chargeable with them; for they spring from a mistaken notion of it, and no sooner is the light of knowledge shed upon the minds of men, than they fly before it as the mists of night before the rising orb of day. On the contrary, it is a melancholy fact that an increase of knowledge in any country, always brings with it a corresponding increase of shrewdness, duplicity, and crime. The Roman people were never more wicked, than when they were in the plenitude of knowledge, and at the height of their glory. Our cities are more enlightened than smaller communities, and the ratio of crime is far greater. This may be accounted for. It is said, that it is a bad rule which will not work both ways. Knowledge gives to a good man a greater capacity to do good, and vice versa; when a naturally bad man becomes enlightened, his capacity for doing evil, is greater because his mind has power to invent stratagems and evil designs which the ignorant would never dream of."

Wiseacre. "As the ancient said to Paul, 'almost thou persuadest me to be a christian,' and to love knowledge. Were it not too late, I would immediately apply myself to the acquisition of both."

Student. "It is never too late to do good. No man has an idea of what he may perform with diligent attention, and properly directed genius. Some of the most talented and learned men, have risen to great eminence by their own exertions from the lowest obscurity. Great philosophers have contended in early life with obscurity, poverty, and deficient education. Genius with industry will shine."

Wiseacre. "Have you any examples within the scope of your recollection?"

Student. "I have, and I might mention a long list of such names as Franklin, Rittenhouse, and Fulton, in this country, and Herschell, Adam Clark, and Simpson, the mathematician, in England."

Wiseacre. "If I understand you right, you are a believer in genius. Some philosophers teach the doctrine that there is no such thing as genius; that all have an equal capacity for learning; and that the superior success of some, depends upon superior advantages or opportunities, and more laborious application. This is, I must confess, most flattering. Will you favour me with your opinion on the subject?"

Student. "I will do so with pleasure; for conversation is enumerated by the great Dr. Watts, as one of the great means of increasing knowledge. It is as certain that one mind may possess a superior capacity to another, as that one memory is superior to that faculty in another mind. Witness two children of the same parents. Both have the same opportunity and the same teacher. That one with a superior capacity will have a desire for knowledge; for that desire always follows genius, and he will readily acquire whatever he attempts, while the other will toil on without any material increase. The one will acquire without effort, that which the other never can master with laborious application. Some men appear to have an universal genius for the acquirement of the sciences, or the arts as it may happen. They will take up an art which they have never learned, and excel those who have spent their lives in the employment. It appears that in the most of families there is one child which possesses more talent than all the rest—and hence it is exceedingly rare that more than one rises to distinction in the same family. There is as much difference between genius and mere application as there is between reason and instinct."

Wiseacre. "You cannot convince me that there is any difference between the reason of man, and the instinct of brute creation. Do you call instinct inferior or superior to reason?"

Student. "It is inferior by all means. Instinct is not a less degree of reason, as cold is the absent of heat—but it is, in my opinion, quite a different principle. It supplies in the brute the want of judgment as well as réason. It is to the brute precisely what reason is to man, though not the same principle."

Wiseacre. "You say it is inferior to reason. Can man with all his ingenious art build a bird's nest?"

Student. "No, sir; for the best reason in the world, he has not the materials required. The nest is modelled by the body of the bird, and hence you see again that God fits every thing to circumstances."

Wiseacre. "There is one act performed by the common hen, which I think will convince you that instinct is nothing less than reason. In summer when the weather is warm, the hen comes off from her nest and remains a long time, whereas, in winter her stay from her eggs is of short duration, proving that she is aware that should she remain off so long in the winter, the eggs would chill, and the young chick die. Then how reasonable does she act in turning over her eggs every day and changing the place of those which have had least warmth."

Student. "Your reasoning appears very reasonable, but it will not stand the test of scrutiny. The hen will sit upon painted blocks or the eggs of a goose without knowing the difference, and sometimes when robbed will sit upon the ground. She will hatch the eggs of the duck, and when the young ducks enter the water, will fly along the shore, alarmed for their safety. Now had she a particle of reason, she would know that they are ducks, and consequently fitted by nature for swimming in the water. No, sir, God never intended to endow these creatures with reason, because they would then have become fearful of death from a knowledge of it, and consequently, would have either resisted man, or fled from him in terror."

Wiseacre. "Indeed, sir, you hem me in on every side and if you refute my next proposition, I shall give up the contest and acknowledge you, as I must, my superior in knowledge. I was once travelling over an old bridge, through which my horse broke and injured his leg. The next year I had occasion to travel, not over the same bridge to be sure; for a new one had been put in its place; the horse refused to go over, nor could I force him over. It was at that place he had been injured, and he remembered it. Are you prepared to say that he did not reason?"

Student. "I will readily agree that your horse remembered having been injured; for horses have the faculty of memory—but I will not agree that he reasoned correctly; for if he had he would have been convinced, that though he fell through an old decayed bridge, it was no reason he should fall through a new one, made strong enough to bear a hundred times his weight."

Wiseacre. "You are right, sir; I see my error and resign the contest. I am also convinced of the value of knowledge, and the pleasure I have enjoyed during this conversation convinces me that you are right in saying that where there is an increase of knowledge, there is an increase of happiness. The correct philosophical ideas I have gained from your reasoning will have a tendency to do away my skeptical notions which I now confess, originated in ignorance."

Student. "The study of philosophy either makes us better or worse—depending upon the use we make of our knowledge. In like manner the greatest blessing may become a curse."

Wiseacre. "Well, sir, for the present I must bid you adieu. There are other subjects I should be happy to discuss with you, and shall give myself the pleasure of calling again in your garret."

Student. "Sir, I shall be extremely happy to see you. Adieu!" MILFORD BARD.

(From a volume of Poems, by John Mackay Wilson.)

THE CLYDE AND TWEED.

Nursed on a rocky mountain's breast,
Two twin-born rivers played;
And parting, one rushed fleetly west,
The other eastward strayed.

The Clyde rolled on,—a warrior's song
Of triumph; while the Tweed
With stilly murmur swept along,
Its voice the shepherd's reed.

A bridegroom leaping light with joy,
On, onward bounded Clyde;
The Tweed, a maiden, timid, coy,
Moved like a blushing bride.

The Clyde rushed forth in glory, where
The sunbeams revelled wild;
The Tweed in beauty, softly, fair,
Was kissed by moonlight mild.

Sublimity and Beauty's tread
Impressed their favoured Clyde;
While loveliness hung o'er the Tweed,
And slumbered on its side.

The Clyde embraced a golden Firth,
Where lake and mountain shone,
And fairy islands left the earth
To deck their marriage throne.

The Tweed her deckings cast aside,
Plain was her bridal bed—
Fair Tweed an unadorned bride
The hoary Ocean wed.

Biographical Sketch of Haydn.

Joseph HAYDN, born 1732, in the village of Rohaur on the borders of Hungary and Austria. His father, a poor wheelwright, played on the harp on Sundays, his mother accompanying with her voice. When the boy was five years old, he used, during his parents' performance, to make motions with a board and a stick, as if he was playing the violin. A schoolmaster, whom accident led to this concert, observing that Joseph kept good time, asked permission to take him to his school. Here he learned to read and write, and received instruction in singing and in playing on the violin and other instruments. After he had been here 2 years, he became, at the age of 8 years, a chorister in St. Stephen's. At the age of ten years, he composed pieces for six or eight voices. "I then thought," he afterwards remarked, laughingly, "that the blacker the paper, the finer the music." With his fine soprano, he lost his place, in his 16th year. His situation was now very discouraging, and he had a foretaste of the difficulties which await an artist without fortune or patrons. He gave instructions in music, played in the orchestra, and occupied himself with composing. "With my worm-eaten harpsichord," said he, "I did not envy the lot of kings." At that time, the six first sonatas of Emanuel Bach fell into his hands. "I did not leave the harpsichord," said he, "until they were played through, from beginning to end; and any one, who knows me, must perceive that I owe much to Emanuel Bach; that I have carefully studied his style; and he himself once paid me a compliment about it." The youth at length had the good fortune to become acquainted with a Mlle. de Martinez, the friend of Metastasio. He instructed her in singing and playing on the harpsichord, for which he received his board and lodging. The first opera-poet of the age and the first composer of the symphonies thus lived in the same house, though in very different circumstances. The poet, honored with the favor of the court, lived in the midst of pleasures, while the poor musician was obliged to pass the days in bed, for want of fuel. When Mlle. de Martinez left Vienna, Haydn was again plunged in the greatest distress. He retired into the suburb of Leopoldstadt, where a hair-dresser took him into his house. This residence had a fatal influence over the rest of his life. He married the daughter of his host, who poisoned his happiest days. Haydn was 18 years old when he composed his first quartetto, which met with general success, and encouraged him to new efforts. At the age of 19, he composed the Devil on Two Sticks, an opera which was forbidden, on account of its satirical character, after its third representation. Haydn now became so celebrated, that prince Esterhazy placed him at the head of his private chapel. For this prince he composed some beautiful symphonies,—a department in which he excelled all other composers,—and the greatest part of his fine quartetts. Here he also composed the symphony known by the name of Haydn's Departure, in which one instrument stops after another, and each musician, as soon as he has finished, puts out his light, rolls up his note book, and retires. When, after a period of about 20 years, the prince Esterhazy reduced his court, and Haydn received his discharge, he went to London, to which he had often been invited. In 1794, he made a second journey thither. He found a most splendid reception, and the University of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of doctor of music. In England, Haydn first became generally known; he had not enjoyed an extensive reputation in his native country. On his return from England, he purchased a small house and garden in one of the suburbs of Vienna. Here he composed the Creation and the Seasons. The former work, which is full of the fire of youth, was finished in his 65th year. The Seasons, his last work, was completed in 11 months. Among his numerous works are also a Te Deum, a Stabat, many concerts, marches, masses, &c. Haydn made a new epoch in instrumental music. Inexhaustible in invention and execution, always new and original always surprising and satisfying the hearer, he ruled the taste of the age. His symphonies have all these characteristics. From him the quartetts first obtained a spirit and an artful involution, which enraptured connoisseurs. Some years before his death, which happened May 31, 1809, the Dilettanti Society in Vienna concluded their winter concerts with a splendid performance of the Creation, to which Haydn was invited. His reception made a great impression on him, weakened as he was by age, but his own work affected him still more deeply; and, at the passage "It was light," overpowered by the harmony which he had himself created, the tears ran down his cheeks, and, with upraised arms, he cried, "Not from me, but thence does all this come!" He sunk under the weight of his feeling, and was obliged to be carried out.

SHERIDAN.

Taylor, of the Opera House, used to say of Sheridan, that he could not pull off his hat to him in the street without its costing him fifty pounds, and if he stopped to speak to him, it was a hundred. No one could be a stronger instance than he was of what is called living from hand to mouth. He was always in want of money, though he received vast sums which he must have disbursed; and yet no one can tell what became of them, for he paid nobody. He spent his wife's fortune (sixteen hundred pounds) in a six weeks jaunt to Bath, and returned to town as poor as a rat. Whenever he and his son were invited out into the country, they always went into a post chaise and four; he in one and his son following in another. This is the secret of those who live in a round of extravagance, and are at the same time always in debt and difficulty. They throw away all the ready money they get upon any new-fangled whim or project that comes in their way, and never think of paying off old scores, which of course accumulate to a dreadful amount. "Such gain the cap of him who makes them fine, yet keeps his book uncrossed." Sheridan once wanted to take Mrs. Sheridan a very handsome dress down into the country, and went to Barber and Nunn's to order it, saying he must have it by such a day, but promising they should have ready money. Mrs. Barber, (I think it was) made answer that the time was short, but that ready money was a charming thing, and that he should have it. Accordingly, at the time appointed, she brought the dress, which came to five and twenty pounds, and it was sent in to Mr. Sheridan, who sent out a Mr. Grimm, (one of his jackalls,) to say that he admired it exceedingly, and that he was sure Mrs. Sheridan would be delighted with it, but he was sorry to have nothing under a hundred pound bank note in the house.

She said she had come provided for such an accident, and could give change for a hundred, two hundred, or five hundred pound note, if it were necessary. Grimm then went back to his principal for further instructions, who made an excuse that he had no stamped receipt by him. For this, Mrs. B. said, she was also provided: she had brought one in her pocket. At each message she could hear them laugh heartily in the next room, at the idea of having met with their match for once; and presently after Sheridan came out in high good humour, and paid her the amount of her bill in ten, five and one pound notes. Once when a creditor brought him a bill for payment, which had often been presented before, and the man complained of its soiled and tattered state, and said he was quite ashamed to see it, "I tell you what I would advise you to do with it my friend," said Sheridan, "take it home and write it upon parchment!"

He once mounted a horse, which a horse dealer was showing off near a coffee-house at the bottom of St. James's street, rode it to Tattersall's, and sold it, and walked quietly back to the spot from which he set out. The owner was furious, swore he would be the death of him; and, in a quarter of an hour afterwards, they were seen sitting together over a bottle of wine in the coffee-house, the horse-jockey with the tears running down his cheeks at Sheridan's jokes, and almost ready to hug him as an honest fellow.

Sheridan's house and lobby were beset with duns every morning, who were told that Mr. Sheridan was not yet up, and shown into the several rooms on each side of the entry. As soon as he had breakfasted, he asked, "Are those doors all shut, John?" and being assured they were, marched out very deliberately between them, to the astonishment of his self-invited guests, who soon found the bird was flown.

I have heard one of his old city friends declare, that such was the effect of his frank, cordial manner, and insinuating eloquence, that he was always afraid to go to ask him for a debt of long standing, lest he should borrow twice as much.

ANECDOTES OF O'CONNELL.

One of O'Connell's earliest displays of acuteness was at Tralee, in the year 1799, shortly after he had been called to the Bar. In the intricate case where he was Junior counsel, (having got the brief more as a family compliment than from any other cause,) the question in dispute was as to the validity of a will, which had been made almost in articula mortis. The instrument was drawn up with proper form; the witnesses were examined and gave ample confirmation that the deed had been legally executed. One of them was an old servant, possessed of a strong passion for speaking. It fell to O'Connell to cross-examine him, and the young barrister allowed him to speak on, in the hope that he might say too much. Nor was this hope disappointed. The witness had already sworn that he saw the deceased sign the will. "Yes," continued he, with all the garrulousness of old age, "I saw him sign it, and surely there was life in him at the time." The expression frequently repeated, led O'Connell to conjecture that it had a peculiar meaning. Fixing his eye upon the old man, he said, "You have taken a solemn oath before God and man to speak the truth, and the whole truth—the eye of God is upon you; the eyes of your neighbors are upon you also. Answer me, by the virtue of that sacred and solemn oath which has passed your lips, was the testator alive when he signed the will?" The witness was struck with the solemn manner in which he was addressed, his colour changed—his lips quivered—his limbs trembled, and he faltered out the reply, "there was life in him." The question was repeated in a more impressive manner, and the result was that O'Connell half compelled, half cajoled him to admit, that, after life was extinct, a pen had been put into the testator's hand—that one of the party guided it to sign his name, while, as a salve for the consciences of all concerned, a living fly was put into the dead man's mouth, to qualify the witnesses to bear testimony that "there was life in him" when he signed that will. This fact, literally dragged from the witness, preserved a large property in a respectable and worthy family, and was the first occurrence in O'Connell's legal career, worth mentioning. Miss Edgeworth, in her, "Patronage," has an incident not much different from this—perhaps it was suggested by it. The plaintiffs in this case were two sisters, named Langton, both of whom still enjoy the property miraculously preserved to them by the ingenuity of O'Connell; and the writer of this sketch has often heard them relate the manner in which he had contrived to elicit the truth.

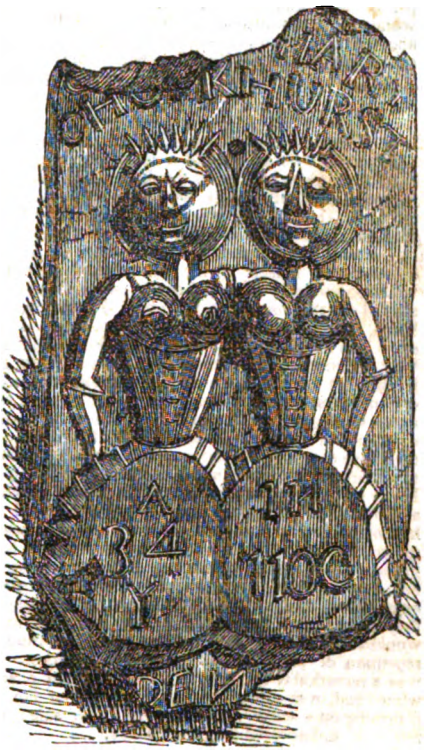
Again—One of the most remarkable personages in Cork, for a series of years, was a sharp-witted little fellow named John Boyle, who published a periodical called "The Freebolder." As Boyle did not see that any peculiar dignity hedged the Corporation of Cork, his "Freebolder" was remarkable for severe and satirical remarks upon its members, collectively and personally. Owing to the very great precautions as to the mode of publication, it was next to impossible for the Corporation to proceed against him for libel—if they could have done so, his punishment was certain; for, in those days, there was none but Corporation Juries—and the fact that Boyle was hostile to the municipal clique, was quite enough for these worthy administrators of justice. It happened on the occasion of a crowded benefit, that Boyle and one of the Sheriffs were coming out of the pit of the theatre at the same moment. A sudden crash drove the scribe against the Sheriff, and the concussion was such that the latter had two of his ribs broken. There could be no doubt that the whole was accidental; but it was too lucky not to be taken advantage of. Mr. Boyle was prosecuted for assault,—O'Connell (who was personally inimical to the Corporation) scarcely cross-examined a witness, and called none in defence. He proceeded to reply. After some hyperbolical compliments on the "well known impartiality, independence, and justice of a Cork jury," he proceeded to address them thus:

I had no notion that the case is what it is; therefore I can call no witnesses. As I have received a brief and its accompaniment—a fee, I must address you, I am not in the vein for making a long speech—so, gentlemen, instead of it, I shall tell you a story. Some years ago, I went specially, to Clonmell assizes, and accidentally witnessed a trial which I never shall forget. A wretched man, a native of that county, was charged with the murder of his neighbor. It seemed that an ancient feud existed between them. They had met at a fair, and exchanged blows: again, that evening, they met at a low pot-house, and the bodily interference of friends alone prevented a fight between them. The prisoner was heard to vow vengeance against his rival. The wretched victim left the house, followed soon after by the prisoner, and was found next day on the road-side, murdered, and his face so barbarously beaten in by a stone that he could only be identified by his dress. The facts were strong against the prisoner—in fact it was the strongest case of circumstantial evidence I ever met with. As a form—of his guilt there was no doubt—the prisoner was called on for his defence. He called, to the surprise of every one, the murdered man. And the murdered man came forward. It seemed that another man had been murdered; that the identification by dress was vague, for all the peasantry of Tipperary wear the same description of clothes; that the presumed victim had got a hint that he would be arrested under the Whiteboy act; had fled, and only returned, with a noble and Irish feeling of justice, when he found that his ancient foe was in jeopardy on his account. The case was clear; the prisoner was innocent. The Judge told the Jury that it was unnecessary to charge them. They requested permission to retire; they returned in about two hours, when the foreman, with a long face, handed him the verdict, 'guilty.' Every one was astonished. 'Good God!' said the Judge, 'of what is he guilty? Not of murder, surely?' 'No, my Lord,' said the Foreman, 'but if he did not murder that man, sure he stole my gray mare three years ago.'"

The Cork Jurors laughed heartily at this anecdote; ere the mirth had time to cool, O'Connell continued with marked emphasis, "So gentlemen of the Jury, if Mr. Boyle did not wilfully assault the Sheriff, he has libelled the Corporation; find him guilty by all means!" The application was so severe that the Jury, shamed into justice, instantly acquitted Mr. Boyle.

EASTER CUSTOM.



An account of the Biddenden Maids in Kent, Born joined at the hips and shoulders.

On Easter Sunday in every year after Divine Service in the afternoon in the Parish of Biddenden, in the county of Kent, there are by the Church-wardens, given to the Strangers about 1000 Rolls with an impression on them similar to the Plate. The origin of this Custom is thus related.

In the year 1100 at Biddenden, in Kent, were born Elizabeth and Mary Chulkhurst, Joined together by the Hips and Shoulders, and who lived in that state Thirty Four Years!! At the expiration of which time, one of them was taken ill and after a short period died; the surviving one was advised to be separated from the corpse which she absolutely refused by saying these words, "as we came together, we will also go together," and about six hours after her sister's decease, she was taken ill and died also. A stone near the Rector's Pew marked with a diagonal line is shewn as the place of interment.

The moon on the east orial shone,
Through slender shafts of shapely stone,
The silver light, so pale and faint,
Shewed the twin sisters and many a saint;
Whose images on the glass were dyed;
Mysterious maidens side by side,

The moon beam kissed the holy pane,
And threw on the pavement a mystic stain.

It is further stated, that by their will, they bequeathed to the Church-wardens of the Parish of Biddenden, and their successors, Church-wardens for ever, certain pieces or parcels of Land, in the Parish, containing about 20 Acres, which is hired at 40 Guineas per annum, and that in commemoration of this wonderful Phenomenon of Nature, the Rolls and about 300 Quartern loaves and Cheeses in proportion, should be given to the Poor Inhabitants of the Parish.

ANECDOTES OF PARROTS.

From the Miscellany of Natural History.

In passing by a garden, (of a house the narrator visited at the Cape,) we heard a talking which our Portuguese, after attentively listening, pronounced to be "plain Dutch," nor was it long, before we had a specimen of as "plain English." After our ears were saluted with the squalling and screaming of a fowl in distress, and indeed, in the act of being strangled, which excited our astonishment, as we could see all around us, the voice of a boy under flagellation was heard, crying out most lustily, "O Lord, sir! O Lord, sir, it was not I, sir; I never saw the old cock before, Sir." To unravel this mystery, we went back to the house once more; and, on making known the strange circumstance, we were conducted to the garden, and a tree was pointed out to us, where we saw, almost enveloped in the thick foliage, the arch deceiver in the shape of a large cockatoo. I was at a loss which to admire most, the half stifled and broken sobbing (if I may so call it) of the fowl, or the outcry of the boy, as detected in killing and stealing what belonged to his neighbor. The girl told us their father had lately given the amazing price of fifteen dollars for this bird in Cape Town; and that it spoke in different languages but that in all of them it made use of such gross expressions, and swore so profanely, they supposed they should soon be obliged to part with it. Nor would they stay long in the garden, possibly fearing a repetition of "plain Dutch," by the same author. It was a remarkably fine bird, in full feather, and nearly white: and, in shutting its eyes, a large sort of fan, as if turning on a spindle, rose up from either side from the neck, and covered them completely.

The following curious circumstances occurred with a couple of parrots in London. A tradesman who had a shop in the Old Bailey, opposite the prison, kept two parrots, much to the annoyance of his neighbors, one of which was green and the other grey. The green parrot was taught to speak when there was a knock at the street door,—the grey put in his word whenever the bell was rung; but they only knew two short phrases of English a-piece, though they pronounced these very distinctly. The house in which these Thebans lived had a projecting old fashioned front, so that the first floor could not be seen from the pavement on the same side of the way; and one day, when they were left at home by themselves, hanging out of a window, some one knocked at the street door. "Who's there?" said the green parrot, in the exercise of his office.—"The man with the leather!" was the reply,—to which the bird answered with his further store of language, which was "Oh, ho!" Presently, the door not being opened as he expected, the stranger knocked a second time. "Who's there!" said the green parrot again, "who's there!" said the man with the leather; "why dont you come down?" to which the parrot made the same answer, "Oh, ho!" This response so enraged the visiter, that he dropped the knocker and rung furiously at the house bell; but this proceeding brought the grey parrot, who called out in a new voice, "Go to the gate." "To the gate!" mustered the appellant, who saw no such convenience, and, moreover, imagined that the servants were bantering him. "What gate?" cried he, getting out into the kennel, that he might have the advantage of seeing his interlocutor. "Newgate," responded the grey parrot, just at the moment when his species was discovered.

What proved a peculiar sagacity in the imitations of Dr. Thornton's parrot, was that they were effected sometimes without his voice; for example, there was a scissors grinder, who came every day into the street where the bird was kept. All parrots have a file in the inside of the upper mandible, with which they grind down the under bill, and in this they are employed an hour every evening. This sound people usually mistake for snoring. This scraping was attempted, but the nice ear marked the difference; and he had recourse to his claws, which he struck against the perch, armed with tin, and observing the time of the turning of the wheel, he effected a most exact imitation, which he repeated every Friday. Sometimes the child's pap would be taken to the window, and beaten with a spoon; this he would immediately imitate by striking his bill against the side of his perch.

Parrots are sometimes extremely quick in picking up certain words that happen to strike their ears; and this they often do very untowardly, so as afterwards to repeat them with an apparently mischievous intent. We remember a parrot which belonged to a lady, which was the innocent means of getting its mistress into a very unfortunate scrape. A friend of hers having called one afternoon, the conversation of the two ladies took that turn towards petty scandal, to which, we grieve to say, it is but too frequently bent. The friend mentioned the name of a lady of their acquaintance. "Mrs.——!" exclaimed the owner of the parrot, "Mrs. —— drinks like a fish." These words were hardly uttered, when the footman, in a loud voice, announced "Mrs.——!" and as the new visitor, a portly, proud dame, came sailing into the room, "Mrs.——!" exclaimed the parrot, "Mrs.—— drinks like a fish." Mrs.—— wheeled round, with the celerity of a troop of heavy dragoons, furiously, to confront the base and unknown maligner. "Mrs.——!" cried the parrot again. "Mrs.—— drinks like a fish." "Madam," exclaimed Mrs.——, to the lady of the house, "this is a piece of wickedness towards me which must have taken no small time to prepare. It shows the blackness of your heart towards one for whom you have long pretended a friendship; but I shall be revenged." It was in vain that the mistress of the parrot rose and protested her innocence. Mrs.—— flounced out of the room in a storm of rage, much too loud to admit of the voice of reason being heard. The parrot, delighted with his new caught up words, did nothing for some days but shout out, at the top of his most unmusical voice. "Mrs.——! Mrs.—— drinks like a fish." Meanwhile, Mrs.——'s lawyers, having once taken up the scent, succeeded in ferretting out some information, that ultimately produced written proofs, furnished by some secret enemy; that the lady's imprudence in the propagation of this scandal had not been confined to the instance we have mentioned. An action of law was raised for defamation. The parrot was arrested, and carried into court, to give oral testimony of the malignity of the plot which was supposed to have been laid against Mrs.——'s good fame; and he was by no means niggardly of his testimony; for, to the great amusement of the bench, the bar, and all present, he was no sooner produced, than he began, and continued to vociferate, "Mrs.——! Mrs.—— drinks like a fish!" till judges and jury were alike satisfied of the merits of the case; and the result was, that the poor owner of the parrot was cast with immense damages.

BUCK HORN TAVERN,

A SCENE IN THE WEST.

It was during the latter part of September, in the year ——, that it was my fortune to be travelling through the western district of Tennessee, and along the main road which now leads on from Bolivar to Paris.

The close of a pleasant day found me fatigued and weary, jogging along through a wild and thinly settled country, on the qui vive for a resting place; the few clearings which I had passed, indicated contentment rather than wealth, or even comfort, and the hooting of owls, the long howl of some famished beast, the rapid passage of birds on their way to roost, together with the recollection of many stories of hair breath escapes and desperate conflict, which had taken place in the country through which I was passing, caused me to feel much solicitude as to where I should sleep, and made me think of home, and happiness, and the busy crowd of Atlantic cities—and when I contrasted all this with the fact, that I was a stranger in a strange land, and beheld the quiet, yet wild appearance of the dense and dark forest around me, I involuntarily tightened my reins, and urged my horse onward.

It was in this mood, that, upon turning an angle of the road, I discovered a horseman coming towards me in a sweeping trot—he was rather badly mounted; but his dress and appearance were of rather a better order, and bespoke him a genuine backwoodsman of some note.

Seeing that he was about to pass me, with a common salutation I hailed him to stop.

"Halt, Billy,"—said he, and Billy halted so suddenly, I thought his rider would have gone over his head—"An now stranger what is it you want with me, you must talk fast, for the way that I'm in a hurry is curious."

"I shall be obliged to you," said I, "if you will tell me where I can sleep to night?"

"An is that all?—well, here's Buck Horn just a head of you, though its right rough there—an about eight miles further there is an excellent house—an if you don't like either of them spose you turn back with me; I've got but one cabin, and it is full of young ones, but I'll make you a pallet and take care of your horse."

"I thank you, sir, but my horse is tired, and I am anxious to get on."

"No thanks, no thanks, stop at Buck Horn, you can make out there for the night."

"But I think you said it was right rough—can I stand it?"

"Oh! stand it—yes—we stand any thing here—I only said so cause you seemed to be a stranger in these parts, an I thought you mightn't like their ways."

"Will they give me and my horse something to eat?"

"Oh! yes—staff you both as full as tics."

"And a bed?"

"Yes—they'll give you a bed—you don't mind sleeping thick—do you?"

"How thick?"

"Oh! sorter thick, and not so very thick neither—they'll only put you in spoon fashion, an you must lie awful still, or all turn over together, if you don't the outside ones will fall out, an if they do, they'll be right apt to hurt themselves."

"Well, is this all I have to fear at Buck Horn."

"Fear! you have nothing to fear—Buck Horn is considered by many as a very clever, nice place—an don't they have musters there?—an don't they try warrants? an don't they have shootin matches? so you see Buck Horn is not so coarse—an if any of 'em should try to use you up, you'll find more who'll fight for you, than agin you—a stranger never wants for friends in these parts."

"Well, I must go now—good bye—if ever you come my way, gim me a call, you hear—jist ask for Little River Jack, they all know me. Go along Billy,"—and he gouged his old horse, who wriggled, shot forward, and curled it so rapidly, that all which remained visible of him was a dark streak.

Contrasting western with eastern manners, and thinking of Buck Horn and its inhabitants, I pursued my way, until, from well known signals, I knew a house was near—and in a few moments after, situated in a small clearing, immediately on the road, appeared a large rude double logged cabin, with a Buck's Horn nailed over the door, which means, in the west, entertainment for man and horse, and this I identified as the tavern to which I had been recommended.

It was now the dusk of evening, and although its appearance was uninviting, it seemed to me a welcome spot—it was quiet—and as I rode up, nothing was to be seen but the cattle lying about the yard, chewing their cud, and the fowls arranged in close order on the limbs of an oak, which grew near to the door—my arrival, however, seemed entirely to change the scene, for the dogs came whisking and barking about me, as if they wished to know who and what I was, and what was my business—the cows eyed me—the turkeys clucked—and I thought an old gobbler would have twisted his neck off, in his solicitude to get his head in such a position, that he might take a fair squint at me. Turkeys, when they examine any thing closely, only use one eye, and my old gobbler would first try one, and then the other, and then he put his head under his wing, as if for the purpose of brightening his vision and drawing it out, would take a long searching look—and then he examined his roost, and said something to the turkeys around him which I could not understand—but they all clucked, and adjusted themselves, concluding, I thought, with, 'he's a stranger in these parts, and I don't much like his looks'—and they would have liked them much less had they known the state of my appetite.

While all this was passing an old lady came to the door to see what was the cause of so much commotion, looked out for an instant, and then disappeared—next came a flock of children of all sizes, barefooted, with short cotton shirts, who scarcely saw me before away they scampered, tumbling over each other, into one of the side doors—and finally there came, with a stately stride, the landlord of the house—he was without a coat, rough in appearance, large and portly in his form, with a good humored, jolly looking face, and while he approached, a pair of eyes might be seen peeping out through every crevice in the house.

"Come, friend, won't you 'light?"

"Thank you, sir, I wish to spend the evening with you."

"Git down—git down—I'll take your horse, and fix you as snug as a bear in a hollow."

Having dismounted, he stripped my horse, and giving me my saddle-bags, and saddle. "Now take 'em in, an put 'em under the bed an make yourself at home—children clear the way, an let this gentleman come."

I did as I was directed, but observed that the gobler rose up, and turned his head towards the door I entered, in order that he might keep a sharp look out—it was nobly done, he seemed resolved never to turn his back to an enemy.

Having examined the apartment, I drew a chair before a large blazing fire, and contented with appearances, sat a silent spectator of the group before me—the house contained but two rooms, and a garret, or loft as it is there called, running the whole extent of the building, and yet I had seen children enough about the establishment to have filled up at least four good rooms, and still, every moment I saw a new face—there was many girls among the group, all pretty, yet barefooted, and when they would catch me looking at their feet—they would stoop so as to make their dress entirely conceal them—modesty must be innate, thought I.

The return of the landlord thinned the little group around me—he sent off all the small fry into the next room, and drawing some whiskey made me drink—then seating himself, began to inquire after his kin in the old country, all of whom he fancied I must know, merely because I came from the same state—discussing this, and sundry other topics, we whiled away some time—I learned from him, that he, with his wife, had that morning returned from a visit to Alabama, and that some of the neighbors would drap in presently to hear the news—I could hear the crowd gathering in the adjoining room, and was soon after called to supper.

The supper though plentiful and inviting had been prepared in the room where the largest part of the company was assembled—and there every face was joyous and happy, save that of the good dame, whose duty it had been to prepare the evening meal—she looked rather crabbed, and slung about the pots and pans, seemingly entirely careless of the shins of her neighbors. But she received my thanks, for among other things there was a large quantity of sweet potatoes, sliced and fried, which I had ordered for my own use. We crowded around the table, cracked jokes, and began to eat. There was a stranger at my elbow, who dipped into my sweet potatoes so often, that I began to take quite a dislike to him—for it was a dish of which I was very fond, which I had ordered, and consequently considered as my own property—besides this, I was as keen set as a hawk.

"Stranger," said I, "you are fond of potatoes"—

"No—I can't say, as how I am—but the way that aunt Pat there cooks 'em is a caution, an I think these are quite sufflunk, jest stick me up a few—will you?"

"You mean to say they will soon be defunct, I suppose?"

"No, sir; sufflunk is the idea, and, if you don't know what sufflunk is, I would advise you to abschize, for its quite impossible for you to semprome here."

Having supped, we arose in order to make room for another table, and I adjourned to the room which had been allotted to me; thither I was followed by my potatoe opponent, who accosted me, with "Come stranger, you musn't mind what I say; we are all free and easy here; I wouldn't hurt a hair of your head, to save my life; the old man just come home to day, and we drapped in merely to have a little spree—come 'spose you join us?'"

I thanked him, but was so fatigued from my ride that I wished to retire early.

Considering a moment—"did you notice them girls?" said he.

"Yes."

"Well, I've a notion of Jinny; she's a real ticklur, and when she dances she slings a nasty foot, I tell you."

"Does she?"

"Yes, she does so; 'twould do you good to see her dance."

The company now began to get more noisy, and the landlord after telling me several times not to mind the boys, went about his business; the chief gathering was in the supper room, which echoed with the loud and noisy glee, leaving me comparatively alone. But unfortunately the whiskey barrel was near by my bed, and as regular as an hour-glass, but at much shorter intervals, did the landlord approach it, with a mug, draw out the spile, fill it, and and then drive in the peg with a hammer—saying "Don't let me disturb you, there's your bed, tumble in when you like it"—and so there was a very nice bed; but it was packed, from the wall to about the middle, with two rows of children, fitted to each other in the same manner as shoes are done up for exportation, and besides this, there were many persons around the fire, and among them several girls just grown. Under these circumstances, I felt loth to undress for bed; but upon being told that my bed was ready, and seeing that nobody was about to leave the room, I conceived that all was right, and stripped, retaining my shirt and drawers with a tolerable degree of composure.

Having been accustomed to sleep alone, I was as fraid of being touched by a child, as I would have been of an eel, and consequently courted sleep to little purpose.

Soon after getting into bed I heard a scuffle, and a general rush to the entry, saying "you strike him." Wishing to see all the fun, I slipped out of bed, and crept to the door, where there was such an eternal clatter of tongues, that it was sometime before I could ascertain the cause of this disturbance; which turned out to be this:

A servant belonging to one of the neighbors, had come over, as it seemed his usual custom, to buy a pint of whiskey, and while waiting at the door for the landlord, was accosted by a large bony, crabbed man, named Wolfe, who, from some cause which did not appear, thought proper to strike him; this was perceived by a small sharp, thin looking man, called Aaron, who having a good share of artificial stimulus, added to much natural firmness, bristled up, and strutted about with huge consequence.

There were many persons about the house who appeared perfectly unmoved by the passing scene, and it was principally the younger persons who surrounded the expected combatants, girls and men formed the ring promiscuously, the girls chock full of fun and life, holding aloft large lightwood torches, determined to see all that was to be seen; conceive myself undressed, peeping over the crowd and you have the scene as I saw it when Aaron cried out "Who struck that niggur?"

"I struck him, a d—n black wampire and he that takes his part, is no better than a niggur."

Aaron making towards him; "Now don't you call me a niggur, Wolfe, don't you call me a niggur; if you do, d—n me if I don't walk right into you, I'll go entirely through you."

"Come on then; I'll lick you, an the way I'll lick you, will be a caution to the balance of your family; if I don't, d—n me."

"Part 'em, part 'em," was the cry from many, and again I heard Aaron's voice rising above the others, saying—

"Did the niggur mislist you?"

"No; but I intruded my conversation upon him, and he could gim me no answer."

"Well I say 'twas d—n mean, to beat a neighbor's niggur merely because he come to git a drink; now you know, Wolfe, when you was in the army, sarvin under General Jackson, you would steal out to get a drink, and why not 'low the poor niggur the same privilege."

"D—n the niggur, I've a great mind to use him right up, and you too for taking his part."

"Now, use me up, just as soon as you choose: you know, Wolfe, you is bigger than me; but I tell you, I'm all gristle; an God never made a man who could walk over me, or hurt faster when he begins; I weigh just one hundred and twenty-five pounds."

"I don't care what the devil you weigh, nor any thing about you—all I can say, is, I can lick you; if you take the niggur's part you is no better than a niggur; I say this and stand in my shoes."

"Now, you needn't talk about your shoes, kaze you see I'm barefooted, I haint got no shoes, 'tis true, but I stand flat footed, and d—n the man who can move me one inch; do you hear that, Wolfe?"

"Yes—I hear it—and Aaron I can lick you."

"Well, Wolfe, I'll fight you, but you've never had a better friend than I've been. I'se 'friended you, when no other man would."

"How have you 'friended me, Aaron, an what have you done for me?"

"Didn't I keep them steers of yourn, better than two months; and didn't I turn that pied heifer of yourn into my pea patch?"

"An 'sposen you did, didn't I call up your hogs—but that's nothing to do with it; Aaron, you took that niggur's part, and you must fight me."

Aaron could stand this no longer but made at him.

"Part 'em, part 'em," was again the cry; but now the girls interfered, crying out "let 'em fight, let 'em fight, you 'spose we g'wine to stand here all night holding the light"—and at the same time I discovered a hearty, buxom, lively looking girl, whom they called Poll, rolling her sleeves up, and swearing at the same time, that both were cowards, and that she believed she could cool 'em both out; this added fresh stimulus, and at it they went; the first concussion was like the meeting of two locomotives at full speed—the jar was so great, that both were thrown into the yard, where, clinching, they rolled over like a couple of cats, squalling and using the most horrible execrations; the crowd still pressed upon them, the girls holding the torches.

"Horrah for Wolfe. Well done Aaron; now gouge him; oh! you missed a chance; now give it to him; why don't you bite him!"

These, and similar expressions, were constantly vociferated by the partizans of each other, and seeing the affair was about drawing to a focus, I slipped off, and went to bed.

Every thing now was comparatively quiet, and but a few moments elapsed, before Poll, with a crowd at her heels, came in, almost convulsed with laughter.

"What is the matter!" said I.

"Oh! the prettiest fight," said Poll, "they were both cowards, but you ought to have seen it; I knew they were sturbin you, standin there quarrelling, so I made 'em fight, merely to have it over; I tell you what, there's 'no mistake' in Aaron, when he does begin."

At this moment Aaron came in, walking carelessly along, with his face much scratched and a handkerchief over one of his eyes.

Poll—"Well Aaron you is a root, I didn't know 'twas in the little man."

"Poll, you know I always told you I was all gristle."

"Well, I didn't think so, but I tell you, you was all over him, I didn't see the licks, but I heard 'em and they seemed to me to fall just as if I was shakin down 'simmons."

How much longer this dialogue would have lasted heaven knows, but being uncomfortably situated, I called to Miss Poll, whose face I really liked, and asked her to be good enough to arrange the children, for if she did not I should soon be kicked out of bed; my wish was hardly expressed, before Poll stripped down the covering and began slapping every child which was out of its place, without paying the least regard to the fact whether it was asleep or awake; this had the desired effect with the children, they were soon packed away, with a strict injunction from Poll, to 'keep quiet or they'd git it agin'—and I cannot say that I felt more sleepy, after Poll had leaned over me to arrange the children, and was kind enough to wish me a good night's rest.

The house now soon became very still, so much so, that one would hardly even have suspected it of having been the scene of such a commotion as the one described.

The stairs which led to the loft, ran up from

Digitized by Google

my room, and while I was endeavoring to sleep, Poll quietly tripped in again, bearing a child in her arms with several small ones following her.

"Hush, now; don't make a noise."

"O the devil!" said I, "you don't mean to put them in my bed?"

"No, sir, these belong up in the loft."

And she marched them gently up stairs, disposed of them, and again returning, disappeared; scarcely a minute passed, before she tripped up with another; until she began to labor up, I heard her say, "Well I never seed so many children in my life," and so I thought; speaking within the bounds of moderation, I think she carried into the loft, from twelve to fifteen children, then coming down puffing with fatigue, she disappeared, and all was quiet.

Well, the scene is over for the night, said I—not so, however, for I again heard Poll's voice in the entry, amid a small bustle, saying, "Now take your shoes off, and march up easy, don't you disturb that gentleman."

The door opened and Poll appeared with a light, and as she did, she turned about, and whispered in a low voice, "Now march," and then led the way up stairs, followed by, I will not say how many of the crowd who had gathered, all marching silently after her in single file; they formed a long line which was several minutes in passing, and I witnessed what I fear I shall never see again.

I must confess, with the whole scene I was struck dumb, utterly amazed, and confounded; good heavens, thought I, what a packing touch they'll have up stairs; and yet there was no bustle; I heard something which sounded like the rustling of shucks, and in a few minutes after every thing was as quiet as the wild woods; this silence reigned unbroken, save an occasional jar which shook the house, resembling the slight shock of an earthquake, or the moving of some heavy body above me with a handspike; this was occasioned, by the joint turning over of the phalanx in the loft; when this ceased all was quiet, and I went to sleep.

THE FALL OF ADAM.—The following images are such as none but an imagination truly poetical could conceive. They are descriptive of the moral consequences of Adam's fall.

"Fell Disease arose
And blew o'er earth his pestilential breath;
A train of evils followed on his steps.
There came Misfortune, with his iron scythe,
Dropping with human blood; there Envy stalk'd
And fann'd the flames of hell—fell Fury there
Yell'd to the winds, and stamp'd the hollow ground:
There came wan Melancholy slowly on,
Telling the sorrows to the list'ning night;
Folded her arms upon her heaving bosom;
Her face directed to the dewy moon.
There came Remorse absorbed in gloomy thoughts.
There rush'd Despair—his dark eye rolled in blood;
He tore his mantle from his raging breast,
And plunged his dagger in his heart. There came Poor Lunacy, in tattered robes, and waved
A straw, and told the kingdoms which he ruled.
Lastly came Death, clothed in his night of terrors,
And clasped his victim in his shiv'ring arms."

ENGLISH BELLES-LETTRES.

WILSON.

The west of Scotland, as I have shown, produced Burns, Grahame, and Campbell; I have now to add a fourth—John Wilson. He is a native of Paisley, and was born in May, 1789. The affluent circumstances of his father enabled him to have the benefit of a classic education; he obtained the rudiments of his learning in Glasgow, and went from thence to Oxford, where he obtained prizes in his college; one of them was an essay, in verse: "On the merits of Ancient Sculpture"—there is a flow of words and the dawning of pure taste. He courted public attention, first, in his poem of "The Isle of Psalms:" it exhibits scenes of enchanting beauty, a prodigality of loveliness united to uncommon sweetness and tranquil grace. "The City of the Plague" succeeded; a noble and deeply pathetic poem—a picture of London, suffering under the calamity which laid her streets and squares desolate. It possesses great dramatic interest, and displays picture after picture of private suffering and public misery; the darkness is relieved by such flashes of light as few bards have at command; in the abodes of despair, there are rays of hope let in—on the brink of the grave, flowers of beauty are scattered! nor do we tread the floor of the charnel-house, but in joy mingled with fear. His most dolorous scenes, are redeemed back to our sympathy by inimitable touches of nature; and we rise from the spell of perusal sobered and elevated.

His poetical powers are very varied: that is, he can handle any subject in its own peculiar spirit. His "Edith and Nora" is one of those fairy fictions of which he once promised a volume; there is a wondrous beauty shed over the landscape, on which he brings out his spiritual folk to sport and play, and do good deeds to men: nor has he wasted all his sweetness on the not insensible earth; he has endowed his fairies with charms from a hundred traditions, assigned them poetic and moral tasks, and poured inspiration into their speech. Another fine poem of his, is "An address to a Wild Deer:" for bounding elasticity of language, hurrying thoughts, and crowding imagery, it is without a parallel. Indeed, throughout all his smaller poems there is a deep feeling for nature; an intimate knowledge of the working of the heart, and a liquid fluency of language almost lyrical. He is distinguished in all his compositions, for splendour of imagination, for loftiness of thought, for sympathy with all that is grand or honourable in man, for transitions, surprising and unexpected, but never forced, and for situations such as appear to an eye which sees through all nature. He may be accused sometimes of an overflow of enthusiasm about his subject; nor has he escaped from the charge of sometimes overflooding sentiments with words. In person he is the noblest looking of all our poets; in company he is free, companionable, and eloquent; never hesitates to do a good deed to a deserving person, or give the young and the meritorious a lift on the road to fame. He is a foe to all affectation, either in dress or verse, and mauls the fop of the toilet and the fop in poetry with equal wit and mercilessness.

WILLIAM MOTHERWELL.

When Aaron's rod sprang out and budded, those who saw it could not marvel more at the dry timber producing leaf and bloom, than we did when Motherwell, an acute and fastidious antiquarian, appeared as a poet, original and vigorous. His lyrics are forceful and flowing—with more of the strength of Burns than of his simplicity and passion.

ALEXANDER ALARIC WATTS

Is distinguished among poets for sweetness of versification, tenderness of sentiment, with occasional bursts of true emotion. He has taste in art as well as in literature. He has wit, too, and humour, and bitterness, and lately exercised them at the expense of sundry of his brethren.

THOMAS PRINGLE

Is a poet and philanthropist; in poetry he has shown a feeling for the romantic and the lovely, and in philanthropy he has laboured to introduce liberty, knowledge, and religion, in the room of slavery and ignorance.

WILLIAM KENNEDY,

The author of "Fitful Fancies," and "The Arrow and the Rose," has fancy and feeling, nor is he without sudden bursts of manly vigour; but he is unequal in execution, and occasionally overstrained in language.

ROBERT MONTGOMERY

Is a poet at once devout and satirical. He has been sternly censured and highly praised; his chief fault lies in choosing topics too holy and heavy for human handling, and his chief merit is fluency of language and moral fervour of thought.

ALFRED TENNYSON

Has a happy fancy; his originality of thought is sometimes deformed by oddity of language; and his subject has not unfrequently to bear the weight of sentiments which spring not naturally from it. He has lyrical ease and vigour, and is looked upon by sundry critics as the chief living hope of the muse.

EBENEZER ELLIOT

Has sung of that public grievance, the Corn Laws, with the bitter energy of a man famishing on the highways. He heaps up images of scorn and loathing till he approaches the sublime. There is much truth amidst his satire, and many moving passages mingled with his invectives. But when the price of corn falls, the fame of the poet will fall in proportion, for such is the penalty paid for pouring out fancy and feeling and sarcasm on fleeting matters. He has, however, other chances of reputation; some of his pictures of domestic life are graphic and forceful; he has inherited not a little of the power of Crabbe—and, like Crabbe too, he sees the dark side of all things, and comes to the peasantry of his country, like the priest in Burns, with tidings not of hope, but damnation.

GEORGE DARLEY

Is a true poet and excellent mathematician: there is much compact and graceful poetry in his "May Queen;" and, in "The Olympian Revel's," a dramatic freedom and fervour too seldom seen in song.

There are other bards of these our latter times, who have sung well and found listeners, and who deserve a place even in a brief account like this: Croly, and Clare, and Moir, and Malcolm, ought not to be forgotten, when the labours of the Muse are mentioned; and others, also; but I have already said too much about the sons of song; besides, a weariness of soul has come upon me, for I have not been insensible of a gradual descent from the commanding heights of genius on which I took up my subject. I must not, however, close accounts with poetry without introducing some of those female spirits who sing with energy as well as grace, and hang the garlands of their fancy on the highest altars of the Muse.

JOANNA BAILLIE.

"Sister Joanna," as Walter Scott loved to call her, is a poetess of a high order; she is at once vigorous and gentle, sarcastic and moving, homely and heroic. Her genius is of the dramatic kind, and her "Plays on the Passions," display such variety of powers, as have obtained her the name of the Female Shakspeare. Her regular poems abound in noble sentiments, and her songs have all the life, humour, and simplicity of the early Scottish lyrics. In conversation she is shrewd, lively, and agreeable, and her looks are full of genius. I have never seen either a bust or portrait of her, and this is the more to be lamented, since she stands not only at the head of female writers, but takes precedence of many of the "lords of the creation," both in quickness of imagination and massive grandeur of thought.

FELICIA HEMANS

Is the authoress of many a plaintive and mournfully strain. She has shown high sentiment and heroic feelings occasionally but her affections are with the gentle, the meek, and the wounded in spirit. It ought to be remembered, that in the strife of song she vanquished all the male professors who entered the lists.—Some one who desired to do a good deed to the Muse, offered fifty pounds for the best poem on the memorable conference which ensued between Wallace and Bruce, after the fatal fight of Falkirk. There were many competitors; the Muse, with the waywardness of her sex, refused her effectual aid to any save Felicia, and enabled her to carry away the money and the fame. Her genius is of the domestic kind, and her best songs are rightly named of the "Affections."

LETITIA ELIZABETH LANDON

Is, next to "Sister Joanna," the most successful poetess of our day. She is the L. E. L. of many a pretty poem: nor has she sung only a tender ditty or two, and then shut her lips to listen to the applause they brought; she has written much; sometimes loftily, sometimes touchingly, and always fluently and gracefully. She excels in short and neat things; yet she has poured out her fancy and her feelings through the evolutions of a continuous narrative and intricate story. The flow of her language is remarkable; her fancy is ever ready and never extravagant. Her chief works are "The Improvisatrice," and "Venetian Bracelet;" nor has she hesitated to try her hand in prose also, and in a long story, "Romance and Reality," displays ready wit, much sprightliness, and an extensive acquaintance with the world. She is young; pleasing, too, in company, and lively without effort.

Digitized by Google

MARY HOWITT

Has shown herself mistress of every string of the minstrel lyre, save that which sounds of broil and bloodshed. There is more of the old ballad simplicity in her compositions, than can be found in the strains of any living poet besides; her language is vigorous, but not swelling; and always subordinate to the sentiments, whether of tenderness or of love.

On looking at the splendid and varied poetical productions of the last fifty years, and comparing them with the works of the first great era of British song, I cannot help perceiving a falling off. We have, it is true, fewer learned allusions; less classical copyism; nor is our verse swelling with gods and goddesses; Venus and Cupid no longer manage the affairs of love; but we have less noble emotion, lower flights of fancy, and little rejoicing in nature's joy; the Muse refuses to skip like a roe on the mountains, but is inclined to be moody and discontented; she sings in a strain sneering and dolorous; she is sensible, in fact, of the low estate of the inspired, and refuses to be comforted. The love of song has suffered of late a sad abatement; many circumstances have combined to harm it; criticism has something of this to answer for; the deluge of verse poured on the land during the last thirty years has had its influence, together with the calculating and mathematical turn which the public mind has taken. All this will pass away, and natural emotion will resume its power; though it is winter with the Muses now, the season of song and of flowers is at hand.

ANECDOTE AND GOSSIP OF AMERICAN PAINTERS.—By William Dunlap.

Benjamin West.—West, although born in humble life, was essentially well born, though not of parents who by riches or station could ensure, or even promote his views of ambition: his father was a man of sense; his mother affectionate and exemplary. He was not spoiled by indulgence, or soured by thwartings. His natural inclinations were good, and they were not poisoned by bad education or evil example. The most precious part of his education was not intrusted to ignorant and vicious menials; and all who surrounded him were temperate, pure, and happy. The sordid sufferings of poverty were unknown to him, neither was he pampered in the lap of luxury. As the youngest child of the family, he was the favorite of his parents, and equally so of his brothers and sisters. His physical advantages were great from nature, and the occupations of rural life in childhood tended to strenghten and perfect him. He was taught in the school of realities. He became acquainted with things as they are. The knowledge which he gained in the school of experience was not blasted by any untoward circumstances. His genius was developed by the friends his manners and his virtues gained him. West may be said to have been the favoured of fortune as well as nature, and to have been so led to the height he attained, that men might say, we know not whether genius or virtue placed him there. This we know: vice or folly did not counteract genius.

Stuart.—It is difficult to account for the very different style of Stuart's painting from that of the master under whom he studied, and whose works were daily before him and occasionally copied by his hand. The pupil had directed his attention to portrait, and the master delighted in the higher branch of the art. West, doubtless, saw that Stuart was the better portrait painter; and we know that when he saw the superiority of another in that branch, he readily acknowledged it. When applied to for instruction by an artist now in this city, he readily gave it, but said, "If you wish to study portrait painting, go to Sir Joshua." Stuart spoke freely of his own superiority as a portrait painter, and used to say, half joke half earnest, that "no man ever painted history if he could obtain employment at portraits." In connection with this difference of opinion and of style, I will mention the following circumstance, which took place about 1786, on the occasion of a visit to his old master's house and gallery in Newman-street. Trumbull was painting on a portrait, and the writer literally lending him a hand by sitting for it. Stuart came in, and his opinion was asked as to the colouring, which he gave very much in these words: —"Pretty well, pretty well; but more like our master's flesh than nature's. When Benney teaches the boys, he says—'yellow and white there,' and he makes a streak; 'red and white there,' another streak; 'blue-black and white there,' another streak; 'brown and red there, for a warm shadow,' another streak; 'red and yellow there,' another streak. But nature does not colour in streaks. Look at my hand; see how the colours are mottled and mingled, yet all is clear as silver."

This was and is true; and yet Mr. West's theory is likewise true, however parodoxical it may appear. Mr. West perhaps made too great a distinction between the coloring appropriate to historical painting and that best suited to portrait.

Stuart, Tom and Towser.—In the early period of Stuart's career, as an independent portrait painter, he had for his attendant a wild boy, the son of a poor widow, whose time was full as much taken up by play with another of the painter's household, a fine Newfoundland dog, as by attendance upon his master. The boy and dog were inseparable, and when Tom went on an errand, Towser was sure to accompany him. Tom was a terrible truant, and played so many tricks that Stuart again and again threatened to turn him off; but as often Tom found some way to keep his hold on his eccentric master. One day, as story tellers say, Tom staid, when sent of an errand, until Stuart, out of all patience, posted off to the boy's mother, determined to dismiss him; but on his entering, the old woman began first:—"Oh, Mr. Stuart, Tom has been here."—"So I supposed."—"Oh, Mr. Stuart, the dog!" "He has been here, too. Well, well, he shall not come again! but Tom must come to you; I will not keep him!" "Oh, Mr Stuart, it was the dog did it!" "Did what?" "Look sir—look there. The dog overset my mutton-pie; broke the dish; greased the floor; and eat the mutton!" "I'm glad of it! You encourage the boy to come here, and here I will send him." "It was the dog, sir, eat the mutton!" "Well, the boy may come and eat your mutton; I dismiss him! I'll have no more to do with him!" The mother entreated, insisted that it was the dog's fault—told over and over again the story of the pie, until Stuart, no longer hearing her, conceived the plan of a trick upon Tom, with the prospect of a joke founded upon the dog's dinner if mutton-pie. "Well, well, say no more; here's something for the pie, and to buy a dish. I will try Tom again, provided you never let him know that I came here to-day, or that I learned from you any thing of the dog and the pie." The promise was given of course, and Stuart hastened home, as full of his anticipated trick to try Tom as any child with a new rattle. Tom found his master at his easel where he had left him, and was prepared with a story to account for his delay, in which neither his mother nor Towser nor the mutton made parts. "Very well, sir," said the painter, "bring in dinner; I shall know all about it by and by." Stuart sat down to his mutton, and Towser took his place by his side as usual, while Tom as usual stood in attendance.—"Well, Towser, your mouth don't water for your share. Where have you been? whisper;" and he put his ear to Towser's mouth who wagged his tail in reply. "I thought so; with Tom to his mother's?" "Bow wow!" "And have you had your dinner?" "Bow!" "I thought so.—What have you been eating? put your mouth nearer, sir!" "Bow wow!" "Mutton-pie! Very pretty. You and Tom have eaten Mrs. Jenkin's mutton-pie, ha?" "Bow wow!" "He lies, sir! I didn't touch it; he broke mother's dish, and eat all the mutton!" From that moment, Tom thought that if he wished to deceive his master, he must leave Towser at home; but rather on the whole concluded, that what with the dog, the devil and the painter, he had no chance for successful lying.

THE BAMBOO.

The bamboo is a native of the hottest regions of Asia. It is likewise to be found in America, but not in that abundance, with which it flourishes in the old world. It is never brought into this country in sufficient supply for any useful purposes, being rather an object of curiosity than of utility. But in the countries of its production it is one of the most universally useful plants. "There are about fifty varieties," says Mr. Loudon, in his Botanical Dictionary, "of the Arundo bambos, each of the most rapid growth, rising from fifty to eighty feet the first year, and the second perfecting its timber in hardness and elasticity. It grows in stools which are cut every two years. The quantity of timber furnished by an acre of bamboos is immense. Its uses are almost without end. In building it forms almost entire houses for the lower orders, and enters both into the construction and furniture of those of the higher class. Bridges, boats, masts, rigging, agricultural and other implements and machinery; carts, baskets, ropes, nets, sail-cloth, cups, pitchers, troughs, pipes for conveying water, pumps, fences for gardens and fields, &c. are made of it. Macerated in water it forms paper; the leaves are generally put round the tea sent to Europe: the thick inspissated juice is a favourite medicine. It is said to be indestructible by fire, to resist acids, and, by fusion with alkali, to form a transparent permanent glass.

REQUISITES FOR A WIFE.—Lovely in her person and lively in her mind; her beauty, however transcendant, is, never to excite particular, only general, admiration, and her liveliness is never for an instant to be supposed to approach to levity. At the same time she must be no prude, object to sitting hours tete-a-tete with a man who evidently thinks her very handsome, and must not take his arm at a ball, assembly, or walk, if he offers it; and if her husband, or any one else, is inclined to cut jokes which may have a doubtful meaning, she must neither be amused nor offended. She is to be very clean in her person, and very well dressed, but never too late for breakfast or dinner, or long at her toilette. She must not spend much money, but be always in the fashion; if she does unfortunately get into debt, and is blamed by her husband, she must take care not to exceed her means again, but not to be in the least less well attired, or she may justly draw down her husband's ire for being a dowdy. She is to be very simple in her diet, and hardly aware of the difference between soup and fish, yet her table is ever to be such as to excite the admiration of the most distinguished epicures of the day. She is to be au fait of every passing event, but not fond of gossip. She is to know everybody, but not mix much in society. She is to know every thing, but not to be learned. She is to have great resources in herself within doors, but their interest is never to interfere with her exercise without, even in the worst weather. She is to like a garden, without presuming to interfere with the gardener; and to have the greatest possible interest in her husband's country-seat, without any power but that of picking a few violets in spring, and a few pinks in summer. She is to be extremely bold on horseback, though perfectly feminine, and ride remarkably well either in the parks or the chase, though she cannot get upon a horse ten times a year. She is never to be dull, though she must like retirement. She is to be extremely agreeable in society, without caring for it. If she is a mother, her children are to be highly accomplished, and dressed with infinite taste; but their governesses' wages are to be low, and their clothes to cost next to nothing. If ill and dejected, she is to be highly pleased if her husband takes that opportunity of going from home.—Lady Isabella St. John, in the Keepsake for 1834.

REQUISITES FOR A HUSBAND.—He is to be very fond of hunting and all manly amusements, without ever making such topics the subject of his discourse, or even thoughts. He is to belong to all clubs, but never frequent them. He is to bet with spirit at Newmarket or in private, but never lose his money. He is to be very fond of assemblies and balls, but not like talking or dancing. He is to admire beauty, but never look at any woman but his wife. He must have a very well-appointed equipage, but only consider it his own by sufferance. He should be very domestic and attached to home, yet regard Paris as a heaven upon earth. He should like reading aloud, without caring for books. Lady Isabella St. John, in the Keepsake for 1834.

THE GASCON VESPERS.

As sung by Mrs. Wood.

Note.—Wandering one autumnal evening on the banks of the Garonne, in the neighbourhood of ——, where I was passing some time at the house of a friend, I accidentally approached several groups of peasantry who were chaunting the Vesper Hymn. The time of the evening, the situation and scenery, together with the delightful harmony of the rustic choristers, rivetted me to the spot. At length, separating from one of the groups, a lively interesting girl, who had seen me at the above friend's house, approached and singing, with the characteristic gaity of her country, an invitation to join her companions, I permitted her to lead me to them, and seating myself in the midst of them, soon learnt also to bear my part in their songs and revels.

See them dancing, chaunt the pleasure
Of their rustic home so sweet;
Changing now in mournful measure,
Tales of hapless love repeat.
Haste then, stranger, join our chorus—
Come then with our maidens, pray;
Join the happy group before us,
Chaunting 'neath the moonlight ray.

Hark! the merry peal is ringing—
List ye how the bells around,
O'er the Garonne's banks are flinging
Far and near their cheerful sound.

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

Parody on Hamlet's Soliloquy, "To Be or Not to Be."

BY A PRINTER.

To Print, or not to Print? that is the question,
Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to suffer
The loss and disappointments of our ev'ry effort
To gain an honest livelihood, or quit the business,
And end the contest. To stop—to add no more
To landlord's, poet's, and paper-maker's bills.
And every other expense incurred by printers,
Is really a consummation to be wished.
To die—to sleep—perchance, to dream:
Ay, there's the rub: perhaps like Egypt's sons of old,
Who died insolvent, be denied a burial.
Mayhap, the corpse for debt may be detain'd
For British laws permit; and closely held
In durance vile, till the last farthing's paid.
There's the respect that makes us bear the burden
Of weekly cares and toils without reward;
For who would else endure the loss of time,
Of labour and of cash, the duns of creditors,
The negligence of debtors, and the string
Of evils unsuccessful artisans suffer,
When he himself might quit them all for ever,
By a bare advertisement? Who would make
His press and pressman groan beneath the weight
Of sheets on sheets—and types, weekly compos'd
To gratify the gen'ral thirst for news;
Pore over books, and cull th' instructive page,
Or seek in ev'ry quarter of the earth,
Collect and publish ev'ry tale that goes,
"And paint the manners living as they rise,"
But that the dread of what may follow, as
The taunts of envious brethren of the type,
The scoff of enemies, (for who's without them?)
Silent suspicions of well-meaning friends,
Who think we should have struggled longer for success,
And utter ruin to our fondest hopes,
Puzzles the will, and makes us rather bear
The ills that now we have, than fly to others
We know not, and perhaps, might have avoided.
Thus is the Printer at a stand, and cannot Between two sad alternatives determine.

Father. Tom, where have you been? Son. No where, Sir. F. Where is no where? S. Up on the Common. F. Who went with you? S. Nobody, Sir. F. Who is nobody? S. Bill Doakes, Sir. F. What have you been doing? S. Nothing, Sir. F. What is nothing? S. Playing marbles. F. What have you done with the money I gave you? S. Lost it, Sir. F. How did you lose it? S. Bill Doakes won it, Sir.

How to Curtail.—While a clergyman of the Methodist order was praying at a camp meeting in a most fervent manner for the power of the devil to be curtailed, a zealous old negro man loudly exclaimed, "Amen! yes, bless God, cut he tail smack smoove off."

Amiable Compassion.—Theodore Hook being told of the marriage of a political opponent exclaimed, "I am very glad, indeed to hear it;" then suddenly added, with a feeling of compassionate forgiveness, "And yet I don't see why I should, poor fellow, for he never did me much harm."

An Independent Man.—One who can shave himself with cold water, black his own boots, and live without tobacco.

Irish Spectacles.—The late General B. going post to Ireland on some extraordinary business that would not permit the incumbrance of a retinue, stoped to dine at the Inn on the Chester road, and ordered a pair of ducks, which he saw ready at the kitchen fire up to the table. The General's desire had been just complied with, when some country bucks came in as hungry as hawks, after the morning's sport. They eagerly enquired what could be had to eat. Like a true Boniface, the landlord enumerated what he had not, to apologize for what he had; and among other things, mentioned the ducks, which had been only one moment before served up for the Irish gentleman's dinner. "Irish jontlemon?" gibbingly exclaimed one of the chagrined group—"I'll lay fifty to five the fellow does not know B from a bull's foot. Here, waiter, take my watch up to the jontlemon, presenting compliments, and request him to tell me what o'clock it is."

The General heard the message, took the watch and with great temper returned his respects, with an assurance that as soon as he had dined he would endeavour to satisfy their enquiry. The bucks, chuckled at the embarrassment which they imagined the ignorant Irishman was led into, sat down to regale themselves on whatever they could get; but their jollity was presently disturbed by the entrance of a military figure, who, with that politeness which is the peculiar characteristic of the army, advanced towards the table where they were seated, and presented the watch; "Gentlemen," said he, "I wish to know its owner, as from a message sent me a little while ago, I presume he is shortsighted, and have brought him this pair of spectacles," pointing to a pair of pistols under his arm, "to remedy the defect." Joke was gone; the bucks were silent. The General deliberately put the watch in his fob, with a declaration that secured it to him forever. "Gentlemen, I am sorry for intruding, as I find the owner is not among you; whenever he claims it he shall have it, but never without a trial of the spectacles."

Captain York's Piece.—A good old lady who always saved the cream, of everything to tickle the palate of her loving spouse, reserving for him the brownest piece of toast, the best slice of cake, and the biggest piece of pie, one day had a gentleman to take a cup of tea at her house, who liked to be the monopolizer of such dainties himself; and who was moreover on terms that warranted his helping himself to whatever suited his fancy. As usual the good woman had cut her pie in such a manner as to leave one formidable slice, which was well understood to belong to her husband. The visitant saw it, and proceeded to help himself to the tempting morsel, when he was interrupted by the wife; "Stop, stop, Mr. ——— that's Captain York's piece.

Docton Lathrop was a man of genuine piety, but much opposed to the noisy zeal that seeketh "to be known of men."—A young divine who was much given to enthusiastic cant, one day said to him, "Do you suppose you have any real religion?" "None to speak of," was the excellent reply.

Mr. Garrow, some short time ago, examining a very young lady, who was a witness in a cause of assault, asked her, if the person who was assaulted, did not give the defendant very ill language; if he did not call him a d——d Scotch cobler, and uttered words so bad, that he, the learned counsel, had not impudence enough to repeat; she replied in the affirmative. "Will you, madam, be kind enough, then," said he, "to tell the court what these words were?" "Why Sir," she replied, "if you have not impudence enough to speak to them, how can you suppose that I have?"

AN ORGAN WELL DEVELOPED.—Certain propensities are often exhibited in childhood, which show the character of the future man. In youth as well as age, the actions of an individual seem to be influenced by a ruling passion, which should be carefully watched, and encouraged or checked accordingly, as it may lead to good or evil. The following anecdote, related to us, furnishes an illustration:—

A little boy, whose parents resided not many miles from this city, was in the habit of seating himself on the gateways, posts, capstans of wharves and the like, much to the annoyance of his parents, who tried hard to overcome this habit, but in vain. One day his father having found his little son seated on the capstan of the wharf, and apparently deriving great enjoyment from his dangerous situation, resolved to try a desperate remedy. He accordingly came softly behind him, and pushed him into the water, and then immediately jumped in himself, to save his son from being drowned the water being nearly twenty feet deep. He naturally supposed that the fright consequent on the sudden event, and the imminent danger to which he was exposed, would effectually cure his son of such dangerous propensities for the future. But after the little fellow was borne safely on shore, and had time to recover breath, he exclaimed with child-like simplicity "Father, do so again, do Father!"—Bost. Mercantile.

Not long since, in South Carolina, a clergyman was preaching on the disobedience of Jonah, when commanded to go and preach to the Ninevites.—After declaiming at length on the awful consequences of disobedience to the divine commands, he exclaimed in a voice like thunder, that passed through the congregation like an electric shock, "and are there any Jonahs here?" There was a negro present whose name was Jonah, and thinking himself called upon, immediately rose, and turning up his white to the minister, with his broadest grin and best bow, very readily answered, "Here be one, Massa."

A MAHOMETAN EXQUISITE.—No description of buck is more entertaining, or more vain, than a Mahometan one; and, in truth, they have much more in their outward finery to be proud of, than we have in the sombre coloured dress of Europe: the caparisons of their horses, too, are so superb and various, that they have a great field for exercising their taste upon them. When a youth or family is fully equipped and mounted for the course, he shows most plainly, by his air and manner, that he is, in his own opinion, all in all; the fashion of his turban and the curl of his moustache, are evidently the result of great pains. The horse is covered with costly trappings; and what little of his natural coat can be seen, is as sleek as possible. His tail is long and sweeping, and his mane plaited with the neatest art, leaving points of silver to each length, to keep it in its place. He is taught to caper, to turn, and to plunge; and is constantly exercised in these accomplishments, particularly when in a crowd; for the great ambition seems to be, as with beaux of less showy exterior, to attract attention, and create a sensation: and, as the scattered foot-passengers are seen flying in all directions before him, he is certain to attain his object.—Capt. Skinner's Excursions in India.

VOCAL MUSIC.—In Switzerland and Germany, vocal music is one of the branches of common school instruction, and it is there generally considered as necessary as reading and writing, and is regarded as an indispensable qualification for an instructor. In consequence of such general and early attention to the subject, this important portion of public worship can be suitably performed by the whole congregation.

At a ball given by the City of Paris to Bonaparte, was a Madam Cardon. The Corsican, in general, was not very fond of people who had become rich by any means but by his own favor. He had never seen Madam Cardon, whose name even he had never known before; but he had been told that her husband was possessed of great wealth. He walked towards her with a peevish sort of air, and said to her very abruptly—"Are you Madam Cardon" She made a profound courtesy to his query. Bonaparte continued his discourse—"You are very rich?" Yes Sir," she said, "I have ten children." Bonaparte, struck with the delicate force of this reply, walked quickly away from her ladyship.

A schoolmaster had among his other pupils, a Yankee and a Dutch boy. Both were learning orthography. The schoolmaster required the Yankee to spell his own name. He performed it thus. "Big a, little a-r-on." The Dutch boy took the hint from this, and answered to a similar request: "Big Hans, little Hans-r-o-n."

RICHARD III.'s CRUELTY.—Richard's crest was a white boar. Ratcliffe, Catesby, and Lovel, giving the King their advice, gave rise to the following rhyme:—

The Cat, the Rat, and Lovel our dogge,
Rulen all Englond under a Hogge.

A gentleman named Collingborne was executed on Tcwerhill for the above effusion. He was hanged, cut down immediately, and his bowels cast into the fire, which torment was so speedily done, that when the butcher of an executioner pulled out his heart (to use the words of the historian, Stow,) he spake, and said, 'JESUS, JESUS!"—Mirror.

"I will forfeit my head if you are not wrong," exclaimed a dull and warm orator, to the president Montesquieu, in an argument. "I accept it," replied the philosopher; "any trifle among friends has a value."

It is wise to do with the utmost kindness of manner a favor which you see to be inevitable, unless, indeed, you fear to encourage a future or frequent application.

ALLITERATION.—We dearly delight in Alliteration. And it is with the purest pleasure that we have lately seen several splendid specimens of this sublime style of writing, perambulating the country in the public prints. What can be more brilliant or beautiful than the following line:

"Let lovely lilacs line Lee's lonely lane."

Or this cacophonous couplet, on the worldly-wise and wiley Wolsey:

"Begot by butchers, but by bishops bred,
How high his honor holds his haughty head!"

What can surpass the singular sententiousness of the sentence? And then it is so sweet, so soft, so solemn! We know of nothing which can compare with it, in clear, comprehensiveness of character, except, perhaps a curious colloquy between an al-literate Dutch sailor and his Skipper, who coming on deck, one soft serene, summer evening while staying in St. Salvador, and hearing a horrid hallabulloo on the forecastle, hoarsely halloed out.

"Peter Pipkin what's to pay?"

"It is young yack in the yellow yacket," answered Peter.

"Where is the wile wagabond?" screamed the skipper.

"He has yust yumped off the yib-boom into the yolly boat."—Boston Evening Journal.

☞ The following humorous affair appeared in a London Magazine shortly after intelligence had been received of the disastrous expedition to Moscow:

THE MARCH TO MOSCOW.

Bonaparte he would set out
For a summer excursion to Moscow;
The fields were green and the sky was blue;
Morbleu! Parbleu!
What a pleasant excursion to Moscow!

Four hundred thousand men and more,
Heigh ho, for Moscow!
There were Marshals by dozens and Dukes by the score,
Princes a few, and Kings one or two,
While the fields are so green and the sky so blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
What a pleasant excursion to Moscow!

There was Junot and Augereau,
Heigh ho, for Moscow!
Dombrowsky and Poniatowsky,
General Rapp and Emperor Nap,
Nothing would do.
While the fields were so green and sky so blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
But they must be marched to Moscow.

But then the Russians they turn'd to,
All on the road to Moscow,
Nap had to fight his way all through,
They could fight but they could not parley vous,
But the fields were green, and the sky was blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
And so he got to Moscow.

They made the place too hot for him,
For they set fire to Moscow;
To get there had cost him much ado,
And then no better course he knew,
While the fields were green and the sky was blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
Than to march back again from Moscow.

The Russians they stuck close to him,
All on the road from Moscow;
There was Tormazow and Gomalow,
And all the others that end in ow;
Rajefsky and Noverefsky,
And all the others that end in efsky;
Schamscheff, Souchosaneff, and Schepeleff,
And all the others that end in eff;
Wasiltschecoff, Kostomaroff, and Theoglokoff,
And all the others that end in off;
Milaradovitch, and Jaladovitch, and Karatchkowitch,
And all the others that end in itch;
Oscharoffsky, and Rostoffsky, Kazatichkoffsky,
And all the others that end in offsky;
And last of all an Admiral came,
A terrible man with a terrible name,
A name which you all must know very well,
Nobody can speak and nobody can spell;
And Platoff he played them off,
And Markoff he mark'd them off,
And Tutchkoff he touch'd them off,
And Kutusoff he cut them off,
And Woronzoff he worried them off,
And Dochtoroff he doctor'd them off,
And Rodinoff he flogg'd them off.

They stuck close to them with all their might,
They were on the left and on the right,
Behind and before, and by day and by night;
Nap would rather parley vous than fight;
But parley vous would no more do,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
For they remember'd Moscow!

And then came on the frost and snow,
All on the road from Moscow!
The Emperor Nap found as he went,
That he was not quite Omnipotent;
And worse and worse the weather grew,
The fields were so white and the sky so blue,
Morbleu! Ventrebleu!
What a terrible journey from Moscow!

The devil take the hindmost,
All on the road from Moscow!
Quoth Nap, who thought it small delight,
To fight all day and to freeze all night;
And so, not knowing what else to do,
When the fields were so white and the sky so blue,
Morbleu! Parbleu!
He stole away, I tell you true,
All by himself from Moscow.

THE FATE OF THOMAS BROWN, SHOEMAKER:

Showing the folly of getting "BLUE," and the evil consequences attending thereon!

A shoemaker was Thomas Brown,
But he'd no work to do—
And so one night, his cares to drown
Our friend Tom Brown got blue!

And as he strove his home to gain,
He chanc'd a post to meet;—
The contact was a source of pain—
And Brown fell in the street.

A friend who saw poor Tom fall down,
To his assistance flew;
"Help, help!" cries Tom, "my name is Brown—
My back is black and blue!"

"Oh, Thomas Brown," said Tommy's friend,
"Who'd have thought this of you?
Quick mend your course!—think what an end
All such, at last come to!"

Now Tom was'd hot, but he'd not gained
His understanding yet—
For though his friend seemed so much pained,
He left him in the street.

"Pray help me up! I want no more
Of your advice!" Tom said;
"I ne'er made such a slip before,
Since I have slippers made.

"You know, if in this state I'm found,
And cannot move a foot,
My wife will soon make my ears sound,
And strap me well, to boot!"

His faithless friend left Tom to gaze
On upper worlds and sky;
Thought Tom, "I'd not have been so low,
If I'd not got so high!"

"Before I help," a passer cries,
"Your name and trade I'd learn."
Quoth Tom, "The concerns of mens' soles
Are, sir, my sole concern."

"And if I help you up, sir now,
Will you again get mellow?"
"If, sir, I do," cries Tom, "I vow,
I'm but a half-soul'd fellow!

"Upon my word, I feel quite down,
That this thing did be*fall*:
Oh, help me!—I can't stir a peg,
If 'twas to save my all!

He help'd poor Tom upon his feet;
And as they walk'd, Tom wrung
His hands, and thought of blows he'd get—
When home——My song is done—

And if I've bored you with my all,
And if I've botch'd the job,
The tale's not long, but very short,
So please forgive

Poor Bob.

LITERATURE, WIT AND SENTIMENT.

The poet's eye, in a fine phrenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
And, as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.

THE FAIRY ISLE.

BY S. G. GOODRICH.

I.

In the far off sea there is many a sprite,
Who rests by day, but awakes at night.
In hidden caves where monsters creep,
When the sun is high, these spectres sleep.
From the glance of noon, they shrink with dread,
And hide mid the bones of the ghastly dead.
Where the surf is hushed, and the light is dull,
In the hollow tube and whitened skull,
They crouch in fear or in whispers wail,
For the lingering night, and the coming gale.
But at eventide, when the shore is dim,
And bubbling wreaths with the billows swim,
They rise on the wing of the freshened breeze,
And flit with the wind o'er the rolling seas.
At summer eve, as I sat on the cliff,
I marked a shape like a dusky skiff,
That skimmed the brine, toward the rocky shore—
I heard a voice in the surge's roar—
I saw a form in the flashing spray,
And white arms beckoned me away.

II.

Away o'er the tide we went together,
Through shade and mist and stormy weather.
Away, away, o'er the lonely water,
On wings of thought like shadows we flew,
Nor paused 'mid scenes of wreck and slaughter,
That came from the blackened waves to view.
The staggering ship to the gale we left,
The drifting corse and the vacant boat,
The ghastly swimmer all hope bereft—
We left them there on the sea to float!
Through mist and shade and stormy weather,
That night we went to the icy Pole,
And there on the rocks we stood together,
And saw the ocean before us roll.
No moon shone down on the hermit sea,
No cheering beacon illumined the shore,
No ship on the water, no light on the lea,
No sound in the ear but the billow's roar.
But the wave was bright, as if lit with pearls,
And fearful things on its bosom played;
Huge krakens circled in foamy whirls,
As if the deep for their sport was made,
Or mighty whales through the crystal dashed,
And upward sent the far glittering spray,
Till the darkened sky with the radiance flashed,
And pictured in glory the wild array.

III.

Hast thou seen the deep in the moonlight beam,
Its wave like a maiden's bosom swelling?
Hast thou seen the stars in the water's gleam,
As if its depths were their holy dwelling?
We met more beautiful scenes that night,
As we slid along in our spirit-car,
For we crossed the South Sea, and, ere the light,
We doubled Cape Horn on a shooting star.
In our way we stopped, o'er a moonlit isle,
Which the fairies had built in the lonely sea,
And the surf spirit's brow was bent with a smile,
As we gazed through the mist of their revelry.
The ripples that swept to the pebbly shore,
O'er shells of purple in wantonness played,
And the whispering zephyrs sweet odours bore,
From roses that bloomed amid silence and shade.
In winding grottos, with gems all bright,
Soft music trembled from harps unseen,
And fair forms glided on wings of light,
Mid forests of fragrance, and vallies of green.
There were voices of gladness the heart to beguile,
And glances of beauty too fond to be true—
For the surf sprite shrieked, and the Fairy Isle,
By the breath of the tempest was swept from our view.
Then the howling gale o'er the billows rushed.
And trampled the sea in its march of wrath;
From stooping clouds the red lightning gushed,
And thunders moved in their blazing path.
'Twas a fearful night, but my shadowy guide
Had a voice of glee as we rode on the gale,
For we saw afar a ship on the tide,
With a bounding course and a fearless sail.
In darkness it came, like a storm-sent bird,
But another ship it met on the wave—
A shock—a shout—but no more we heard,
For they both went down to their ocean grave!
We paused on the misty wing of the storm,
As a ruby flash lit the face of the deep,
And fair in its bosom full many a form
Was swinging down to its silent sleep.
Another flash! and they seemed to rest,
In scattered groups, on the floor of the tide!

The lover and loved, they were breast to breast,
The mother and babe, they were side by side.
The leaping waves clapped their hands in joy,
And gleams of gold with the waters flowed,
But the peace of the sleepers knew no alloy,
For all was hushed in their lone abode.

IV.

On, on, like midnight visions, we passed,
The storm above, and the surge below,
And shrieking forms swept by on the blast,
Like demons speeding on errands of woe.
My spirit sank, for aloft in the cloud,
A star-set flag on the whirlwind flew,
And I knew that the billow must be the shroud
Of the noble ship and her gallant crew.
Her side was striped with a belt of white,
And twenty guns from each battery frowned,
But the lightning came in a sheet of flame,
And the towering sails in its folds were wound.
Vain, vain was the shout, that in battle rout,
Had rung as a knell in the ear of the foe,
For the bursting deck was heaved from the wreck,
And the sky was bathed in the awful glow!
The ocean shook its oozy bed,
As the swelling sound to the canopy went,
And a thousand fires like meteors shed
Their light into the tossing element.
A moment they gleamed, then sank in the foam,
And the darkness swept over the gorgeous glare—
They lighted the mariner down to their home,
And left them all sleeping in stillness there!

V.

The storm is hushed, and my vision is o'er,
The surf sprite changed to a foamy wreath,
The night is deepened along the shore,
And I thread my way o'er the dusky heath.
But often again I shall go to that cliff,
And seek for her form on the flashing tide,
For I know she will come in her airy skiff,
And over the sea we shall swiftly ride.

THE LAST WORDS OF BYRON.

"I must sleep now," the murmur'd sound,
Hung on the dying Poet's breath,
And his closed lids were almost bound,
By the cold wreath of death.
The lustre of that eye was fled—
Press'd by the heavy, clammy brow,
And half released from earth he said
In gentle tones, "I must sleep now."

That cold, and unexpressive eye
Once lighted on the brave to peace;
And that still voice, once raised on high,
The triumph songs of Greece.
"Was she, the loved one, lingering near,
The sharer of his early vow—
That he might whisper in her ear
His dying words, "I must sleep now?"

Unheard by her, those accents fell,
Unheeded passed his latest breath,
No gentle wife, to bid farewell,
No child to smooth his bed of death.
No forms of kindred youth, or love,
Around his couch, were seen to bow;
But stranger ears, and His—Above
Heard his last words, "I must sleep now."

MORAL PERCEPTIONS.—No moral perceptions are so blunt as those of the selfish; their's is the worst of near-sightedness—that of the heart.

THE BARONET'S BRIDE.

From the Diary of a Late Physician.

Never was man married under more auspicious circumstances than Sir Henry Harleigh. Himself the descendant of an ancient house, and the accomplished possessor of a splendid fortune; his bride the fairest flower in the family of a distinguished nobleman; surely here were elements of high happiness, warranting the congratulations of the "troops of friends" who, by their presence, added eclat to the imposing nuptials. "Heaven bless thee, sweet Anne?" sobbed the venerable peer, her father, folding his daughter in his arms, as Sir Henry advanced to conduct her to his travelling chariot; "may these be the last tears thou wilt have occasion to shed!" The blushing girl could make no reply; and linking her arm in that of her husband, dizzy with agitation, and almost insensible of the many hands that shook hers in passing, suffered him to lead her through the throng of guests above, and lines of be-favoured lacqueys below, to the chariot waiting to conduct "the happy pair" to a romantic residence of Sir Henry's in Wales. The moment they were seated, the steps were shut up—the door closed. Sir Henry hastily waved a final adieu to the company thronging the windows of the drawing-room he had just quitted: the postillions cracked their whips, and away dashed the chariot-and-four, amidst the cheery pealing of the bells—

——"bearing its precious throbbing charge
To halcyon climes afar."

Sir Henry's character contrasted strongly, in some respects, with that of his lady. His urbanity was tinctured with a certain reserve, or rather melancholy, which some considered the effects of an early and severe devotion to study; and others, perhaps more truly, of a constitutional tendency inherited from his mother. There was much subdued energy in his character; and you could not fail, under all his calmness of demeanour, to observe the strugglings of talent and ambition. Lady Anne, on the contrary, was all sprightliness and frolic. 'Twas like a sunbeam and a cloud brought together; the one, in short, "L'Allegro:" the other, "Il Penseroso." The qualities of each were calculated to attemper those of the other, alternately instigating and frightening; and who would not predicate a happy and harmonious union of such extremes?

Six months after their marriage, the "happy couple" returned to town, after having traversed an extensive portion of the Continent. Lady Anne looked lovelier, and her spirits were more buoyant and brilliant than ever. She had apparently transferred not a little of her vivacity into her husband's more tranquil temperament: his manners exhibited a briskness and joyousness which none of his friends had ever witnessed in him before. During the whole of the London "season," Lady Anne revelled in enjoyment, the idol of her husband—the centre of the gaiety and cheerfulness—the star of fashion Her debut at Court was the most flattering of the day. It was generally talked of, that the languid elegance, the listless fastidiousness of royalty, had been quickened into something like an appearance of interest, as the fair bride bowed before it, in the graceful attitude of loyal duty. One or twice I had the satisfaction of meeting with her Ladyship in public—all charming vivacity—all sparkle—followed by crowds of flatterers—till one would have thought her nearly intoxicated with their fragrant incense! 'What a sweet smile!'—'How passing graceful!'—'Heavens, what a swan-like neck?'—'Ah! happy fellow, that Harleigh!'—'Seen Lady Anne! Oh! yonder she moves—there—that laughing lady in white satin, tapping the French Ambassador on the shoulder with her fan.' 'What! is that Lady Anne, now waltzing with Lord ——? What a superb foot and ankle!—What a sylph it is!' Such was the ball-room tittle tattle that ever accompanied Sir Henry and his lady in passing through the mazes of a London season; and I doubt not the reader would have joined in it, could he have seen Lady Anne! Should I attempt to present her bodily before him, he would suspect me of culling the hyperboles of the novelist, while I should feel that after all I had failed. He should have seen for himself the light of passion—of feeling and thought—that shone in her eyes—the beauteous serenity that reigned in her aristocratic brow—'in all her gestures, dignity and love!' There is a picture of a young lady by Sir Joshua Reynolds that has been sworn to by hundreds as the image of Lady Anne; and it is one worthy of the artist's pencil. Not the least characteristic trait about her, was the naivete with which she acknowledged her love of Sir Henry, displaying it on all occasions by that disdained concealment. And so it was with the Baronet. Each was the other's pride and contentment: and both were the envy of society. Ah, who could look upon them, and believe that so dark a day was to come.

'Looks of reverent fondness,'

In due time Sir Henry completed the extensive arrangements for his town residence; and by the beginning of the ensuing winter, Lady Anne found herself at the head of as noble an establishment as her heart could desire. The obsequious morning prints soon teemed with accounts of his dinners; and of the balls, routs, soirees, and conversaziones given by this new "queen of the evening hour." Sir Henry, who represented his county in Parliament, and consequently had many calls upon his time—for he was rather disposed to be a "working" member—let his lady have it all her own way. He mingled but little in her gaities; and when he did it was evident that his thoughts were elsewhere—that he rather tolerated than enjoyed them. He soon settled into the habitudes of the man of political fashion, seldom deviating from the track, with all its absorbing associations, bounded by the House and Clubs;—those sunk-rocks of many a woman's domestic happiness! In short, Sir Henry—man of fashion as he was—was somewhat of a character, and was given ample credit for sporting "the eccentric." His manners were marked by a dignity that often froze into almost surly abruptness; which, however, was easily carried to the account of severe political application and abstraction. Towards his beautiful wife, however, he preserved a demeanour of uniform tenderness. She could not form a wish that he did not even personally endeavour to secure her the means of gratifying. Considering the number and importance of his public engagements, many wondered that he could contrive to be so often seen accompanying her in rides in and about the Park and elsewhere; but who could name

'The sacrifice affection would not yield.'

Some there were, however, who ere long imagined they detected a moodiness; an irritability; a restlessness; of which his political engagements afforded no sufficient explanations. They spoke of his sudden fits of absence, and the agitation he displayed on being startled from them. What could there be to disturb him? was he running beyond his income to supply his lady's extravagance? was he offended at any lightness or indiscretion of which she might have been guilty? had he given credence to any of the hundred tales circulated in society of every woman eminent in the haut ton? was he embarrassed with the consequence of some deep political move? No one could tell; but many marked the increasing indications of his dissatisfaction and depression. Observation soon fastened her keen eyes upon the Lady Anne, and detected occasional clouds upon her general joyous countenance. Her bright eye was often laden with anxiety; the colour of her check varied; the blandness and cheerfulness of her manner gave place to frequent abruptness, petulance, and absence; symptoms, these, which soon set her friends sympathising, and her acquaintance speculating. Whenever this sort of enquiry is roused, charity falls asleep. She never seemed at ease, it was said in her husband's presence—his departure seemed the signal for her returning gaiety. Strange to say, each seemed the conscious source of the other's anxiety and apprehension. Each had been detected casting furtive glances at the other—trackling one another's motions, and listening, even, to one another's conversation; and some went so far as to assert that each had been observed on such occassasions to turn suddenly pale. What could be the matter? Every body wondered; no one knew. Some attributed their changed deportment to the exhaustion consequent upon late hours and excitement; a few hinted the probability of a family—many whispered that Sir Henry —some that Lady Anne—gambled.—Others, again, insinuated that each had too good a cause to be dissatisfied with each other's fidelity. When, however, it got currently reported that a letter was one evening given to Sir Henry at his club, which blanched his face and shook his head as he read it—that his whole manner was disturbed for days after, and that he even absented himself from a grand debate in the house—an occasion on which he was specially pledged to support his party—curiosity was at once heightened and bewildered. Then, again, it was undeniable that they treated one another with the utmost tenderness—really —unequivocally. Lady Anne, however, daily exhibited symptoms of increasing disquietude; the lustre faded from her eye, the colour from her cheek—her vivacity totally disappeared—she no longer even affected it. "How thin she gets!" was an exclamation heard on all hands. They were seen less frequently in society; and even when they did enter into it, 'twas evidently an intolerable burden.—Sighs were heard to escape from Lady Anne; her eyes occasionally filled with tears; and it was noticed, that on observing Sir Henry watching her—which was often the case—she made violent efforts to recover her composure. Thus in tears one evening, curiosity was strained to the utmost when Sir Henry approached her, bowed among the gentlemen who were proposing to dance with her, drew her arm within his, and, with some trepidation of manner, quitted the room. 'Good Heaven! what can be behind the scenes? thought fifty different people who had witnessed this exhibition.

'Afraid they lead a woful life together,' said one. 'I never thought they would suit one another,' was the reply.

''Pon my soul,' simpered a sickly scion of nobility, ''tis an odd thing to say—but—but—gad, I do believe I can explain it all! Harleigh, I know hates to see her dance with me—whew!'

'Haven't you seen her turn pale, and seem quite sick at heart, when she has noticed him talking to Miss ——?' wheezed an old Dowager, whose daughter had attempted to join in the race for the Baronet's hand? These, and a thousand others, were questions, hints, and innuendoes bandied about everywhere during the remainder of the season; soon after the close of which Lady Anne brought her husband a "son and heir;" and as soon as circumstances would permit, the whole establishment was ordered out of town—and Sir Henry and his lady set off no one knew whither. It was presently discovered, however, that they were spending the summer in a sequestered part of Switzerland. At an advanced period of the autumn they returned to London; and the little that was seen of them in society served to show that their continental sojourn had worked little or no change in either—save that Lady Anne, since her accouchement, was far more delicate in health than usual under similar circumstances. Rumour and speculation were suddenly revived by an extraordinary move of Sir Henry's—he broke up, at a moment's warning, his extensive town establishment, and withdrew to a beautiful mansion about ten or twelve miles distant from the metropolis. Strange as was such a step, it had the effect, probably contemplated by the Baronet, of quieting curiosity, as soon as the hubbub occasioned by the removal of its cause, had ceased. In the vortex of London pleasure and dissipation, who can think of objects no longer present to provoke enquiry? One thing was obvious—that Lady Anne's family were, or affected to be, in the dark about the scource of her disquietude. The old peer, whose health was rapidly declining, had removed to his native air, in a remote part of Ireland. Several of his daughters, fine, fashionable women, continued in town. It was whispered that their visits to Sir Henry's had been coldly discouraged: and thus, if secresy and seclusion were the objects aimed at by the Baronet, he apparently succeeded in attaining them.

I may observe, that during the period above referred to, several enquiries had been made of me concerning the topics in question, by my patients, and others—who supposed that a former professional acquaintance with the Baronet, slight though it was, gave me some initiation into the mysteries of his conduct. Such, I need hardly say, were queries I was utterly unable to answer. Sir Henry, though a polite, was at all times a distant, uncommunicative man: and had he even been otherwise, we came but seldom into personal contact since his marriage. I therefore shared, instead of satisfying, the prevalent curiosity respecting his movements.

It was late in the evening of the 25th of April 181—, that a letter was put into my hands, bearing on the envelope the words "Private and confidential." The frank was by Sir Henry Harleigh, and the letter, which also was from him, ran thus. Let the reader imagine my astonishment in perusing it!

"Dear Doctor ——: My travelling carriage-and-four will be at your door to-morrow morning at between nine and ten o'clock, for the purpose of conveying you down to my house, about ten miles from town—where your services are required. Let me implore you not to permit any engagement—short of life or death—to stand in your way of coming at the time, and in the mode I have presumed to point out. Your presence—believe me!—is required on matters of special urgency—and—you will permit me to add—of special confidence. I may state, in a word, that the object of your visit is Lady Anne. I shall, if possible, and you are punctual, meet you on the road, in order that you may be in some measure prepared for the duties that await you. I am, &c. &c.

HENRY HARLEIGH.

P. S. Pray forgive me if I say I have opened my letter for the sake of entreating you not to apprise any body of the circumstance of my sending for you."

This communication threw me into a maze of conjectures. I apprehended that the ensuing morning would introduce me to some scene of distress—and my imagination could suggest only family discord as the occasion. I soon made my requisite arrangements; and when the morning came, without having shewn my wife the Baronet's letter, or giving her any clue to my destination, jumped into the pea-green chariot-and-four, the instant it drew up at my door—and was presently whirled out of town at the rate of twelve miles an hour. I observed that the pannels had neither crest nor supporters; and the colour was not that of the Baronet's. I did not meet the Baronet, as his letter had led me to expect. On reaching the park gates, which stood open, the groom leaped down the instant the reeking horses could be stopped, opened the carriage-door, and with a respectful bow informed me that the Baronet begged I would alight at the gates. Of course I acquiesced, and walked up the avenue to the house, full of amazement at the apparent mystery which was thrown about my movements. I ascended the spreading steps which led to the hall-door, and even pushed it open without encountering any one. On ringing the bell, however, an elderly and not very neatly dressed female made her appearance—and asked me, with a respectful curtsy, whether my name was "Dr. ——." On being answered in the affirmative, she said that Sir Henry was waiting for me in a room adjoining, and immediately led the way to it. I thought it singular enough that no male domestic should have hitherto made his appearance—knowing that in town Sir Henry kept an unusually large retinue of such gentry. I thought, also, that I perceived something unusual, not only in the countenance and manner of the female who had answered my summons, but of the groom who attended me from town. I was soon, however, in the presence of the Baronet. The room was spacious and lofty, and furnished in a style of splendid elegance. Several busts, statues, and valuable paintings graced the corners and sides, together with a noble library containing, I should think, several thousand volumes. Before I had time to cast more than a cursory glance around me, Sir Henry issued from a door at the further extremity of the library, and advancing hastily to me, shook me by the hand with cordiality. He wore a flowered green velvet dressing-gown, and his shirt collars were turned down. I thought I had never seen a finer figure or a more expressive countenance—the latter, however, clouded with mingled sternness and anxiety.

"Doctor," said he, conducting me to a seat, "I feel greatly obliged by this prompt attention to my wishes—which, however, I fear must have inconvenienced you. Have you breakfasted?"

"Yes—but my drive has sharpened my appetite afresh—I think I could not resist a cup of chocolate or coffee."

"Ah—good! I'm happy to hear it. Perhaps then you will permit me to take a turn round the garden—and then we will join Lady Anne in the breakfast room?"—I assented. There was something flurried in his manner and peremptory in his tone—I saw there was something that agitated him, and waited for the denouement with interest. In a moment or two, we were walking together in the garden, which we had entered through a glass door.

"Doctor," said Sir Henry in a low tone, "I have sent for you on a most melancholy errand to-day"—he seemed quite agitated, and paused—proceeding, "I have infinite satisfaction in being able to avail myself of your services—for I know that you are both kind and experienced—as well as—confidential?" Again he paused, and looked full at me—I bowed, and he resumed.

"Possibly you may have occasionally heard surmises about Lady Anne and myself?—I believe we have occasioned no little speculation latterly!" I smiled and bowed off his enquiry. "I am conscious that there has been some grounds for it"—he continued with a sigh—"and I now find the time is arrived when all must be known—I must explain it all to you. You have, I believe, occasionally met us in society, and recollect her ladyship?"

"Several times, Sir Henry—and I have a distinct recollection of her. Indeed"—

"Did it ever strike you that there was any thing remarkable either in her countenance or deportment?"

I looked at a loss to understand him.

"I—I mean—did you observe a certain peculiarity of expression in her features?"—he continued earnestly.

"Why—let me see—I have certainly observed her exhibit languor and lassitude—her cheek has been pale, and her countenance now and then saddened with anxiety. I supposed, however, there was no unusual mode of accounting for it, Sir Henry"—I added with a smile. The Baronet's face was clouded for a moment, as if with displeasure and anxiety.

"Ah"—he replied, hastily—"I see—I understand you—but you are quite mistaken—totally so. Pray, is that the general supposition?"

"Why—I am not aware of its being expressed in so many words; but it was one that struck me immediately—as a matter of course." As I was speaking, I observed Sir Henry change colour.

"Doctor ——" said he, in a low agitated voice, grasping my arm as if with involuntary energy—"We have no time to lose. One word—alas, one word—will explain all. It is horrible torture to me—but I can conceal it no longer. You must be told the truth at once. Lady Anne is—insane! "He rather gasped than spoke that word. He stood suddenly still, and covered his face with his hands. He shook with agitation. Neither of us spoke for a minute or two—except that I almost unconsciously echoed the last word he had uttered. "Insane!—Why, I can scarcely believe my ears, Sir Henry. Do you use the last word in its literal—its medical sense?"

"Yes, I do!—I mean that my wife is mad—Yes! with a mad woman you are asked to sit down to breakfast. I can assure you, Doctor ——, that the anguish I have latterly endured on this horrible account has nearly driven me to the same condition! Oh God, what a dreadful life has been mine for this last year or two, as I have seen this tremendous calamity gradually befalling me"——

"I implored him to restrain his feelings."

"Yes, you are right," said he, after a pause, in which he tried to master his emotion—"I have recovered myself. Let us repair to the breakfast-room. For Heaven's sake, appear—if you can—as though nothing had transpired between us. Make any imaginable excuse you please for coming hither. Say you were called in by me, on my account; for—for—any complaint you choose to mention. It will be for you to watch my poor Lady Anne with profound attention—but, of course, not obviously. I shall take an opportunity, as if by chance,—of leaving you alone with her. Afterwards, we will concert the steps necessary to this dreadful emergency. By the way, you must not expect to see any thing wild or extravagant in her manner. She will not appear even eccentric; for she is very guarded before strangers. Hush!" said he, shaking and turning round palely—"did you hear; no, it was a mistake!—Alas, how nervous I am become!—I have perfect control over her; but watch her eye; her mouth—her eye"—he shuddered; "and you will know all! Now, Doctor, for mercy's sake don't commit yourself; or me!" he whispered, as he regained the room he had quitted. He paused for a moment as if to expend a heavy sigh,—and then opening the door through which he had originally entered to receive me, ushered me into the breakfast-room. Lady Anne; beautiful creature; in a white morning dress, sat beside the silver urn, apparently reading the newspaper. She seemed surprised at seeing me, and bowed politely when Sir Henry mentioned my name, without moving from her seat. Her cheek was very pale—and there was an expression of deep anxiety; or rather apprehension; in her eye, which glanced rapidly from me to Sir Henry who could not appear calm; his cheek was flushed; his hand unsteady; his voice thick; his manner flurried.

"Are not you well, Sir Henry?" enquired his lady, looking earnestly at him.

"Never better, love!" he replied, with an effort at smiling.

"I fear I have disturbed your ladyship in reading the Morning Post," said I, interrupting an embarrassed pause.

"Oh, not at all, sir; not the least. There is nothing in it of any interest," she replied, with a faint sigh; "I was only looking over a silly account of the Duchess of ———'s fête. Do you take breakfast?" addressing me.

"A single cup of tea, and a slice of this tongue, are all I shall trouble your ladyship for. Talking, by the way, of fêtes," I added, carelessly, "it is whispered in the world that your ladyship had taken the veil—or—or—died; in short, we are all wondering what has become of your ladyship—that is, of both of you!"

"Ah!" said the Baronet, with affected eagerness, "I suppose, by the way, we come in for our share of hint and innuendo! Pray, what is the latest coinage, doctor, from the mint of scandal and tittle-tattle?"

Lady Anne's hand trembled as she handed me the cup of tea I asked her for—and her eye settled apprehensively on that of her husband. "Why, the general impression is, that you are playing general misanthrope, in consequence of some political pique." Sir Henry laughed feebly.

"And your Ladyship, too, turns absentee! I fear you are not in the health—the brilliant spirits—which used to charm the world."

"Indeed, Doctor, I am not! I am one of the many victims"——

"Of ennui," interrupted the Baronet, quickly, fixing an imperative eye upon his lady, I saw with what nervous apprehension, lest she should afford even the desired corroboration of what he had told me in the garden.

"Yes, yes, ennui," she replied, timidly, adding, with a sigh, "I wonder the world remembers us so long."

"I have a note to write, Docter," said the Baronet suddenly, treading at the same time gently on my foot, "which I intend to beg you will carry up to town for me. Will you excuse me for a few moments?" I bowed. "Lady Anne, I dare say will entertain you from the Morning Post—ha! ha!"

She smiled faintly. I observed Sir Henry's eye fixed upon her, as he shut the door, with an expression of agonizing apprehension. The reader may imagine the peculiar feelings of embarrassment with which I found myself at length alone with Lady Anne. Being ignorant of the degree or species of her mental infirmity, I felt much at a loss how to shape my conversation. As far as one could judge from appearance, she was as perfectly sane as I considered myself. I could detect no wildness of the eye—no incoherence of language—no eccentricity of deportment—nothing but an air of languor and anxiety.

"Sir Henry is looking well," said I, as he closed the door.

"Yes—he always looks well; even if he were ill, he would not look so."

"I wish I could sincerely compliment your ladyship on your looks," I continued, eyeing her keenly.

"Certainly—I have been better than I am at present," she replied, with a sigh—"What I have to complain of, however, is not so much bodily ailing, as lowness of spirits."

"Your ladyship is not the first on whom a sudden seclusion from society has had similar effects. Then why not return to town—at least for a season?"

"There are—reasons—why I should at present prefer to continue in retirement," she replied, dropping her eyes to avoid the steadfast look with which I regarded them.

"Reasons! permit me to ask your ladyship the import of such mysterious terms?" I enquired, with gentle earnestness, drawing my chair nearer to her, believing that the ice was at length broken.

"I am not aware, Doctor," said she coldly, "that I said anything that should be called mysterious."

"Pardon, pardon me, my lady! I was only anxious lest you might have any secret source of anxiety preying on your mind, and from which I might have the power of relieving you. Permit me to say, how deeply grieved I am to see your ladyship's altered looks. I need not disguise the fact that Sir Henry is exceedingly anxious on your account"—

"What! what! Sir Henry anxious—on my account!" she repeated, with an air of astonishment; "why, can it then be possible that I am the object of your present visit, Dr.——?"

I paused for a moment. Why should I conceal or deny the fact, thought I.

"Your ladyship guesses aright. Sir Henry's anxieties have brought me hither this morning. He wishes me to ascertain whether your ladyship labours under indisposition of any kind."

"And pray, Doctor," continued her ladyship, turning pale as she spoke, "what does he imagine my complaint to be? Did he mention any particular symptoms?"

"Indeed he did—lassitude—loss of appetite—lowness of spirits."

She raised her handkerchief to her eyes, which, glistening with tears, she presently directed to the window, as if she dreaded to encounter mine. Her lips quivered with emotion.

"Dear lady, for Heaven's sake be calm! Why should you distress yourself?" said I, gently placing my fingers upon her wrist, at which she started, withdrew her hand, looked me rather wildly full in the face, and bursting into tears, wept for some time in silence.

"Oh, Doctor——!" at length she sobbed, in hesitating, passionate accents—"you cannot imagine how very ill I am—here," placing her hand upon her heart. "I am a wretched, a miserable woman! There never lived a more unfortunate being! I shall never, never be happy again," she continued, vehemently.

"Come, come, your Ladyship must make a confident of me!—What, in Heaven's name, can be the meaning of all this emotion? No one, sure, can have used you ill? Come, tell me all about it!"

"Oh, I cannot I dare not! It is a painful secret to keep, but it would be dreadful to tell it. Have you really no idea of it? Has it not, then, been openly whispered about in the world?" she enquired eagerly, with much wildness in her manner.

Alas, poor, lady Anne! I had seen and heard enough to satisfy me that her state corroborated the fears expressed by Sir Henry, whose return at that moment, with a sealed note in his hand, put an end to our melancholy tete-a-tete. He cast a sudden keen glance of scrutiny at his lady and me, and then went up to her, and kissed her tenderly without speaking. What wretchedness were in his features at that moment! I saw by his manner that he desired me to rise and take my leave; and after a few words on different subjects, I rose, bowed to her ladyship, and accompanied by the baronet, withdrew.

'Well, am I right or wrong, Doctor, in my terrible suspicions?' enquired the baronet, his manner much disturbed, and trembling from head to foot, as we stood together in the large bow-window of his library. I sighed, and shook my head.

'Did she make any allusions to the present arrangement I had been obliged to adopt in the house?'

I told him the substance of what had passed between us. He sighed profoundly, and covered his eyes for a moment with his hands

'Is her ladyship ever violent?' I enquired.

'No—seldom—never, never! I wish she were! Any thing—any thing to dissipate the horrid monotony of melancholy madness—but I cannot bear to talk on the subject. I can scarcely control my feelings!' He turned from me and stood looking through the window, evidently overpowered with grief. For a minute or two neither of us spoke.

'The dreadful subject forces itself upon us,' said he suddenly turning again towards me—'Doctor, what in Heaven's name—what is to be done in this tremendous emergency? Let our first care be to prevent disclosure. I suppose—a contemporary seclusion, I am afraid, will be necessary?' he added, in a hollow whisper, looking gloomily at me. I told him I feared such a course would be advisable, if not even necessary, and assured him that he need be under no apprehension on that score, for there were many admirable retreats for such patients as his unfortunate lady—where privacy, comfort, amusement, and skilful surveillance, were combined. I told him not to despond of his lady's early restoration to society.

'Oh, Doctor!'—he groaned, clasping his hands vehemently together—'the maddening thought that my sweet, my darling wife, must be banished from my bosom—from her home—from her child—and become the inmate of—of—a—.' He ceased abruptly. A wild smile shot across his features.

'Doctor,' said he, lowering his tone to a faint whisper, 'can I trust you with a secret? I know I am acting imprudently—unnecessarily disclosing it—but I know it will be safe with you!"

I bowed, and listened in breathless wonder * * My flesh crept from head to foot as he went on. I had been all along the dupe of A MADMAN. His eye was fixed upon me with a devilish expression. The shock deprived me of utterance—for a while, almost of sight and hearing. I was startled back into consciousness, by a loud laugh uttered by the Baronet. He was pointing at me, with his arm and finger extended, almost touching my face, with an air of derision. The dreadful truth flashed all at once upon my mind. I could now understand the illness, the melancholy of Lady Anne—whose blanched countenance, looking through the half-opened door, caught my eye at that moment, as I happened to turn in the direction of the breakfast-room. I trembled lest the madman should also see her, and burst into violence!

* * I had been pondering all the while on the proper course to follow under such extraordinary circumstances, and therefore permitted him to ramble on as he pleased.—"First and foremost," his countenance suddenly fell, and he cast a disturbed glance at the breakfast room door, "we must make some decisive arrangements about poor Lady Anne. She knows my secret, and it is the thoughts of it that have turned—(women you know cannot bear sudden fortune!)—but oh! such a gentle madness is hers!" He uttered this last exclamation in a tone that touched my heart to the quick; melting, moving, soul-subduing was it as some of the whispers of Kean in Othello! "Doctor," he commenced abruptly, after a pause, "let me consider of it for a moment—a thought suggests itself—I would not have her feelings wounded for worlds!—I'll consider of it—and presently tell you my determination." He folded his arms on his breast, and walked slowly up and down the library, as if engaged in profound contemplation, and so continued for five or ten minutes, as if he had utterly forgotten me, who stood leaning against the window-frame, watching him with unutterable feelings. What should I do? It was next to impossible for me to have another interview with Lady Anne before leaving. I thought it on the whole advisable not to alarm his suspicions by any such attempt, but to take my departure as quietly and quickly as possible; determined on reaching London to communicate immediately with Mr. Courthrope, his brother-in-law, with whom I had some little acquaintance, and with him suggest such measures as were necessary to secure the safety, not only of the Baronet, but his wretched lady. This resolution formed, I felt anxious to be gone. As the poor Baronet's cogitations, however, seemed far from approaching a close, I found it necessary to interrupt him.

"Well, Sir Harry," said I, moving from the window-recess, "I must leave you, for I have many engagements in town."

"Do you know, now," said he, with a puzzled air, "I positively cannot remember what it was I had to think about! How very absurd! What was it, now?" standing still, and corrugating his brows. "Oh, it was whether it would be proper for me to see Lady Anne before I left—Ah," said he, briskly, "aye, so it was—I recollect—why—see Lady Anne?—No—I think not," he replied with an abrupt, peculiar tone and manner, as if displeased with the proposal, "I will accompany you to the road, where you will find the carriage in readiness to take you back to town." He at the same time took from a pocket book in his bosom-pocket a note case, and gave me a check, by way of fee, £500!

"By the way," said he, abruptly, as arm-in-arm we walked down to the park gates, "what, after all, are we to do with Lady Anne? How strange that we should have forgotten her? Well, what step do you intend taking next?"—I sighed.

"I must turn it over carefully in my mind, before I commit myself."

"Ah Sallust!—Priusquam incipias—consulto; sed ubi consulueris—sed ubi consulueris, Doctor ——."

"Maturæ facto, opus est, Sir Harry," I replied, humouring his recollection."

"Good. There never was any thing more curt and pretty." He repeated the sentence. "Well, and what will you do?"

"I cannot precisely say at present, but you may rely upon seeing me here again this evening. I hope you will conceal it from Lady Anne, however, or it may alarm her."

"Mind me, Doctor," said he abruptly, his features clouding over with a strange expression, "I—I—will have no violence used."

"Violence! my dear Sir Henry! violence! God forbid!" I exclaimed, with unaffected amazement.

Of course, Doctor, I hold you personally, laying a strenuous emphasis on the last word, 'I hold you personally responsible for whatever measures may be adopted. Here, however, is the carriage. I shall await your return with anxiety.' I shook him by the hand, and stepped in the chariot.

'Good morning—good morning, Sir Henry!' I exclaimed, as the postilions were preparing to start. He put in his head at the window, and in a hurried tone whispered,—'On second thoughts, Dr. ——, I shall decline any further interference in the matter—at least to-day.' He had scarcely uttered the last words, when the chariot drove off.

"Hollo! hark ye, fellow! stop! stop!" shouted the Baronet, at the top of his voice, "stop, or I'll fire."—The postilions, who, I observed, had set off at pretty near a gallop, seemed disposed to continue it; but on hearing the last alarming words, instantaneously drew up. I looked with amazement through the window, and beheld Sir Henry hurrying towards us—fury in his features, and a pocket-pistol in his extended right hand.

"Good God, Sir Henry!" I exclaimed, terror-struck, "what can be the meaning of this extraordinary conduct?"

"A word in your ear, Doctor," he panted, coming close up to the carriage door.

"Speak, for Heaven's sake, speak, Sir Henry," said I, leaning my head towards him.

"I suspect you intend violent measures towards me, Doctor ——."

"Against you! Violent measures—against any body?—You are dreaming, Sir Henry!"

"Ah, I see further into your designs than you imagine, Doctor ——! You wish to extract my secret from me, for your own exclusive advantage. So, mark me—if you come again to —— Hall, you shall not return alive—so help me ——! Adieu!" He strode haughtily off, waving his hand to the terrified postilions, and we soon lost sight of the unhappy madman. I threw myself back in my seat completely bewildered. Not only my own personal safety, but that of Lady Anne was menaced. What might not frenzy prompt him to do, during my absence, and on my return?—Full of these agitating thoughts, I rejoiced to find myself thundering townward, as fast as four horses could carry me, in obedience to the orders I had given the postilions, the instant that Sir Henry quitted us. At length we reached a steep hill, that compelled us to slacken our pace, and give breath to our panting horses. I opened the front window, and bespoke the nearest postilion.

"Boy, there! Are you in Sir Henry's service?"

"No, sir, not exactly—but we serves him as much as thof we was, for the matter of that," he replied touching his hat.

"Were you surprised to see what occurred at starting?"

"No, sir," he replied, lowering his tone, and looking about him, as if he expected to find the Baronet at his heels. "He's done many a stranger thing nor that, sir, lately!"

"I suppose, then, you consider him not exactly in his right senses, eh!"

"It a'n't for the likes o' me to say such a thing of my betters, sir; but this I may make bold for to say, sir, if as how I, or any o' my fellow-servants, had done the likes o' what we've latterly seen up at the Hall there, they'd a' clapped us into jail or Bedlam long ago?"

"Indeed! Why, what has been going on?"

"You'll not tell of a poor lad like me—will you sir?"

"Oh, no—you may be sure of that—I'll keep your secret."

"Well, sir," said he, speaking more unconstrainedly turning round in his saddle full towards me, "first and foremost, he's discharged me, and Thomas here, my fellow-servants, an' we takes up at the inn, a mile or so from the Hall; likewise the coachman and the footman; likewise all the women servants—always excepting the cook, and my lady's maid—and an't them a few sarvents for to do all the work of that great Hall? An't that strange-like, sir?"

"Well, what else? How does Sir Henry pass his time?"

"Pass his time sir? Why, sir, we hears from cook, as how he boils candles, sir," quoth the fellow, grinning.

"Boils candles, sirrah? What do you mean? Are you in earnest?"

"Yes, sir, I be indeed! He'll boil as many as twenty in a day, in the cook's best saucepans; and then he pours the most precious brandy into the mess—wasting good brandy—and then throws it all into a deep hole every night, that he has dug in the garden. 'Twas no later nor yesterday, sir, cook told me all—how she happened to be squinting through the key-hole, and no harm neither, sir, (axing your pardon,) when a man goes on in sich ways as them—and seed him kneel down upon the dirty hearth, before the saucepan full of candles, as they were boiling, and pray sich gibberish—like!"

"Well!" said I, with a sigh, "but what does her Ladyship all this while?"

"Oh, sir, our poor lady is worn almost, in a manner, to skin and bone. She follows him about like a ghost, and cries her eyes out; but for all that she is so gentle-like, he's woundy stern with her, and watches her just like a cat does a mouse, as our would say! Once he locked her in her bedroom all day, and only gave her bread and water! But the strangest thing is yet to come, sir; he makes out that it's her that's mad! so that for a long time we all believed it was so; for, sir, it's only of late, that we began to see how the real truth of the matter stood, sir. Sir Henry was always, since we've known him, a bit queer or so, but steady in the main; and as our poor lady was always mopish and melancholic like, it was natral we should give in to believe it was her that was, as one would say, melancholy mad, and so all true what Sir Henry said of her."

"Is Sir Henry ever violent?"

"Lord, sir! Mrs. Higgins, that's the cook, tells strange tales of him just latterly. He bolts every door, great and small, in the Hall, with his own hands, every night, and walks about in it with a loaded blunderbuss!"

"Miss Sims," said the further postilion, "that's my lady's maid, told Mrs. Higgins, and she told my sister, who told me, as a secret, sir, that Sir Henry always sleeps every night with a bare drawn sword under his pillow, and a couple of loaded pistols stuck into the watch-pockets, as they call 'em, and frightens my Lady to death with his pranks!"

I could scarcely believe what they were telling me.

"Why, my boy, I cannot believe that all this is true!"

"'Deed, sir, we wish it warn't!"

"How long have you known it?"

"Only a day back, or so."

"And why did not you set off for London, and tell ——."

"Lord, sir—us spread about that Sir Henry was mad! Nobody would believe us, for he's woundy cunning, and can talk as grave as a judge, and as good as the parson, when he chooses; an' that being so, if we'd gone up to town with them stories, the great folk would ha' come down, and he'd a' persuaded them it was all false—and what would have become of we?"

"And what is become of the servants? Are they all dumb?"

"Yes, sir, in a manner, seeing as how they have been bound to silence by our poor lady, till she should tell them to give the alarm; an' he's been too cunning latterly to give her an opportunity of doing so. She'll be main glad o' your coming, I'll warrant me, for scarce a fly dare leave the house but he'd be after it!"

"Drive on—drive on, boys, for your lives," said I, finding we had at length surmounted the hill, and directed them to go at once to the house of Mr. Courthrope. Indeed there was not a moment to be lost, for it was clear that the madman's suspicions were roused, indefinite as might be his apprehensions; and his cunning and violence, each equally to be dreaded, might prompt him to take some dangerous, if not fatal step in my absence. Fortunately, I found Mr. Courthrope at home, and immeasurably shocked he was at my intelligence. It seemed that the Baronet and he had been totally estranged for some months, owing to an affront, which he was now satisfied arose out of his unhappy relative's insanity. Our arrangements were soon made. We exchanged the chariot in which I had returned to town, for a commodious carriage, calculated to hold four or five persons, and drove off at once to the residence of Dr. Y——, one of the most eminent "mad doctors," as they are somewhat unceremoniously denominated. Our interview was but brief. In less than half an hour, Dr. Y——, Mr. Courthrope, and I, with two keepers, deposited ourselves respectively within and without the vehicle, and set off direct for —— Hall.

Mr. Courthrope and I were sad enough; but little Dr. Y—— was calm and lively as if he were obeying an invitation to dinner!

"Suppose Harleigh should grow desperate—should offer resistance!" said Mr. Courthrope, very pale.

"Nothing more likely," replied Dr. Y——, coolly.

"But what is to be done? My cousin was always an athletic man; and now that the strength of madness"—

"Pho, my dear sir, he would be but a child in the hands of those two fellows of mine outside—like a wild elephant between two tame ones—ha, ha!"

"You, I dare say, have witnessed so many of those scenes," said I, with a faint smile—for his indifference hurt me; it jarred upon my own excited feelings.

"For Heaven's sake—for Lady Anne's sake, Dr. Y——," said Mr. Courthrope agitatedly, as a sudden turn of the road brought us in sight of —— Hall, "let nothing like violence be used."

"Oh, most assuredly not. 'Tis a system I always eschewed. Never do by foul, what may be accomplished by fair means. Our conduct will be regulated to a hair by that of Sir Henry. Only leave him to us, and, by hook and by crook, we'll secure him."

"But, suppose he should have fire-arms," said I; "I know he carries them—he pointed a loaded pistol at me this morning."

"My dear Doctor, how did you know it was loaded? 'Tis what one would have called at the schools a gratuitous assumption! Madmen have a vast penchant for terrifying with fire-arms; but somehow they always forget the ammunition!"

"But only put the case; suppose Sir Henry should have got possession of a pistol ready loaded to his hand!"

"Certainly, in such a case, something awkward might occur," replied Dr. Y——, seriously, "but I trust a good deal to the effect of my eye upon him from the first. 'Tis a kind of talisman among my patients—ha, ha!"

"Poor Lady Anne!" exclaimed Mr. Courthrope, "what will become of her?"

"Ah! she must be removed with, and kept out of the way; otherwise we may expect a scene!" replied the matter-of-fact Dr. Y——.

Now there was a certain something about this my professional brother that was intolerable to me; a calm, self-satisfied air, a smirking civility of tone and manner, that, coupled with his truly dreadful calling, and the melancholy enterprise which he at present conducted, really revolted me. How doleful, how odious, would be the jocularity of Jack Ketch! And, again, when the Doctor, who was a well-bred man, saw the sickening agitation of his two companions, there was an artificial adaptation of his manner, in the tones of his voice, and the expression of his features, that offended me, because one felt it to be assumed, in consideration of our weakness! He was, however, in his way, a celebrated and successful man, and I believe deserved to be so.

In due time we reached the park gates, and Dr. Y——, Mr. Courthrope, and I, there alighted, directing the carriage to follow us at a leisurely pace to the hall-door. I rang the bell; and, after waiting nearly a minute or two, an elderly woman answered our summons.

"Can we see Sir Henry Harleigh?" enquired Mr. Courthrope.

"No, sir," was the prompt reply.

"And why not? My good woman, we must see Sir Henry immediately, on business of the highest importance."

"Indeed! Then you should have come a little earlier!"

"Come a little earlier?" said I; "what do you mean? Sir Henry himself appointed this evening."

"Then it's clear he must have changed his mind; for he and my Lady both set off in a post-chaise-and-four some two hours ago, howsomever, and I don't know where, either; perhaps you had better go after him!"

We stood looking at one another in amazement.

"In what direction did he go?" I enquired.

"Down the road, sir. He desired me to tell any one that might call, that he was gone off to Wales."

I sighed with vexation and alarm; Mr. Courthrope looked pale with apprehension; while Dr. Y——, with his eyes half-closed, stood looking with a smiling inquisitiveness at the confident woman that was addressing us. A pretty stand-still were we arrived at! What was now to be done?

"Here!" said Dr. Y——, in an under tone, beckoning us to follow him to a little distance from the door. We did so.

"Pho, pho!" he whispered, taking our arms into his —"the woman is trifling with us. Sir Henry is at this moment in the Hall—aye, as surely as we are now here!"

"Indeed! How can you possibly"——

"Ah, he must be very clever, either sane or insane, that can deceive me in these matters! 'Tis all a trick of Sir Henry's, I'll lay my life on't. The woman did not tell her tale naturally enough. Come, we'll search the Hall, however, before we go back again on a fool's errand! Come, my good woman," said he, as we reascended the steps, "you have not told us the truth. We happen to know that the Baronet and his lady are at this moment above stairs, for we saw him just now at the corner of the window."

This cool invention confounded the woman, and she began to hesitate. "Come," pursued our spokesman, "you had better be candid; for we will be so—and tell you we are determined to search this Hall from one end to the other, from top to bottom, but we will find him we come to seek."

"Oh, lord!" replied the woman, with an air of vexation. "You must do as you please; I've given you my answer, and you'll take the consequences."

With this she left us. After a short consultation, Mr. Courthrope volunteered to go through the principal rooms alone. In about ten minutes' time he returned, not having seen any thing of the fugitives, except a letter lying on the library-table, in the Baronet's frank, the ink of which was scarcely dry. It proved only, however, a blank envelope. We determined together to commence a strict search over the whole Hall. Every room, however, we explored in vain, and began to despair of success. The back drawing-room we examined again, hoping to find some note or letter that might give us a clue to the Baronet's retreat. It commanded a fine view of the grounds; and after standing for some moments at the window, narrowly scrutinizing every shrub or tree that we could fancy Sir Henry lurking either in, or near, we turned together in council once more. Where could he be? Had he really left the place? We cast our eyes on the mantel-piece and table, on which were scattered various papers, notes, cards, &c. and one or two volumes, with the Baronet's manuscript notes in the margin—and sighed. This, Mr. Courthrope informed us, was Sir Henry's favourite room, because of the prospect it commanded. We could, however, see nothing to cast a ray of information upon the subject of our enquiries. We determined, then, to commence a rigorous search of the outer premises, but were delayed for a time by the violence of the storm. The afternoon had been very gloomy, and at length the rain came down in torrents. The thunder rattled directly overhead, in fearful proximity, followed in a second or two by lightning of terrible vividness. Peal upon peal, flash after flash, amid the continued hissing of the hail and heavy rain, followed one another with scarce a minute's intermission. Nothing attracted the eye without, but the drenched gloomy grounds, and the angry lightning-laden sky; a prospect this, which, coupled with thoughts of the melancholy errand on which we were engaged, completely depressed our spirits; at least I can answer for my own.

"Gloomy enough work this, both within and without!" exclaimed Dr. Y——, "If Sir Henry is travelling, he will be cooled a little, I imagine."

"What can he have done with Lady Anne? I tremble for her safety!" exclaimed Mr. Courthrope.

"Oh, you may depend she's safely stowed somewhere or other! These madmen are crafty beyond" —said Dr. Y——, when the doors of an old fashioned oaken cabinet, which we had examined, but imagined locked, were suddenly thrown wide open, and forth stepped the Baronet, in travelling costume, with a composed haughty air.

"Gentlemen," said he, calmly, "are your aware of the consequences of what you are doing? Do you know that I am Sir Henry Harleigh, and that this happens to be my house? By what warrant, at whose command do you thus presume to intrude upon my privacy?"

He paused, his hand continuing extended towards us with a commanding air. His posture would have charmed a painter. The suddenness of his appearance completely astounded Mr. Courthrope and myself, but not so Dr. Y——, the experienced Dr. Y——! who, with a confident bow and smile, stepped forward to meet Sir Henry almost at the moment of his extraordinary entree, just as if he had been awaiting it. Never in my life, did I witness such a specimen of consummate self-possession.

"Sir Henry, you have relieved us," said Dr. Y——, with animation, "from infinite embarrassments; we have been searching for you in every corner of the house!"

"You have been—searching—for me, Sir! Your name!" exclaimed the Baronet, with mingled hauteur and astonishment, stepping back a pace or two, and drawing himself up to his full height.

"Pray, Sir Henry, relieve us, by saying where her ladyship is to be found!" pursued the imperturbable Dr. Y. I could scarce tell why, but I felt that the Doctor had mastered the madman, as if by magic. The poor Baronet's unsteady eye wandered from Dr. Y. to me, and from me to Mr. Courthrope.

"Once more, sir, I beg the favour of your name?" he repeated, not however, with his former firmness.

"Dr. Y.," replied that gentleman, promptly, bowing low.

The Baronet started. "Dr. Y., of———?" he whispered, after a pause, in a low thrilling tone.

"Precisely—the same, at your service, Sir Henry," replied the Doctor again bowing. Sir Henry's features whitened sensibly. He turned aside, as if he could not bear to look upon Dr. Y., and sunk into a chair beside him, murmuring, "Then I am ruined!"

"Do not, Sir Henry, distress yourself!" said Dr. Y., mildly, approaching him; but he was motioned off with an air of disgust. Sir Henry's averted countenance was full of horror. We stood perfectly silent and motionless, in obedience to the hushing signals of Dr. Y.

"George," said Sir Henry, addressing Mr. Courthrope in a faltering tone, "You are not my enemy"—

"Dear, dear Henry!" exclaimed Mr. Courthrope, running towards him and grasping his hand, while the tears nearly overflowed.

"Go and bring Lady Anne hither!" said the Baronet, his face still averted, "you will find her in the summer-house, awaiting my return!"

Mr. Courthrope, after a confirmative nod from Dr. Y. and myself, hurried off on his errand, and in a few moments returned, accompanied, or rather preceded by Lady Anne, who, in a travelling-dress, flew up the grand staircase, burst open the doors, rushed into the room, almost shrieking. "Where—where is he?

Dear, dear Henry! my husband! What have they done to you? Whither are they going to take you? Oh, wretch!" she groaned, turning towards me her pale, beautiful countenance, full of desperation, "is all this your doing? Love! love!" addressing her husband, who never once moved from the posture in which he first placed himself in the chair, "I am your wife! your own Anne!" and she flung her arms round his neck, kissing him with frantic vehemence.

"I thought we should have a scene!" whispered Dr. Y. in my ear, "'twas very wrong in me to permit her coming! Pray be calm, my lady," said he, "do, for God's sake, for pity's sake, be calm," he continued, apparently unnoticed by Sir Henry, whose eyes were fixed on the floor, as if he were in profound meditation. "You will only aggravate his sufferings!"

"Oh yes, yes," she gasped, "I'll be calm! I am so! There! I am very calm now!" and she strained her grasp of Sir Henry with convulsive violence—he all the while passive in her arms as a statue! Dr. Y. looked embarrassed. "This will never do; we shall have Sir Henry becoming unmanageable," he whispered.

"Can I say a single word to your ladyship, alone?" he enquired, softly.

"No, No, No!" she replied, with mournful vehemence through her closed teeth, "you shall never part me from my husband! Shall they love! dearest?" and loosing her embrace for a moment, she looked him in the face with an expression of agonizing tenderness, and suddenly reclasped her arms around him with the energy of despair.

"Speak to her ladyship, calm her, you alone have the power," said Dr. Y., addressing Sir Henry, with the air of a man who expects to be—who knows that he will be obeyed. His voice seemed to recall the Baronet from a reverie, or rouse him from a state of stupor, and he tenderly folded his lady in his arms saying fondly, "Hush, hush, dearest, I will protect you."

"There! there! did you hear him? Were these the words of—of—a—madman? almost shrieked Lady Anne.

"Hush, Anne! my love! my dearest, sweet Anne! They say we must part!" exclaimed the wretched husband, in tones of thrilling pathos, wiping away the tears that showered from his poor wife's eyes,—"but, 'tis only for a while"———

"They never shall! they NEVER shall! I won't—I won't—won't," she sobbed hysterically. He folded her closer in his arms, and looking solemnly upwards, repeated the words, "Take—oh take her to your care!" He then burst into a loud laugh, relaxed his hold, and his wretched wife fell swooning into the arms of Mr. Courthrope, who instantly carried her from the room.

"Now, Sir Henry, not a moment is to be lost," said Dr. Y. "Our carriage is at the door, you must step into it, and accompany us to town. Her ladyship will follow soon after, in your carriage."

He rose and buttoned his surtout. "What," said he, eagerly, "has his Majesty really sent for me, and in a friendly spirit? But," addressing me with a mysterious air, "you've not betrayed me, have you?"

"Never—and never can I, dear Sir Henry," I replied, with energy.

"Then I at once attend you, Dr. Y. Royalty must not be trifled with. I suppose you have the sign-manual?" Dr. Y. nodded; and without a further enquiry after Lady Anne, Sir Henry accompanied us down stairs, took his hat and walking-stick from the hall stand, drew on his gloves, and followed by Dr. Y. stepped into the carriage, which set off at a rapid rate, and was soon out of sight. I hastened, with a heavy heart, to the chamber whither Lady Anne had been conducted. Why should I attempt to dilate upon the sufferings I there witnessed—to exhibit my wretched patient writhing on the rack of torture? Sweet suffering lady! Your sorrows are recorded above! Fain would I draw a curtain between your intense agonies, and the cold scrutiny of the unsympathising world!

From Lady Anne's maid I gathered a dreadful corroboration of the intelligence I had obtained in the morning. True I found it to be, that every domestic, except herself and the cook, had been dismissed by the despotic Baronet; the former retaining her place solely through the peremptoriness of his lady; the latter from necessity. Why did not the disbanded servants spread the alarm?—was explained by the consummate cunning with which Sir Henry, to the last, concealed his more violent extravagances, and the address with which he fixed upon Lady Anne the imputation of insanity, alleging frequently, as the cause of dismissing his servants, his anxiety to prevent their witnessing the humiliation of his Lady. More effectually to secure himself impunity, he had supplied them liberally with money, and sent them into Wales! On one occasion he had detected Sims—the maid—in the act of running from the Hall, with the determination at all hazards, of disclosing the fearful thraldom in which they were kept by the madman; but he seemed apprised of her movements—she fancied, even her intentions—as if by magic, met her at the Hall gates, and threatened to shoot her, unless she instantly returned, and on her knees took an oath of secrecy for the future. He would not allow a stranger, or visitor of any description under any pretence, to enter the precincts of the Hall, or any member of his family, except as above mentioned, or to quit them. He had prayer three times a day and walked in procession every day at noon round the house, himself, his lady, her maid and the cook; with many other freaks of a similar nature. He got up at night, and paraded with fire-arms about his grounds! I understood that these palpable evidences of insanity had made their appearance only a few days before the one on which I had been summoned. Sir Henry, I found, had always been looked upon as an eccentric man; and he had tact enough to procure his unfortunate Lady the sympathy of his household, on the score of imbecility. After giving the maid such general directions as suggested themselves, to procure an immediate supply of attendants, and to have the neighbouring apothecary called in on the slightest emergency, and enjoining her to devote herself entirely to her unhappy lady, I returned to her chamber. The slight noise I made in opening and shutting the door startled her ladyship from a brief doze into which she had fallen a few minutes before I quitted her bedside. She continued in a state of lamentable exhaustion; and finding the soothing draught I had ordered for her was beginning to exhibit its drowsy agency, I resigned my patient into the hands of the apothecary whom I had sent for, and hastened up to town, by one of the London coaches which happened to overtake me.

Late in the evening Mr. Courthrope called at my house and informed me that they had a dreadful journey up to town. For the first mile or two the Baronet he said, appeared absorbed in thought. He soon however, began to grow restless, then violent, and ultimately unmanageable. He broke one of the carriage windows to atoms, and almost strangled one of the keepers, whom it was found necessary to summon to their assistance by suddenly thrusting his hand into his neckerchief. He insisted on the horses' heads being turned towards the Hall; and finding they paid no attention to his wishes, began to utter the most lamentable cries, which attracted many persons to the carriage. On reaching Somerfield House, the private establishment of Dr. Y., whither it was thought advisable in the first instance, to convey the Baronet, till other arrangements could be made, he became suddenly quiet. He trembled violently, his face became pale as ashes, and he offered no opposition to his being led at once from the carriage into the house. He imagined it was the Tower. He sate in silent moodiness for a length of time, and then requested the attendance of a chaplain, and a solicitor. In a private interview with the former, he fell upon his knees, confessing that he had several times attempted the life of Lady Anne, though he declared with solemn asseverations that he was innocent of treason in any shape He owned, with a contrite air, that justice had at length overtaken him in his evil career. He imagined, it seemed, as far as they could gather from his exclamations, that he had that morning murdered his Lady! On Mr. Courthrope taking leave of him for the evening, he wrung his hands with the bitterness of a condemned criminal who is parting with his friends forever, and in smothered accents warned him to resist the indulgence of unbridled passions!

Well, a singular, a woful day's work had gone through; and I thanked God, that putting out of the question all other considerations, I had not suffered personal injury from the madman. How horrid was my suspense, at several periods of the day, lest he should suddenly produce fire arms, and destroy either himself or his persecutors! Alas, how soon might I expect the distressing secret to make its appearance in the daily newspapers, to become the subject of curiosity and heartless speculation! I resigned myself to rest that night, full of melancholy apprehensions for Lady Anne, as well as the Baronet; and my last fervent thoughts were of thankfulness to God for the preservation of my own reason hitherto, under all the troubles, anxieties and excitements I had passed through in my life!

I determined, on rising in the morning, to make such arrangements as would leave me at liberty to pay an early visit to Lady Anne; and was on the point of stepping into my chariot, to hurry through my morning round, when a carriage rolled rapidly to the door, and in a few seconds I observed her maid handing out Lady Anne Harleigh. Deeply veiled as she was, and muffled in an ample shawl, I saw at once the fearful traces of her yesterday's agony and exhaustion in her countenance and feeble tottering gait. She almost swooned with the effort of reaching the parlour. I soon learned her object in hurrying thus to town; it was to carry into effect an unalterable determination —poor lady!—to attend personally on Sir Henry, even in the character of his menial servant. It was perfectly useless for me to expostulate; she listened with impatience, and even replied with asperity.

"For mercy's sake, Doctor, why do you persist in talking thus? Do you wish to see me share the fate of my unhappy husband? You choke me; you suffocate me! I cannot breathe"—she gasped.

"Dearest Lady Anne!" said I, taking in mine her cold white hand, "try to overcome your feelings! My heart aches for you, indeed, but a solemn sense of duty forbids me to yield to you in this matter. You might gratify your excited feelings for the moment, by seeing Sir Henry—but I take God to witness the truth, with which I assure you that, in my belief, such a step would destroy the only hope left for his recovery. The constant presence of your ladyship would have the effect of inflaming still more his disordered, his excited feelings, till his malady would defy all control. and Heaven only knows what would be the consequences, as well to him as to yourself." I paused; she did not reply.

"I thank God, that he enables your ladyship to listen to reason in these trying circumstances. Rely upon it, Providence will strengthen you, and you will prove equal to this emergency!"

"Oh Doctor," she murmured, clasping her hands over her face, "you cannot sympathize with me; you cannot feel how wretched, how desolate I am! What will become of me? Whither shall I go to forget myself? Oh, my child, my child, she groaned, and fell back senseless. It was long before our attentions succeeded in restoring her to consciousness. What an object she lay in my wife's arms! Her beautiful features were cold and white as those of a marble bust; the dew of agony was on her brow; her hair was all dishevelled; and thus prostrate and heart broken, she looked like one on whom misfortune had dealt her heaviest blow! As soon as she was sufficiently recovered, she yielded to my wife's entreaties, and suffered herself to be conducted up to bed, and promised there to await my return, when I would bring her tidings of Sir Henry. In two or three hours' time, I was able to call at Somerfield House. I found from Dr. Y., who told me that such cases were always fluctuating, that Sir Henry's demeanour had undergone a sudden change. He had, from great violence and boisterousness, sunk into contemplative calmness and melancholy. On entering his chamber, where there was every comfort and elegance suited to his station, I found him seated at a desk writing. He received me courteously; and but for that strange wildness of the eye, of which no madman can divest himself, there was no appearance of the awful change which had came over him.

"You may retire, sir, for the present," said the Baronet to his keeper, who, looking significantly at me, bowed and withdrew.

"Well, Sir, Henry," said I, drawing my chair to the table at which he was sitting, "I hope your present residence is made as comfortable as circumstances"——

"I neither deserve nor desire any thing agreeable," he replied gloomily. "I know, I feel it all; I am conscious of my deep degradation; but of the particular offence for which I am arrested, I solemnly declare that I am innocent. However," he concluded abruptly, "I must not be diverted from what I am doing," and inclining politely towards me, he resumed his pen. I sat watching him in silence for some minutes. He seemed to be unconscious of my presence—completely absorbed with what he was doing. I was turning about in my mind how I could best introduce the topic I wished, when he suddenly asked me, without removing his eyes from the paper, how I had left Lady Anne.

"I am glad you ask after her, Sir Henry, for she is afraid you are offended with her."

"Not at all—not the least! It is surely I who am the offender," he replied, with a sigh.

"Indeed! her ladyship does not think so, however! She is in town; at my house: will you permit me to bring her here?"

"Why—why—do the regulations of this place admit of females coming?" he asked, with a puzzled air, proceeding to ask in a breath: "Has any thing further transpired?"

"Nothing," I replied, not knowing to what he alluded.

"Will she be calm?"

"Why otherwise, Sir Henry?"

"Or object to your being present all the while?"

"No; I am sure she will not."

"Mind, I cannot bear her to bring any bells with her!"

"Rely upon it, Sir Henry, you shall not be annoyed."

"Well—then I beg you will leave me for the present, that I may prepare for the interview. Had we not better engage a short-hand writer to attend? You know she might say something of moment."

"We will see that every thing is arranged. In two hours' time, Sir Henry, then, you will be prepared?"

He bowed, resumed his pen, and I withdrew. There seemed little to be apprehended from the interview, provided he retained his present humour, and Lady Anne could overcome her agitation, and control her feelings.

On returning home, I found her ladyship had risen, and was sitting with my wife in tears: but more composed than I had left her. I told her how calm and contented Sir Henry appeared, and the satisfaction with which he received the proposal of her visit: she clasped her hands together, and assured me, with a faint hysteric laugh, how very happy she was! Presently she began to convince me that I need be under no apprehension for her; and repeated her conviction that she should preserve a perfect composure in Sir Henry's presence, over and over again, with such increasing vehemence, as ended in a violent fit of hysterics. My heart heavily misgave me for the event of the interview: however there was nothing for it but to try the experiment.

About six o'clock, her ladyship, together with her sister, Lady Julia ——, who had been hastily summoned from the country, and Mr. Courthrope, drove with me to Somerfield House. They were all shewn into the drawing-room, where Dr. Y. and I left them, that we might prepare his patient for the visit. Dr. Y. saw no objection to the whole party being admitted: so, in a moment's time, we introduced the wretched couple to one another.

"Ah, Henry!" exclaimed Lady Anne, the moment she saw him, rushing into his arms, where she lay for a while silent and motionless. I suspected she had fainted.

"Julia, is that you? How are you?" enquired the Baronet, with an easy air, still holding his wife in his arms. She sobbed violently. "Hush, Anne, hush!" he whispered. "You must be calm; they allow no noise here, of anykind. They will order you to leave the room! Besides, you disturb me, so that I shall never be able to get through the interview!" All this was said with the coolest composure; as if he were quite unconscious of being the object of his wife's agonizing attentions. Her sobs, however, became louder and louder. "Silence, Anne!" said the Baronet, sternly; "this is foolish!" Her arms instantly fell from around him, for she had swooned—and I bore her from the room—begging the others to continue till my return. I soon restored my suffering patient by a potent draught of sal volatile, and enabled her once more to return to her husband's presence. We were all seated, but conversation languished.

"It is now my bitter duty," said the Baronet, with a serious air, breaking the oppressive silence, "to explain the whole mystery. Have you firmness, Anne, to bear it?" She nodded. "And in the presence of so many persons?" Again she nodded; to speak was impossible,

"Perhaps we had better leave?" said I.

"No, not one of you, unless you wish. The more witnesses of truth the better," replied the Baronet, proceeding with much solemnity of manner. "I am not, I never was, a dishonourable man; yet I fear it will be difficult to persuade you to believe me when you shall have heard all. The dreadful secret, however, must come out; I feel that my recent conduct requires explanation, that disguise is no longer practicable, or availing. The hand of God has brought me hither, and is heavy upon me—you see before you a wretch whom He has marked with a curse heavier than that of Cain!"

He paused for a moment, and turned over the leaves of his manuscript, as if preparing to read from. We all looked and listened with unfeigned astonishment. There was something about his manner that positively made me begin to doubt the fact of his insanity; and I was almost prepared to hear him acknowledge that for some mysterious purpose or other, he had but been feigning madness. Lady Anne, pale and motionless as a statue, sat near him, her eyes riveted upon him with a dreadful expression of blended fondness, agony, and apprehension.

"Behold, then, in me," continued Sir Henry, in a stern undertone, "an IMPOSTER. The world will soon ring with the story; friends will despise me; the House of Commons will repudiate me; relatives will disown me; my wife even," raising his eyes towards her, "will forsake me. I am no Baronet;" he paused; he was evidently striving to still strong emotions: I have no right either to the title, which I have disgraced, the fortune which I have wantonly squandered, or the hand I have dishonored." His lips, despite his efforts at compression, quivered, and his cheeks turned ashy pale. "But I take God to witness, that at the time of my marriage with this noble lady," pointing with a trembling hand to Lady Anne, "I knew not what I know now about this matter—that another was entitled to stand in my place, and enjoy the wealth and honours; what, does it not, then, confound you at all;" he enquired, finding that we neither looked nor uttered surprise at what he said. "Nothing like agitation at the confession? Is it, then, no news? Are you all prepared for it? Has then my privacy, my confidence, been violated? How is this, Lady Anne?" he pursued with increasing vehemence; "Tell me, Lady Anne, is it you who have done this?" The poor lady forced a faint smile into her palid features—a smile as of fond incredulity. "Ha! cockatrice! away" —— he shouted, springing from his chair, and pacing about the room in violent agitation. Lady Anne, with a faint shriek, was borne out of the room a second time insensible.

"Yes," continued the Baronet, in a high tone, regardless of the presence of his keeper, whom his violence hurried back into the room, "that false woman has betrayed me to disgrace and ruin! She has possessed herself of my fatal secret, and turned it to my destruction! But for her it might have slept hitherto! Ha! this is the secret that has so long lain rankling at my heart, blighting my reason, driving me to crime, making my continual companion, the Devil, the great fiend himself, and Hell all around me! Oh, I am choked! I am burnt up! I cannot bear it! What, Dr. Y., have you nothing to say to me, now you have secured me in your toils! Are you leagued with Lady Anne? Lady Anne!—Lady!—she will preserve her title, but it will be attached to the name of a villain! Ah! what will become of me! Speak, Doctor," addressing me, who had returned to whisper to Mr. Courthrope, "speak to me."

"While you are raving thus, it would be useless, Sir Henry ——."

"Sir Henry! do you then dare to mock me to my face?" He paused, stopped full before me, and seemed meditating to strike me. Dr. Y. came beside me, and the wretched madman instantly turned on his heel and walked to another part of the room. Again he commenced walking to and fro, his arms folded, and muttering, "The Commons, I suppose, will be impeaching me; ha! ha! ha! and thus ends Sir Henry Harleigh, Baronet, member for the county of ——! Ah, ha, ha! What will X., and Y., and Z.," naming well known individuals in the Lower House. "What will they say to this! What will my constituents say! They will give me a public dinner again! The pride of the county will be there to meet me!"

Mr. Courthrope caused Lady Anne and her sister, as soon as the former could be removed with safety, to be conveyed to his own residence, which they reached, happily, at the same time that Mrs. Courthrope, one of Lady Anne's intimate friends, returned from the country, to pay her suffering relative every attention that delicacy and affection could suggest. What now was the situation of this once happy, this once brilliant, this once envied couple! Sir Henry, in a mad-house; Lady Anne, heart-broken, and, like Rachel, "refusing to be comforted!" All splendor faded; the sweets of wealth, rank, refinement, loathed!—What a commentary on the language of the Royal Sufferer in Scripture; "And in my prosperity, I said, I shall never be moved. Lord, by thy favour thou hast made my mountain to stand strong; thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled."

The ravings of Sir Henry, on the occasion last mentioned, of course passed away from my recollection, with many other of his insane extravagances, till they were suddenly revived by the following paragraph in a morning paper, which some days afterwards I read breathlessly and incredulously.

"We understand that the lamentable estrangement, both from reason and society, of a once popular and accomplished Baronet, is at length discovered to be connected with some extraordinary disclosures made to him some time ago concerning the tenure by which he at present enjoys all his large estates, and the title, as it is contended, wrongfully. The new claimant, who, it is said, had not been long in this country, and is in comparatively humble circumstances, has intrusted the prosecution of his rights to an eminent solicitor, who, it is whispered, has at length shaped his client's case in a form fit for the investigation of a court of law; and a very formidable case, we hear, it is reported will be made out. If it should be successful, the present unfortunate possessor, in addition to being stripped of all he holds in the world, will have to account for several hundred thousand pounds. The extensive and distinguished connexions of Sir ——, have, we understand, been thrown into the utmost consternation, and have secured, at an enormous expense, the highest legal assistance in the country."

Wonder, pity, alarm, perplexity, by turns assailed me, on reading this extraordinary announciation, which squared with every word uttered by the Baronet on the occasion I have alluded to, and which we considered the mere hallucination of a madman. Could then, this dreadful—this mysterious paragraph—have any foundation in fact? Was it this that had shaken, and finally overturned, Sir Henry's understanding? And did Lady Anne know it? Good God, what was to become of them? Would this forthwith become the topic of conversation and discussion, and my miserable patients be dragged from the sacred retreats of sorrow and suffering, to become the subjects of general enquiry and speculation? Alas, by how slight a tenure does man hold the highest advantages of life!

I had proposed calling at Mr. Courthrope's that day, to see Lady Anne. I should possibly have an opportunity, therefore, of ascertaining whether this newly-discovered calamity constituted an ingredient of that "perilous stuff" which weighed upon her heart.

What an alteration had a fortnight worked on Lady Anne! In her bed-chamber, where I entered, were her sister, Lady Julia, Mrs. Courthrope, and her maid; the latter of whom was propping up her mistress, in bed, with pillows. How wan was her once lovely face,—how wasted her figure! There was a tearless agony in her eye, a sorrowful resignation in her countenance, that spoke feelingly the > 'Cruel grief that hack'd away her heart

> Unseen, unknown of others!'

"And what intelligence do you bring from Somerfield, to day, Doctor?" she whispered, after replying to my enquiries about her health.

"I have not seen him to-day, but I hear that he continues calm. His bodily health is unexceptionable."

"Is that a favourable sign?" she enquired faintly, shaking her head, as though she knew to the contrary.

"It may be, and it may not, according to circumstances. But how is your ladyship to-day?"

"Oh, so much better! I really feel getting quite strong—don't you think so, Julia?" said the feeble sufferer. Lady Julia sighed in silence.

"I shall be able to get about in a few days," continued Lady Anne, "and then—dont be so angry, Julia! —once at Somerfield—I—I know I shall revive again! I know I shall die if you do not give me my way. Do, dear Doctor," her snowy attenuated fingers gently seized and compressed my hand, "do persuade them to be reasonable! You can't think how they torment me about it! They don't know what my feelings are," —she could utter no more. I endeavored to pacify her with a general promise, that if she would keep herself from fretting for a fortnight, and was then sufficiently recovered, I would endeavor to bring about what she wished.

"Poor Sir Henry," said I, after a pause, addressing Lady Julia, "takes strange notions into his head.,"

"Indeed he does!" she replied, what new delusion has made its appearance?"

"Oh nothing new; he adheres to the belief that he is not the true Baronet; that he has no title to the fortune he holds!" No one made any reply; and I felt chagrined and embarrassed on account of having alluded to it. I mentioned another subject, but all in vain.

"Doctor, you must know it to be true, that there is another who claims our fortune!" whispered Lady Anne, a few minutes afterwards. I endeavored to smile it off.

"Yes smile, Doctor; but my poor husband found it no smiling." She sobbed hysterically. "And what if it is true," she continued, "that we are beggars—that my child—oh!—I could bear it all, if my poor Henry" —her lips continued moving, without uttering any sound; and it was plain she had fainted. I bitterly regretted mentioning the subject; but we had frequently talked about other cretchets of Sir Henry's, by his lady's bed-side, without calling forth any particular emotion on her part. No allusion of any kind had been since made to the topics about which Sir Henry raved on the last occasion by any member of the family; and I thought it would prove either that Lady Anne was in happy ignorance of the circumstances, or that they proved a chief source of her wasting misery. The latter, alas! proved the case! She lay for some minutes rather like a delicate waxen figure before us, than actual flesh and blood. Never did I see any one fade so rapidly; but what anguish had been hers for a long period! And this poor wasted sufferer was relying upon being the nurse of her husband in a fornight's time! Oh! cruel delusion! I left her, apprehensive that when matters assumed a more favorable aspect, a fortnight would see her more than half-way towards the grave.

"Doctor," whispered Lady Julia to me, as I descended the stairs, "have you seen that frightful paragraph in this day's newspaper?"

"I have, my lady—and"—

"So has my poor sister!" interrupted her ladyship.—"We generally read the newspapers before they are shewn to her, as she insists on seeing them—but this morning it unfortunately happened that Sims took it up to her at once. Poor girl! she soon saw the fatal paragraph, and I thought she would have died."

"Indeed—indeed, my lady, I never can forgive myself," said I, wringing my hands.

"Nay, Doctor, you are wrong. I am glad that you have broken the ice; she must be talked to on the subject, but we dared not begin."

"Pray, how long has her ladyship known of it?"

"I believe about six months after Sir Henry became alarmed about it; for, at first, he disbelieved it, and paid no attention to it whatever. He was never aware, however, that she knew the secret source of his anxiety and illness; and as she saw him so bent on concealing it from her, she thought it more prudent to acquiesce. Fancy, Doctor, what my poor sister must have suffered! She is the noblest creature in the world, and could have borne that which has almost killed her husband, and quite destroyed his reason. People have noticed often his strange manner; and circulated a hundred stories to the discredit of both, which Anne has endured without a murmur, often when her heart was near breaking! Alas! I am afraid she will sink at last!"—She hurried from me, overcome by her emotions, and I drove off, not much less oppressed myself.

During the next few weeks, I visited, almost daily, both Sir Henry and Lady Anne. It was a dreadful period for the former, whose malady broke out into the most violent paroxysms, rendering necessary restraints of a very severe character. Who could have believed that he was looking on the once gay, handsome, accomplished, gifted Baronet, in the howling maniac, whom I once or twice shuddered to see chained to a staple in the wall, or fastened down on an iron-fixed chair, his head close shaven, his eyes bloodshot and staring, his mouth distorted, uttering the most tremendous imprecations! I cannot describe the emotions that agitated me as I passed from this frightful figure, to the bedside of the peaceful, declining sufferer, his wife, buoying her up from time to time with accounts of his improvement! How I trembled as I told the falsehood!

Sir Henry's bodily health continued to improve; his flesh remained firm; the wilder paroxysms ceased, and soon assumed a mitigated form. In his eye was the expression of settled insanity! I confess I began to think, with the experienced Dr. Y. that there was little reasonable hope of recovery. His case assumed a different aspect almost daily. He wandered on from delusion to delusion, each absurder than the other, and more tenaciously retained. On one occasion, after great boisterousness, he became suddenly calm, called for twenty quires of foolscap, and commenced writing from morning to night, without intermission, except for his meals. This, however, remained with him for nearly three weeks; and the result proved to be a speech for the House of Commons, vindicating his alledged ill-treatment of Lady Anne, and his claims to his title and estates! It must have taken nearly a fortnight to deliver! He insisted on his keeper, a very easy tempered phlegmatic fellow, hearing him read the whole; good occupation for a week—when the Baronet tired in the middle of his task. He always paused on my entrance; and when I once requested him to proceed in my presence, he declined, with a great air of offended dignity; I several times introduced the name of Lady Anny, curious to see its effect upon him; he heard it with indifference, once observing, "that he had formed a plan about her which would not a little astonish certain persons." I represented her feebleness—her emaciation. He said coldly, that he was sorry for it, but she brought it upon herself, quoting the words, "Thus even-handed justice," &c. He adopted a mode of dress, that was remarkably ridiculous, and often provoked me to laughter, in spite of myself—a suit of tightly-fitting jacket and pantaloons, made of green baize, with silk stockings and pumps.—His figure was very elegant and well-proportioned, but in this costume, and with his hair cut close upon his head, looked most painfully absurd. This was Sir Henry Harleigh, Baronet, M. P. for the county of ———, husband of the beautiful Lady Anne ———, master of most accomplishments, and owner of a splendid fortune! Thus habited, I have surprised him, mounted on a table in the corner of his room, haranguing his quiet keeper, with all the vehemence of parliamentary oratory; and on my entrance, he would sneak down with the silliest air of schoolboy shame! He became very tractable, took his meals regularly, and walked about in a secluded part of the grounds, without being mischievous, or attempting to escape. And who shall say that he was not happy? Barring a degradation, of which only others were sensible, what had he to trouble him? Where, in this respect, lay the difference between Sir Henry, wandering from delusion to delusion, revelling in variety, and the poet, who always lives in a world of dreams and fancies all his own.

And Lady Anne—the beautiful—the once lively Lady Anne—was drooping daily! Alas, in what a situation were husband and wife! I could not help likening them to a noble tree, wreathed with the graceful, affectionate ivy, and blasted by lightning—rending the one asunder, and withering the other. For so in truth it seemed. Lady Anne was evidently sinking under her sorrows. All the attentions of an idolizing family, backed by the fond sympathies of "troops of friends"—even the consolations of religion—seemed alike unavailing!

The reader has not yet, however, been put into distinct possession of the cause of all this devastation.

It seems that shortly after his marriage, his solicitor suddenly travelled to the Continent, to communicate the startling—but in the Baronet's estimation ridiculous—intelligence, that a stranger was laying claim to all he held in the world, of title and fortune. The lawyer at length returned to England, overpersuaded by the Baronet, to treat the matter with contemptuous indifference; and nothing further was in fact heard for some months, till, after Sir Henry's return, he received one evening, at his club, (a circumstance which I have before said, appeared to confirm certain suspicions then afloat) a long letter, purporting to come from the solicitor of the individual preferring the fearful claim alluded to. It stated the affair at some length and concluded by requesting certain information, which, said the writer, might possibly have the effect of convincing his client of his error, and conducing to the abandonment of his claim. The shocking letter at length roused the Baronet from his lethargy. Several portions of it tallied strangely with particular passages in the family history of Sir Henry, who instantly hurried with consternation to his solicitor, by whom his worst apprehensions were aggravated. Not that the lawyer considered his client's case desperate; but he at once prepared his agitated client for a long, harassing, and ruinous litigation, and exposure of the most public nature. It cannot be wondered at that a sense of his danger should prey upon his feelings, and give him that disturbed manner which occasioned the speculations, hints, and inuendoes, mentioned in an early part of this paper. He anxiously concealed from his lady the shocking jeopardy in which their all on earth was placed; and the constant effort and constraint—the withering anxiety—the long continued apprehensions of ruin—at length disordered, and finally overthrew his intellects. What was the precise nature of his adversary's pretensions, I am unable to state technically. I understand it consisted of an alledged earlier right under the entail. To support his claim, every quarter was ransacked for evidence by his zealous attorney, often in a manner highly indelicate and offensive. The upstart made his pretensions as public as possible; and a most imprudent overture made by Sir Henry's solicitor was unscrupulously—triumphantly—seized upon by his adversary, and through his means at length found its way into the newspapers. The additional vexation this occasioned Sir Henry may be readily imagined; for independently of his mortification at the circumstance, it was calculated most seriously to prejudice his interests; and when he kept ever before his agonized eyes the day of trial which was approaching, and the horrible catastrophe, he sunk under the mighty oppression. Lady Anne had, despite her husband's attempts at secrecy, for some time entertained faint suspicions of the truth; but as he obstinately, and at length sternly interdicted any enquiry on her part, and kept every document under lock and key, he contrived to keep her comparatively in the dark. He frequently, however, talked in his sleep, and often did she lie awake listening to his mysterious expressions with sickening agitation. The illness of Sir Henry and his lady, together with its occasion were now become generally known; and the cruel paragraph in the morning paper above copied, was only the precursor of many similar ones, which at length went to the extent of hinting, generally, the nature of the new claimant's pretensions, with the grounds of Sir Henry's resistance.

Recollecting the event of Lady Anne's last interview with Sir Henry, the reader may imagine the vexation and alarm with which, at the time she imagined I had fixed, I heard her insist upon the performance of my promise. Backed by the entreaties of her relatives, and my conviction of the danger that might attend such a step, I positively refused. It was in vain that she implored, frequently in an agony of tears, occasionally almost frantic at our opposition—we were inexorable. During a month's interval, very greatly to my surprise and satisfaction, her health sensibly improved. We had contrived to some extent to occupy her attention with agreeable pursuits, and had from time to time soothed her with good accounts of Sir Henry. Her little son too—a charming creature—was perpetually with her; and his prattle served to amuse her through many a long hour. She was at length able to leave her bed, and spend several hours down stairs; and under such circumstances, she renewed her importunities with better success. I promised to see Sir Henry, and engaged to allow her an interview, if it could be brought about safely. In order to ascertain the point, I called one day upon the Baronet, who still continued at Somerfield House, though several of his relatives had expressed a wish that he should be removed to private quarters. This, however, I opposed, jointly with Dr. Y——, till the Baronet exhibited symptoms of permanent tranquility. I found no alteration in the mode of his apparel. If his ridiculous appearance shocked me, what must be its effect on his unhappy lady? He wore—as he did every day—his tight-fitting green baize, [what first put it into his head I am at a loss to imagine,] and happened to be in excellent humour; for he had just before beaten a crazy gentleman in the establishment at chess. He was walking to and fro, rubbing his hands, detailing his triumph to his keeper with great glee, and received me with infinite cordiality.

"What should you say to seeing company, Sir Henry?—Will you receive a visiter if I bring one?"

"Oh, yes—happy to see them—that is any day but to-morrow—any day but to-morrow," he replied briskly; "for to-morrow I shall be particularly engaged: the fact is, I am asked to dinner with the king, and am to play billiards with him."

"Ah! I congratulate you!—And, pray, does his majesty come to Somerfield, or do you go to Windsor?"

"Go to Windsor?—Lord bless you, his Majesty lives here—this is his palace; and I am one of his resident lords in waiting!—Were you not aware of that?"

"True—true; but at what hour do you wait on his majesty?"

"Three o'clock precisely—to the millionth part of a second."

"Hem!—Suppose, then, I take the opportunity of bringing my friend—who is very anxious to see you—at twelve o'clock?"

He paused, apparently considering. I was vexed that he made no enquiry as to the person I intended to introduce. I determined, however, that he should know.

"Well, Sir Henry, what say you—shall she come at twelve o'clock?"

"If she will go soon, I don't mind; but, you know, I must not be flurried, as I shall have so soon to attend the king. How can I play billiards, if my hand trembles?—Oh dear, it would never do—would it?"

"Certainly not, but what can there possibly be to flurry you in seeing Lady Anne?"

"Lady Anne!" he echoed with a sheepish air—"well you know, Lady Anne!—well—she can make allowances—eh?"

Aye indeed—poor madman—thought I, if such a spectacle as yourself does not paralize her—replying, "Oh, yes—all allowances, supposing any to be necessary, you may depend upon it. She's very considerate, and longs to see you."

"Well, I hope you'll be in the room? for, do you know, the thought of it almost makes me sick—don't I look pale?" he inquired of his keeper—"It is so long since I have seen her. Will she—I hope—what I mean, is—has she recovered from the wound?"

"Ha, long ago! She was more frightened than hurt at the accident."

"Accident! is that what it is called? All the better for me, you know," he replied, with a serious air, "However, I consent to see her at the hour you mention. Tell her to be calm, and not to try to frighten me, considering the king." With this he shook my hand, opened the door, and I took my leave. Dr. Y—— greatly doubted the prudence of the step we were about to take; but we were too far committed with her ladyship to recede. I grew alarmed, on returning home, with the apprehension of her mere presence—however calmly she might behave—stirring up slumbering associations in the mind of her husband, that might lead to very unpleasant results. However, there was nothing for it but to await the experiment, and hope for the best.

The following morning, I called on her ladyship about eleven o'clock, and found her dressed and waiting. Out-door costume seemed as if it did not become one so long an invalid. She looked flushed and feverish, but made great efforts to sustain the appearance of cheerfulness. She told me of her hearty breakfast—(a cup of tea and part of an egg!)—and spoke of her increasing strength. She could almost, she said, walk to Somerfield. Lady Julia trembled, Mrs. Courthrope was deadly pale, and I felt deeply apprehensive of the effect of the coming excitement upon such shattered nerves as those of Lady Anne.

Into the roomy carriage we stepped about half-past eleven. The day was bright and cold—the air, however, refreshing. As we approached Somerfield, it was evident that but for the incessant use of her vinaigrette, Lady Anne must have fainted. We were all silent enough by the time we reached the gates of Dr. Y——'s house. Lady Anne was assisted to alight and, leaning on my arm and that of her sister, walked up with tottering steps to the house, where Mrs. Y—— received her with all respectful attention. A glass of wine considerably reassured the fainting sufferer; and while she paused in the drawing-room to recover her breath, I stepped to the Baronet's apartment to prepare him for a suitable reception of his lady.—Dr. Y— informed me that sir Henry had been talking about it ever since. I found him pacing slowly about his chamber, dressed, alas, with additional absurdity, In vain, I found, had both Dr. Y—— and his keeper expostulated with him: they found that nothing else would keep him in humour. He wore over his usual green baize dress, a flaming scarlet sash, with a massive gold chain round his neck. An ebony walking stick was worn as a sword; and his cap, somewhat like that of a hussar, was surmounted with a peacock's feather, stripped, all but the eye at the top, and nearly three feet high. On this latter astounding appendage, I found, he particularly prided himself. I implored him to remove it, but he begged me, somewhat haughtily, to allow him to dress as he pleased. I protest I felt sick at the spectacle. What a frightful object to present to Lady Anne. However, we might prepare her to expect something outre in her husband's appearance. "Permit me to ask, Sir Henry," said I, resolved upon a last effort, "why you are in full dress?"

He looked astonished at the question. "I thought, Doctor, I told you of my engagement with his majesty."

"Oh, aye, true; but perhaps you will receive your lady uncovered," said I, pressing for a dispensation of the abominable head-dress.

"No sir," he replied, quietly but decisively, and I gave up the point. His keeper whispered to me at the door, that Sir Henry alledged as a reason for dressing himself as I have described, his having to attend the king immediately after the interview with his lady; so that he would have no time for dressing in the interval.

"Is the party ready?" enquired the Baronet, interrupting our momentary tete-a-tete. I hesitated; I was suddenly inclined, at all hazards, to put off the dreaded interview; but I dared not venture on such a step.

"Y—yes, Sir Henry, and waits your pleasure to throw herself into your arms."

"What! good God! throw herself into my arms! throw herself into my arms! was there ever any such a thing heard of!" exclaimed the Baronet, with a confounded air; "no, no! I can admit of no such familiarities! that is going rather too far under the circumstances—eh?" turning towards his keeper, whom he had thrust reluctantly into a costume something like that of an Austrian soldier. "What do you say?" The man bowed in acquiescence.

"And further, Doctor," continued the Baronet, pointing to his keeper, "this gentleman, my secretary, must be present all the while, to take notes of what passes."

"Undoubtedly," I replied, with an air of intense chagrin, inwardly cursing myself for permitting the useless and dangerous interview. I hastened back to the apartment in which I had left the ladies, and endeavoured to prepare Lady Anne, by describing, with a smile, her husband's dress. She strove to smile with me, and begged that she might be led into his presence at once. Leaning between Lady Julia and myself, she shortly tottered into the Baronet's room, having first, at my suggestion, drawn down her black veil over her pale face.

"Pen! pen! pen!" hastily whispered the Baronet to his keeper, as we opened the door—and the latter instantly took his seat at the table, before a desk, with pens and ink. The Barenet bowed courteously to us as we entered.

"Speak to him," I whispered, as I led in her ladyship. She endeavored to do so, but her tongue failed her. Her lips moved, and that was all. Lady Julia spoke for her sister, in tremulous accents. Lady Anne closed her eyes on seeing the fantastic dress of her husband, and shook like an aspen-leaf.

"Harry, dearest Harry," at length she murmured, stretching her trembling arms towards him, as if inviting him to approach her. Sir Henry, with a polite but distant air, took off his cap for a moment, and then carefully replaced it without making any reply.

"Shall we take seats, Sir Henry?" I enquired.

"Yes—she may be seated," he replied, with an authoritative air, folding his arms, and leaning against the corner of the window, eyeing his lady with curious attention.

"Are you come here of your free will?" said he, calmly.

"Yes, Henry, yes," she whispered.

"Put that down," said the Baronet; in an under tone, to his secretary.

"Are you recovered?"

"Quite, dearest!" replied his lady, faintly.

"Put that down," repeated the Baronet, quickly, looking at his "secretary" till he had written it. There was a pause. I sat beside Lady Anne, who trembled violently, and continued deadly pale.

"I am sure, Sir Henry," said I, "you are not displeased at her ladyship's coming to see you? If you are not, do come and tell her so, for she fears you are offended!" She grasped my fingers with convulsive efforts, without attempting to speak. Sir Henry, after an embarrassed pause, walked from where he had been standing, till he came directly before her, saying, in a low tone, looking earnestly into her countenance, "God be my witness, Anne, I bear you no malice; is it thus with you?" elevating his finger, and looking towards his keeper, intimating that he was to take down her reply—but none was made. He dropped slowly on one knee, drew the glove off his right hand, as if going to take hold of Lady Anne's, and tenderly said, "Anne, will you give me no reply?" There was no madness in either his tone or manner, and Lady Anne perceived the alteration.

"Harry! Harry! Dearest! my love!" she murmured, suddenly stretching towards him her hands, and fell into his arms, where she lay for a while motionless.

"Poor creature! How acute her feelings are!" exclaimed the Baronet, calmly. "You should strive to master them, Anne, as I do. I bear you no ill-will; I know you had provocation! How her little heart beats," he continued, musingly. "Why, she has fainted! How very childish of her to yield so!"

It was true; the unhappy lady had fainted, and lay unconsciously in her husband's arms. Her sister, weeping bitterly, rose to remove her; but the Baronet's countenance became suddenly clouded. He allowed us to assist his lady, by removing her bonnet, but continued to grasp her firmly by the wrists, staring into her face with an expression of mingled concern and wonder. His keeper's practised eye evidently saw the storm rising and came up to him.

"You had better let her ladyship be removed!" he whispered into his ear authoritatively, eyeing him fixedly, at the same time gently disengaging her arms from his grasp.

"Well, be it so; I am sorry for her; I've a strange recollection of her kindness; and is it come to this, poor Anne!" he exclaimed, tremulously, and walked to the further window, where he stood with his back towards us, evidently weeping. We removed Lady Anne immediately from the room; and it was so long before she recovered, that we doubted whether it would be safe to remove her home that day." "Well, as far as I am concerned," thought I, as I bent over her insensible form, "this is the last time I will be a party to the torture inflicted by such a scene as this, though in obedience to your own wishes!" As I was passing from the room in which she lay, I encountered Sir Henry, followed closely by his keeper.

"Whither now, Sir Henry," I enquired, with a sigh.

"Going to tell the king that I cannot dine with him to-day, as I had promised, for I am quite agitated, though I scarce know why. Who brought Lady Anne to me?" he whispered. I made him no reply. "I am glad I have met you, however; we'll take a turn in the grounds, for I have something of the highest consequence to tell you."

"Really you must excuse me, Sir Henry; I have"—

"Are you in earnest, Doctor? Do you know the consequences of refusing to attend to my wishes?"

"I suffered him to place my arm in his, and he led me down the steps into the garden. Round, and round, and round we walked at a rapid rate, his face turned towards me all the while with an expression of extensive anxiety, but not a syllable did he utter. Faster and faster we walked, till our pace became almost a run, and beginning to feel both fatigued and dizzy, I gently swayed him from the pathway towards the door-steps.

"Poor, poor Anne!" he exclaimed in a mournful tone, and starting from me abruptly, hurried to a sort of alcove close at hand, and sat down, covering his face with his handkerchief, his elbows resting upon his knees.

I watched him for a moment from behind the door, and saw that he was weeping, and that bitterly. Poor Sir Henry! Presently one of his brother captives approached him, running from another part of the grounds, in a merry mood, and slapping him instantly on the back, shouted, "I am Lord of the isles!"

"I can't play billiards with your Majesty to-day," replied Sir Henry, looking up, his eyes red and swollen with weeping.

"Embrace me, then!" said the lunatic; and they were forthwith locked in one another's arms. "You are in tears!" exclaimed the stranger, himself beginning suddenly to cry; but in a moment or two he started off, putting his hand to his mouth, and bellowing, "Yoicks, yoicks! Stole away!"

The Baronet relapsed into his former mood, and continued in a similar posture for several minutes, when he rose up, wiped away his tears, and commenced walking again round the green, his arms folded on his breast as before, and talking to himself with great vehemence. I could catch only a few words here and there, as he hurried past me. "It will never be believed! What could have been my inducement? When will it be tried? I saw all the while through his disguise! My secretary, if acquitted, released, discovery, ennobled," were fragments of his incoherencies. Alas! what an object he looked! I could not help thinking of the contrast he now afforded to the animated figure he had presented to the eye of the beholder from the gallery of the House of Commons, the busy eager throngs of the clubs, and as the man of fashion and literature!

"Hei mihi, qualis erat! quantum mutatus ab illo
Hectore, qui redit exuvias indutus Achillis,
Vel Danaum Phrygios jaculatus puppibus ignes!"

On regaining her room, I found Lady Anne had been relieved by a copious flood of tears. She continued weeping hysterically, and uttering wild incoherencies for some time, nor could the entreaties or commiserations of those around her, assuage her grief. When at length her paroxysm had abated, from exhaustion, she expressed a determination not to be removed from the house in which her unfortunate husband resided! It was in vain that we represented the peril with which such a resolution was attended, as well to herself as Sir Henry: she was deaf to our solicitations, regardless of our warnings. She requested Mrs. Y. to inform her whether their house was fully occupied; and on receiving a hesitating answer in the negative, at once engaged apartments occupying the whole of the next wing of the building, careless, she said, at what expense. The result was, that finding her inflexible on this point, the requisite arrangements were at once entered upon, and that very night she, with her sister and maid, slept under the same roof with her unconscious—her afflicted husband. Every measure was taken to secure her from danger, and keep her as much out of Sir Henry's way as possible.

Nearly a month passed away without her having been once in Sir Henry's company, or even seeing him, for more than a moment or two together; and, unlikely as it had seemed, her health and spirits appeared rather to improve than otherwise. At length, the Baronet, being taken in a happy mood, was informed that she had long been a resident in Somerfield House, at which he expressed no surprise, and consented to her being invited to take tea in his apartment. He was very shy and silent during the interview, and seemed under constraint till his guests had taken leave of him. Gradually, however, he grew reconciled to their visits, which he occasionally returned, always accompanied by his "secretary"; and took great pleasure in hearing the sisters play on the piano. He composed verses, which they pretended to set to music; he brought them flowers, and received various little presents in return. For hours together he would sit with them reading, and hearing read, novels and newspapers; and, in short, grew in a manner humanized again. He treated Lady Anne with great civility, but, towards her sister, Julia, he behaved as if he were courting her!—They soon prevailed upon him to discard the absurd peacock's feather he frequently wore, always on Sunday, accepting in its stead, a small drooping ostrich feather, which also, in its turn, he was by and by induced to lay aside altogether, as well as to assume more befitting clothing. They could not, however, dislodge from his crazed imagination the idea that he was confined in prison, awaiting his trial for the murder of his wife, and high treason!

He addressed her one morning, as Queen, receiving her with the most obsequious obeisances. He persisted in this hallucination with singular pertinacity. All poor Lady Anne's little familiarities and endearments were thenceforth at an end: for he seemed so abashed by her presence, that no efforts of condescension sufficed to reassure him, and she was compelled to support a demeanor consistent with the station which his crazed imagination assigned her. His great delight was to be sent on her royal errands about the house and grounds! He could hardly ever be prevailed upon to sit, at least at ease, in her presence; and was with great difficulty induced to eat at the same table. The agony I have seen in her eye on these occasions! Compelled to humour his delusions, she wore splendid dresses and jewels; and dismissed him on every occasion by coldly extending her hand, which he would kiss with an air of reverent loyalty! He believed himself to have been elevated to the rank of a general officer, and insisted on being provided with a military band, to play before his window every evening after dinner. He invited me, one day in the Queen's name, to dinner in his apartments, some time after this delusion had manifested itself. It was a soft September evening, and the country round about seemed every where bronzed with the touch of autumn. During dinner Sir Henry treated his lady with all the profound respect and ceremony due to royalty, and I, of course, was obliged to assume a similar deportment, while his lady was compelled to receive with condescending urbanity attentions, every one of which smote her heart as an additional evidence of the inveteracy of her husband's malady. I observed her narrowly. There was no tear in her eye—no flurry of manner—no sighing: her's was the deep silent anguish of a breaking heart!

How can I do justice to the virtues of this incomparable wife, or sufficiently extol her unwearying, her ennobling self-devotion to the welfare of her afflicted husband! Her only joy was to minister to his comfort, at whatever cost or feeling, or even health, at all hours, in all seasons; to bear with his infinite, incongruous whims, perversities, and provocation; to affect delight when he was delighted; to soothe and comfort him under all his imaginary grievances. Her whole thoughts, when absent from him, were absorbed in devising schemes for his amusement and occupation. She would listen to no entreaties for cessation from her anxious labours; no persuasions, no inducement, could withdraw her even for a moment from the dreary scene of her husband's humiliation and degradation. Hail, woman, exalted among thy sex! Eulogy would but tarnish and obscure the honour that is thy due!

All, however, was unavailing; the unhappy sufferer exhibited no symptoms of mental convalescence: on the other hand, his delusions became more numerous and obstinate than ever. He seemed to be totally unconscious of Lady Anne's being his wife; he treated her, and spoke of her, as an amiable companion, and even made her his confidant. Among other vagaries, he communicated to her a long story about his attachment to a girl he had seen about the premises, and earnestly asked her opinion in what way he could most successfully make her an offer!

Shortly after dinner was removed, we drew our chairs—Lady Anne in the centre, seated on a sort of throne, specially provided for her by the Baronet—a circle round the ample bow window that overlooked the most sequestered part of the grounds connected with the establishment, as well as a sweep of fine scenery in the distance. In a bower a little to our right, was placed Sir Henry's band, who were playing very effectively various pieces of brilliant military music. By my direction, privately given beforehand, they suddenly glided, from a bold march, into a concert of French horns. Oh, how exquisite was that soft melancholy wailing melody! The hour—the deepening gloom of evening—the circumstances—the persons—were all in mournful keeping with the music to which we were listening in subdued silence. Lady Anne's tears stole fast down her cheeks, while her eyes were fixed with sad earnestness upon her husband, who sat in a low chair, a little on her left hand, his chin resting on the palm of his hand, gazing with a melancholy air on the darkening scenery without. Occasionally I heard Lady Anne struggling to subdue a sob, but unsuccessfully. Another, and another, and another forced its way—and I trembled lest her excitement should assume a more violent form. I saw her, almost unconsciously, lay her hand upon that of the Baronet, and clasp it with convulsive energy. So she held it for some moments, when the madman slowly turned round, looking her full in the face; his countenance underwent a ghastly change, and fixing on her an eye of demoniac expression, he slowly rose in his seat, seeming to my disturbed fancy, an evil spirit called up by the witchery of music, and sprung out of the room. Lady Anne, with a faint groan, fell at full length upon the floor; her sister, shrieking wildly, strove to raise her in vain; I hurried after the madman, but finding his keeper was at his heels, returned. I never can forget that dreadful evening! Sir Henry rushed out of the house, sprung at one bound over a high fence, and sped across a field, amidst the almost impervious gloom of evening, with steps such as those of the monster of Frankenstein. His keeper, with all his efforts, could not gain upon him, and sometimes altogether lost sight of him. He followed him for nearly two miles, and at length found that he was overtaking the fugitive. When he had come up within a yard of him, the mad man turned round unexpectedly, struck his pursuer a blow that brought him to the ground, and immediately scrambled up into a great elm tree that stood near, from amidst whose dark foliage he was presently heard howling in a terrific manner; anon, there was a crashing sound amongst the branches, as of a heavy body falling through them, and Sir Henry lay stunned and bleeding upon the ground. Fortunately the prostrate keeper had called out loudly for assistance as he ran along; and his voice attracted one or two of the men whom I had despatched after him, and between the three, Sir Henry was brought home again to all appearance dead. An eminent surgeon in the neighbourhood was summoned in to his assistance, for I could not quit the chamber of Lady Anne—she was totally insensible, having fallen into a succession of swoons since the moment of Sir Henry's departure; Lady Julia was in an adjoining room, shrieking in violent hysterics; and, in short, it seemed not impossible that she might lose her reason, and Sir Henry and Lady Anne their lives. 'Tis a small matter to mention at such a crisis as this, but I recollect it forcibly arrested my attention at the time: the band of musicians, unaware of the catastrophe that had occurred, according to their orders, continued playing the music that had been attended with such disastrous consequences; and as Lady Anne's bed-chamber happened to be in that part of the building nearest to the spot where the band were stationed, we continued to hear the sad wailing of the bugles and horns without, till it occurred to Mrs. Y. to send and silence them.—This little incidental circumstance—the sudden mysterious seizure of Sir Henry—the shrieks of Lady Julia—the swoons of Lady Anne—all combined—completely bewildered me. It seemed to be a dream.

I cannot—I need not—dwell upon the immediate consequences of that sad night. Suffice it to say, Sir Henry was found to have received severe but not fatal injury, which, however, was skilfully and successfully treated; but he lay in a state of comparative stupor for near a week, at which period his mental malady resumed its wildest form, and rendered necessary the severest treatment. As for Lady Anne, her state became eminently alarming; and as soon as some of the more dangerous symptoms had subsided, we determined on removing her, at all hazards, from her present proximity to Sir Henry, to ——— Hall, trusting to the good effects of a total change of scene and of faces. She had not strength enough to oppose our measures, but suffered herself to be conducted from Somerfield without an effort at complaint. I trembled to see an occasional vacancy in the expression of her eye; was it impossible that her husband's malady might prove at length contagious? Many weeks passed over her, before Lady Anne exhibited the slightest signs of amendment. Her shocks had been too numerous and severe—her anxieties and agonies too long continued—to warrant reasonable hopes of her ultimate recovery. At length, however, the lapse of friendly time, potent in assuaging the sorrows of mankind, the incessant and most affectionate attentions of her numerous relatives, were rewarded by seeing an improvement, slight though it was. The presence of her little boy powerfully engaged her attention. She would have him lying beside her on the bed for hours together; she spoke little to him, sleeping or waking; but her eye was ever fixed upon his little features, and when she was asleep, her fingers would unconsciously wreathe themselves amongst his flaxen curls. About Sir Henry she made little or no enquiry; and when she did, we, of course, put the best face possible upon matters. Her frequent efforts to see and converse with him, had proved woefully and uniformly unsuccessful; and she seemed henceforth to give up the idea of all interference, with despair.

But the original, the direful occasion of all this domestic calamity, must not be overlooked. The contest respecting the title and estates of Sir Henry went on as rapidly as the nature of the case would permit. The new claimant was, as I think I hinted before, a man of low station; he had been, I believe, a sort of slave-driver, or factotum, on a planter's estate in one of the West India Islands: and it was whispered that a rich Jew had been persuaded into such confidence in the man's prospects, as to advance him, from time to time, on his personal security, the large supplies necessary to prosecute his claims with effect.

There were many matters of most essential consequence that no one could throw light upon but the unfortunate Baronet himself; and his solicitor had consequently, in the hope of Sir Henry's recovery, succeeded in interposing innumerable obstacles, with the hope, as well of wearing out his opponents, as affording every chance for the restoration of his client's sanity. It was, I found, generally understood in the family, that the solicitor's expectations of success in the lawsuit were far from sanguine: not that he believed the new claimant to be the bona fide heir to the title, but he was in the hands of those who would ransack the world for evidence—and, when it was wanting, make it. Every imaginable source of delay however—salvation to the one party, destruction to the other—was at length closed up; all preliminaries were arranged; the case was completed on both sides, and set down for hearing. Considerable expectation was excited in the public mind; occasional paragraphs hinted the probability of such and such disclosures; and it was even rumored that considerable bets were depending upon the issue!

I was in the habit of visiting Sir Henry once or twice a week. He became again calm as before the occasion of his last dreadful out-break; and his bodily health was complete. New delusions took possession of him. He was at one time composing a history of the whole world; at another, writing a memoir of every member that had ever sat in the House of Commons, together with several other magnificent undertakings. All, however, at length gave way to 'The Pedigree, a Tale of Real Life,' which consisted of a rambling, exaggerated account of his own lawsuit.—It was occasioned by his happening, unfortunately, to cast eye upon the following little paragraph in his newspaper, which chanced to have been overlooked by the person who was engaged for no other purpose than to read over the paper beforehand, and prevent any such allusions from meeting the eye of the sufferer.

'Sir Henry Harleigh, Bart. This unfortunate gentleman continues still greatly indisposed. We understand that little hope is entertained of his ultimate recovery. The result, therefore, of the approaching trial of 'Doe on the demise of Harleigh, v. Higgs' will signify but little to the person principally interested.'

From the moment of his reading these lines, he fell into a state of profound melancholy—which was however, somewhat relieved by the task with which he had occupied himself, of recording his own misfortunes. He had resumed his former dress of green baize, as well as the intolerable peacock's feather. What could have conferred such a permanency upon, or suggested this preposterous penchant, I know not—except the interest he had formerly taken in a corps of riflemen, who were stationed near a house he had occupied in the country. He continued quiet and inoffensive.—His keeper's office was little else than a sinecure—till Sir Henry suddenly set him about making two copies of every page he himself composed!

I remember calling upon him one morning about this time, and finding him pacing about his chamber in a very melancholy mood. He welcomed me with more than his usual cordiality; and dismissing his attendant, said "Doctor, did you ever hear me speak in Parliament?" I told him I had not.

"Then you shall hear me now; and tell me candidly what sort of an advocate you think I should have made—for I have serious thoughts of turning my attention to the bar. I'll suppose myself addressing the jury on my own case—and you must represent the jury. Now!"—

He drew a chair and table towards a corner of the room,—mounted on it, having thrown a cloak over his shoulders, and commenced. Shall I be believed, when I declare that—as far as my judgment goes—I listened on that occasion, for nearly an hour, to an orator? He spoke, of course, in the third person; and stated in a simple and most feeling manner, his birth, education, fortune, family, marriage—his Parliamentary career—in short, his happiness, prosperity and pride. Then he represented the contemptuous indifference with which he treated the first communications about the attack meditated upon his title and property, as well as the consternation with which he subsequently discovered the formidable character of the claim set up against him. He begged me—the jury—to put myself in his place; to fancy his feelings; and proceeded to draw a masterly sketch of the facts of the case. He drew a lively picture of the secret misery he had endured—his agony lest his wife should hear of the disastrous intelligence—his sleepless nights and harrassing days—the horrid apprehensions of his adversary's triumph—the prospect of his own degradation—his wife—his child's beggary—till I protest he brought tears into my eyes. But, alas! at this point of his history, he mentioned his discovery of the mode of turning tallow into wax—and dashed off into an extravagant enumeration of the advantages of the speculation! There, before me, stood confessed—the madman—violent and frantic in his gestures, haranguing me, in my own person, on the prodigious wealth that would reward the projector; and had I not risen to go, he would probably have continued in the same strain for the remainder of the day! I had purposed calling that evening on Lady Anne, but I gave up the idea. The image of her insane husband would be too fresh in my mind. I felt I could not bear to see her, and think of him. What a lot was mine—thus alternating visits between the diseased in mind, and the diseased in body—and that between husband and wife—over whom was besides impending the chance, if not probability of total ruin! Oh, Providence—mysterious and awful in thy dispensations among the children of men!—who shall enquire into thy purposes, who question their wisdom or beneficence!

Alike in what it gives, and what denies!"

My heart misgives me, however, that the reader will complain of being detained so long amongst these scenes of monotonous misery—I would I had those of a different character to present to him! Let me therefore draw my long narrative to a close by transcribing a few extracts from the later entries in my journal.

Saturday, Nov. 5, 18—. This was the day appointed for the trial of the important cause which was to decide the proprietorship of the title and possessions of Sir Henry Harleigh. Much interest was excited, and the court crowded at an early hour. Six of the most distinguished counsel at the bar had taken their seats, each with his ponderous load of papers before him, in the interest of Sir Henry, and three in that of his opponent. A special jury was sworn; the Judge took his seat; the cause was called on; the witnesses were summoned. The plaintiff's junior counsel rose to open the pleadings: after having paused for some time for the arrival of this client's attorney, who, while he was speaking, at length made his appearance, excessively pale and agitated. The plaintiff had been found dead in his bed that morning, having been carried thither in a state of brutal intoxication, the preceeding night, from a tavern dinner with his attorney and witnesses. He died single, and there of course was an end of the whole matter that had been attended with such direful consequences to Sir Henry and his lady. But of what avail is the now established security of his title, rank and fortune to their unhappy owner? an outcast from society, from home, from family, from the wife of his bosom; even from himself! What signified the splendid intelligence to Lady Anne, perishing under the pressure of her misfortunes? Would it not a thousandfold aggravate the agonies she was enduring? It has been thought proper to entrust to me the difficult task of communicating the news to both parties, if I think it advisable that it should be done at all. What am I to do? What may be the consequence of the secret's slipping out suddenly from any of those around Lady Anne? About the Baronet I had little apprehension; I felt satisfied that he could not comprehend it; that whether he had lost or won the suit was a matter of equal moment to him!

As I had a patient to visit this morning, whose residence was near Somerfield, I determined to take that opportunity of trying the effect of the intelligence on

Sir Henry. It was about two o'clock when I called, and I found him sitting by the fire, reading one of Shakspeare's plays. I gradually led his thoughts into a suitable train, and then told him, briefly, and pointedly, and accurately, his own history; up to the latest incident of all; but as of a third person, and that a nobleman. He listened to the whole with profound interest.

"God bless me!" he exclaimed, with a thoughtful air, as I concluded; "I surely must have either heard or read this story before! You don't mean to say it is a fact! That it has happened lately?"

"Indeed I do, Sir Henry," I replied, looking at him earnestly.

"And are the parties living! Lord and Lady ——?"

"Both of them; at this moment; and not ten miles from where we are now sitting!"

"Indeed!" he replied, musingly; "that's unfortunate!"

"Unfortunate, Sir Henry!" I echoed with astonishment.

"Very; for my purpose. What do you suppose I have been thinking of all this while?" he replied, with a smile. "What a subject it would be for a tragedy! But, of course, since the parties are living, it would never do! Still I cannot help thinking that something might be made of it! One might disguise, and alter the facts."

"It is a tragedy of very real life!" I exclaimed, with a deep sigh.

"Indeed it is!" he replied, echoing my sigh; "it shows that fact often transcends all fiction; does it not? Now, if this had been the plot of a tale, or novel, people would have said; "how improbable! how unnatural!"

"Aye, indeed they would, Sir Henry," said I, unable to keep the tears from my eyes.

"'Tis affecting," he replied, his eyes glistening with emotion, adding, after a moment's pause, in a somewhat tremulous tone—"Now, which of the two do you most pity, Doctor—Lord —— or Lady ——?"

"Both. I scarce know which most."

"How did they bear the news, by the way, do you know?" he enquired, with sudden interest.

"I believe Lady Mary — - is in too dangerous circumstances to be told of it. They say she is dying!"

"Poor creature! What a melancholy fate! And she is young and beautiful, you say?"

"She is young, but not now beautiful, Sir Henry!"

"I wish it had not been all real!" he replied, looking thoughtfully at the fire. "What would Shakspeare have made of it! It would have been a treasure to the writer of King Lear? And how, pray, did Lord —— receive the intelligence. 'Stop,' said he suddenly, 'stop—How can one imagine Shakspeare to have drawn the scene? How would he have made Lord —— behave? Let me see—an ordinary writer could make the madman roar, and stamp, and rave—and perhaps be at length sobered with the news—would not he?"

"Very probably, Sir Henry, I replied faintly."

"Ah, very different, I imagine, would be the delineation of that master painter! Possibly he would make the poor madman listen to it all, as to a tale of another person? He would represent him as charmed with the truth and nature of the invention—poor, poor fellow!—commiserating himself in another! How profound the delusion! How consumately true to nature! How simple, but how wonderfully fine, would be the scene under SHAKSPEARE'S pencil!" continued Sir Henry, with a sigh, folding his arms on his breast, leaning back in his chair, and looking thoughtfully into the fire.

"Why, you are equal to Shakspeare yourself, then my dear Sir Henry."

"What!—what do you mean?" said he starting and turning suddenly towards me with some excitement, rather pleasurable, however, than otherwise—"Have I, then" ——

"You have described it EXACTLY as it happened!"

"No! Do you really say so? How do you know it, my dear Doctor?" said he, scarce able to sit in his chair, his countenance brightening with delight.

"Because I was present, Sir Henry; I communicated the intelligence," I replied, while every thing in the room seemed swimming round me.

"Good God, Doctor! Are you really in earnest?"

"As I live and breath in the sight of God, Sir Henry," I replied, as solemnly as my thick, hurried voice would let me, fixing my eye keenly upon his. He gave a horrible start and remained staring at me with an expression I cannot describe.

"Why—did you see that flash of lightning, Dr.?" he presently stammered, shaking from head to foot.

"Lightning, Sir Henry! Lightning!" I faltered on the verge of shouting for his keeper.

'Oh—pho!' he exclaimed, with a long gasp, 'I—I beg your pardon! How nervous you have made me! Ha, ha, ha! attempting a laugh, that mocked him with its faintness: 'but really you do tell me such horrid tales, and look so dreadfully expressive while you are telling them—that—that—upon my soul—I cannot bear it! Pho! how hot the room is! Let us throw open the window and let in fresh air! He rose, and I with him. Thank God, he could not succeed, and I began to breathe freely again. He walked about, fanning himself with his pocket handkerchief. He attempted to smile at me, but it was in vain; he became paler and paler, his limbs seemed to stagger under him, and I had scarce time to drop him into a chair, before he fainted. I summoned his keeper to my assistance, and with the ordinary means, we soon restored Sir Henry to his consciousness.

'Ah! is that you?' he exclaimed, faintly smiling, as his eye fell upon the keeper. '1 thought we had parted long ago! Why, where have you, or rather where have I been?'

At length, with the aid of a little wine and water, he recovered his self-possession.

'Heigh-ho! I shall be fit for nothing all the day, I am afraid! So I shall go and play at chess with the king. Is his majesty at liberty?'

My soul sunk within me; and seeing he was uneasy at my stay, I took my leave; but it was several hours before I quite recovered from the effects of perhaps the most agitating scene I ever encountered. I found it impossible to pay my promised visit to Lady Anne that evening. One such interview as the above is enough, not for a day, but a life: so I despatched a servant on horseback with a note, stating that I should call if possible, the next evening.

Sunday, Nov. 6.—I determined to call upon Sir Henry to-day, to see the effect, if any, produced by our yesterday's conversation. He had just returned from hearing Dr. Y—— read prayers, and was perfectly calm. There was no alteration in his manner; and one of the earliest observations he made was, "Ah, Doctor, how you deceived me yesterday! What could I be thinking of, not to know that you were repeating, in another shape, the leading incident in—absolutely!—ha, ha!—my own tale of "The Predigree." 'Tis quite inconceivable how I could have forgotten it as you went on; but I have gained some valuable hints! I shall now get on with it rapidly, and have it at press as soon as possible. I hope it will be thought worthy by the world of the compliments you took occasion to pay me so delicately yesterday."

I took my leave of him, in despair.

On reaching ——— Hall, in the evening, I found that the news, with the delivery of which I fancied myself specially and exclusively charged, had, by some means or other, found its way to her ladyship in an early hour in the afternoon of the preceding day. She had been but slightly agitated on hearing it; and the first words she murmured were a prayer that the Almighty would make the intelligence the means of her husband's restoration to reason; but for herself, she expressed perfect resignation to the Divine will, and a hope that the consolations of religion might not be withdrawn from her during the little interval that lay between her and hereafter. Surely, that pure prayer, proceeding from the depths of a broken heart, through guileless lips, found favour with her merciful Maker. Surely it was his influence that diffused thenceforth serenity and peace through the chamber of the dying sufferer; that extracted the keen thorn of mental agony; that healed the broken spirit, while it gently dissolved the elements of life, kindling amid the decaying fabric of an earthy tabernacle that light of faith and hope which shines

"Most vigorous when the body dies!"

Come hither a moment, ye that doubt or deny the existence of such an influence; approach with awful steps this deathbed chamber of youth, beauty, rank—or all loveliness in womanhood, and dignity in station—hither! and say, do you call THIS "the deathbed of hope, the young spirit's grave?" Who is it that hath rolled back from this sacred chamber door the boisterous surges of this world's disquietude, and "bidden them that they come not near?"

It was true that Lady Anne was dying, and dying under bitter circumstances, as far as mere earthly considerations were concerned; but was it hard to die surrounded by such an atmosphere of "peace that passeth understanding?"

I found my sweet patient surrounded by her sisters, and one or two other ladies, propped up with pillows in a sort of couch, drawn before the fire, whose strong light fell full upon her face and showed me what havoc grief had made of her once beautiful features. She was then scarcely eight and-twenty; and yet you might have guessed her forty! The light with which her full eyes once sparkled had passed away, and left them sunk deep in their sockets, laden with the gloom of death. Her cheeks were hollow, and the deep bordering of her cap added to their wasted and shrunken appearance. One of her sisters, a very lovely woman, was sitting close beside her, and had always been considered her image: alas, what a woful disparity was now visible!

Lady Sarah, my patient's youngest sister, was stooping down upon the floor, when I entered, in search of her sister's wedding ring, which had fallen from a finger no longer capable of filling it. 'You had better wind a little silk about it,' whispered Lady Anne, as her sister was replacing it on the attenuated alabaster-hued finger from which it had dropped. 'I do not wish it ever to be removed again. Do it, love!' Her sister, in tears, nodded acquiescence, and left the room with the ring, while I seated myself in the chair she had quitted by her sister's side. I had time to ask only a few of the ordinary questions, when Lady Sarah reappeared at the door, very pale, and beckoned out one of her sisters to communicate the melancholy intelligence, that moment received, that their father, the old Earl, who had travelled up from Ireland, though in an infirm state of health, to see his dying daughter, at her earnest request,—had expired upon the road! In a few minutes, all present had, one by one, left the room, in obedience to similar signals at the door, and I was left alone with Lady Anne.

"Doctor," said she, calmly, "I am afraid something alarming has happened. See how they have hurried from the room! I observed Sarah through that glass," said she, pointing me to a dressing-glass that stood so as to reflect whatever took place at the door. "Are you aware of any thing that has happened?" I solemnly assured her to the contrary. She sighed—but evinced not the slightest agitation.

"I hope they will tell me all; whatever it is, I thank God I believe I can bear it! but, Doctor," she pursued in the same calm tone, whatever that may be, let me take this opportunity of asking you a question or two about—Sir Henry. When did you see him?" I told her.

"Have you much hope of his case?" I hesitated.

"Pray, Doctor, be frank with a dying woman!" said she, with solemnity. "Heaven will vouchsafe me strength to bear whatever you may have to tell me! How is it?"

"I—I—fear—that at present, at least, he is no worse, and certainly far more tranquil than formerly."

"Does he know of the event of Saturday? How did it affect him?"

"But little, my lady. He did not seem quite to comprehend it." She shook her head slowly, and sighed.

"I hope your ladyship has received consolation from the intelligence?"

"Alas, what should it avail me! But there is my child. Thank God, he will not now be a beggar! Heaven watch over his orphan years!" I thought a tear trembled in her eye, but it soon disappeared. "Doctor," she added, in a fainter tone even than before, for she was evidently greatly exhausted, "one word more! I am afraid my weakness has from time to time occasioned you much trouble—if the frequent attempts I have made to see my husband—my poor lost Henry!" She paused for several seconds. "But the word is spoken from on high; I shall never see him again on this side the grave! I have written a letter to him, which I wish to be delivered to him after I shall be no more, provided—he be capable of—of"—again she paused. "It is lying in my portfeuille below, and is sealed with black. It contains a lock of my hair, and I have written a few lines—but nothing that can pain him. Will you take the charge of it?" I bowed in respectful acquiescence. She extended her wasted fingers towards me, in token of her satisfaction. I can give the reader, I feel, no adequate idea of the solemn, leisurely utterance with which all the above was spoken. In her manner there was the profound composure of consciously approaching dissolution. She seemed beyond the reach of her former agitation of feeling—shielded, as it were, with a merciful apathy. I sat beside her, in silence, for about a quarter of an hour. Her eyes were closed, and I thought she was dozing. Presently one of her sisters, her eyes swollen with weeping, stepped softly into the room, and sat down beside her.

"Who is dead, love?" enquired Lady Anne, without opening her eyes. Her sister made no reply, and there was a pause. "He would have been here before this, but for"—muttered Lady Anne, breaking off abruptly. Still her sister made no reply. "Yes—I feel it; my father is dead!" exclaimed Lady Anne, adding in a low tone, "if I had but strength to tell you of my dream last night! Call them all in—call them all in; and I will try, while I have strength," she continued with more energy and distinctiveness than I had heard during the evening. Her eye opened suddenly, and settled upon her sister.

"Do not delay—call them all in to hear my dream!" exclaimed Lady Anne, her eye glancing at me with sudden brightness. "There he is—he wishes to see his children around him, poor old man!" A faint and somewhat wild smile lit her pale features for a moment. "I hear them on the stairs—they must not find me thus. I am getting cold!" She suddenly rose from her chair, drew her dress about her, and walked to the bed. Her maid that moment entered, assisted in drawing the clothes over her. I followed, and begged her to be calm. Her pulse fluttered fast under my finger.

"I should not have hastened so much," said she, feebly, "but he is beckoning to me!" At this moment her sisters entered the room. "The lights are going out, and yet I see him!" she whispered, almost inarticulately. "Julia—Sarah—Elizabeth—Elizabeth—Eliza—El'—she murmured; her cold hand suddenly closed upon my fingers, and I saw that the brief struggle was over!

Her poor sisters, thus in one day doubly bereaved, were heart-broken. What a house of mourning was —— Hall! I felt that my presence was oppressive.—What could I do to alleviate grief so profound—to stanch wounds so recent! I therefore took my leave shortly after the decease of Lady Anne. As I was walking down the grand staircase, I was overtaken by the nursery maid, carrying down the little orphan son of her ladyship.

"Well, my poor little boy," said I, stopping her, and patting the child on the cheek, "what brings you about so late as this?"

"'Deed, sir," replied the girl, sobbing, "I don't know what has come to Master Harry to-night! He was well enough all day; but ever since seven o'clock, he's been so restless, that we did'nt know what to do with him. He's now dozing, and then waking; and his little moans are very sad to hear. Had'nt he better have some quieting physic, sir?"

The child looked, indeed, all she said. He turned from the light, and his little face was flushed and feverished.

"Has he asked after his mamma?"

"Yes, sir, often, poor dear thing! He wants to go to her; he says he will sleep with her to-night, or he won't go to bed at all," said the girl, sobbing; "and we daren't tell him that—that—he's no mamma to go to any more!"

I thought of the FATHER—then of the son—then of the precious link between them that lay severed and broken in the chamber above; and with moist eyes and a quivering lip, kissed the child and left the Hall. It was a wretched November night. The scene without harmonized with the gloom within. The country all around was wrapped in a dreary winding-sheet of snow; the sleet came down without ceasing; and the wind moaned as it were a dirge for the dead. Alas for the dead! Alas for the early dead! The untimely dead!

Alas, alas, for the living!

Tuesday, Nov. 8th.—"On Sunday, the 6th November, at —— Hall, of rapid decline, Lady Anne, wife of Sir Henry Harleigh, Bart., and third daughter of the late Right Hon. the Earl of —— whom she survived only one day."

Such was the record of my sweet patient's death that appeared in to-day's papers. Alas, of what a sum of woes are these brief entries the exponents! How little does the eye that hastily scans them see of the vast accumulations of suffering which are there represented!

This entry was full before my eyes when I called to-day upon Sir Henry, who was busily engaged at billiards in the public room with Dr. Y——. He played admirably, but was closely matched by the Doctor, and so eager in the game, that he had hardly time to ask me how I was. I stood by till he proved the winner, and great was his exultation.

"I'll play you for a hundred pounds, Doctor!" said Sir Henry; and give you a dozen!"

"Have you nothing to say to your friend, Doctor?" replied Dr. Y——, who knew that I had called for the purpose of attempting to make Sir Henry sensible of the death of Lady Anne.

"Oh yes; I'll play with him; but before I lay odds, we must try our skill against one another. Come Doctor, ' extending the cue; you shall begin!"

"Of course I excused myself and succeeded in enticing him to his apartment, by mentioning his tale of the "Pedigree."

"Ah, true," said he briskly; "I'm glad you've thought of it! I wish to talk to you on the subject."

We were soon seated together before the fire, he with manuscripts lying on his knee.

"And what have you done with the wife?" said I, pointedly.

"Oh, Lady Mary? Why—let me see. By the way—in your version of my story, the other day—how did you dispose of her?" he enquired curiously.

I heaved a deep sigh. "God Almighty has disposed of her since then," said I, looking him full in the face. "He has taken her gentle spirit to himself; she has left a dreary world, Sir Henry!" He looked at me with a puzzled air.

"I can't for the life of me make you out, Doctor! What do you mean? What are you talking of? Whom are you confounding with my heroine? Some patient you have just left? Your wits are wool-gathering!"

"To be serious, Sir Henry," said I, putting my handkerchief to my eyes, "I am thinking of one who has but within this day or two, ceased to be my patient! Believe me—believe me, my dear Sir Henry, her case —very—closely—resembled the one you describe in your story. Oh, how sweet—how beautiful—how resigned!"

He made no reply, but seemed considering my words—as if with a reference to his own fiction.

"I can tell you, I think, something that will affect you, Sir Henry!" I continued.

"Aye! What is that? What is that?"

"She once knew you!"

"Knew me! What, intimately?"

'Very—VERY! She mentioned your name on her deathbed: she uttered a fervent prayer for you!'

'My God!' he exclaimed, removing his papers from his knee, and placing them on the table, that he might listen more attentively to me; 'how astonishing! Who can it be?' he continued, putting his hand to his forehead—'Why, what was her name?'

I paused, and sickened at the contemplation of the possible crisis. 'I—I—perhaps—it might not be prudent to mention her name'——

'Oh, do! do! he interrupted me eagerly,—'I know what you are afraid of; but honour! Her name shall be safe with me! I cannot be base enough to talk of it!'

'Lady Anne Harleigh!' I uttered with a quivering lip.

'Po—po—poh, he stammered, turning pale as ashes, and trembling violently, 'What—wh—at do you mean? Are you talking about my wife?'

'Yes—your wife, my dear bereaved Sir Henry; but your little boy still lives to be a comfort to you!'

——the boy!' said he, uttering, or rather gasping a violent imprecation, continuing, in a swelling voice, 'You were talking about my wife!'

"For heaven's sake, be calm," said I, rising.

"MY WIFE!" he continued exclaiming, not in the way of an enquiry, but simply shouting the words, while his face became transformed almost beyond recognition. * * I shall, however, spare the reader the scene which followed. He got calm and pacified by the time I took my leave, for I had pledged myself to come and play a game at billiards with him on the morrow. On quitting the chamber, I entered the private room of Dr. Y——; and while he was putting some questions to me about Sir Henry, he suddenly became inaudible,—invisible for I was fainting with excitement and agitation, occasioned by the scene I have alluded to.

"Depend upon it, my Dear Doctor, you are mistaken," said Dr. Y—— pursuing the conversation, shortly after I had recovered, "Sir Henry's case is by no means hopeless—by no means!"

"I would I could think so? If this madness has stood two such tremendous assaults with impunity, rely upon it, it is impregnable. It will not be accessible by any inferior—nay, by any whatever."

"Ah, quite otherwise—experto credè!" replied the quiet Doctor, helping himself to a glass of wine; "the shocks you have alluded to have really, though invisibly, shaken the fortress; and now we will try what sapping—undermining—will do—well followed out in figure, by the way is it not? But I'll tell you a remarkable case of a former patient of mine, which is quite in point."

"Pray, forgive me, my dear Doctor, pray excuse me at present. I really have no heart to listen to it; I am, besides all in arrear with my day's work, for which I am quite unfit, and will call again in a day or two."

"N'importe—Be it so—'twill not lose by the keeping," replied the Doctor, good-humouredly; and shaking him by the hand, I hurried to my chariot, and drove off. Experience certainly had not sharpened the sensibilities of Dr. Y.!

[Bear with me, kind reader! Suffer me to lay before you yet one or two brief concluding extracts from this mournful portion of my Diary. If your tears flow, if your feelings are touched, believe, 'tis not with romance—it is with the sorrows of actual life. "It is better to go to the house of mourning than to go to the house of feasting; for that is the end of all men—and the living will lay it to his heart."]

Nov. 9th to 14th inclusive. Between these periods I called several times at Somerfield House, but saw little alteration in Sir Henry's deportment or pursuits, except that he was at times, I heard, very thoughtful, and had entirely laid aside his tale, taking, in its place, to chess! He grew very intimate with the crazy gentleman before mentioned, who was imagined, both by himself and Sir Henry, to be the king. More than once, the keeper warned Dr. Y. to interfere for the purpose of separating them, for he feared lest they should be secretly concerting some dangerous scheme or other. Dr. Y. watched them closely, but did not consider it necessary to interrupt their intercourse. I found Sir Henry one evening, sitting with his friend, the king, and their two keepers, very boisterous over their wine. Sir Henry staggered towards me, on my entry, singing snatches of a drinking song, which were attempted to be echoed by his majesty, plainly far gone. I remonstrated with the keepers, full of indignation and alarm at their allowing two madmen the use of wine.

"Lord, Doctor," said one of them, smiling, taking a decanter, and pouring out a glass of its contents, "taste it, and see how much it would take to intoxicate a man."

I did; it was toast and water, of which the lunatics had drunk several decanters, complaining all the while of their being allowed nothing but sherry! I need hardly add, that they had, in a manner, talked, and laughed, and sung themselves tipsey! Sir Henry, with a hiccup—whether real or affected I knew not—insisted on my joining them, and told his majesty of the hoax I had lately been playing upon him, by "getting up" his own "tale," and mystifying him with telling it of another. His majesty shouted with laughter.

Wednesday, Nov. 16.—This was the day appointed for the funeral of Lady Anne, which I was invited to attend. I set apart, therefore, a day for that melancholy, that sacred purpose. I was satisfied that no heavier heart could follow her to the grave than mine.

It was a fine day. The sky was brightly, deeply blue, and the glorious sun was there, dazzling, but apparently not warming, the chilly earth. As I drove slowly down to the Hall, about noon, with what aching eyes did I see here a scarlet jacketed huntsman, there a farmer at his work whistling; while the cheery sparrows, fluttering about the bare twigs, and chirruping loudly, jarred upon my excited feelings, and brought tears into my eyes, as I recollected the words of the Scotch song,

"Ye'll break my heart, ye merry birds."

In vain I strove to banish the hideous image of Sir Henry from my recollection—he seemed to stand gibbering over the corpse of his lady! ——— Hall was a spacious building, and a blank desolate structure it looked from amidst the leafless trees—all its windows closed—nothing stirring about it but the black hearse, mourning coaches and carriages with coachmen and servants in sable silk hat-bands. On descending, and entering the Hall, I hastened out of the gloomy bustle of the undertaker's arrangements below, to the darkened drawing-room, which was filled with the distinguished relatives and friends of the deceased—a silent, mournful throng! Well, it was not long before her remains, together with those of her father, the Earl of ——— were deposited in the vault which held many members of their ancient family. I was not the only one whose feelings overpowered him during the ceremony, and unfitted me in some measure, for the duty which awaited me on my return, of ministering professionally to the heart-broken sisters. Swoons, hysterics, sobs and sighs, did I move amongst during the remainder of the day! Nearly all the attendants of the funeral left the Hall soon afterwards to the undisturbed dominion of solitude and sorrow: but I was prevailed upon by Lord ——, their brother, to continue all night, as Lady Julia's continued agitation threatened serious consequences.

It was at a late hour that we separated for our respective chambers. That allotted to me had been the one formerly occupied by Sir Henry and his lady, and was a noble, but, to me, gloomy room. Though past one o'clock, I did not think of getting into bed, but trimmed my lamp, drew a chair to the table beside the fire, and having brought with me pen, ink, and paper, began writing, amongst other things, some of these memoranda, which are incorporated into this narrative, for I felt too excited to think of sleep. Thus had I been engaged for some twenty minutes or half an hour, when I laid down my pen to listen; for, unless my ears had deceived me, I heard the sound of soft music at a little distance. How solemn was the silence at that witching hour! Through the crimson curtains of the window, which I had partially drawn aside, was seen the moon, casting her lovely smiles upon the sleeping earth, and quiet as in her immediate presence. How tranquil was all before me, how mournful all within! The very room in which I was standing had been occupied, in happier times, by her, whose remains had that day been deposited in their last cold resting place!

At length more dreary thoughts; of Somerfield; of its wretched insensate tenant, flitted across my mind. I drew back again the curtain, and returning to the chair I had quitted, resumed my pen. Again, however I heard the sound of music; I listened, and distinguished the tones of a voice, accompanied by a guitar, singing the melancholy air, 'Charley is my darling,' with exquisite simplicity and pathos. I stepped again to the window, for the singer was evidently standing close before it. I gently drew aside a little of the curtain, and saw two figures, one at a little distance, the other very near the window. The latter was the minstrel, who stood exactly as a Spaniard is represented in such circumstances; a short cloak over his shoulders; and the colour fled from my cheeks, my eyes were almost blinded, for I perceived it was Sir Henry, accompanied by the wretch whom he treated as 'the king!' I stood staring at him unseen, as if transfixed, till he completed his song. He paused.

'They all sleep sound,' he exclaimed with a sigh, looking with a melancholy air at the windows—'Wake, lady-love, wake!' He began again to strike the strings of his guitar, and was commencing a merry air, when a window was opened overhead. He looked up suddenly; a faint shriek was heard from above; Sir Henry flung away his guitar, and, followed by his companion, sprung out of sight in a moment! Every one in the house was instantly roused. The shriek I had heard was that of Lady Elizabeth, the youngest sister of Lady Anne, who had recognized Sir Henry; and it was providential that I happened to be on the spot. Oh, what a dreadful scene ensued! Servants were sent out, as soon as they could be dressed, in all directions, in pursuit of the fugitives, who were not, however, discovered till day-break. Sir Henry's companion was then found, lurking under one of the arches of a neighbouring bridge, half dead with cold; but he either could not, or would not, give any information respecting the Baronet. Two keepers arrived post at the Hall by seven o'clock, in search of the fugitives.

It was inconceivable how the madmen could have escaped. They had been very busy the preceding day whispering together in the garden, but had art enough to disarm any suspicion that circumstance might excite, by a seeming quarrel. Each retired in apparent anger to his apartment; and when the keeper came to summon them to supper, both had disappeared. It was supposed that they had mounted some of the very many coaches that traversed the road adjoining, and their destination, therefore, baffled conjecture.

Advertisements were issued in all directions, offering a large reward for his capture; but with no success. No tidings were received of him for upwards of a week; when he one day suddenly made his appearance at the Hall, towards dusk, very pale and haggard; his dress in a wretched state; and demanded admission of a new porter, as the owner of the house. Enquiry was soon made, and he was recognized with a shriek by some of the female domestics. He was, really, no longer a lunatic; though he was believed such for several days. He gave, however, unequivocal evidence of his restoration to reason; but the grief and agony occasioned by discovering the death of his lady, threw him into a nervous fever, which left him at the end of five months, 'more dead than alive.' Had I not attended him throughout, I declare I could not have recognised Sir Henry Harleigh in the haggard, emaciated figure, closely muffled up from head to foot, and carried into an ample travelling chariot-and-four, which was to convey him towards the continent. He never returned to England: but I often heard from him, and had the satisfaction of knowing that for several years he enjoyed tolerable health, though the prey of unceasing melancholy. The death of his son, however, which happened eight years after the period when the events above related occurred, was a voice from the grave, which he listened to with resignation. He died, and was buried in Italy, shortly after the publication of the first of these papers. I shall never forget that truly amiable, though unfortunate individual, whose extraordinary sufferings are here related under a disguise absolutely impenetrable to more than one or two individuals. They will suffer the public to gather, undisturbed, the solemn instruction which I humbly hope and believe this narrative is calculated to afford, as a vivid and memorable illustration of that passage from Scripture already quoted, and with which, nevertheless, I conclude this melancholy history 'And in my prosperity, I said, I shall never be moved. Lord, by thy favour thou hast made my mountain to stand strong: thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled!'

THE GOINGS FORTH OF GOD.

An extract from 'The Maniac Minstrel, a Tale of Palestine.' (MS.) by OTWAY CURRY.

GOD WALKETH ON THE EARTH. The purling rills
And mightier streams before him glance away,
Rejoicing in his presence. On the plains,
And spangled fields, and in the mazy vales,
The living throngs of earth before him fall
With thankful hymns, receiving from his hand
Immortal life and gladness. Clothed upon
With burning crowns the mountain heralds stand,
Proclaiming to the blossoming wilderness
The brightness of his coming, and the power
Of Him who ever liveth, all in all!

GOD WALKETH ON THE OCEAN. Brilliantly
The glassy waters mirror back his smiles
The surging billows and the gamboling storms
Come crouching to his feet. The hoary deep
And the green gorgeous islands, offer up
The tribute of their treasures, pearls and shells,
And crown-like drapery of the flashing foam,
And solemnly the tesselated halls,
And coral domes, of mansions in the depths,
And gardens of the golden sanded seas,
Blend with the anthems of the chiming waves
Their allelujahs unto Him who rules
The invisible armies of eternity.

GOD JOURNIETH IN THE SKY. From sun to sun,
From star to star the living lightnings flash;
And pealing thunder through all space proclaim
The goings forth of Him, whose potent arm
Perpetuates existence, or destroys.
From depths unknown, unsearchable, profound,
Forth rush the wandering comets; girt with flames,
They blend in order true with marshalling hosts
Of starry worshippers. The unhallowed orbe
Of earth-born fire that cleaves the hazy air,
Blanched by the flood of uncreated light.
Fly with the fleeting winds and misty clouds
Back to their homes, and deep in darkness lie.

GOD JOURNIETH IN THE HEAVENS. Refulgent stars,
And glittering crowns of prostrate seraphim,
Emboss his burning path. Around him fall
Dread powers—dominions—hosts—and kingly thrones.
Angels of God—adoring millions—join
With spirits pure, redeemed from distant worlds,
In coral songs of praise.—"Thee we adore,
For thou art mighty. Everlasting spheres
Of light and glory in thy presence wait;
Time, space, life, light, dominion, majesty,
Truth, wisdom—are all thine, Jehovah! Thou
FIRST, LAST, SUPREME, ETERNAL POTENTATE."

SPANISH EVENING HYMN.

Aye! now let prayer and music
Meet in love on shore and sea!
Now, sweet mother! may the weary
Turn from this cold world to thee.

From the dark and restless waters
Hear the sailor's hymn arise!
From his watch-fire, 'midst the mountains,
Lo! to thee the shepherd cries.

Yet, where thus full hearts find voices,
If o'erburden'd souls there be,
Dark and silent in their anguish,
Aid those captives—set them free!

Touch them, every fount unsealing,
Where the frozen tears lie deep;
Thou, the Mother of all sorrows,
Aid, oh! aid to pray and weep!

Autobiography of Mathew Carey.

LETTER VIII.

I next published the Porcupiniad, a Hudibrastic poem, in which I gave a great number of extracts to shew the scurrilous and abusive nature of Cobbet's paper. I turned some of his paragraphs into Hudibrastic verse, and it is wonderful how smoothy they ran, in many instances, with the alteration of a single word or two—and often without the alteration of a letter.

"The same villains on the same evening, arm'd in the same way, came to the house also. My clerk did not call me down. If he had, and if they had struck me, THEY WOULD NOW BE IN HELL."—Porcupine's Gazette, Feb. 1, 1799.

The self same villains, sameway arm'd,
My house on that same night alarm'd;
My clerk to call me down forgot—
Had he, hard would have been their lot.
If they had struck me, mark me well,
They would ere now be lodged in hell.*

"It must be a republican to belie a fallen republic. You are like porpoises, the moment one receives a wound, the rest gather round and devour him."—December 6, 1798.

None but republican so base,
As to belie and heap disgrace,
On fall'n republics. You are all,
Vile porpoises, both great and small,
The moment one receives a wound,
The rest, instanter, gather round,
And seizing their devoted prey,
Tear and devour him straitway.

"Let them write on, till their old pens are worn to the stump: let the Devils sweat; let them fire their balls at my reputation, till the very press cries out murder. If ever they hear me whine or complain, I will give them leave to fritter my carcase, and trail my guts along the street, as the French sansculottes did those of Thomas Mauduit." Life of Porcupine, p. viii.

Let them with perfect freedom write;
And to the stump their pens wear quite;
I'll let the wretched Devils sweat,
And all their base attacks repeat;
Let them my precious fame belie,
Till e'en the press shall murder cry;
If they should ever hear me whine,
Or at their calumny repine,
I ne'er shall even once gainsay,
That they my carcase fritter and flay,
And trail my guts along the street,
As erst the French serv'd Mauduit.

"Gullibility is far from being the characteristic of Americans in the common concerns of life; but in politics they have shown themselves most miserably shallow. They have been the dupes of every artful rascal, who has thought it worth his while to deceive them."—Pt G. November 8, 1798.

Th' Americans, I know full well,
In small affairs, a'nt gullible,
In politics, they're very shallow,
And dup'd by ev'ry artful fellow,
Or rascal, who thinks worth his while,
Their easy nature to beguile."

"Shoot and hack away, my brave fellows! You cannot strike amiss. Lay about you on all sides: and, like Hercules of old, when you have rid the world of all other monsters, conclude by doing justice on yourselves. So shall your vile carcases become a prey to the beasts of the forest and to the fowls of the air, and the earth shall have peace. Amen."—Sept. 17, 1797.

Shoot, hack away, my fellows brave,
Nor child, nor man, nor woman save.
You cannot strike amiss, ne'er doubt you
On all sides fiercely lay about you,
And when, like Hercules, you kill
All other monsters, then fulfil
Decree of justice on yourselves,
You Democratic, dev'lish elves.
So shall, our terrors to allay,
Your carcases become a prey
To fowls in air, and beasts in den;
And wearied earth have peace again,
I, William Cobbett, sing Amen.

"This wolf-like trick, is an exact emblem of the general conduct of the brutes of Democracy all over the world."—December 24, 1798.

This wolf-like trick exactly suits
Democracy's most furious brutes.

"I hope destruction will light on me and mine, if ever I do any thing either directly or indirectly to aid or assist him."—May 24, 1798.

Destruction light on me and mine,
If ever I should once incline,
By means direct, or indirect,
To aid the caitiff, or protect.

"Send me a file of your papers, you trimming rascals, and you shall see what pretty creatures I'll make of you. I'll cook you up into a dish fit for the Devil."—Idem, Jan 28, 1798.

Of your newspapers send a file,
You trimming rascals, base and vile;
What pretty creatures I shall make you!
I'll make your warmest friends forsake you.
To my old patron, I'll be civil,
A dish I'll cook you for the Devil.

"With this before their eyes, the house of Representatives sit debating, shilly shally, whipping the devil round the post, and no energetic measure is adopted, no strong alien bill or sedition law is passed, nor is any declaration of war made, by which traitors can in the eye of the law, be found guilty and punished."—Idem, June 19 1798.

Congress, alas! are still debating,
Shilly shally, hesitating;
Whipping the Devil round the post,
And so much precious time is lost,
No bill 'gainst Aliens do they pass,
Nor strong sedition law, alas!
Nor do the cowards dare declare
Against the French a state of war.

I presume this is enough for the present letter. My next shall furnish another collection, equally creditable to the taste of the public by whom Cobbett was patronized.

Philadelphia, Jan. 2, 1834.

*Should any critic be disposed to be severe on some of these lines as harsh and unpoetical, let him examine Hudibras, the grand prototype of this species of versification, and he will find couplets infinitely more harsh than any of mine—as, for example:

And shine upon me but benignly,
With that one and the other pigsney.—Hudibras, p. II. c. 1, 569.

If we permit men to run headlong,
T' exorbitances fit for bedlam."—Idem, p. 1, c. II. 655.

Was no dispute afoot between,
The caterwauling brethren?"—Idem 701,

'Twas nothing so. Both sides were balanc't
So equal, none knew which was valian'st.—Idem 807.

Ward, author of England's Reformation, a celebrated Hudibrastic writer, took equal liberties.

That every one may understand,
What sort of faith we are to teach the land.—England's Reformation Canto II.

The doctrines taught in every one,
Tho' perfect contradiction.—Ibid.

And in plain syllables declare,
That only bread and wine are present there.—Ibid.

LETTER IX.

I give a few more extracts to shew the authoritative and imperious style used by Cobbet, and his dictation to the government.

"Can there be any stronger evidence than these, that you do not possess the public confidence; and that, although by some fatality or other, you fill seats in Congress, you are really not the representatives of the people at this moment, nor the organs of their will and opinion? What do you wait for more? Are you resolved to hang as dead weights, and to stop the wheels of government, until the people rise and take you by the shoulders, as Cromwell did the rump, in the last century, and turn you out of doors?"—June 26th, 1798.

And will you, pray, dare make pretence
T' enjoy the public confidence?
Although you fill the Congress seats,
You are a pack of very cheats:
I pray, why will you longer wait?
Will you still hang a deadly weight,
To stop the governmental wheel,
And overturn the commonweal?
Wait you until the people rise,
Your various misdeeds to chastise,
And out doors turn you in a rage,
As Cromwell serv'd the rump last age?"

"Were I the king (there is but one upon earth,) I would immediately declare war against the Danes and Swedes. People in general are not aware of the mischief these peddling monarchs have done. I pray to God to reward them with a revolution."—March 1, 1799.

Were I the king (what jubilee!)
There is but one—and George is he—
I would directly war declare,
'Gainst Danes and Swedes. Few are aware
How much their peddling kings have done
Of mischief, which they'll ne'er atone.
I pray, O God! reward them well,
With revolutions dire from hell!

"In all combats or rencontres—in all transactions of peace or war, between Englishmen and Dutchmen, the perfidy of the latter, and particularly their atrocious conduct towards the British army, ought ever to be remembered. If I could save one of these snigger-sneeing rascals from sinking in the Delaware, I would not do it. To forgive the crimes of the Dutch is one of the most base offences against nature that a Briton can commit."—Jan. 1, 1798.

In each rencontre, or affair,
'Twixt Dutch and English, peace or war,
The Dutchman's perfidy ought not
A single moment be forgot,
If I a snigger-snee could save
From sinking in the Del'ware wave,
Perdition on me if I'd do it,
I'd make the rascals surely rue it.
The crimes of Dutchmen to forgive,
Must surely be, as I'm alive,
'Gainst nature, the offence most base,
That can on Briton heap disgrace.

"Let us hope that the Methodist Preachers all over the country will follow this gentleman's example. The Methodists ought to fight as well as other people. The sword and the word have often co-operated, and such a co-operation is at this time ten thousand times more necessary than ever. There ought to be, and there must be, a real crusade, a holy war, against the infidel reprobate French. To kill one of them in field of battle, will merit more in the eyes of God, than praying and singing psalms for a hundred years."—July 11, 1798.

Let us the Methodists excite,
As well as other folks, to fight:
Let the word and sword co-operate,
To save the holy ark of state;
'Tis thousand times more needful now,
Than in times past, all men allow:
Let's boldly make a grand crusade—
And quick the gallic lands invade;
T' attack the French in field of battle,
And butcher them like sheep or cattle;
Will gain of grace a greater store,
And please the God of Mercy more.
Than singing psalms a hundred years,
Or teazing heav'n with pray'rs and tears.

"The rascal deserves to have a red-hot wire run through his tongue."—July 11, 1798.

Run through his tongue a red-hot wire:
No less deserves this rascal dire,

"And yet the sound of peace re-echoes through the land! O lasting disgrace! Rivers of blood will not wash it away!"—May 26, 1798.

Still through the land, the sound of peace,
Re-echoes! O what dire disgrace!
Rivers of blood, you'd use in vain,
To wash away the hideous stain!

"It would be a happy thing if the accursed art of printing could be totally destroyed, and obliterated from the human mind."—Sept. 1, 1798.

O what a glorious theme for joy,
Could we with vandal rage destroy,
And from mankind obliterate
Printing, thou art most reprobate.

The Porcupiniad closed the controversy, Cobbet made no attempt at reply, and never, as far as I recollect, had my name in his paper after the publication, except once or twice, and then only incidentally.

In 1796 there was an association in the city of Philadelphia, of which Dr. Leib, Dr. Reynolds, John Beckly, W. Duane, J. Clay, and B. F. Bache, were the prime leaders. As the name and character of Gen. Washington were employed as a species of argument in favour of the treaty, it was debated among the leaders for a considerable time, whether the validity of this argument, that is, the character and merits of Gen. Washington, should be canvassed. At length, in an evil hour, it was resolved to assail Gen. Washington in the Aurora, and in pamphlets, of which a number appeared, some of them coarse and vulgar. Among the rest, the spurious letters published, as those of Washington, during the Revolutionary war, and the attacks on the General in an old pamphlet, of which I forget the title, wherein he was charged with the murder of a Frenchman bearing a flag of truce, during the war of 1756. A Pole, of the name of Trezulney, who acted as bookkeeper for Mr. Duane, wrote a pamphlet, the object of which was to prove the utter incapacity of Gen. Washington as displayed during the revolution.

These violent measures, which did more to injure the cause of Democracy than all the efforts of its enemies could have done in five years, were carried, as I was given to understand, through the influence of Dr. Leib and Dr. Reynolds, two men of ardent temperament; the latter of whom was among the most imprudent of men. The publications were highly pernicious to B. F. Bache, who, till that period, was popular on account of his amiable manners and his descent from Dr. Franklin. The Aurora was ably conducted, and had had a very extensive circulation. But the attacks on Gen. Washington blasted Bache's popularity, and almost ruined the paper. Subscribers withdrew in crowds—and the advertising custom sank to insignificance.

Dr. Reynolds was the most unfortunate of men in all his undertakings. Unlike Midas, whose touch turned every thing he came in contact with, into gold, every thing in which the Doctor was concerned, eventuated unprosperously. On one occasion, he stationed himself in the yard of St. Mary's Church, on Sunday, with a chair, table and desk, to procure subscribers to a memorial to Congress against a proposed altration in the laws respecting citizenship, which went to extend the time of probation for emigrants. The majority of the congregation were federalists, and hostile to the object of Dr. Reynolds. A rash young man gave him a shove, and upset his table and desk —a scuffle ensued, in which the doughty hero of the memorial was severely handled—thrown to the ground —and his clothes torn—He was finally taken by constables, followed by at least 500 men and boys, to the House of Judge McKean, by whom he was at once released. What became of the affair afterwards, I have forgotten. So convinced was I of the fatality of his efforts, that I once told him, half jest, half earnest, that if I were a leading federalist, I would give him 500 dollars a year to take an active part in the affairs of the Democrats, for so surely as he did, so surely would they be utterly blasted.

MATHEW CAREY.

Philadelphia, Jan. 6th, 1834.

From the Western Monthly Magazine.

A SKETCH.

From the blank-book of a Sexagenarian.

'Come what may, you will never find the happiness you ask; you exact too much from the ideal.'

The prophetess spoke truth; but I had worshiped the ideal too long to heed the admonition; and I turned again to the eversmiling countenance of Hope, who still urged me unward.

Oh, Hope! fair is thy form to the vision of youth and inexperience. Softly dost thou linger with us in the spring-time of existence. Beautiful are thy pictures of happiness, and sweet are the tones of promise with which thou dost betray us. Lovely, fair, but ever in the dim distance, is the goal of contentment and joy which thou dost point out to us: and we struggle forward, amid strife, and toil, and sorrow—still by thee deceived, and still seduced—until we totter to the brink of the grave, to hear the only truth which thou dost ever utter. It tells of peace in heaven.

* * * * * * * * *

I stood at morning upon the the peninsula of Apsheron, and the restless waters of the Caspain were sparkling before me in the sunlight. Noon came and passed; but the promised boon came not. It never came.

'Well, well,' I exclaimed, 'I can die here. The cold waves shall sing my requiem, and their mourning shall outlive my name and the record of my fate.'

'Follow! follow! follow!' said my mysterious guide. 'Follow—to the sunny clime of Italy, or die, a baffled wanderer, here.'

'Have I not followed thee, faithfully and far? Have I not journeyed with thee through many a strange land! The banks of the Euphrates are imprinted with our footsteps, and in the groves of Damascus, and beneath the cedars of Mount Lebanon have we reposed. We have stood in sorrow by the entombed grandeur of Laksor, and in the ever-green valley of Quito, we have loitered in vain. Through climes of eternal snow—through deserts of burning sands—through ocean's calms and storms, with thee have I toiled—with thee I have journeyed—and thou—thou hast ever mocked me.————Oh! deceiver, I will follow thee still!'

* * * * * * *

Gloriously the moonbeams glittered upon the towering spires of St. Peter's. Softly they shone upon the buildings of the Vatican. Silence reposed upon the bosom of night, and sweet flowers mingled their perfume with the breath of zephyrs. Who could have told that, on such a night, the dark angel of destruction was unfurling his banner.

A piercing cry broke the stillness of the hour, and shrieks of 'fire!' resounded wildly through the air. I started from the column against which I had been leaning, and flew towards the part of the city from which the alarm proceeded. Dashing onward, through hurrying men, and terified women and shrieking children, the broad, bright blaze of the destroying element soon broke upon my sight. It arose from the dwelling of the Signor di Valendi.

'Save her! save her! for the sake of the holy virgin, save my child,' cried a gray-haired man, as I reached the spot. His eyes and hands were raised in agony towards the upper part of the building, as he spoke.—Casting a single glance in the direction indicated, I beheld his daughter, leaning, pale, and apparently paralyzed, against the side of one of the windows, at a fearful height from the ground. The fire originated in a back apartment below, and the building was almost entirely enveloped in flame. Below—above—around —all was smoking, blazing and crackling.

A few, urged by feelings of humanity, or the cries of the aged father, made attempts to enter the blazing pile and rescue his daughter; but they were driven back by the flames that began to curl in red wreaths along the flight of stairs that arose from the hall.

My coat and cap were upon the ground in an instant. My eye caught the prostrate form of Carlo, who was crouching and winning before me.

'If I perish, God bless thee, Carlo!' I forgot, in that moment that he was a dog.

I flew into the smoking hall, and bounded up the fiery stairs with the speed and strength of a tiger. I reached the third story, and found myself in a back apartment, without ceiling or roof, amid the flame and smoke, and falling brands, while the red rafters threatened destruction from above. I saw a smoking door before me which seemed to lead into an apartment fronting the street. I did not stop to reflect, but rushing forward, the iron bolt gave way at my touch, and in another instant the object of my search was in my arms. Flying again to the door at which I had entered, I saw a sight that chilled my heart to the very core. Large pieces of timber had fallen upon the staircase, and were blazing, and crackling, and sending up, and around hot flames—hot as the flames of hell.

"God of heaven do not forsake me, now," I exclaimed, as I pressed my unconscious burden closer to my heart. At that instant I saw a flight of stairs that led to an upper apartment, from the room in which I then stood. I remember that I passed up those stairs, forced my way through a skylight, and found myself upon that part of the roof which looked upon the street. The flames were curling over the cone. Large flakes of fire were falling around me. I saw the roof of an adjoining building which the destructive element had not reached. I rushed towards it along the very verge of the eaves, and found that a chasm several feet wide separated the two houses. Ah! it was no time to despair—no time to doubt. I made the leap. I reached the roof, and fell, and rolled with my senseless burden to the very verge—over but I grasped with one hand an iron rod that passed along the eaves—and I knew that I had saved the old man's child. Ay—I saw that I graped her wrist with my right hand. I saw that my fingers were buried in the flesh. And I knew she was safe!

I looked down upon the silent crowd. The light of the flames shone full upon them. They spoke not—they moved not—but with pale cheeks and parted lips, they stood, statue-like, gazing up at me, as I hung suspended from the roof.

"A ladder!" I exclaimed, in a voice which I did not recognize as my own. The words had an electric effect. The whole mass below appeared to be in agitation. Another moment, and a ladder was raised against the wall. I felt my feet upon one of the rounds. Releasing my hold of the rod, I began to descend. My frame seemed to be of iron. Not a muscle shook, not a nerve trembled. I reached the ground in safety. I saw the old man clasp his child to his heart. I saw no more—I remembered no more of what passed that night. The roaring of a thousand cataracts sounded in my ears, and I staggered, and reeled, and fell.

* * * * *

How long I remained insensible I know not. I awoke as from a dream, and found myself reclining upon a sofa in a gorgeous apartment, which was lighted by a lamp that burned feebly upon a small table near me. I was just awakening from the fever of delirium, and it was some time ere I could collect my wandering senses. The events of the night of the fire however, soon recurred to my mind; and I remembered all.—But I knew not where I was. Looking around the dimly lighted apartment, I saw a female form. She seemed to be gazing on me with a look of the sweetest tenderness. Those features could not be mistaken. I should have known them in eternity. It was the daughter of the signor di Valendi. A sudden light burst upon my soul. Was my pilgrimage at last ended? Was the boon at last found? Would she love me? Why would she not? My heart again felt the thrill of the spring-time of youth. My blood ran wildly through my veins. I arose from the couch. I knelt before her. I spoke long and incoherently. I told her all my sorrows, and all my hopes. I was bewildered with the intensity of my own feelings. She did not turn from me. Her face was not averted, and I thought I saw by the flickering light, a deep blush suffusing her cheeks. I thought I saw her white bosom heave with emotion, while a tear seemed to be stealing to her soft blue eyes. I believed she would love me. How could I doubt it. Maddened with ecstacy, I arose from my kneeling posture, and rushing forward, clasped to my heart—PICTURED CANVASS—lifeless—soulless—cold.

Slowly did I unclasp that embrace. Steadily did I gaze for one moment on the portrait before me. I did not faint, nor fall—nor falter, But I laughed—ay, laughed—long—loudly—bitterly.

INVOCATION.

The flowers, the flowers, the summer flowers
The playmates of our earlier hours,
Ye children of the dews, and showers,
Come from your cells.

Yield them to life, Oh! gentle earth,
Give the fair buds and blossoms birth,
The angry season of their dearth
Young spring repels.

Hither it hastens on its wing,
The fair, the bright, the beauteous spring,
Waters, and woods, and wild birds sing
Its welcome hail.

Hither it hastens in its pride,
(Like to a young and glorious bride,
With rose-wreath'd Cupid for her guide,)
Sweet'ning the gale.

Come then, and earth shall catch the sound,
And, as thy breathings kiss the ground,
Like fairy spirits all around
The flowers shall rise.

'Till, by the Valley's fertile store,
Thou'rt led the woodland's verdure o'er,
To thy bright home, on sunny shore,
Or in the skies.

IDEAS.—Shakspeare, Butler and Bacon, have rendered it extremely difficult for all who come after them to be sublime, witty or profound.

THE TEMPLE OF BUTTERFLIES.

The Chevalier de Boufflers, whom Delile characterized as "the honour of knighthood and the flower of troubadours," the erotic poet, the agreeable novelist, so long the delight of the saloons of Paris, was by turns an abbot, a colonel of hussars, a painter, an academician, a legislator, and, under all these characters, the most gay, careless and witty of French cavaliers.

I was long acquainted with this highly-gifted man. I saw him in 1780, at the beautiful estate of Chanteloup, near Amboise, whither the duke de Choiseul, then an exile from the court, attracted many of the most distinguished men of France, whether for birth or merit. It was the focus of the most brilliant wits and beauties of the day. The duchess de Choiseul, whose memory is still cherished on the lovely banks of the Loire, had a friendship for the chevalier de Boufflers, which did her honour; he was her companion in her walks, in the chase, and still more frequently in her visits to the cottages of the peasantry, to whom this accomplished and excellent woman constantly administered comfort and assistance.

Madame de Choiseul, who was in her youth intimate with Buffon, had imbibed from that celebrated man a strong taste for the observation of natural objects. Her library contained a complete collection of natural historians, ancient and modern.

This delightful and exhaustless study had inspired Madame de Choiseul with a new and fanciful idea. Opposite to the windows of her own room she had erected a temple of gause of antique form, and sheltered by an ample roof; during the summer she amused herself with collecting in this airy palace all the most beautiful butterflies of the country.

The duchess alone had a key of the temple of butterflies, which was peopled by the assiduity of village girls of the neighbourhood. They strove, by presenting to her continually some new species, to obtain the privilege of speaking to their beloved patroness, and they were sure to receive a reward proportioned to the beauty and rarity of their offerings.

Boufflers was frequently a witness to the duchess's assiduous cares about her favourite temple.

"Chevalier," said she to him, with a smile, "I run no risk in introducing you among my butterflies; they will take you for one of themselves, and will not be frightened."

On one occasion, when Madame de Choiseul was compelled by illness to keep her room for some weeks, she gave the key of her temple to the chevalier, who found ample compensation for the trouble of his charge in the pleasure of receiving the country girls, who daily came to recruit the numerous family of butterflies. He encouraged them to talk about their rural sports and their love affairs, so that he was soon master of the chroni cles of all the surrounding vilages In this way he frequently caught ideas and expressions with which he afterwards adorned his poems.

It was, however, remarked that Boufflers almost always preferred the butterflies brought by the prettiest girls; his scrutiny turned rather upon their features, their natural and simple graces, than upon the objects it was his office to select. An engaging face, a graceful carriage, or a well-turned person, was pretty sure not to be rejected. Thus the beautiful temple declined in splendour, but fewer poor little girls went away disappointed; and the duchess's bounty, passing through the easy hands of the chevalier, was diffused more widely, and gladdened more hearts.

Among the villagers who came to offer the fruits of their chase, he had frequently remarked a girl of about fifteen, whose large, deep blue eyes, jet black eyebrows and laughing mouth, graceful and easy carriage, and sweet, soft voice realized the most poetical descriptions of rural beauty. To crown her attractions, he found that she was the daughter of a forester of Amboise, and that her name was Aline. This pretty name was the title of a tale of his, which had been greatly admired. It may be imagined that he felt a peculiar interest in this young girl, and with what pleasure he rewarded her, in the duchess's name; and how he took advantage of the pretext afforded by the beauty of any of her butterflies, to double the gift. Boufflers soon drew from her the secret of her heart; he learnt how she loved Charles Verner, son of the keeper of the castle, but that his father opposed their union on account of the disparity of their fortunes. Boufflers, who thought love levelled all distinctions, secretly resolved to serve the young Aline. He sent for Charles Verner, found him worthy to be the possessor of so lovely a creature, and spoke in his behalf to the duchess, who, wishing to have some fair pretext for contributing towards the marriage-portion of the chevalier's protegé, made it known in the neighbourhood, that at the end of the season she would give a prize of twenty-five louisd'ors to the girl who brought her the greatest number of rare and beautiful butterflies. The emulation excited among the young villagers may easily be imagined; and whether it was that the fresh verdure of Aline's native forest of Amboise was propitious to her, or whether she was more agile and dexterous than the others, it fell out that she often presented Madame Choiseul, through her kind protector, with the butterflies upon which Reaumur had fixed the ighest value.

One day, when the duke and duchess, accompanied by the train of nobles, who formed the usual society of Chanteloup, were walking in that part of the park bordering on the forest, Aline, with a gause net in her hand, and, panting for breath, came running joyously up to Boufflers, and said to him, with that innocent familiarity he had encouraged in her, "Look, Monsieur le Chevalier, what do you think of my butterflies? you are such a fine judge of them." This speech was susceptible of an application so curiously fitted to the known character of Boufflers, that every body laughed. He took the butterflies from Aline's hands, and told her they were really of a rare and most valuable kind; one, especially; which, with its four azure wings of enormous size, studded with flame-coloured eyes, and its long black proboscis, supplied the only deficiency in the temple, and completed the duchess's immense collection. It was instantly decided that Aline had won the promised prize; she soon afterwards received it from the hands of Madame de Choiseul, and Boufflers added a golden cross, which Aline promised to wear as long as she lived.

It was now the middle of Autumn, and as the pleasures of Paris became daily more brilliant and inviting, the Chevalier de Boufflers, could not resist their attractions, though he left the delightful abode of Chanteloup with regret. Before he went away he saw the maiden who had so deeply interested him, and obtained from the father of her lover, the promise that he would consent to their marriage as soon as Aline had a sufficient portion. He recommended her warmly to the duchess's kindness, and departed for the capital.

A short time after, the duke de Chosieul quitted a world in which he had exercised such vast power, and so courageously withstood his numerous enemies. His widow was compelled to sacrifice nearly the whole of her own fortune, to pay the debts contracted by her husband, who had outshone all the nobles of the court in magnificence. She sold the estate of Chanteloup to the duke de Penthievre, and went to live at Paris. Aline, thus deprived of her patroness, lost all hope of being united to her lover, whose father remained inflexible, and the young man in a fit of desperation, enlisted in a regiment of dragoons. Boufflers heard of this. By a fortunate chance the colonel of the regiment was his near relative and friend, and Charles did so much credit to his recommendation, that he soon rose to the rank of Marechal des Logis. On his first leave of absence, he hastened to Chanteloup, where he found his fair one provided with a sufficient portion of the chevalier's generosity; the old keeper no longer withheld his consent, and the lovers were speedily united.

Twenty years passed away, and France fell into the confusion of political dissentions, and, at length, into all the horrors of a first revolution. Boufflers, though friendly to the opinions which were then propagated by the true lovers of liberty, was compelled, after the deplorable tenth of August, 1792, to quit France, and take refuge in Berlin. Prince Henry and the king of Prussia, after keeping him some time with them, gave him an estate in Poland, where, like a true French knight, he founded a colony for all the emigrants who were driven from their unhappy country. But in spite of all the advantages, and all the consolations he received in foreign lands, he never ceased to sigh after Paris. Thither his family, his friends, his most cherished habits, all called him. The compliments paid him on his poems, only served to remind him of the lovely and captivating women who had inspired them; those on his novel, of the delights of Chanteloup, of the amiable duchess de Choiseul, (who had survived her husband only a few years,) and of the temple of butterflies.

The storm of the revolution having subsided, many proscribed persons obtained leave to return to France; among these was Boufflers, who left Poland, travelling homewards through Bohemia, Bavaria, and Switzerland. He wished to revisit the beautiful shores of the lake of Geneva, where, thirty years before, he had passed a time which he never recurred to without delight. He therefore stopped at Lausanne, and, fearing lest his name might expose him to some disagreeable curiosity or supervision, he had furnished himself with a passport under the name of Foubers, a French painter. In this character, which he had more than once assumed before, he presented himself in the first houses of Lausanne, where he was received with all the attention due to genuine talent. The rage for M. Foubers, and for his fine miniature portraits, was universal. As he was anxious to obtain beautiful subjects, he was constantly told that he ought to paint the countess de Lauterbach; she was described to him as a lady of French origin, and the widow of a Bavarian general, who, at his death, had left her considerable property, including a magnificent estate, situated on the banks of the lake, at a few miles distance from Lausanne. At a fête given by one of the principal inhabitants of Lausanne, the beautiful countess of Lauterbach was present, and more than justified all his expectations.

He was introduced to the countess, who appeared struck by the sound of his voice, and agitated by some emotion which she strove to dissemble. They entered into conversation, and Boufflers expressed the most earnest desire to paint from so fine a model. After a moment's reflection, the countess accepted his offer; and, as if struck by some sudden thought, fixed a day for Foubers to go to her house, at the same time expressing her pleasure at being painted by a French artist.

On the day appointed, a calèche stopped at the door of his lodging, and conveyed him to the chateau de St. Sulpice, situated on the banks of the lake, opposite to the superb ampitheatre, traced by the Alps on the horizon. Boufflers arrived; he crossed an outer court, passed through an outer hall, and entered a vast saloon, in which every thing announced opulence and taste. On one side of the room hung a full-length portrait of the late duchess de Choiseul, seated near the temple of butterflies, with a volume of Boufflers' works in her hand. The chevalier could not control the emotions which agitated him, and forced tears from his eyes. "What recollections!" exclaimed he, involuntarily: "this countess de Lauterbach must certainly be of the Choiseul family. I shall like her the better." Whilst he gave himself up to these reflections, a chamberlain came to tell him that his lady would be occupied for a short time, and that she begged M. Foubers to excuse her, and desire him to ask whether he would be pleased to walk into her plantation a la Francaise. Boufflers followed his conductor through a long suit of apartments, where he entered an avenue of limes, and at the first turning, he saw, under the shade of some large trees, a temple of gauze, precisely like the duchess the Choiseul's. The temple was filled with butterflies of every species, and over the door was an inscription in verse which Boufflers had formerly written over the entrance of the temple at Chateloup, and he stood before it agitated, yet motionless with astonishment, and thought himself transported by magic to the banks of Loire. But his surprise was increased, and his emotion heightened, when he saw advancing towards him a young girl of fourteen or fifteen, in the dress of the villagers of Lorraine, whose features, shape and gait were precisely those of the girl he remembered with so affectionate an interest that he thought it was she herself that stood before him, and whose deep, rich voice met his ear.

"Your servant, Monsieur de Boufflers," said she, with a courtesy, and presenting to him a little gauze net, "what do you think of my butterflies? you are such a fine judge?"

"What are you—angel, sylph, enchantress?"

"What! do you not remember Aline, the daughter of the forester af Amboise, who used so often to bring you butterflies?"

"Do I dream!" said Boufflers, rubbing his eyes, and, taking the child's hand, he pressed it to his lips; "Aline, lovely Aline! it cannot be you?"

"How! it cannot be I? Who then won the prize for the finest butterflies? Who received from the hands of the duchess a prize of twenty-five louis, and from yours this golden cross, which I promished to wear as long as I live, and which I have never parted with for an instant?"

"I do indeed remember that cross—it is the very one! Never was illusion so perfect—never was man so bewildered. Your elegance betrays you. No, you are not a mere country girl. Tell me, then, to whom am I indebted for the most delicious emotion I ever felt in my life? Whence do you come? Who are you?"

"She is my daughter," cried the countess de Lauterbach, suddenly stepping from the concealment of a thicket, and throwing herself into the arms of Boufflers. "My dear protector; kind author of my happiness and of my good fortune—behold the true Aline, the wife and widow of Charles Verner, whose only daughter stands before you. Your emotion, however strong, cannot equal mine."

"How, madame! are you that simple village girl? Good and beautiful as you were, you had a right to become what you now are. But tell me, how happened it that for once fortune was not blind? Have the kindness at once to satisfy my curiosity."

"Listen then," replied the countess, with confiding delight, "and you shall hear all. Charles, in whom you took so generous an interest, having distinguished himself by repeated acts of bravery, obtained a commission shortly after our marriage. The war which broke out between France and Germany, called him to the field, and I followed him. He afterwards rose to the rank of colonel of cavalry, when he saved the life of the count de Lauterbach, commander of a Bavarian division on the field of battle; but in this act he received a mortal wound, and with his last breath recommended his wife and child, then an infant, to the general's care. Count de Lauterbach thought that in no way could he so effectually prove his gratitude to his preserver as by becoming the husband of his widow and a father of his child. After a few years of happy union he died, leaving me a large fortune, and a revered and cherished memory. At that time," added the countess, "I knew that you had been compelled to quit France, and to take refuge in Prussia. I left no means untried to discover the place of your residence; but your change of name, your travelling as a French painter, as you have so often done, always prevented my accomplishing the most ardent wishes of my heart. Judge, then, what was my emotion on meeting you the other day at Lausanne. I instantly determined to prove to you, in some degree at least, my joy and gratitude; and taking advantage of my daughter's age, and of her perfect resemblance to that Aline who owed to you the hand of Charles Verner, and all that she has subsequently possessed or enjoyed, I made use of your own colours; I copied the most beautiful scene of your elegant story which I have read so often—in short, I tried to bewitch you with your own enchantments; have I succeeded?"

"Ah!" exclaimed Boufflers, pressing the mother and daughter to his heart, "never shall I forget this ingenious fraud; it is true, that the memory of the heart is indestructible in women; and I see that the little good one may be able to do to the simplest village girl, may become a capital which gratitude will repay with interest."

AN ESCAPE FROM THE GUILLOTINE.

"Another victim!" I uttered involuntarily, as looking through a window which commanded a view of the principal entrance to the prison, I observed a crowd who, with the shouts of "pain ou sang," were dragging some unfortunate man to confinement, preparatory to his final debut on the scaffold.

I saw a man cross the street, of whose purpose my heart misgave me. This was an individual named Canve, for whom my brother and me had interested ourselves. He had received numberless favours from us; we had, therefore, every reason to dread his enmity.

It was as I conjectured; a few minutes after I remarked his approach in our direction, we were startled by a loud battering at the door.

"Open your door!" thundered the ruffian; "Je le donnerai les raisons ensuite." I, of course, refused.

"Ah! ah!" he shouted, with a demoniac laugh, "you shall see me return shortly and then—" He did not wait to conclude the sentence but hurried away, evidently with the intention of seeking assistance. When he had departed, I turned towards my sister, who, pale with surprise and fear, stood by me, and requested her to see to the immediate collection of our plate, jewels, and money. This done, we took the boxes in which we had packed them, and carrying them into the wood-cellar, we dropped them into a hole which was fortunately found there, and covering the spot with wood, we returned to wait the threatened return of Canve, and his band of ruffians.

We were fortunate in completing our task, for scarcely had we composed ourselves after our hasty labour, when the door with one blow was shattered to pieces, and in rushed Canve, accompanied by four men, all armed.

"We have come," said Canve, who appeared to act as the leader, "to search your house for a man called Le Cour." (The husband of my youngest sister, who was at this moment lying ill at our country seat.) Saying this, and without further remark, they rushed past us.

Expecting that in the course of their search they would visit my chamber, I repaired to it to hide a few little articles which were on my dressing-table. As I anticipated, they came to examine my apartment, but as if fatigued with their undertaking, they contented themselves with examining the closets, and thrusting their swords through the bed, saying, at the same time, "If he is here, this will spare the guillotine one job."

Having completed their survey, they repaired to the drawing-room, seated themselves without any ceremony, and ordered my sister to supply them with some of the best wine. By this time the poor girl had recovered herself, and indignation took the place of fear. She treated this demand with contemptuous silence, and Canve, started up, I believe, with the intention of striking her. I laid my hand on the pistol which I always carried, but perhaps awed by her firm bearing, he departed, without making any remark, in the direction of the wine-cellars. He returned shortly, loaded with several bottles, having to appearance previously satisfied himself of its quality. Having regaled themselves until they became in a state of beastly intexication, they left us, having first, out of mere wantonness, destroyed a large quantity of china and glass, which unfortunately lay in their way.

For three days we continued unannoyed by any of the revolutionary spirits; at the end of that time we learnt with horror that poor Le Cour had fallen into their hands, and would on the following day undergo his trial as a Royalist. The next day came, and the hour was fast approaching appointed for the commencement of the trial.

I had ever remarked that my sister possessed a certain noble-mindedness and contempt of self which had insured her my esteem and affection; but I was yet to learn that she was a heroine.—In the present instance she was the only one whose presence of mind remained unshaken.—Well knowing the disregard paid to any defence proceeding from the unfortunate individuals whose deplorable fate had brought them before this bloody tribunal, as also the unwillingness evinced by legal characters to undertake it, she determined to perform the part herself. I was astounded at the extraordinary resolution she had formed. A young and beautiful girl, who had hitherto appeared to me timid as a fawn, to array herself in a court of justice—and such a court—in defence of one whom it was a crime to succour. In vain I remonstrated—she was inflexible. She delayed her departure to the last moment, to render her appearance as striking as possible. Probably she thought the power of beauty might effect that which justice might plead for in vain. If so, never was beauty applied to nobler purpose. I could not witness the exhibition, and therefore remained at home, in an agony of apprehension for the result.

Whether the beauty and eloquence of this fair creature softened the hearts of the miscreants who presided at that dreadful tribunal I know not, but she was successful. The sentence of death which Canoc (who formed one of the members of this tribunal) endeavoured to have decreed against our relative, was commuted to banishment for life, with three months' imprisonment as a kind of preparation.

Morning after morning passed, and regularly as the hour of ten came round did it find my sister at the prison gate an applicant for admission, bearing such luxuries as his prison fare did not afford; and it is with a shudder of horror that I recall to my mind when accompanying her, the sight of blood, warm perhaps from the heart of some victim to private revenge, streaming down the gutter which conveyed it to the Saone.

It was during the performance of one of these morning duties that we remarked a young lady, whom we had known a few months before as the leading star of fashion in Lyons, now walking alone to convey to her husband such consolation as the sight of her would afford. She, as is ever the case, early became surrounded by a crowd of admirers, all envying the look which accidentally she might cast upon any one in particular. Of all these none had so distinguished himself in her eyes (as he thought) as N——, and he industriously circulated rumours that he would shortly receive the hand in marriage, which was the object of general rivalry; and even the day was named when all doubts would be set at rest.—Fortune, however, decreed otherwise, and threw in the way a young man whose accomplishments appeared in her eyes to outweigh the pretensions of all others. His noble countenance interested her—his elegant figure captivated her—and a few weeks saw the charming—the universally admired Annette become the bride of Romeo de Pouilli. Truly might he say with Cæsar, Veni, vidi, vici. "I came, I saw, I conquered."

The deaths this event occasioned must be acknowledged were but few, but the disappointment, I may say, general; and as N—— had at one time possessed the happiness through the prospect of winning the prize, saw now that all hopes was perished, his share of disappointments were the largest; and although time seemed to have washed from his mind the memory of his blighted prospects, still the veteran physiognomist traces were discernible in his features of deep and bitter enmity to his successful rival.

Time had passed with this happy pair in a continual round of pleasure until the event took place, which consigned so many of the elite of France to the scaffold. De Pouilli and N—— were both of the royalist creed: but N—— adopted the revolutionary principles to wreak his vengeance on the man, who, as he said, had robbed him of his happiness—they both having been suitors to the reigning beauty of Lyons, the consequence was that De Pouilli immediately became the inmate of a dungeon, there to wait until the moment had arrived when the revenge of N—— could consign him to the guillotine. On the occasion of her first visit to her husband in prison she had been summoned to attend the wretch who was the source of all her misery in an apartment, the window of which looked out upon the guillotine, where three unfortunate individuals were about to be executed, and addressing her, he said, without any introduction—

"There, feast your eyes upon the scene before you, and consider that ere three days pass, the axe, which you see now about to fall on those miscreants, will sever the beautiful neck of your adored."

"Unable to endure the sight, for at the moment he finished, the axe fell upon one of the unfortunate wretches," related Mad. De Pouilli, "I sank to the ground, and on my recovery found him watching over me with a look of anxious tenderness—with my faculties returned my sense of De Pouilli's situation, and I eagerly seized on this moment to endeavour to procure his liberty. As his wife did I sue for him, but in vain—in vain I conjured by every motion calculated to move the breast of man with compassion—all in vain! At last I touched upon the love he so often had professed for me, and named this as an opportunity to prove his sincerity.—Hitherto he had gazed upon me with a vividness of countenance, but like oil thrown on fire it revived the slumbering flame of hatred which I had hoped to have subdued."

"Can you," said he, "remind me of those moments, and use them as arguments in his favour! Do you suppose that my memory only retains the recollection of my former love, and not the means by which my happiness was blasted?—Can I forget that I had a rival—that that rival was the high-born, haughty and favoured de Pouilli, and that he now lies in prison waiting only my command to die? No, no; do not deceive yourself, but hear the only terms on which he lives. The time is arrived when priestcraft and all its rules are set at naught—freedom for heart and hand is amongst the blessings of the age. Consent to be mine—discard him from your love—and he is free!"

"He uttered this last sentence in a slow impressive manner, that I might fully understand his meaning; and when he had concluded, I still continued to gaze upon him, as if bereft of my senses. Whether he thought favourably of my silence, I know not, but relaxing the severity of his countenance, he approached me, and inquired whether I was prepared to purchase my husband's life on such terms. The inquiry aroused me from the state of torpor into which his declaration had thrown me,—every nerve seemed strung anew,—my voice was changed from that of supplication to that of desperation, as I bitterly reviled him, and rushed from the room, leaving him motionless with surprise."—As she finished her relation, she burst into tears, unable any longer to control her feelings, and wringing her hands implored the intercessions of heaven in behalf of her husband.

A few mornings after, her husband informed her that N—— had directed him to prepare for his execution on the following day. With this terrible information she returned to us, and the scene which took place was truly heart rending; she tore her hair—beat her breast—called herself her husband's destroyer—and vented curses on the beauty which had murdered him;—lastly, throwing herself on her knees before my sister, she implored her to save her husband's life. I never shall forget the astonishment with which I gazed on my sister, as she said calmly—

"I cannot save his life—it is for you to accomplish that." "I!" she cried wistfully, "Oh! if I knew how;—tell me—what can I do to save him?"

"Return to N——," replied she collectedly, 'and say you consent to his proposal!"

We were positively aghast, and before a word could be said, she continued—"If you will be guided by me, you shall suffer no dishonour. Go to N——, I repeat—say that when your husband has his passport in his hands, and you see him, from his windows if he pleases, parting from death and danger you will resign yourself into his hands!—trust to me for the rest, and now begone." Such an influence had Maria over her weaker friend, that without another word to any one, she departed. Half an hour had passed ere she returned; pale and ghastly she entered the apartment, and sought, by a flood of tears, to ease her over-burdened heart.

The morning came, and after a long interview with my sister, during which I was not present, she departed with a kind of cheerfulness, that raised suspicions in my mind of her sanity. I watched her from the window which overlooked the prison, until she entered the gate, and when it closed upon her, I thought it would be for ever!

Three months after we were the inhabitants of another soil, refugees from our country, sharing the same roof with those whose sufferings had endeared them to us,—these were M. and Madame de Pouilli,—the story of their escape is short.

On the morning of her departure to the prison, after her interview with my sister, who gave her advice as to the only course left her, she visited the monster N——, who was highly pleased at her unexpected compliance, and every thing was done as she dictated. Night saw her husband with his passport, in a post carriage on the road to England, and in a few hours his wife joined him—he having, by a preconcerted understanding waited for her on the road.

The next morning spread the news of N——, having been found stabbed in his apartment by some unknown hand; my sister's advice—secret advice—was no longer a mystery!

Interpretation of Motives.—There is no word or action but may be taken with two hands: either with the right hand of charitable construction, or the sinister interpretation of malice, and suspicion: and all things do succeed as they are taken. To construe an evil action well is but a pleasing and profitable deceit to myself; but to misconstrue a good thing is a treble wrong, to myself, the action and the author.—Bishop Hall.

SIGNS OF PROSPERITY.

[From the Chinese.]

Where spades grow bright, and idle swords grow dull;
Where jails are empty, and where barns are full;
Where church paths are with frequent feet outworn,
Law court-yards weedy, silent and forlorn:
Where doctors foot it, and where farmers ride;
Where age abounds, and youth is multiplied;
Where these signs are, they clearly indicate
A happy people, and well governed state.

MY TWO AUNTS.

Philosophers tells us that we know nothing but from its opposite; then I certainly knew my two aunts very perfectly, for greater opposites were never made since the formation of light and darkness; but they were both good creatures,—so are light and darkness good things in their place. My two aunts, however, were not so appropriately to be compared to light and darkness as to crumb and crust—the crumb and crust of a new loaf; the crumb of which is marvellously soft, the crust of which is exceeding crisp, dry, and snappish. The one was my father's sister, the other was my mother's; and very curiously it happened that they were both named Bridget. To distinguish between them, we young folks used to call the quiet and easy one Aunt Bridget, and the bustling, worying one Aunt Fidget. You never in the whole course of your life saw such a quiet, easy, comfortable creature as Aunt Bridget; she was not immensely large, but prodigiously fat. Her weight did not exceed twenty stone, or two-and-twenty at the utmost; hot weather made some little difference: but she might be called prodigiously fat, because she was all fat: I don't think there was an ounce of lean in her whole composition. She was so imperturbably good-natured, that I really do not believe that she ever was in a passion in the whole course of her life. I have no doubt that she had her troubles; we all have troubles more or less, but Aunt Bridget did not like to trouble herself to complain. The greatest trouble that she endured was the alteration of day and 'night; it was a trouble for her to go up stairs to bed, and it was a trouble to her to come down stairs to breakfast; but, when she was once in bed, she could sleep ten hours without dreaming, and when she was once up and seated in her comfortable arm-chair, by the fire-side, with her knitting apparatus in order, and a nice, fat, flat, comfortable quarto volume on a small table at her side, the leaves of which volume she could turn over with her knitting needle, she was happy for the day; the 'grief of getting up was forgotten, and the trouble of going to bed was not anticipated. Knowing her aversion to moving, I was once saucy enough to recommend her to make two days into one, that she might not have the trouble of going up and down stairs so often. Any body but Aunt Bridget would have boxed my ears for my impertinence, and would in so doing, have served me rightly; but she, good creature, took it all in good part, and said, "Yes, my dear, it would save trouble, but I am afraid it would not be good for my health I should not have exercise enough." Aunt Bridget loved quiet, and she lived in the quietest place in the world. There is not a spot in the deserts of Arabia, or in the Frozen Ocean, to be for a moment compared for quietness with Hans Place—

"The very houses seem asleep;"

and when the bawlers of milk, mackerel, dabs, and flounders enter the placid precincts of that place, they scream with a subdued violence, like the hautboy played with a piece of cotton in the bell. You might almost fancy the oval building to be some mysterious egg on which the genius of silence had sat brooding ever since the creation of the world, or even Chaos had combed its head and washed its face. There is in that place a silence that may be heard, a delicious stillness which the ear drinks in as greedily as the late Mr. Dando used to gulp oysters. It is said that when the inhabitants are all asleep, they can hear one another snore. Here dwelt my Aunt Bridget,—kindest of she kind, and quietest of the quiet. But good nature is terribly imposed upon in this wicked world of ours; and so it was with Aunt Bridget. Her poulterer, I am sure, used to charge her ten per cent. more than any of the rest of his customers, because she never found fault. She was particularly fond of ducks,—very likely from a sympathy with their quiet style of locomotion: but she disliked haggling about the price, and she abhorred the trouble of choosing them, so she left it to the man's conscience to send what he pleased, and to charge what he pleased. I declare that I have seen upon her table, such withered, wizened, toad-like villians of half-starved ducks, that they looked as if they had died of the hooping cough. And if I ever happened to say any thing approaching to reproach of the poulterer, Aunt would always make the same reply—"I dont like to be always finding fault." It was the same with her wine as it was with her poultry; she used to fancy that she had port and sherry, but she never had any thing better than Pontac and Cape Madeira. There was one luxury of female life, which my Aunt never enjoyed—she never had the pleasure of scolding the maids. She once made the attempt, but it did not succeed. She had a splendid set of Sunday crockery, done in blue and gold, and by the carelessness of one of her maids the whole service was smashed at one fell swoop. "Now that is too bad," said my aunt; "I really will tell her of it." So I was in hopes of seeing Aunt Bridget in a passion, which would have been as rare a sight as an American aloe in blossom. She rang the bell with heroic vigor, and with an expression of almost a determination to say something very severe to Betty, when she should make her appearance. Indeed if the bell pull had been Betty, she might have heard half the first sentence of a terrible scolding; but before Betty could answer the summons of the bell, my aunt was as cool as a turbot at a tavern dinner. "Betty," said she, "are they all broke?"—"Yes, ma'am," said Betty.—"How came you to brake them?" said my aunt.—"They slipped off the tray, ma'am," replied Betty.—"Well then be more careful another time," said my aunt.—"Yes, ma'am," said Betty. Next morning another set was ordered. This was not the first, second, or third time that my aunt's crockery had come to an untimely end. My aunt's maids had a rare place in her service. They had high life below stairs in perfection; people used to wonder that she did not see how she was imposed upon; bless her old heart! she never liked to see what she did not like to see, and so long as she could be quiet she was happy. She was a living emblem of the Pacific Ocean.

But my aunt Fidget was quite another thing. She only resembled my Aunt Bridget in one particular, that is, she had not an ounce of lean about her, but then she had no fat neither—she was all skin and bone; I cannot say for a certainty, but I really believe that she had no marrow in her bones; she was as light as a feather, as dry as a stick, and, had it not been for her pattens, she must have been blown away in windy weather. As for quiet, she knew not the meaning of the word; she was flying about from morning to night, like a faggot in fits, and finding fault with everybody and everything. Her tongue and her toes had no sinecures. Had she weighed as many pounds as my Aunt Bridget weighed stones, she would have worn out half-a-dozen pair of shoes in a week. I don't believe that Aunt Bridget ever saw the inside of her kitchen, or that she knew exactly where it was; but Aunt Fidget was in all parts of the house at once—she saw every thing, heard every thing, remembered everything, and scolded every thing. She was not to be imposed upon, either by servants or tradespeople. She kept a sharp look-out upon them all—she knew when and where to go to market. Keen was her eye for the turn of the scale, and she took pretty good care that the butcher should not dab his mutton-chops too hastily in the scale making momentum tell for weight. I cannot think what she wanted with meat, for she looked as if she ate nothing but raspings, and drank nothing but vinegar. Her love of justice in the matter of purchasing was so great, that when her fishmonger sent her home a pennyworth of sprats, she sent one back to be changed because it had but one eye. She had such a strict inventory of all her goods and chattels, that if any one plundered her of a pin, she was sure to find it out. She would miss a pin out of a peck, and she once kept her establishment up half the night to hunt for a bit of cheese that was missing. It was at last found in the mouse-trap. "You extravagant minx," said she to the maid, "here is cheese enough to bait three mouse-traps;" and she nearly had her fingers snapt off in her haste to rescue the cheese from its prison. I used not to dine with my Aunt Fidget so often as with Aunt Bridget, for my Aunt Fidget worried my very life out with the history of every article that was brought to table. She made me undergo a narration of all that she had said, and all that the butcher or the poulterer had said concerning the purchase of the provision; and she used always to tell me what was the price of mutton when her mother was a girl—twopence a pound for the common pieces, and twopence halfpenny for the prime pieces. Moreover, she always entertained me with an account of all her troubles, and with the sins and iniquities of her abominable servants, whom she generally changed once a month. Indeed, had I been inclined to indulge her with more of my company, I could not always manage to find her residence, for she was moving about from place to place, so that it was like playing a game at hunt-the-slipper to endeavor to find her. She once actually threatened to leave London altogether if she could not find some more agreeable residence than hitherto it had been her lot to meet with. But there was one evil in my Aunt Fidget's behaviour which disturbed me more than any thing else; she was always expecting that I should join her in abusing my placid Aunt Bridget. Aunt Bridget's style of housekeeping was not, perhaps, quite the pink of perfection, but was it not for me to find fault with it; and if she did sit still all day, she never found fault with those who did not; she never said any thing evil of any of her neighbors. Aunt Fidget might be flying about all day like a witch upon a broomstick; but Aunt Bridget made no remarks on it; she let her fly. The very sight of Aunt Fidget was enough to put one out of breath—she whisked about from place to place at such a rapid rate, always talking at the rate of nineteen to the dozen. We boys used to say of her that she never sat long enough in a chair to warm the cover. But she is gone—requiescat in pace: and that is more than ever she did in her life time.

SINGULAR PROVIDENTIAL ESCAPE.

The journal of Mr. Kay, one of the Wesleyan Missionaries in South Africa, contains the following remarkable account of the deliverance of a poor sick Hottentot, from the jaws of a lion.

"About three weeks or a month ago, he (the Hottentot in question) went out on a hunting excursion, accompanied by several other natives. Arriving on and extensive plain, where there was an abundance of game, they discovered a number of lions also, which appeared to be disturbed by their approach. A prodigiously large male immediately separated himself from the troop, and began slowly to advance towards the party, the majority of whom were young, and altogether unaccustomed to rencounters of so formidable a nature. When droves of timid antelopes, or springbocks only, came in their way, they made a great boast of their courage, but the very appearance of the forest's king made them tremble. While the animal was yet at a distance, they all dismounted to prepare for firing, and, according to the custom on such occasions, began tying their horses together, by means of the bridles, with the view of keeping the latter between them and the lion, as an object to attract his attention, until they were enabled to take deliberate aim. His movements, however, were at length too swift for them. Before the horses were properly fastened to each other, the monster made a tremendous bound or two, and suddenly pounced upon the hind parts of one of them, which, in its fright, plunged forward, and knocked down the poor man in question, who was holding the reins in his hand. His comrades instantly took to flight, and ran off with all speed; and he, of course, rose as quickly as possible, in order to follow them. But, no sooner had he regained his feet, then the majestic beast, with a seeming consciousness of his superior might, stretched forth his paw, and striking him just behind the neck, immediately brought him to the ground again. He then rolled on his back when the lion set his foot upon his breast, and laid down upon him. The poor man now became almost breathless, partly from fear, but principally from the intolerable pressure of his terrific load. He endeavored to move a little to one side, in order, to breathe; but, feeling this, the creature seized his arm, close to the elbow; and, after once laying hold with his teeth, he continued to amuse himself with the limb for some time, biting it in sundry different places down to the hand, the thick part of which seemed to have been pierced entirely through. All this time the lion did not appear to be angry, but he merely caught at his prey, like a cat sporting with a mouse that is not quite dead; so that there was not a single bone fractured, as would, in all probability, have been the case had the creature been hungry or irritated. Whilst writhing in agony, gasping for breath, and expecting every moment to be torn limb from limb, the sufferer cried to his companions for assistance, but cried in vain. On raising his head a little, the beast opened his dreadful jaws to receive it, but providentially the hat, which I saw in its rent estate, slipped off, so that the points of the teeth only just grazed the surface of the skull. The lion now set his foot upon the arm from which the blood was freely flowing; his fearful paw was soon covered therewith, and he again and again licked it clean! The idea verily makes me shudder while I write. But this was not the worst; for the animal then steadily fixed his flaming eyes upon those of the man, smelt on one side, and then on the other of his face, and having tasted the blood, he appeared half inclined to devour his helpless victim. 'At this critical moment,' said the poor man, 'I recollected having heard that there is a God in the heavens, who is able to deliver at the very last extremity; and I began to pray that he would save me, and not allow the lion to eat my flesh, and drink my blood.' While thus engaged in calling upon God, the beast turned himself completely round. On perceiving this, the Hottentot made an effort to get from under him; but no sooner did the creature observe his movement, than he laid terrible hold of his right thigh. This wound was dreadfully deep, and evidently occasioned the sufferer most excruciating pain. He again sent up his cry to God for help; nor were his prayers in vain. The huge animal soon afterwards quietly relinquished his prey, though he had not been in the least interrupted. Having deliberately risen from his seat, he walked majestically off, to the distance of thirty or forty paces, and then laid down in the grass, as if for the purpose of watching the man. The latter, being happily relieved of his load, ventured to sit up, which circumstance immediately attracted his attention; nevertheless, it did not induce another attack, as the poor fellow naturally expected; but, as if bereft of power, and unable to do any thing more, he again rose, took his departure and was seen no more. The man seeing this, took up his gun, and hasted away to his terrified companions, who had given him up for dead. Being in a state of extreme exhaustion, from the loss of blood, he was immediately set upon his horse, and brought, as soon as was practicable, to the place where I found him. Dr. Gaulter, who on hearing of the case, hastened to his relief, and has very humanely rendered him all necessary attention ever since, informs me that, on his arrival, the appearance of the wounds was truly alarming, and amputation of the arm seemed absolutely necessary. To this, however, the patient was not willing to consent, having a number of young children whose subsistence depends upon his labor. 'As the Almighty had delivered me,' said he, 'from that horrid death, I thought surely he is able to save my arm also.' And, astonishing to relate, several of his wounds are already healed, and there is now hope of his complete recovery."

TURKISH INCREDULITY.—A late traveller in the East, endeavouring to display the wonders of British machinery, mentioned, among other examples, that of the Manchester and Liverpool Rail-road, illustrating its speed by reference to corresponding distances in Egypt; to which the Turk to whom it was addressed simply replied by saying, "That's a lie." "But," replied the narrator, "these gentlemen have seen it." "I do not," rejoined the Turk, "believe it any the more for that."

SCRIPTURE ANTHOLOGY.

BY N. C. BROOKS, A. M.

No. 1.

Abraham and Isaac. Genesis xxii.

Night trembled on her throne, and furling up
Her starry banner, to the conquering sun,
Whose car of flame rolled up the Eastern hills,
Resigned the silver sceptre of her reign.
Leaving his couch, while yet in foldings hung,
The vale of darkness on the face of earth,
The patriarch arose, and poured his soul
In fervent aspiration to his God—
And prayed for grace to stay his fainting heart
In its deep trial.
Strengthened and composed,
With holy resignation on his brow,
He left his tent and saddling up his beast,
Clave, in obedience to the word of God,
Wood for a holocaust, wherein his son
Should to the Lord an offering be made—
And taking servants and the fated youth,
Sped on his journey to the distant hills
Of Mount Moriah.
Thrice the golden sun
Had from the glowing theatre of earth
Rolled up the curtain, bringing on the day—
And now the patriarch beheld far off
The place appointed—the then electric flash
Of anguish ran like lightning down the wires
Of strong paternal feeling, and his hand
Palsied with age and grief smote on his breast
In nature's sorrow; yet the gath'ring shades
That clouded o'er his venerable brow,
Like shadows chased by sunbeams, fled away,
And left it cloudless, tranquil, and serene.
Now toiling up the rugged mount's ascent,
Oft resting on his staff his hoary head,
Ascended Abraham, bearing in his hand
The knife and sacred fire for sacrifice—
And by his side, groaning beneath the wood
Pressed on his victim, steadying, with his hand,
The tottering footsteps of his feebler sire.
Led on to slaughter as the unconscious lamb,
Upon his father's face he turned his eye
Of dovelike innocence, and mildly said,
"Behold the wood, and fire, my father! Where,
Is the burnt offering for the Lord our God?"
The look of tender conficence, the voice,
Soft as the echoes of an angel's hymn,
Wakened in sorrow's tone the sleeping chords
Of yearning nature; and the gathering tear
Moistened his eyelids, as the patriarch gazed
On his devoted son; yet grace from Heaven,
Like oil upon the troubled Ocean's waves,
Restrained the swelling torrents of his breast,
And calmly he returned "God will provide
A victim for an offering, my son."

Now on the appointed mount the altar stood
Waiting its victim. Abraham had prayed
Until within his bosom every thought
And feeling upward rose from earth to Heaven,
Like sublimated incense; and the glow
Of heavenly composure o'er his face
Threw the calm glories of the midday sun,
As in obedience to Jehovah's word
He bound with thongs his son for sacrifice.

There is amid the majesty of mounts,
Whose towering summits seem to pillar Heaven,
A sense of solitude—a loneliness,
Chill and oppressive to the awe struck soul—
And deeply Abraham felt it as he stood
Upon Moriah's heights, and saw around
A thousand hills rearing their azure fronts
Above the clouds, flinging back on the plain
The lengthened shadows of their giant forms.
How awful and how still was all around,
Hushed was the lip of every echo—voice
Was not on all the air: No rustling leaf
Trembled upon its stem; amid the boughs,
Tongue, pennon, plume was still; the very clouds
Poised their bright purple wings and hovered o'er.
The painful breathings of the youth, alone
Stole on his ear; and, as around he gazed,
No eye was on him, save the eternal eye,
And the broad gleam of the meridian sun;
As on the mountain altar of the Lord,
Curtained with clouds he stood to pour the blood
Of innocence—his son's, his only son's,
In a libation to the most high God.

The victim pressed the wood. The waxen neck
And ivory wrists were dented with the chords,
Until the purple blood seemed bursting through
The tissue of the pure, transparent skin.
Glowing in youthful, like a rose,
Meek as an uncomplaining lamb he lay—
Yet as he turned his silent eye to Heaven
Upon the beauteous sky and golden sun,
Glories that now would meet his gaze no more,
His snowy bosom swelled with stifled sighs;
And from his eyelid's silken fringe, the tears
Rolled down his damask cheek, like melted pearls.
Raising the fatal knife, the patriarch stood
With eye upturned to God, and throwing back
The golden curls that bathed his victim's neck,
Aimed the dread blow, when on his startled ear
A voice thrilled loudly "Abraham! forbear!
Nor stretch thy hand against thy boy to harm."
The knife, unconscious, from his palsied grasp
Fell suddenly; and from his aged eyes
Gushed the warm tear of overpowering joy,
As bending o'er his child, he loosed his bands
And pressed his beating bosom to his own,
In fervency of gratitude and love.
Now on the altar of the Lord, a lamb,
A substituted victim, blazed on high,
A holocaust in ruddy spires of flame;
While, on the incense wings of sacrifice
Wafted, arose the prayer of sire and son,
A goodly savour to the Lord, their God.

At the battle of Waterloo, the 2d battalion of the 3d Foot Guards gallantly repulsed the attacks of the enemy on the Chateau Hougoumont, which they garrisoned. The shades of night terminated a conflict which had, throughout the whole day, with little interruption, been vigorously carried on. Utterly exhausted by fasting and fatigue, the remnant of the brave garrison endeavoured to provide some refreshment ere they sought repose; and some of the officers kindling a fire, plucked a fowl or two, which dismembering with their fingers, they broiled or toasted in small separate portions over the embers, on the points of their swords, &c. One of the party, now a beneficial clergyman retains rather a ludicrous recollection of the part he played on this occasion. Overcome with weariness, he dropped into a sound sleep while gnawing the leg of a chicken; and when he woke next morning, found it still between his teeth, but protruding from his mouth by the drumstick!

REVENGE.—There are but three ways for a man to revenge himself of the censure of the world;—to despise it—to return the like—or to endeavour to live so as to avoid it. The first of these is usually pretended—the last is almost impossible. The universal practice is for the second.

YORK MINSTER.

Nothing perhaps can exceed the grandeur of York Minster, as a specimen of ancient English architecture. It is justly esteemed the glory of the city in which it stands; and it has become more interesting, from the changes and injuries, which it has from time to time undergone. To enter minutely into the particulars relating to its history and architecture, is, with our limited space, impossible: but we can furnish a general account of the cathedral, and certain dates of the different portions of the building as they at present exist. These, we trust, will prove acceptable to our readers.

The first church dedicated to St. Peter, in the city of York, is supposed to have owed its origin to Edwin, King of the Northumbrians, who was converted to Christianity, A. D. 627; but it was scarcely finished when that prince fell in battle. His head is said to have been interred in this cathedral, and his body in the monastery of Whitby.

The church built by Edwin, was burnt down in 741, and being afterwards rebuilt, had the same fate in 1069. Thomas, a canon, of Bayeux, and the first Norman archbishop, in addition to appointing the several dignities in the cathedral, repaired the fabric, which was again destroyed by a fire that accidentally occurred in 1137, reducing to ruins the greater part of the city. In 1171, Archbishop Roger began to rebuild the choir, in which the Norman style prevailed; circular arches, single and massive pillars with plain capitals, and an entire freedom from all the aid of ornament," were here conspicuous.

York Minster was, however, afterwards entirely renewed; and by the care and munificence of some succeeding archbishops and other benefactors, the stately fabric now standing was erected.

Of the present building, the south part of the cross-aisle or transept is of as ancient a date as 1227, and is supposed to be the oldest portion of the Minster: at that time, in the reign of Henry the Third, the large heavy pillar had given place to a cluster of slender and elegant columns; a quantity of rich foliage adorned the capitals; the windows were made high, narrow, and pointed; and the light tracery ran round the vaultings of the roof. The north transept was built in the same character in 1260. The first stone of the nave was laid with great state in 1291, and it was finished with the two western towers about the year 1330. The materials for building the nave were supplied by Robert de Wansour and Robert de Boulton, earl of Boulton, the former of whom gave the stone, the latter the timber. The memory of these noble benefactors is preserved by statues at the east and west ends of the cathedral.

The choir just alluded to, as built by Archbishop Roger, not corresponding with the rest, was taken down, and a new one begun in 1365, and the great central tower in 1370. The eastern window, which forms the grand termination of the choir, was put up in the reign of Henry the Fourth. The glazing of this magnificent window, was done at the expence of the dean and chapter, by John Thornton, of Coventry, who, by the contract then made, was to receive four shillings per week for his work, and to finish it within the space of three years. He was, also, to have one hundred shillings per annum besides, and ten pounds more at the conclusion, if he continued and finished his work to the satisfaction of his employers. The sum may at first appear small, particularly when the extreme beauty of the colouring, and the manner of execution in this window is considered; but it is no longer surprising, when the difference in the value of money is taken into account.

The nobility and gentry of the north of England, were at all times great contributors to this magnificent structure; and the experience of our own times, is sufficient to prove that, when such assistance is actually required, is not denied in these days.

The following are the dimensions of York Minster.

Whole length from east to west, -	524½ feet.
Breadth of the east end, - - -	105
Breadth of the west end, - - -	109
Length of transept from north to south,	222

Height of the nave, - - - -	99
Height of the east window, - - -	75
Breadth, - - - - - - -	38

The interior of the Minster, is in every respect answerable to the grandeur of its exterior, and exhibits a striking specimen of the progressive styles of architecture which marked the reigns of the English monarchs, from Henry the Third, to Henry the Sixth or Seventh inclusive, with the last of whom Gothic architecture may be said to have ceased.

The newest portion of the building, but not the least beautiful, is the organ-screen, at the entrance of the choir. It is of a florid kind, ornamented with fifteen statues of the kings of England, and is probably of the time of Henry the Seventh. When the great repairs were recently made in the Minster, to which we shall more particularly allude, it was at one time contemplated to remove this screen eastward, in consequence of its concealing the bases of two great pillars, which help to support the lantern tower; but the plan was afterwards abandoned, as likely to injure the proportions of the choir, besides that it would have sacrificed some of the statues on the screen. It would be difficult indeed to imagine a view more calculated to fill the mind with awe and delight, than that which is presented on entering the west end of the Minster. The columns, the arches, "the long drawn aisle," the screen, not intercepting the noble eastern window, which sheds its rich and varied light through the forms of kings and prelates, giving that air of mingled gravity and beauty so appropriate to the sacred place, and assisting to lift the soul to him who made us, whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, and yet who dwells in the hearts of those who worship him in spirit and in truth.

This spacious building is well-adapted for music, and considering its size, favourable to the conveyance of sound; a point to which great attention seems to have been paid in the construction of our Cathedrals. Its importance in all churches, for the general purpose of hearing properly, and for the due effect of psalmody, scarcely requires to be pointed out. But the advantages possessed by York Minster, in this respect, were never so fully displayed, as at the Musical Festivals which have been held there.

The first of these took place in September, 1823, when the number present on one of the days was, 4860, and of vocal and instrumental performers, 459.

This performance of sacred music, which was chiefly from the works of Haydn and Handel, is said to have been most grand and striking, surpassed by nothing of the kind except the commemoration of Handel in West Minster Abbey, in 1784.

The benevolent object in view was the benefit of the York County Hospital, and of the General Infirmaries of Leeds, Sheffield, and Hull, to which between seven and eight thousand pounds were divided, as the balance of the receipts. Two similar festivals, for the same purpose, were subsequently held in the Minster, in 1825 and 1828.

In recording in our pages, a short sketch of this splendid cathedral, we now come to a memorable event in its history which, excited most painful emotions at the time of its occurrence, and must be yet fresh in the recollection of many of our readers. Early in the morning of the 9d of February, 1829, York Minster was discovered to be in flames. A boy, one of the choristers, happened to be passing through the Minster-yard, and accidentally stepping upon a piece of ice was thrown on his back. Before he could rise, he saw a quantity of smoke issuing from several parts of the roof. As soon as the doors were opened, the beautiful wood-work of the choir was found to be extensively on fire. It soon spread to the roof, which shortly after fell in. The pews on each side of the choir were completely demolished; the organ (a modern and excellent one) was consumed; the screen, however, upon which it rested, sustained very little injury. The great eastern window, which is styled the "glory of the cathedral," and for the fate of which intense anxiety was felt by many during the conflagration, remained almost entire. The fire was not accidental. It was traced to be the work of a deranged fanatic, who was afterwards tried for the crime at York, found to be insane, and sentenced to imprisonment for life, in New Bethlehem Hospital, London.

A very becoming and generous spirit soon manifested itself in the nobility and gentry of the county, and of other places, for the restoration of the Minster. A meeting was held in the following month, at which Mr. Smirke, the architect, furnished a statement of the mischief occasioned, and an estimate of the probable cost for a thorough repair, to be performed after the original designs. The dean and chapter concurred in his recommendation, and on a liberal and public subscription being entered upon for the purpose, pledged themselves to the restoration of the Minster, to its former strength and beauty. This has been amply fulfilled. Mr. Smirke's first object was to give security to the fabric, and to repair substantially the walls, and the shafts of the pillars which had suffered from the fire. Masons were employed to prepare a new alter-screen, the ornamented capitals of the clustered pillars, new mouldings and cornices, all according to the original models, fragments of which still existed. The roof of the choir was constructed of teak, a wood which has been known to last firm, in situations where even oak has failed. The elaborate stalls and seats, with the tabernacle-work over them, were formed with the assistance of parts remaining among the ruins, and of drawings formerly made. These found employment for a considerable number of carvers and other workmen in London. It may be remarked, that in the progress of these works, some instances of former, but partial imperfect, repairs were found, and of course, supplied by such as were of more solid execution.

The discoveries under the floor of the choir, were very interesting, consisting of a series of Norman pillars, the remains of the crypt of a church more ancient than any other part of the present building. These pillars stand within the space of those of the choir, and are ornamented in spiral lines: they were found by the workmen, while employed in clearing away the rubbish from the interior of the organ-screen. It may be fairly conjectured, that this was the lower portion of the church built by Thomas, the Norman archbishop before mentioned, or perhaps of that of Archbishop Roger, whose choir was removed for a more modern one.

It is not perhaps generally known, that the archbishops of York, had anciently the privilege of a mint. There are coins still extant, one as early as the eighth century, struck by archbishops in this right. The last archbishop who struck money in this mint, was Dr. Edward Lee, the successor of Wolsey. He died in 1544.

Among the curiosities preserved in the treasury of York Minster, two articles deserve particular attention. One is a very ancient ivory horn, granted in the Saxon times, with certain lands, by Ulphus, a Prince of Deira. It was lost at the period of the reformation, but was restored to the dean and chapter by Henry Lord Fairfax, (into whose father's hands it had accidentally fallen) in 1675. The other is a mazer-bowl or maple-bowl, edged round with silver, gilt, and with silver feet, anciently given by Archbishop Scroop, to the coordwainers company of the city.

THE ROCK OF GIBRALTAR.

The rock of Gibraltar is, as its name imports, an immense mountain of stone, rising abruptly from the sea, at the southern extremity of Spain, and of the European continent. It is separated into two distinct parts, by a lofty ridge, which beginning abruptly at the northern extremity, rises still higher, until it has reached an elevation of 1400 feet, thence declining gradually, and terminating in Europa point, the southern extremity of Europe. The eastern section, which looks upon the Mediterranean, is either perfectly perpendicular, or else so steep and craggy, as to be altogether inaccessible. The western front, though interspersed with dangerous precipices, offers some gradual slopes, which have furnished sites to the town. On this side are the only landing places.

This spot of ground, which has been the cause of so much bloodshed and contention, is yet only three miles long, and but seven in circumference. It is not quite insulated, being connected with the Andalusian coast, by a narrow sandy neck of land, which rises but a few feet above the level of the sea. To the west there is a deep bay, which forms the harbour of Gibraltar, an unsafe roadstead: the eastern coast is utterly inaccessible. This place, until the invasion of the Saracens, was known by the name of Calpe. Its position in front of the opposite African mountain of Abyla, and at the opening of that vast sea, of unknown waters, which none ever penetrated, or penetrated to return, awakened at an early period, the attention of the ancients, who invented a fable, which has connected its origin with the achievements of a deified hero of Antiquity. As the story goes, Hercules, in honour of a victory he had obtained over the Girons, caused immense stones to be thrown into the mouth of the Strait, until a great mountain arose on either side; and these were the famous "Pillars of Hercules."

Gibraltar was for a long time a strong hold of the Moors: but subsequently returning into the possession of its proper owners, it continued for many centuries to form an appendage of the Spanish crown, and its fortifications were enlarged and strengthened by Charles the Fifth, until it was esteemed impregnable. While the Austrian and Bourbon competitors were struggling, in 1704, for the Spanish crown, the weakened garrison having only 150 men, to work 100 guns, became the prey of a third party. Admiral Rooke, having been sent to Barcelona with troops, had failed to effect the object. Dreading the reflections of a disappointed public at home, he called together a council, in which it was determined to attack Gibraltar. On the 21st of July, the fleet arrived in the bay, and 1800 English and Dutch was landed on the beach. The fortress was summoned to surrender, and, on receiving a refusal, the batteries were opened, and the Spaniards were eventually driven from their guns, and forced to submit. The possession of this fortress, to recover which Spain has sacrificed tens of thousands of men, and millions of money, was purchased by the British, with the trifling loss of sixty killed, and two hundred and twenty wounded. Several unsuccessful attempts were made from time to time, especially in 1726, and 1760, on the part of the Spaniards, to recover their lost possession: but all the efforts made to regain this important fortress, become insignificant, when compared to the siege it sustained during the great war, set in motion by the struggle for American Independence.

This famous siege, lasted nearly four years. The Duke de Crillon commanded the Spaniards and their allies. The defence was conducted by the brave General Elliott, with equal courage and good conduct. The number of rounds of artillery from the allied batteries, was sometimes a thousand a day. The total on both sides, amounted to half a million. The loss of life was of course proportionate. All the known arts of taking towns, were exhausted, and new inventions in the hateful art of destruction, date from the siege of Gibraltar. Among the number were ten floating towers of the Allies, which mounted 200 guns, and where so contrived as to be both ball and bomb proof, and had consequently nothing to fear from any known art of annoyance. But they were not provided against possible inventions. In this emergency, the expedient was tried by the British, of heating shot in furnaces, and discharging them red hot at these moving fortresses, which were able to approach the walls, and place themselves in the most assailable positions. The expedient succeeded; the shot penetrated and fired the wood, and at midnight, those floating castles, which, in the morning, had been the terror of the besieged, furnished huge funeral piles for the destruction of the besiegers. The situation of the brave, but unfortunate Spaniards, shut up in these sea-girt towers, is enough to make the heart bleed. Assailed by balls of fire from the fortress, by flames from within, surrounded by an adverse element, and their escape cut off by the British Flotilla, all that remained to them in their extremity, was a choice of deaths. From that period, to the present, Gibraltar has continued in the possession of the English.

The rock of Gibraltar would be considered a very singular production of nature, if it had not St. Michael's Cave: and if it possessed no other claim to attention, this alone would render it remarkable. This cave, like other similar ones to be seen at the rock, is supposed to be produced by the undermining, and falling away of the loose earth and stones below. In process of time, the dripping of the moisture and its petrifaction cover the vault with stalactities, some of which depend lower and lower, until they reach the corresponding mass of petrifaction (commonly called stalagmite,) which the dripping water has produced immediately below: these uniting, form a perfect column, while the space between two of them, assumes the figure of an arch. The entrance to St. Michael's Cave is very small, and, being overgrown with bushes and brambles, might easy escape the search of a stranger. On entering, however, it at once expands into a vast hall, from which passages branch out to other halls, deeper and deeper into the bowels of the earth. The floor, like the vault above; is very irregular, and the stalactites of the roof above, are much blackened by smoke from the torches of visiters. Upon penetrating a short distance, the cave assumes a beautiful and highly interesting appearance. The little light which streams in at the entrance, is yet sufficient to define with clearness, the outline of caverns, columns, and arches, which intervene: and so closely has nature seemed in this instance to have imitated art, that in earlier times, the whole might have passed for the work and residence of a fairy.

The extreme singularity of the place, has given rise to many superstitious stories, not only among the ancients, but also among the vulgar of our own day. As it has been penetrated by the hardy and enterprising, to a great distance, (on one occasion by an American, who descended by ropes to a depth of 500 feet,) a wild story is current, that the cave communicates, by a submarine passage, with Africa. The sailors who have visited the rock, and seen the monkeys, which are found in no other part of Europe, and are only seen here occasionally and at intervals, say that they pass at pleasure, by means of the cave, to their native land: the truth, however, seemed to be, that they usually live among the inaccessible precipices of the eastern side of the rock, where there is a scanty store of monkey-grass for their subsistance: but when an east wind sets in, it drives them from their caves and crannies, and they take refuge among the western rocks, where they may be seen from below, hopping from bust to bush, boxing each other's ears, and cutting the most extraordinary antics. If disturbed, they scamper off with great rapidity, the young ones jumping upon the backs, and putting their arms round the necks of the old. As they are very harmless, strict orders have been issued from the garrison, for their special protection.

While I was at the rock, two drunken soldiers, one day, undertook to violate these orders. The result was a most melancholy one. As they were rambling about the declivity, below the signal-tower, they happened to come upon the traces of a party of monkeys, and at once gave chase. The monkeys, cut off from their upward retreat, ran downwards; the soldiers followed, and the monkeys ran the faster. In this way they approached the perpendicular precipice which rises from the Alameda; one of the soldiers was able to check his course, and just saved himself; the formost and most impetuous, unable to stop himself, passed over the fearful steep, and fell a mangled and lifeless corpse upon the terrace below. The next morning, the slow and measured tread of many feet beneath my window, the mournful sound of the muffled drums, and the shrill and piercing plaint of the fife, told me that they were bearing the dead soldier to his tomb.

THE REWARD OF JUSTICE.

Quisera, king of Persia, was one of the most just and virtuous monarchs that ever governed a nation; and that over-ruling Providence, which constantly defends such characters from the arts and designs of their enemies, signally rewarded, on one occasion, the sacrifice of his own wishes to his high sense of personal injustice.

Quisera was desirous of erecting a magnificent palace in one of the most pleasant parts of his dominions; and as the spot which he had selected was occupied by a number of small cottages, he offered a considerable sum of money for permission to remove them. His proposals were gratefully accepted by all the inhabitants, except one old woman, who refused to listen to any conditions whatever. "This hut," said she, "was my cradle, and it shall be my tomb."—When the king was informed of her obstinacy, instead of giving way to passion, he very coolly said, "The cottage is certainly her's, and I cannot deprive her of it by force, without being guilty of injustice. However, I will build my palace, and her hut shall remain where it is." The architect represented to him that this mean dwelling would stand completely in the court-yard. "So much the better," replied Quisera, "the good woman will be in no want of light." His courtiers incessantly repeated, that his majesty was too considerate; that there was not any respect due to a foolish old peasant, who had the audacity to oppose her sovereign's will.—But he answered, that it was the duty of every sovereign to be just. "It may be said," observed he, "that this poor creature is foolish; but it shall never be said that Quisera was unjust.

The palace was finished in the first style of magnificence, and ornamented in such a costly manner that it was reckoned one of the wonders of the East. No traveller ever visited Persia without procuring a sight of it; no ambassador ever arrived from a foreign court, who was not struck with admiration at its amazing beauty. One of these, who was celebrated for his taste and judgment, could not refrain, one day, from addressing the king to the following purport: "Your palace, sire, certainly corresponds with the greatness and sublimity of your mind; but I am astonished to see that a mean hut should be suffered to stand in the midst of such unrivalled magnificence." The king then informed him of the reason of its remaining in that situation; but the ambassador replied, that the old woman not only deserved to lose her habitation, but her life, for daring to oppose her sovereign's pleasure. "Pardon me," said Quisera, "if I differ from you in opinion, and if I persist in thinking that, in the present instance, you have lost sight of that wisdom for which you are justly famed. This little cottage is, in my estimation, the most precious ornament of my palace, since it proves that I am just, though possessing absolute power; while on the contrary, the magnificence of this structure, and all its expensive decorations, are only the display of riches, which blind Fortune either gives or withdraws at her caprice. I remember that, when yet a child, as I was going one day to my sports, I saw a mischievous boy throw a stone at a dog, which was quietly lying asleep on the ground, and break his leg; then, as if delighted at the exploit he had achieved, he went away jumping with joy. It so happened, that, at the very instant, a gentleman on horseback passed by. The giddy youth, who was running along, came so near the horse's hoof, that he gave him a kick, which fractured his leg. The lad fell down crying most piteously. The traveller, instead of going to his assitance, pursued his way; but, immediately after, the horse, putting his foot into a deep hole, fell on his chest, and broke his knees; and the rider, who was thrown on the earth, dislocated his shoulder. This circumstance," added the king, "has been a lesson to me, by which I have endeavored to regulate my conduct through life; for, as it appears perfectly just that evil should befall those who intend evil to others, I carefully abstain from doing wrong. Besides, Nature has implanted this universal law in the human heart—'Do not unto others that which you would not have them to do unto you.'"

The ambassador, by his respectful silence, showed that his reason was convinced by the arguments of this truly just monarch; and, on returning to his master's court, he applauded his justice even more than his magnificence.

This rigid adherence to strict equity, however, though it insured the happiness of Quisera's subjects, and was the object of their respect and admiration, was considered in a very different light by his ministers. As it obliged them to give an exact account of all their proceedings, they regarded it as an intolerable oppression; and thought themselves much aggrieved, because they were denyed the privilege of promoting a relation, or protecting a rich man, who offered a large sum of money for their patronage.

It happened that Jeroluf, the prime minister's brother, having committed a capital crime, was imprisoned until the execution of his sentence. There remained not the smallest hope of his being pardoned; for the king insisted that the award pronounced by the laws should be irrevocable. The minister, who was much attached to his brother, went and threw himself at his sovereign's feet, to implore his mercy. But Quisera made him this reply: "I would readily pardon him, had I condemned him; but he is condemned by the laws, which were made for the public good. I am only their guardian, and it is my duty to see them executed." The minister used every argument he could devise to induce the king to grant his petition, but in vain: that just monarch was inflexible, and refused to listen to his prayer. He, therefore, quitted his sovereign's presence with his heart full of rancor, resolving to form a conspiracy, and assassinate his master. For some minutes, he walked to and fro, considering how he should be able to effect his dreadful purpose. At length, he recollected a man, whose name was Daramuc, who, from a low situation, had been raised by his means to a high military station, but who was still discontented, because he could not pursue his vicious inclinations with impunity. Towards this man he directed his thoughts, and determined to make him the instrument of his vengeance. He accordingly went to him, and engaged him to meet him privately, the same evening, in the palace court, behind the old woman's cot, where, he said, he wished to speak to him on an affair of the utmost importance.

The minister knew that his brother, at a time when he commanded the armies of Quisera's deceased father, had artfully lost a decisive battle, for which the enemy had rewarded him with a considerable sum; and that he, whom he intended to involve in the conspiracy, had assisted Jeroluf in betraying the king's army. Quisera, however; was entirely ignorant of this treachery; and all the heads of accusation against Jeroluf were of recent date. But the artful minister availed himself of his knowledge of the fact, to try whether Daramuc, in endeavoring to save his own life, might not also preserve his brother's.

In the evening, Daramuc did not fail to repair to the court of the palace, where the minister, thinking himself unheard by every human ear, spoke as follows: "My friend, our masters's rigorous justice is much too dangerous for ourselves and our friends. I only wish you to recall to mind the last war in which we were engaged."—"You then," said Daramuc, "obtained for me one of the first military posts under your brother, who was appointed commander of the whole force."—"I did not mention this," rejoined the minister, "to remind you of an obligation, but merely to bring forward a circumstance that will be no less fatal to you than to my imprisoned brother, unless we have the courage to avert the blow. Know, then, that Quisera has decreed your death, and that, to-morrow, you will be confined. The monarch against whom our late king took up arms, has sent my brother's letters to Quisera, by which the whole treason is exposed, and the names of all who were concerned with him: yours, of course, is among the number." Daramuc, who knew the account of this treachery to be true, exclaimed —"Well, then, I will plunge my dagger in his heart before he can pronounce my sentence.—He has long been hateful to me!" The minister, finding his design likely to be accomplished, replied—"I will be of your party; for I am determined to save Jeroluf, or perish in the attempt."

The old woman, who had overheard the whole conversation, now crept out very softly from her little hut, and, going up to the officers who guarded the royal apartment, demanded an audience, saying, she had discovered a conspiracy, and must speak to the king in person. When led into his presence, she thus addressed him: "Most great and just monarch! send your guards instantly to secure two villains, who are behind my cottage—lose no time—and whilst they are gone, I will relate all I have overheard." The guards were immediately dispatched; the king was informed of the whole conspiracy; and ten other conspirators were arrested, and separately examined by the judges, who sentenced them all to the ignominious death they so justly merited.

Quisera, seeing that to a single act of justice, which had been blamed by every one, he owed the preservation of his life, felt, with the greater force, the justice of the Almighty, and became the more confirmed in his resolution of being just himself.

THE BAG OF GOLD.

The following well-told story, by the poet Rogers, will be read with interest even by those who have seen it before. We should deem it susceptible of a fine effect from the stage.

"There lived, in the fourteenth century, near Bologna, a widow lady of the Lampertini family, called Madonna Lucrezia, who, in a revolution of the state, had known the bitterness of poverty, and had even begged her bread; kneeling day after day, like a statue, at the gate of the cathedral—her rosary in her left hand and her right held out for charity—her long black veil concealing a face that had once adorned a court, and had received the homage of as many sonnets as Petrarch has written on Laura.

"But fortune had at last relented; a legacy from a distant relation had come to her relief; and she was now the mistress of a small inn at the foot of the Appennines, where she entertained as well as she could, and where those only stopped who were contented with a little. The house was still standing, when in my youth I passed that way; though the sign of the White Cross, the Cross of the Hospitallers, was no longer to be seen over the door—a sign which she had taken, if we may believe the tradition there, in honour of a maternal uncle, a grand-master of that order, whose achievements in Palestine she would sometimes relate. A mountain stream ran through the garden; and at no great distance, where the road turned on its way to Bologna, stood a little chapel, in which a lamp was always burning before a picture of the Virgin—a picture of great antiquity, the work of some Greek artist.

"Here she was dwelling, respected by all who knew her, when an event took place which threw her into the deepest affliction. It was at noon-day, in September, that three foot travellers arrived, and, seating themselves on a bench under her vine-trells, were supplied with a flagon of Alcatico by a lovely girl, her only child, the image of her former self. The eldest spoke like a Venetian, and his beard was short and pointed after the fashion of Venice. In his demeanor he affected great courtesy, but his look inspired little confidence; for when he smiled, which he did continually, it was with his lips only, not with his eyes; and they were always turned from yours. His companions were bluff and frank in their manner, and on their tongues were many a soldier's oath. In their hats they wore a medal, such as in that age was often distributed in war; and they were evidently subalterns in one of those free bands which were always ready to serve in any quarrel, if a service it could be called, where a battle was little more than a mockery; and the slain, as on an opera-stage, were up and fighting to-morrow. Overcome with the heat, they threw aside their cloaks; and, with their gloves tucked under their belts, continued for some time in earnest conversation.

"'At length they rose to go; and the Venetian thus addressed their hostess:—'Excellent lady, may we leave under your roof, for a day or two, this bag of gold?'

"'You may, she replied gaily. 'But remember, we fasten only with a latch. Bars and bolts we have none in our village; and, if we had, where would be your security?'

"'In your word, lady.'

"'But what if I died to-night? where would it be then?' said she, laughingly. 'The money would go to the church; for none could claim it.'

"'Perhaps you will favour us with an acknowledgment.'

"'If you will write it.'

"An acknowledgment was written accordingly, and she signed it before Master Bartolo, the villiage physician, who had just called by chance to learn the news of the day; the gold to be delivered when applied for, but to be delivered (these were the words) not to one, nor to two but to the three; words wisely introduced by those to whom it belonged, knowing what they knew of each other. The gold they had just released from a miser's chest in Perugia; and they were now on a scent that promised more.

"They and their shadows were no sooner departed, than the Venetian returned, saying, 'Give me leave to set my seal on the bag as the others have done; and she placed it on a table before him. But in that moment she was called away to receive a cavalier, who had just dismounted from his horse; and, when she came back, it was gone. The temptation had proved irresistible; and the man and the money had vanished together.

"'Wretched woman that I am!' she cried, as in an agony of grief she fell on her daughter's neck; 'what will become of us? Are we again to be cast out into the wide world? Unhappy child, would that thou hadst never been born!' And all day long she lamented; but her tears availed her little. The others were not slow in returning to claim their due, and there were no tidings of the thief; he had fled far away with his plunder. A process against her was instantly begun in Bologna; and what defence could she make—how release herself from the obligation of the bond? Wilfully or in negligence she had parted with it to one, when she should have kept it for all; and inevitable ruin awaited her!

"'Go, Gianetta,' said she to her daughter, 'take this veil which your mother has worn and wept under so often, and implore the counsellor Calderino to plead for us on the day of trial. He is generous, and will listen to the unfortunate. But, if he will not, go from door to door; Monaldi cannot refuse us. Make haste, my child; but remember the chapel as you pass by it. Nothing prospers without a prayer.'

"Alas! she went, but in vain. Those were retained against them; those demanded more than they had to give; and all bade them despair. What was to be done? No advocate, and the cause to come on to-morrow!

"Now, Gianetta had a lover; and he was a student of the law—a young man of great promise, Lorenzo Martelli. He had studied long and diligently, under that learned lawyer, Giovanni Andreas; who, though little of stature, was great in renown, and by his contemporaries was called the arch-doctor, the rabbi of doctors, the light of the world. Under him he had studied, sitting on the same bench with Petrarch; and also under his daughter, Novella, who would often lecture to the scholars when her father was otherwise engaged placing herself behind a small curtain, lest her beauty should divert their thoughts; a precaution, in this instance at least, unnecessary, Lorenzo having lost his heart to another.

"To him she flies in her necessity; but of what assistance can he be? He has just taken his place at the bar, but he has never spoken; and how stand up alone, unpractised and unprepared as he is, against an array that would alarm the most experienced?

"'Were I as mighty as I am weak,' said he, 'my fears for you would make me as nothing. But I will be there, Gianetta; and may the Friend of the friendless give me strength in that hour! Even now my heart fails me; but, come what will, while I have a loaf to share, you and your mother shall never want. I will beg through the world for you.'

"The day arrives, and the court assembles. The claim is stated, and the evidence given. And now the defence is called for—but none is made; not a syllable is uttered; and, after a pause and a consultation of some minutes, the judges are proceeding to give judgment, silence having been proclaimed in the court, when Lorenzo rises, and thus addressed them:

"'Reverend signors—Young as I am, may I venture to speak before you? I would speak in behalf of one who has none else to help her; and I will not keep you long. Much has been said; much on the sacred nature of the obligation—and we acknowledge it in its full force. Let it be fulfilled, and to the last letter. It is what we solicit, what we require. But to whom is the bag of gold to be delivered? What says the bond? Not to one—not to two—but to the three. Let the three stand forth and claim it.'

"From that day, (for who can doubt the issue?) none were sought, none employed, but the subtle, the eloquent Lorenzo. Wealth followed fame; nor need I say how soon he sat at his marriage-feast, or who sat beside him."

The following lines, full of the life and soul of poetry, appeared originally in the Cincinnati Journal.—The New York Evangelist states that they are the production of a poor young man, who, with a companion, not long since, set out from the Oneida Institute of New York, to join Dr. Beecher's Theological Seminary at Cincinnati. Being short of money they hired themselves to work on a craft from the head of the Alleghany river to their place of destination, on arriving at which they found themselves richer, by twenty dollars each, then when they started from home. The author is, however, rich in talent and genius.

DELUGE.

Thrice fifty years the teacher toil'd;
Around his head Time twined a wreath of snowy whiteness,
And the deep hollows in his cheek—where Age
Had laid its fingers, told of labors for the good of men;
The Earth was not yet old: but in deeds of darkness
It had grown to quick maturity. The groves of Eden
Saw the Sun of Righteousness descend and set
Among its lonely and forsaken bowers.
The holy patriarchs were in their graves of peace:
The message came, and sainted Enoch too,
Was gone to take his seat among the blest'd on high.
All, all were gone! Their dying words forgotten;
Their memories swathed in winding sheets,
And laid away to moulder and to rot.
No bleeding goat lay on the altar now;
No guilty one would come and pray to be forgiven:
No tear of gushing penitence now glisten'd in the eye;
But Crime would come and dance with death,
And Guilt would take its fellow's hand
And sit and feast at sin's carnival. The maiden
Threw away her native loveliness, and stood
Array'd in paint and daub of harlotry;
The mother's hand had torn the mother's heart away,
And left it in the house of nameless crime!
O! deeds of guilt were practised then
That crime itself would blush to look upon.

All the patriarchs were dead. Yet there was one
Who toil'd and pray'd, and wept and groan'd,
To bring the wanderers back. Alas! 't was vain;
His tears fell on the ground unheeded;
His age was mock'd: and oft precocious guilt
Seem'd loth to let him pass in safety by.
Ourath! a fearful time had come in thy dark history;
Upon thy giant brow it yet recorded stands;
Thy mountains, hills, and e'en the ocean's voice,
Shall tell the tale of woe—
Till thy great maker's hand shall blot them out.

The sun went down upon the isles that deck
The sea: and, as it sunk away the preacher stood
Upon thy mountain's top, and told again his tale of mercy
He said the time had come when pardon ne'er would plead
Again with plaintive voice. He heard the angel
Of destruction coming in his car of death;
He told them mercy's voice would cease to plead,
That pity's fount of tears was dry.
But no one listen'd—no one heard—
And no one answered—save now and then a cry of scorn.
Or frenzied shout came rolling on the evening air.
The man of God now turned his footsteps to his home
Of peace. He trod the road that lay to where
The ark was built, and entered in. His hand
Now closed the door, and all was still
As where the grave worm riots on the wreck of beauty.

At midnight in the seats of sin,
A strange unearthly cry of terror came.
The voice of mirth was hush'd—the dancers
In the hall stood still—the bridegroom's song
Of gladness ceas'd, with all its beauteous minstrelsy;
The moon had hid her face as if she wept,
And each lone star that treads its pathway
In the skies, now veil'd its face, as if afraid
To look. Again the sound came on the palsied ear—
Ask ye what it meant? It was the voice
Of vengeance coming in its iron chariot
To tread the winepress of the world.
A night like this the world had never seen—
The winds that make their beds among
The pillar'd clouds of heaven—now waked
Their giant energies, and came as laborers
In th' harvest field of ruin—and thunder
Rais'd his maddening voice amid the storm;
And lightning lit his baleful fires, to show the way
Of death—and earthquake, that had slumber'd
In his gloomy cave, awoke and did his work.
O earth! thy watery grave is made and God
Has wove thy winding-sheet of waters:
The stars have put their weeds of mourning on,
And come to lay thee in thy sepulchre!

The morning dawn'd at last—
The sun arose to meet his bride;—He look'd
Not with a smile of holy gladness that used
To dawn upon his golden forehead;
No! his brow was dark and stormy,
And the light came darting on the air,
As flash the flames of hell upon the midnight
Of the pit!

Alone!
Upon the flood the ark in safety rode,
An angel's hand was on the helm—
The inmates of its chambers sung and pray'd;
For GOD had come; and in their hearts
Had kindled up a little heaven.

DEATH.—The whole plot of the world being contrived by infinite wisdom and goodness, we cannot but surmise that the most sad representations are a show, but the delight real to such as are not wicked and impious; and that what the ignorant call "evil" in this universe is but as shadowy strokes in a fair picture, or the mournful notes in music, by which the beauty of the one is more lively and express, and the melody of the other more pleasing and melting.—MOORE.

Second Verse.

Would you picture our meeting, our mutual fond greeting,
When we whisper our vows 'neath the moon's silver beam;
The world's richest treasure, compar'd to such pleasure,
Is but an illusion, a phantom, a gleam!
Her fair form caressing, her balmy lips pressing,
I yield me a captive in Love's silken chain;
I've a kind heaven o'er me, and rapture before me,
For Mary has promis'd that she'll be my ain.

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

HEAVY TIMBERED LANDS.—"Is the land heavy timbered?" inquired a person of a Vermonter, who was offering a tract of land for sale. "I vum," replied the vender, "it is a most mighty piece of land, and so heavily timbered that a humming bird cannot fly through it? As I was passing upon the road along side of it t'other evening, I heard a loud cracking and crashing among the trees, I looked to see what it was, and I'm d——d if it were not the moon trying to get up through the branches, but it was so tarnation thick she could not do it; so down she went again; and I had to come home in the dark."

ADVANTAGE OF CONFINEMENT.—An Italian conversing with some friends on the subject of the great injury Rome had recently sustained from an inundation of the Tiber, declared that they ought all to pray for the river to be seriously indisposed in the future. Being asked for his reason, he replied, "because he does nothing but mischief when not confined to his bed."

Voltaire defined a Physician as an unfortunate gentleman who is every day requested to perform a miracle to reconcile health with intemperance or surfeiting, but as will be seen by the anecdote subjoined, the disciples of Æsculapius have other duties occasionally:—

Dr. M. being sent for by a maker of universal specifics, grand salutariums, &c. up Broadway, expressed his surprise at being called in on an occasion apparently trifling. "Not so trifling neither," replied the quack; "for, to tell the truth, I have, by a mistake, taken some of my own pills."

COMPOUNDING WITH CONSCIENCE.—An Arab, having lost his camel, swore that if it was ever found, he would sell it for a single dirhem. The camel was found, but the owner was very unwilling to fulfil his rash oath. At length he adopted the following expediant; taking his cat he entered the market proclaiming, "Who will buy a camel for a dirhem, and a cat for a hundred dirhems? but take notice, that one animal will not be sold without the other.

A Connecticut Jonathan, in taking a walk with his dearest, came to a toll bridge, when he, as honestly as he was wont to be, said, after paying his toll, (which was one cent,) "Come, Suke, you must pay your own toll, for jist as like as not I shant have you arter all."

SOVEREIGNTY.—A recent European traveller speaks of the little principality of Monaco, in Sardinia, as not being larger than a Kentucky farm. This reminds us of an anecdote told of George Selwin, an English ambassador to one of the minor German courts. Having given offence to the Prince, he was ordered to quit his territories in twenty-four hours. "Tell your master," was his reply to the messenger, "I shall look back to his dominions in half an hour."

"JACK AT ALL TRADES."—A man, in a Maryland paper, advertises and returns his sincere thanks to the public for the liberal encouragement he has received in the wheelwright and butchering business. He likewise takes the liberty to inform them, that he has provided himself with a hearse and materials for making coffins, and that he will be at all times ready to attend to any calls in the shoemaking and blacksmithing business, and that he is willing to fill up his time in fiddling at pig shoes.

LAZARETTOS.—A few centuries ago when leprosy was one of the prevailing diseases, there were more than 20,000 lazarettos in Europe alone. The following were the interdictions pronounced by the Priest, from the ritual, on any one becoming an inmate of one of these receptacles of misery:—

"I forbid thee to go abroad without thy leper's dress.

"I forbid thee to go abroad with naked feet.

"I forbid thee to pass through any narrow street.

"I forbid thee to speak to any one except against the wind.

"I forbid thee to enter any church, any mill, any fair, any market, any assembly of men whatever.

"I forbid thee to drink or wash thy hands, either in a well or a river.

"I forbid thee to handle any merchandise before thou hast bought it.

"I forbid thee to touch children, or to give them any thing."

The Priest then gave them his foot to kiss, in token of obedience.

Pat outwitted by Patrick.—Yesterday two specimens "of the finest pissantry upon earth," one named Pat Daly, and the other Patrick Fagan, appeared at the Mayor's Court, Pat in the witness box, and Patrick in the dock, the latter charged by the former with having robbed him of eight sovereigns. From the evidence of Pat, it appeared that he and Patrick were "sworn friends" before the matter happened, and having come on Tuesday last, to Liverpool together, they were anxious to bed and board in the same house, and accordingly, on that day they went on the discovery of suitable lodgings. In the course of their peregrination, Patrick said to Pat, "sure, man, ye'd better be after hiding the eight sovereigns, as we don't know the company we may get into." "Faith, you're a broth of a boy for thinking of the main thing," replied Pat, "but I've no needle to sew them up in the back of my waistcoat." "But I have," rejoined the other, and kindly undertook the task, which, the complainant said, he tolerated him to do, and was much obliged for the favor. After performing the kind office for his friend, Patrick was suddenly missing, having wheeled round a corner. Pat was at first afraid that his countryman would be lost in the wilds of Liverpool, and, in consequence, was in a great perturbation for his fate, until at length, he fancied that the sovereigns in the back of his waistcoat felt light, and he was induced to overhaul the stitches, when, to his consternation, he discovered that his faithless friend had "rung the changes," and deposited eight shillings, instead of eight sovereigns in the waistcoat; he accordingly ran to the police and informed them of the treachery, and Patrick was apprehended on Saturday, and accommodated with lodgings in Bridewell. The case was proved, and Patrick committed.

SMUGGLING.—A countryman was stopped by a revenue officer, who took from him two casks of spirits, and carrying the same to the next town (a distance of fifteen miles) was desired by the countryman to stop and leave it at the first public house; the officer replied, "No, I have seized it, and it must go to the excise office." "Not so, master," said the countryman; "I have a little bit of paper here, which, if you'll take the trouble of reading, will convince you I am right." The officer, reading his bit of paper, exclaimed, "Why, you rascal, this is a permit; why did you not show it me sooner?" "Because," said he, "if I had, you would not have carried the liquor so far for me."

A little man observed, that he had two negative qualifications—which were, that he never lay long in bed, or wanted a great coat.

A Kentuckian's account of a Panther Fight.

By James H. Hackett.

I never was down-hearted but once in my life, and that was on seeing the death of a faithful friend, who lost his life in trying to save mine. The fact is, I was one day making tracks homeward, after a long tramp through one of our forests—my rifle carelessly resting on my shoulder—when my favorite dog, Sport, who was trotting quietly ahead of me, suddenly stopped stock still, gazed into a big oak tree, bristled up his back, and fetched a loud growl. I looked up and saw, upon a quivering limb, a half-grown panther, crouched down close, and in the very act of springing upon him. With a motion quicker than chain-lighting I levelled my rifle, blazed away, and shot him clean through and through the heart. The varmint, with teeth all set and claws spread, pitched sprawling headforemost to the ground, as dead as Julyus Cesar! That was all fair enough; but mark! afore I had hardly dropped my rifle, I found myself thrown down flat on my profile by the old she panther, who that minute sprung from an opposite tree and lit upon my shoulders, heavier than all creation; I feel the print of her devilish teeth and nails there now! My dog grew mighty loving—he jumped a-top and seized her by the neck; so we all rolled and clawed, and a pretty considerable tight scratch we had of it. I began to think my right arm was about chawed up; when the varmint, finding the dog's teeth rayther hurt her feelings, let me go altogether, and clenched him. Seeing at once that the dog was undermost, and there was no two ways about a chance of a choke-off or let-up about her, I just out jack-knife, and with one slash, prehaps I didn't cut the panther's throat deep enough for her to breathe the rest of her life without nostrils! I did feel mighty savagerous, and big as she was, I laid hold of her hide by the back with an alligator grip, and slung her against the nearest tree hard enough to make every bone in her flash fire. "There," says I, "you infernal varmint, root and branch, you are what I call used up!"

But I turned around to look for my dog, and—and tears gushed smack into my eyes, as I see the poor affectionate cretur—all of a gore of blood—half raised on his fore legs, and trying to drag his mangled body towards me; down he dropped—I run up to him, whistled aloud, and gave him a friendly shake of the paws—(for I loved my dog!)—but he was too far gone; he just had strength enough to wag his tail feebly—fixed his closing eyes upon me wishfully—then gave a gasp or two, and—all was over!

Origin of the Discovery of Peru.—Balboa, the famous Spanish adventurer, in one of his expeditions, met with a young cazique, who expressed his astonishment at the high value which was set upon the gold, which the Spaniards were weighing and distributing. "Why do you quarrel," said he, "about such a trifle? If you are so passionately fond of gold as to abandon your own country, and to disturb the tranquillity of distant nations, for its sake, I will conduct you to a region where the metal, which seems to be the chief object of your admiration and desire, is so common, that the meanest utensils are formed of it." Transported with the intelligence, Balboa eagerly inquired where this happy country lay, and how they might arrive at it.—The cazique informed them, that at the distance of six suns, or six days' journey to the south, they would discover another ocean, near which this wealthy kingdom was situated; but if they intended to attack it, they must assemble forces far superior in number and strength to those which now attended them. This was the first information which the Spaniards received concerning the great southern continent, known afterwards by the name of Peru.

The Scotch Doctor and the Jackalls.

Doctor S—— was on board a Company's ship lying at or near Diamond Harbour; and being short of amusement, and feeling the bump of destructiveness more strongly developed than usual on the surface of his pericranium, he took up his gun, and went on shore to lay wait for the Jackalls. In his walk along the beach he encountered the carcase of a dead buffalo—and, thinking himself sure of sport, lay down behind some bushes, and waited till the moon rose. Jackalls poured down from the woods by dozens, and began to pick the buffalo's bones. The Doctor cocked his percussion—and thought to himself, "The de'il my coveys!—boot I ha' thee noo!—here goes for wha's the best mon, a Scot or a Jackall!" No sooner said than done,—the Doctor blazed away right and left, and through the cloud of his own smoke, dashed down the beach to bag his game! Alas! not a Jackall's brush was singed!—and, to the Doctor's consternation, instead of running away, the animals stood looking at him with much coolness; and though frightened by the report at first, they now began to collect round him, in great numbers, as if unwilling to be cheused of their booty. Dr. S—— thought they might relish a bonny Scotsman more than a carrion buffalo, and fumbled for his ammunition. But, unlike a wise general, he had left his powder-flask under the bushes; and the gaunt bony forms of the Jackalls were now stealing down towards him from that quarter. "The de'il!—the de'il!—but my retreat is cut off!" wailed the Doctor; "and the varmints look as if they would na mind a bit o' Christian flesh!"

Strange and almost unparalleled as the incident may appear—and I had it from the Doctor himself—the hungry Jackalls, when a cloud passed over the moon, began to compass him around, and yelping and grinning with their long fangs, forced the Doctor to back as they advanced.

Dr. S—— brandished his firelock and shouted, "Hoot awa'! Hoot awa'!" with all his vigour; but the cunning animals seemed aware of his being out of powder, and as the buffalo lay at the edge of the water, they fairly drove him into the river up to his chin, shrieking; "Hoot awa'!—hoot! awa'—the de'il damn your mither's sons!"—and being unwilling to lose his powder-horn, and yet afraid to attack such a host of "hoongry beasts," he waited shivering in the limpid element for many hours, till the gray of morning induced his conquerors to retire.

Nothing annoys the Doctor so much as the question: "Which is the best mon, Doctor, a Scot or a Jackall?" I believe it was S——'s first and last sporting excursion.

He left off shoting on the wise principle of a celebrated tiger-shot, who having killed nine, and narrowly escaped being torn in pieces by the tenth, relinquished the sport for ever: and, when jeered for his timidity, he coldly replied, "Tiger-hunting is a delightful recreation while you hunt the tiger, but not quite so agreeable when the tiger takes it into his head to hunt you."—London Sport. Mag.

Resignation.—Mr ——, a covetous man, lost his only son an event which overwhelmed him with sorrow. The minister came to comfort him, and in the course of conversation remarked, that such chastisements of Providence were mercies in disguise—that, although in the death of his son, he had suffered a severe and irreparable misfortune, yet undoubtedly his own reflections had already suggested to him some sources of consolation. "Yes," exclaimed the weeping father, "James was a monstrous oster."

A schoolmaster being asked what "fortification" meant, replied that two twenty-fications made one fortification!

THE GROVES OF BLARNEY.

AS SUNG BY MR. POWER.

The Groves of Blarney, they are so charming,
Down by the purling of sweet silent brooks—
'Tis there's the Daisy spontaneous growing,
Planted by nature all in the rocky nooks,
'Tis there's the poesy call'd the sweet Carnation—
The blushing Pink, and the Rose so fair,
Likewise the Lily and the Daffy-dilly,
All sweet flowers scenting the most fragrant air.
Och hone! Och hone! &c.

'Tis Lady Jeffery that owns this station,
Like Alexander or like Helen fair,
There's never a commander in all the nation,
For emulation can with her compare;
There's castles round her where no nine pounder,
Would dare for to enter into her place of strength,
Until Oliver Cromwell, (bad luck to that old thief,) he did her so pummel,
That he made a great breach right through into her battlements.

There's gravel-walks there for meditation,
And contemplation, all in sweet solitude—
'Tis there's the lovyer may meet the Plovyer,
Or the gentle Dove, by way of interlude:
And in case any young lady be so engaging,
Just to fetch a walk those shady bowers around,
Oh! 'tis there's her courtier might transport her,
Into some dark cavern all down in under ground.

'Tis there's the cave where no day-light enters—
Where Cats and Badgers are forever bred,
Almost by nature, which makes it complature,
Nor a coach and six nor a downy bed.
'Tis there's the lake well stored with fishes,
The comely Eels in the vardant mud that stray,
There's them Trout and them Salmon, playing together at black-gammon.
But if you try to catch hold of them dont they sill immajuntly swim away.

'Tis there's the Kitchen with many a flitch in,
And the maids a stitchin before the door:
There's bread and biscay, likewise the whiskey,
Which would make you friskey, if yourself was there,
'Tis there's good Katy Whaley's daughter Nelly,
A washing praters forment the door,
And Roger Daly and Miss Biddy Kelly,
All blood relations of that entirely great, noble, and renowned family my Lord Donnogmore.

There's statury gracing that noble place in,
All heathen goddesses so fair,
Bold Neptune, Plutarch, and sweet Nicodemus,
All alive and naked out in the cold frosty air—
And now to finish this brief narration,
Which my poor genus could ne'er divine,
Oh was I a Homer, or even Nebuchadnezzar,
In every feature I'd make it for to shine.

LOVE'S ALAS!

"The course of true love never did run smooth."

Th' unluckiest lover sure am I
That ever penned a sonnet,
Or eulogized a lady's eye,
Or tied a lady's bonnet.

And what is worse, my case is one
That hath no parallel
In Cupid's calender. There's none
E'er loved so ill—so well!

Perhaps you'll think Louise is crusty—
Or else too young—or I
A bachelor, grown old and fusty,
Less fit to wed than die.

Or perhaps, you'll think my goodness silly
Some one else caresses;
Or that papa has treated drily
Me and my addresses.

Yet no: I am but twenty-one;
The nymph not quite so aged;
Moreover, I'm an only son,
And she quite disengaged.

And for papa and ma, I'm sure
They'll never rant and rave,
Because I know they're both secure,
And quiet in the grave.

Neither is't absence mars my lot;
Nor illness, which is worse;
Nor yet that Wedlock's antidote,
Yclept an empty purse.

Then what, you'll ask,—what can it be,
I' the name of love and wonder,
That keeps my sweet Louise and me
So wrongfully asunder?

This—this the cause of all my woes—
Woes that no tears can quench!
She not a word of English knows,
And I not one of French.

THE LOVES OF THE PLANTS.

The gay Daffodil once, an amorous blade,
Stole out of his bed in the dark,
And waking his man Ragged Robin, he strayed,
To breathe forth his vows to a Violet maid
That dwelt in a neighbouring park.

A spiteful old Nettle aunt frown'd on their love,
But Daffy who laughed at her power,
A Shepherd's Purse slipped in the nurse's Fox-glove,
Then up Jacob's Ladder, he flew to his dove,
And into the young Virgin's bower.

The Maiden's Blush Rose, and she seemed all dismay'd,
Attired in her new white Lady's Smock;
She called Mignionette but the sly little jade
That instant was hearing a sweet serenade
From the lips of a tall Hollyhock.

The Pheasant's Eye, always a mischievous wight,
For prying out something not good,
Avow'd that he peep'd through the key-hole that night,
Where clearly he saw, by a glow-worm's light,
Their Two faces under a Hood.

Old dowager Peony, deaf as a door,
Who wish'd to know more of the facts,
Invited Dame Mustard and Miss Hellebore,
With Miss Periwinkle, and many friends more,
One ev'ning to tea and to tracts.

The Buttercups rang'd; defamation ran high,
While every tongue joined the debate:
Miss Sensitive said, 'twixt a groan and a sigh,
"Tho' she felt much concern'd, yet she thought her dear Vi
Had grown rather love-sick of late."

Thus the tale spread about through the busy parterre;
Miss Columbine turned up her nose;
And the prude Lady Lavender said with a stare,
That her friend, Mary Gould, had been heard to declare,
"The creature had toy'd with the Rose."

Each Sage look'd severe, and each Cock's comb look'd gay,
When Daffy, to make their minds easy,
Miss Violet married, one morning in May,
And as sure as you live, before next Lady-day,
She brought him a Michaelmas Daisy.

ATKINSON'S
CASKET
OR GEMS OF
LITERATURE, WIT AND SENTIMENT.

"Then came the jolly summer, being dight,
In a thin silken cassock coloured green,
That was unlined all, to be more light,
And all his head a garland well beseene
He wore, from which, as he had chaffed been,
The sweat did drop, and in his hand he bore
A bow and shaft, as he in forest green
Had hunted late the libbard or the boar,
And now would bathe his limbs, with labour heated sore."

No. 7.] PHILADELPHIA.—JULY. [1834.

THE LUTE.

My twilight lute! my twilight lute!
You hear each silver tone,
Breathing among the tremulous leaves
Of all these woodlands lone,
As plainly as you ever heard
From mortal lips a living word.

And may not love, in burning souls
Of such a clime as this,
Utter with such a voice divine,
Its sorrows and its bliss?
It fills the eye, the brow, the cheek;
Yet cannot, as it need not speak.

Ah no! it is a vestal fire,
In the veiled bosom fed,
Whose hallowed heat must only be
O'er its own worship shed:
Within, within, the spirit kneels,
Hushed with the rapture which it feels.

Ah no! it is enough to see,
In glorious eyes like thine,
O daughter of the vine-crowned land,
The fervid feeling shine:
She smiles—she sighs—I will not seek
For surer pledge—she need not speak.

THE MONARCH'S WISH.

Oh! that I had wings like a dove! for then would I flee away, and be at rest. Lo then would I wander far off, and remain in the wilderness. I would hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest.—Ps. 55. 6, 7, 8.

The wearied monarch sat apart,
A moment from his troubles free;
Saddened in soul, and sick at heart,
With earthly pomp and vanity:
And while with burdening cares he strove,
And griefs were gathering in his breast,
He sighed for pinions like a dove,
To flee away, and be at rest.

He languished for a calm retreat,
Some far-away and peaceful shore;
Untrodden, but by sinless feet,
Were earth should vex his soul no more:
Hate had usurped the bower of love,
And wild the phrenzy of his breast;
And oh! for pinions like a dove,
To flee away, and be at rest!

'Tis thus with life: its best estate
Is but a feeble ray of joy;
An hour of golden hopes elate,
Which often clouds and storms destroy:
And while the heart reluctant clings,
And sorrows, whelm the laboring breast,
Oh! for the Turtle's gentle wings,
To flee away, and be at rest!

And though the joys of earth invite
To sip their flattering streams of pain,—
Who, that has tasted earth's delight,
Would ever sigh to taste again?
Its purest joys, its fairest things,
But serve to wound the bleeding breast:
Oh! for the Turtle's gentle wings,
To flee away, and be at rest!

But there shall come a glad release
From all the storms that darkly roll;
And mercy's voice shall whisper "peace"
Upon the tempest of the soul:
For death the envied treasure brings,
And calms the turmoils of the breast;
And gives the spirit deathless wings,
To flee away and be at rest!

THE UNKNOWN GRAVES.

BY MRS. JANE E. LOCKE.

Holy to human nature seems,
The long forsaken spot;
To deep affections, tender dreams,
Hopes of a brighter lot.

MRS. HEMANS.

It was a fearful period in New England's early history. The pilgrim fathers, enduring persecution and wrong, had become jealous of their rights and suspicious of every novelty. The night was dark and boisterous, and the tempests of autumn gathering up their might threatened deeper distress to the unprovisioned colonies, when the family of Gov. Endicott was surprised by the entrance of two strangers, habited each in a long black surplice and hood. There was a startling pause as they entered, during which they stood as criminals awaiting their destiny. The Governor, placing himself in attitude of defence, and assuming an air of one who was wont to command, demanded who they were and what their errand. The stoutest of the two laying aside his cowl and bowing with a courtly air, replied, "fear not, honored sir, we are from the haughty, persecuting government of Charles II. and we come to you as exiles—outlaws, on whose heads a price is set, entreating your protection." The Governor drew up his benignant countenance to a sort of frown, and sternly bade them welcome. The strangers gravely seated themselves while the eldest continued;—

"It were not best to conceal my character sir, at this critical hour in the political affairs of England; I will therefore boldly declare myself, I am William Goffe, one of the judges of King Charles the 1st, and now, that Cromwell is deposed, and Charles the 2nd about to be proclaimed, I with this my wife have sought protection here, yet I ask it not for myself beneath your roof. I would seek a more retired spot, and if you will but shield and shelter the companion of my bosom till the tempest of political fury be spent, you will not be conferring a favor on ungrateful hearts."

Governor Endicott immediately signified his readiness to accoom modate and oblige them; and it was soon agreed that on the succeeding morning Goffe should remove to Cambridge, and the lady, his wife, remain in the family of Gov. Endicott and pass for his own daughter.

Accordingly next morning the exiles "pressed the parting hand," and bade adieu with swelling bosoms, little deeming it was their last farewell. The wife of William Goffe was the daughter of Robert Endicott, Bart. brother to the Governor of the colony of Massachussetts, at whose house she now dwelt, consequently she felt not entirely as a stranger; but so long had she been wont to tread the paved walks of England and accustomed to courtly honors that she was ill prepard to dare the perils and the sufferings of that infant colonly: yet with woman's heroism, and woman's faithfulness, she forsook her titled splendours and accompanied the idol of her heart in exile to this unexplored, savage wilderness.

Not long however had they remained in their new situations, before the act of indemnity was brought from England, and it appeared that Goffe was not excepted with those to whom pardon was offered; consequently the Governor was obliged to summon a court of assistants to consult about securing him, but they did not agree to it, yet finding it unsafe to remain where he was, Goffe immediately left Cambridge, and none knew whither he went, not even the grief stricken spirit of her, the companion of his youth, the sharer of his exile. A few days after his removal a hue and cry was brought by way of Barbadoes and the Governor and assistants issued a warrant as in loyalty they were obliged, to secure him; and to avoid all suspicion of their sincerity they sent two zealous loyalists through the colonies in search of him. But though he effectually eluded discovery, the yearning soul of his beloved wife was not quieted, for she knew not but he was a captive in savage hands, or suffering even greater perils than savage ingenuity could devise. It was in vain her friends endeavoured to cheer her suffering heart, and in vain that they offered her the sympathies and the consolations of friendship. Years passed on, each bearing on its bosom the unebbing tide of her woe and the record of woman's constancy; years passed on, and she passed from youth to middle age, with her spirit still unburthened, and her sorrow unassuaged. The flatteries of those who would gladly have won her to themselves, she heeded not, and the vows and protestations of England's titled sons as they knelt before her on their public errands hither, passed by her as the wind, though there was scarce a shadow of probability that he for whom every sacrifice was made, would ever again return to shield her beneath the arm of his protection. Patiently, meekly, aye, and joyfully could she have borne with him his degradation and his shame, if shame and degradation there could be, in bearing the image of an outlaw and an exile for a deed his conscience and his country had approved; patiently and meekly could she have borne with him his sufferings and privations, but to be separated from him and uncertain of his fate, was more than her woman's heart could bear.

There was at this time an Indian, by the name of Ninnigret, a sachem of the Niantick's, one of the most venomous and subtle among the numerous tribes of the Naragansetts, who had for a time held bitter enmity towar dthe family of long Gov. Endicott, and he having by some secret art become acquainted with the circumstances of the regicide Goffe, and ascertained also the situation and distresses of his faithful wife, resolved on a plan to convey her away and destroy her, hoping thus to afflict the family of the Governor and vent his hatred.

Accordingly he kept hourly watch about the dwelling, and finding her one evening on an excursion alone to a neighbouring grove, he stepped forward and in a friendly tone and manner made known his errand, telling her that her husband was secretly holding himself in the cave of a high rock, which was the fact, near New Haven; and that he had sent him to give her information and conduct her to the place; and added that it must be done without the knowledge of any one, lest public information should be obtained of his residence, and be consequently exposed to the long threatened punishment. The heart of Mary Goffe bounded with joy at the communication, and she was ready to accompany the savage through the untrod pathless wilderness even to its most desolate haunts, could she but once more behold the object around which had clustered all her youth's bright hopes, and her heart's most sacred sensibilities. She paused a moment—a slight expression of distrust passed over her countenance; then once more looking in the face of her narrator her confidence was renewed and she moved gaily forward with her savage escort.

Ah what will not the affection of woman dare, and its enthusiasm attempt; in the blindness of her love through every age, what sacrifices has she not made and what perils suffered that she might unhindered bow down to the star of her youth.

The sachem was accompanied by a band of hardy warriors and they had not proceeded far before she was made to understand their unhallowed deception, and by menaces and threats forced to a state of the most distressing and perplexing fearfulness. Hunger, and cold, and sickness, and suffering of every kind, the delicacy of her constitution was made to endure and its feebleness support. But it would be in vain to attempt to pourtray the sorrows and the woes of her long and dreary wanderings. Daily was she expecting and wishing the hour of her trial and her torture, but it came not, while her spirit strove with savage insult. At length after the weary wanderings of nearly two years, during which she had seen no human face but the savages around her, the faggots were gathered, the implements of torture prepared on the top of the highest mountain that overlooks the Connecticut, near Northampton. The river rolled as now in all its majesty along, and its beautiful curve was distinctly visible from the top of that commanding eminence. What though the hand of centuries had not polished the mountain and dignified the plain, yet the forest stood in its native grandeur, laden with foliage, grass and herbage flourished, and flowers in all their beauty bloomed unplucked and the impress of the God of nature dwelt on all around; in view of these the heart of the woe worn captive felt the presence of the Deity and could calmly yield herself to her destroyers.

But while these things were preparing there, other and still more alarming scenes were passing in the village a few miles below them. The Sabbath's holy calm as yet unbroken by the savage whoop had settled on the spirits of that small band of puritans and they had gathered with hallowed yearnings in the house of prayer, rejoicing in that interval of alarm and peril; suddenly their orisons ceased, and the still communion with their God was broken by the yells of savage warriors. Unarmed and defenceless as they were, confusion and consternation prevailed. But in the midst of their alarm when all was terror around, there appeared among them an aged and venerable man, in military armour, and with the air of one of authority he immediately placed himself at their head and led them to the onset. Valiant indeed were his deeds, for by his bravery the enemy were soon dispersed. But instantly he disappeared, leaving the astonished and grateful inhabitants to the conjecture that the arm of an angel had delivered them. As he passed from their gratulations, he discovered, through the bending forest, the fire prepared, and the helpless victim of Ninnigret ready for sacrifice. His spirit was emboldened, and his arm strengthened for the rescue; he hastened to the spot with the firm and elastic step of his better days. The savages noticed his approach, and simultaneously they shrank back from a look so bold and daring. Their leader resolving to accomplish his work of death, instantly raised his tomahawk, and planting it in the head of his captive, fled with his followers far into the forest's fastnesses.

At this moment the valorous stranger came up and knelt to raise that fallen one from the earth. But more than the lassitude of fatigue, and the weakness and tremulousness of age came over him as he traced in the ghastliness of death, and though the marks of grief, and woe, and years, the features of one whose image he had cherished in his heart with an idolatry that had been almost crime in the sight of Heaven—the companion of his youth—the wife of his bosom! Years, painful years had passed since their separation in their exile, and that face and form he had worshipped so devotedly were changed indeed, still the beauty and the grace were there, and they could not be mistaken even in the fixedness of death, and he wept, aye, wept as woman weeps, till his armour was dewed as with the rain drops. Alas! the tears of manhood, they gush forth from the agony of an o'erburdened spirit, as the torrent from the swollen fountain bursts through all restraint.

At length he rose from the earth with a calmer spirit, and raising his dead wife in his arms, he bore her far through the forest depths and depositing her at the foot of a lofty mountain, he dug a grave, and after kneeling long and fervently beside it, he laid the clods upon the bosom of his love.

* * * * * *

In an unplained, unrivered, and unromantic town in the interior of Massachusetts there rises abruptly from the surrounding scenery a beautiful mountain, abounding equally in vegetation and story, and still known to its inhabitants by its original Indian name. It overlooks many very pleasant villages; but by far the most beautiful of all it commands, are the rudely constructed dwellings of the inhabitants at its base, with their fertile gardens, rich in culinary importance, stretching toward the sun and bedded with herbage and flowers, while here and there rises in rustic grandeur a stately stock of the sunflower, the most domestic of all Flora's numerous family, and the more ungraceful holly with its innumerable varieties; and still further on "the twinkling maize field," the meadows with their waving grass, and grain, the untilled pasturage dotted with lowing herd and bleating flocks, quietly grazing on the hillocks or ruminating in its valleys. There is also at the foot of this mountain a small pond, glittering in the rays of the noonday's sun, and reflecting its sedgy margin, and the drooping tassels of the willows that fringe its banks.

It was near these that a small party of the original Massachusetts colony quietly located themselves, after their sun of battle had gone down; but as they began to fell, and build, and frame, and cultivate what then was but a forest, they discovered a slight mound of earth marked at each end by two bits of unhewn stone, and on them rudely carved the letters M. G. 1679. On one side of it there stood rooted a plant of the sweetbriar, shedding its fragrance round the desolate spot, and on the other a giant oak which seemed like one of the fathers of the soil; many of its boughs were leafless and dead. But these, as well as its trunk, were covered with leaves of the ivy which had sprung up at its root, and pierced the body with its tendrils until the bark had grown over it in some places, and it seemed a part of the oak itself. It was the only tree of the kind that could be found in that vicinity, and the ivy is by no means an indigenous plant, therefore, there was every reason to believe that these had been transplanted by some careful hand to mark that spot, "holy to human nature." It was also surrounded by a small spot of cultivated land, and near it an old log hut in a dilapidated state, its timber overgrown with moss, and here and there among the ruins a rusty kitchen utensil, or implement of husbandry. All these were carefully examined, and the place left to its desolation. Indeed the inhabitants avoided the place as a haunted spot and feared to tread the soil. Many and various were the conjectures respecting it. Some declared that it was the grave of Paugus; others, that it was that of one of the Salem witches, who having fled from the scene of confusion they had created, had perished there; while one old lady, the oracle of the town, collecting more of truth than others might have believed, deposed, that it was the grave of one of the judges of King Charles the 1st, and from this it was commonly received, that it was the grave of a murderer; and hence, at that superstitious age, the stoutest and most fearless of all that hardy band of labourers that emigrated thither, dared not turn the sward around it. But there was one who knew its history, and treasuring it in his heart, daily watched that sacrilege did not polute it, while tradition with her Babel tongues was babbling.

At sunrise on a morning in spring, an aged man, of giant stature was discovered by the inhabitants of the nearest dwelling in an attitude of prayer beside that lonely grave. His beard was long, and his locks thin and hoary and unprotected by any covering, fiercely wrestled with the winds that swept around the mountain, and his stout and sinewy frame seemed as unyielding as the tall forest around him. His loins were slightly girded with the skin of the wolf and his feet bound in that of the timid fawn. Horror and amazement siezed the affrighted family, and they at first believed it some supernatural visitor to the tomb of an injured relative. Shortly they become more rational, and come to the conclusion, that it was a lunatic, or wild man of the wood who had his dwelling in some recess of the mountain, and they resolved to watch him through that day, and communicate his movements to the neighbouring peasantry, and should he make his appearance on the succeeding, they would give him chase as they would the beasts of the forest. Ere long, however, the aged stranger rose from his orisons and gazing steadfastly a few moments on the grave before him, he turned away, and began to collect from the ruins around, the bits of broken wood and small timber; with these in the course of the day he erected a sort of booth, covering it with the boughs of the oak that stood in lonely pride on that desolate spot. Thus he had formed a shelter from the rain and sun, and a covering for the night; observing this as a token of pacific disposition, the inhabitants began to look upon him less fearfully or more leniently, and to consider him as a being of friendly order, and whose claim to the soil was prior to their own, and they concluded to let him remain peacefully and enjoy as he would his own mysterious character and hermit seclusion.

For many months he made his fearless abode in the then dreary place, keeping himself aloof from the society of man, and apparently holding intercourse alone with Heaven and the mysteries of his creation. Daily was he to be seen beside that lonely grave in the attitude of prayer. At length one morning at the accustomed hour he was missed at the spot where he was wont to kneel in adoration, and nothing was observed of him through the day. Another followed, and another, and he was absent still, and conjecture was earnest to account for his disappearance. Finally it was determined to rally the bravest among them and proceed to the hut. Accordingly, after he had been missing three or four days, several of the sternest and the stoutest among them formed a band and entered the hut. Braver hearts than the fathers of that age possessed were never on Columbia's soil, yet even these quailed and shuddered, as they found themselves in presence of a feared and dreadful thing—the mere vestige of humanity in the very throes of death. Alas there is ever a fearfulness attached to mystery and death. It has made the bold heart shiver and the sturdy shrink. What wonder then, they should stand aghast when these that make earth a fearful spot, brake upon their vision in the fullness of their terror. The object of their search was stretched upon the ground before a small faggot blaize and loosely wrapped in a blanket. Nothing like food appeared within his reach, and his haggard looks betokened he had not obeyed nature's call for many a day. A few papers were laying about the hut, a pen and ink stood in one corner of it and his hand firmly clenched a folded piece of parchment. To the sound of human voices he roused for a few minutes, seemed to parly with death and raising his eyes to those who surrounded him, in a feeble and tremulous voice he interrogated, "Are ye come to bury me now? The destroyer has not finished his work." To this one of the boldest among them replied, "nay, we are not come on any purpose of harm or errand of mercy and if necessary would be ministers of mercy; nor would we molest the stranger who is at peace in his own dwelling. But our business here was to learn the fate, and if possible, ascertain something of the character of one who has seemed a wanderer in this valley, shunning the haunts of men and familiar only with the forest caves." "My history," the aged man replied, "has no connexion with any thing here, nor can never be fully known, nor has it ever been wept or mourned by any, except the occupant of that grave ye may see not far distant; many incidents of my life may stand recorded on England's history, and others perhaps connected with the annals of America, but the heart's true history can never be told. The events of our lives become important to ourselves, only as they influence and affect the heart. And dropping the parchment he had held, he added, that, I had hoped, would preserve my name from oblivion and asked no more—'tis useless now, my hour has come, and I beseech ye men, bury me in solitude and silence beneath that aged oak, and beside that grave where I have so often knelt, the grave of my wife, and let my name only be there inscribed, for I am William Goffe, England's long lost, long exiled son. There was a choaking for utterance and a struggling for breath and then a moment and the heart of the regicide was at rest forever!

* * * * A long unbroken pause succeeded, and that firm band gravely and solemnly obeyed the injunction of the dead, and to this day the spot is marked and passed with hallowed breath, and childhood points it out, as the place of the Unknown Graves.

Bombardment and Defence of Stonington,
During the late War with Great Britain.

No part of the sea-coast of Connecticut is more exposed to an annoyance from an enemy than the village of Stonington. It is compactly built on a point of land extending into the sea, with a harbour easy of access and wholly unfortified. During the late war, whilst the national vessels were blockaded in the harbour of New-London by the British fleet, the inhabitants of Stonington were under continual apprehension of a visit from the enemy. The blockading ships were in fair view of the village, and their boats almost daily reconnoitred along the coast, apparently with other objects than the interruption of commerce. We implored the general government for protection, but it was not found convenient to grant it. The governor of the state, however, sent us a small guard of militia to aid the inhabitants in keeping a nightly watch, and sound the alarm in case the enemy should approach. Despairing of further aid, the citizens who were disposed to do their duty to their country and to themselves, resolved to take their defence into their own hands. By voluntary labour, three temporary breastworks were thrown up in different positions. At the upper work a staff-flag was planted, and a small platform prepared, on which was placed two fine eighteen-pounders which had been obtained from the national government previous to the war. Scarcely were these hasty preparations made, when on Tuesday, the ninth of August, 1814, the hostile fleet was perceived to be in motion, passing through Fisher's Island Sound and coming on in the direction of Stonington. Various conjectures were formed as to their destination; few of us, however, supposed that so formidable a force could be arrayed for the attack of our defenceless village. As they continued to approach, the female portion of our population expressed great alarm, which soon rose to indiscribable consternation when the whole squadron were seen to enter our harbour, consisting of the Ramilies, seventy-four, the frigate Pactolus, the bomb-ship Terrour, and the brig of war Despatch, of twenty guns. Soon after they were moored, a barge put off from the nearest ship and rowed towards the shore, bearing a white flag. A momentary consultation was held among the inhabitants who were then assembled, on the question what shall be done? when it was decided, as by a general impulse, to meet the foe! Immediately several gentlemen entered a boat and proceeded to receive the flag. The officer of the barge, the first lieutenant of the Ramilies, presented an unsealed communication, of which the following is an exact copy, but refused to answer any interrogatories further than to say he had performed his duty in delivering the message of the commodore.

"His Britannic Majesty's ship Pactolus,
9th August, 1814, half-past 5, P. M.

"Not wishing to destroy the unoffending inhabitants residing in the town of Stonington, one hour is granted them from the receipt of this to remove out of town. T. M. HARDY, Captain of his Majesty's ship Ramilies."

I shall not attempt to describe the agitation which this message occasioned. Its brevity, its awful import, the overwhelming force of the enemy, our defenceless condition, and the short time allowed us to remove our "unoffending" women and children, and to prepare for the conflict, awoke sensations which can be more easily conceived than expressed. The brief space allotted us was diligently employed in taking our non-combatants to places of safety, and in collecting whatever ammunition could be found in the possession of individuals, whilst ten determined volunteers took their stand at the breastwork, to observe the first movements of the enemy. All remained quiet until eight o'clock in the evening, when the Terrour commenced the bombardment, by throwing a shell into the town, and continued with short intervals to fire bombs and carcasses through the night. Nothing was done, at that period, on our part, except once discharging an eighteen-pounder at the brig, which had suspended a lantern in her shrouds, but immediately hauled it down from the apparent effect of the shot. As soon as the day broke on Wednesday, the enemy's barges appeared at a short distance from the east side of the point, and commenced firing their rockets at the buildings. Immediately a sufficient number of the volunteers dragged one of their guns across the point, attacked the barges from the open field, sunk one of them, compelled the rest to retire, and, in the midst of a raking fire from the brig, returned to the breastwork in safety. At sunrise, the brig of war commenced firing upon the town, approaching within grape-shot distance of the shore. At the same moment the Terrour resumed the discharge of rockets and throwing of shells and carcasses. Whilst the brave men at the guns were doing their duty, others equally fearless followed the rockets and carcasses to the buildings, and extinguished the fires they were kindling—a perilous service, which they continued to perform to the end of the conflict. The men at the breastwork had ammunition for one gun only, which they aimed with deadly effect, hulling the brig at every shot; but their powder at length failing, they reluctantly retired for a short time, until the express which they had despatched to New-London should return with a supply.

This, to their great joy, arrived at eleven o'clock, A. M., when they instantly repaired to their post, nailed their colours to the staff, opened their fire anew, and with such effect that the brig, in no great length of time, to avoid being sunk, cut her cable and retired, leaving her cable and anchor behind, which were afterwards secured, and are still preserved. During this exhibition of desperate valour, the men were driven to the expedient of making cartridges with clothing torn from their bodies, and weeds collected around the breastwork; and when the match-rope failed, they fired the cannon with a small gun snapped over the vent. The number of men thus engaged at no time exceeded twenty, all equal in command. The bombardment continued until Thursday, when a cessation of hostilities took place, and a flag was sent from Commodore Hardy, with a message, the purport of which was, to require us to send on board his ship Mrs. Stewart, the British consul's wife, then in New-London, and to give a pledge that we would not send torpedoes to annoy his ships. On our compliance with these terms, he engaged the bombardment should cease. With a spirit becoming the occasion, he was told in reply, that no compliance could be expected from us, and no favours were asked of him beyond what the rules of honourable warfare required. The bomb-ship re-commenced her fire of shells and carcasses; and on Friday, after the Ramilies had fired two broadsides at the town, the squadron, about noon, retreated to the place from whence it came, with little cause of triumph, it is believed, at the result of the expedition.

Should it be asked how many lives were lost on our part? I must answer, with gratitude to God, not an individual was killed. One young man received a wound in the knee, and died six months afterwards. This statement may appear incredible when it is considered that during a part of the conflict the men were wholly exposed to the enemy's fire—that their breastwork was merely a mound of earth—the star-spangled banner, which hung low over our heads, was pierced with many balls, and the board-fence and buildings in their rear were perforated in a manner so remarkable, as would seem to render it impossible that any of them could have escaped uninjured. It will also be seen that those who were engaged in watching the houses, and guarding them against the effects of the rockets and shells, were exposed to dangers of no ordinary kind. Their unremitting efforts prevented a single instance of conflagration, although many buildings were greatly injured by the balls and shells, and some were wholly destroyed.

The bombardment, it is perceived, lasted from Tuesday evening to Friday noon; during which many incidents of an interesting nature occurred which cannot now be detailed. One instance, however, of female fortitude and filial piety united, I feel it a duty to record. A few rods in the rear of the breastwork stood a small house, in which resided an aged widow and her daughter. The mother was sick and could not be moved. Her daughter remained alone with her through the night of Tuesday and the battle of Wednesday, until the mother died. The daughter then went forth to announce the fact and obtain assistance to bury the dead. No female aid could be had; all had fled. A few men assembled, but perceived they could do nothing with the body except to take it with the bed and covering, and bury them together. Accordingly they carried all to the nearest burying-ground, where they found a hole made by the fall and explosion of a shell, in which the whole were interred, and where they have since remained. The composure, the passive courage as well as dutiful affection of the daughter, astonished all who saw her. Without calling for aid or uttering a complaint, she continued at the bed-side of her dying mother until her death, while cannon-balls were often passing through the house, and even the room where she sat. Her name is Huldah Hall. She is still living, poor in worldly substance, but "rich in faith," and I doubt not, "an heir of glory."

The writer of the foregoing narrative has furnished no estimate of the enemy's loss, as he probably possessed no certain evidence of its amount. But if we may credit the account published at the time, it was far from proving a bloodless affair to the assailants.

Expresses were also sent to convene the neighbouring militia, who promptly assembled, were organized in the confines of the town, and stood ready to meet the enemy if a landing had been effected.

Written for the Casket.

Lines written at the request of a friend, on finding a Violet amidst the snows of January, 1834.

Frail delicate bloomer, how lovely, yet lonely,
'Mid tempests that chill thee, and wither thy bed;
In sweetness thou dwellest, meek, beautiful, only
Survivor of changes, that pass o'er thy head.

The rose can but blossom, when sunlight grows round her,
'Mid airs mild and balmy, as zephyrs of spring,
But thou hast a smile, when the snow wreath hath bound her—
And drear frosts of winter are wild on the wing.

Let the rose-bud of spring, be the type to remind us
Of friendships that bloom in the smile of the day,
But wither and pass, when the sorrows that found us,
Have rent all the sweets of existence away.

But thou art the same, true and constant forever;
The sunlight may glow, or the storm howl above,
Thy leaf is unfading, thy fragrance dies never—
Oh! what is thy type, and thine emblem but love.

Chapters from the Note-Book

OF A DECEASED LAWYER.

One of the most extraordinary and most interesting trials of which I find any account in my note-book, took place in the Northern Circuit, very little less than fifty years ago. It is instructive in many points of view. To those who believe that they see the finger of Providence especially pointing out the murderer, and guiding, in a slow but unerring course, the footsteps of the avenger of blood, it will afford matter of deep meditation and reflection. To those who think more lightly upon such subjects; to those whom philosophy or indifference has taught to regard the passing current of events as gliding on in a smooth and unruffled channel, varied only by the leaves which the chance winds may blow into the stream, it will offer food for grave contemplation. However they may smile at the thought of Divine interposition, they will recognise in this story another proof of the wisdom of the sage of old, who said, that when the Gods had determined to destroy a man, they began by depriving him of his senses, that is, by making him act as if he had lost them. To the inexperienced in my profession it will teach a lesson of prudence, more forcible than ten thousand arguments could make it; they will learn that of which they stand deeply in need, and which scarce anything but dear-bought experience can enforce—to rest satisfied with success, without examining too nicely how it has been obtained, and never to hazard a defeat by pushing a victory too far. "Leave well alone" is a maxim which a wise man in every situation of life will do well to observe; but if a barrister hopes to rise to eminence and distinction, let him have it deeply engraven on the tablet of his memory.

In the year 17—, John Smith was indicted for the wilful murder of Henry Thomson. The case was one of a most extraordinary nature, and the interest excited by it was almost unparalleled.—The accused was a gentleman of considerable property, residing upon his own estate, in an unfrequented part of —— shire. A person, supposed to be an entire stranger to him, had, late in a summer's day, requested and obtained shelter and hospitality for the night. He had, it was supposed, after taking some slight refreshment, retired to bed in perfect health, requesting to be awakened at an early hour the following morning. When the servant appointed to call him entered his room for that purpose, he was found in his bed, perfectly dead; and, from the appearance of the body, it was obvious that he had been so for many hours. There was not the slightest mark of violence on his person, and the countenance retained the same expression which it had borne during his life. Great consternation was, of course, excited by this discovery, and inquiries were immediately made, first, as to who the stranger was—and, secondly, as to how he met with his death. Both were unsuccessful. As to the former, no information could be obtained—no clue discovered to lead to the knowledge either of his name, his person, or his occupation. He had arrived on horseback, and was seen passing through a neighbouring village about an hour before he reached the house where his existence was so mysteriously terminated, but could be traced no farther. Beyond this, all was conjecture.

With respect to the death, as little could be learned as of the dead man; it was, it is true, sudden—awfully sudden; but there was no reason, that alone excepted, to suppose that it was caused by the hand of man, rather than by the hand of God. A coroner's jury was of course, summoned; and after an investigation, in which little more could be proved than that which I have here stated, a verdict was returned to the effect that the deceased died by the visitation of God. Days and weeks passed on, and little further was known. In the mean time rumour had not been idle; suspicions, vague, indeed, and undefined, but of a dark and fearful character, were at first whispered, and afterwards boldly expressed. The precise object of these suspicions was not clearly indicated; some implicated one person, some another; but they all pointed to Smith, the master of the house, as concerned in the death of the stranger. As usual in such cases, circumstances totally unconnected with the transaction in question, matters many years antecedent, and relating to other persons, as well as other times, were used as auxiliary to the present charge. The character of Smith, in early life, had been exposed to much observation. While his father was yet alive, he had left his native country, involved in debt, known to have been guilty of great irregularities, and suspected of being not over-scrupulous as to the mode of obtaining those supplies of money of which he was continually in want, and which he seemed somewhat inexplicably to procure.

Ten years and more had elapsed since his return; and the events of his youth had been forgotten by many, and to many were entirely unknown; but, on this occasion, they were revived, and, probably, with considerable additions.

Two months after the death of the stranger, a gentleman arrived at the place, impressed with a belief that he was his brother, and seeking for information either to confirm or refute his suspicions. The horse and the clothes of the unfortunate man still remained, and were instantly recognised; one other test there was, though it was uncertain whether that would lead to any positive conclusion; the examination of the body. The test was tried; and although decomposition had gone on rapidly, yet enough remained to identify the body, which the brother did most satisfactorily. As soon as it was known that there was a person authorised by relationship to the deceased to inquire into the cause of his death, and, if it should appear to have been otherwise than natural, to take steps for bringing to justice those who had been concerned in it, the reports which had been previously floating idly about, and circulated without having any distinct object, were collected into one channel, and poured into his ear. What those reports were, and what they amounted to, it is not necessary here to mention; suffice it to say, that the brother laid before the magistrates of the district such evidence as induced them to commit Mr. Smith to gaol, to take his trial for the wilful murder of Henry Thomson. As it was deemed essential to the attainment of justice, to keep secret the examination of the witnesses who were produced before the magistrates, all the information of which the public were in possession before the trial took place, was that which I have here narrated.

Lord Mansfield's charge to the grand jury upon the subject of this murder had excited a good deal of attention. He had recommended them, if they entertained reasonable doubts of the sufficiency of the evidence to ensure a conviction, to throw out the Bill; explaining to them most justly and clearly that, in the event of their doing so, if any additional evidence should, at a future time, be discovered, the prisoner could again be apprehended and tried for the offence; whereas, if they found a true Bill, and, from deficiency of proof, he was now acquitted on his trial, he could never again be molested, even though the testimony against him should be morally as clear as light. The grand jury after, as was supposed, very considerable discussion among themselves, and, as was rumoured, by a majority of only one, returned a true Bill.

Never shall I forget the appearance of anxiety exhibited upon every countenance on the entrance of the judge into court. In an instant the most profound silence prevailed; and interest, intense and impassioned, though subdued, seemed to wait upon every word and every look, as if divided between expectation and doubt, whether something might not even yet interfere to prevent the extraordinary trial from taking place. Nothing, however, occurred; and the stillness was broken by the mellow and silvery voice of Lord Mansfield—"Let John Smith be placed at the bar." The order was obeyed; and, as the prisoner entered the dock, he met on every side the eager and anxious eyes of a countless multitude bent in piercing scrutiny upon his face.—And well did he endure that scrutiny. A momentary suffusion covered his cheeks: but it was only momentary, and less than might have been expected from an indifferent person, who found himself on a sudden "the observed of all observers." He bowed respectfully to the court; and then folding his arms, seemed to wait until he should be called upon to commence his part in that drama in which he was to perform so conspicious a character. I find it difficult to describe the effect produced on my mind by his personal appearance; yet his features were most remarkable, and are indelibly impressed on my memory. He was apparently between forty and fifty years of age; his hair, grown grey either from toil, or care, or age, indicated an approach to the latter period; while the strength and uprightness of his figure, the haughty coldness of his look, and an eye that spoke of fire, and pride, and passion, ill concealed, would have led conjecture to fix on the former. His countenance, at the first glance, appeared to be that which we are accustomed to associate with deeds of high and noble daring; but a second and more attentive examination of the face and brow was less satisfactory. There was, indeed, strongly marked, the intellect to conceive and devise schemes of high import; but I fancied that I could trace, in addition to it, caution to conceal the deep design, a power to penetrate the motives of others, and to personate a character at variance with his own, and a cunning that indicated constant watchfulness and circumspection. Firmness there was, to persevere to the last; but that was equivocal; and I could not help persuading myself that it was not of that character which would prompt to deeds of virtuous enterprise, or to "seek the bubble reputation at the cannon's mouth;" but that it was rather allied to that quality which would "let no compunctious visitings of Nature shake his fell purpose," whatever it might be. The result of this investigation into his character, such as it was, was obviously unfavourable; and yet there were moments when I thought I had meted out to him a hard measure of justice, and when I was tempted to accuse myself of prejudice in the opinion I had formed of him; and particularly when he was asked by the clerk of the arraigns the usual question, "Are you guilty, or not guilty!" as he drew his form up to his fullest height, and the fetters clanked upon his legs, as he answered with unfaltering tongue and unblenching cheek, "Not guilty," my heart smote me for having involuntarily interpreted against him every sign that was doubtful.

The counsel for the prosecution opened his case to the jury in a manner that indicated very little expectation of a conviction. He began by imploring them to divest their minds of all that they had heard before they came into the box; he entreated them to attend to the evidence, and judge from that alone. He stated that, in the course of his experience, which was very great, he had never met with a case involved in deeper mystery than that upon which he was then addressing them. The prisoner at the bar was a man moving in a respectable station in society, and maintaining a fair character. He was, to all appearance, in the possession of considerable property, and was above the ordinary temptations to commit so foul a crime. With respect to the property of the deceased, it was strongly suspected that he had either been robbed of, or in some inexplicable manner made way with, gold and jewels to a very large amount; yet, in candour, he was bound to admit that no portion of it, however trifling, could be traced to the prisoner. As to any motive of malice or revenge, none could by possibility be assigned; for the prisoner and the deceased were, as far as could be ascertained, total strangers to each other.—Still there were most extraordinary circumstances connected with his death, pregnant with suspicion at least, and imperiously demanding explanation; and it was justice, no less to the accused than to the public, that the case should undergo judicial investigation. The deceased Henry Thomson was a jeweller, residing in London, wealthy, and in considerable business; and, as was the custom of his time, in the habit of personally conducting his principal transactions with the foreign merchants with whom he traded. He had travelled much in the course of his business in Germany and Holland; and it was to meet at Hull a trader of the latter nation, of whom he was to make a large purchase, that he had left London a month before his death.—It would be proved by the landlord of the inn where he had resided, that he and his correspendent had been there; and a wealthy jeweller of the town, well acquainted with both parties, had seen Mr. Thomson after the departure of the Dutchman; and could speak positively to there being then in his possession jewels of large value, and gold, and certain bills of exchange, the parties of which he could describe. This was on the morning of Thomson's departure from Hull, on his return to London, and was on the day but one preceding that on which he arrived at the house of the prisoner. What had become of him in the interval could not be ascertained; nor was the prisoner's house situated in the road which he ought to have taken. No reliance, however, could be placed on that circumstance; for it was not at all uncommon for persons who travelled with property about them, to leave the direct road even for a considerable distance, in order to secure themselves as effectually as possible from the robbers by whom the remote parts of the country were greatly infested. He had not been seen from the time of his leaving Hull till he reached the village next adjoining Smith's house, and through which he passed without even a momentary halt. He was seen to alight at Smith's gate, and the next morning was discovered dead in his bed. He now came to the most extraordinary part of the case. It would be proved, beyond the possibility of a doubt that the deceased died by poison—poison of a most subtle nature, most active in its operation, and possessing the wonderful and dreadful quality of leaving no external mark or token by which its presence could be detected. The ingredients of which it was composed were of so sedative a nature, that, instead of the body on which it had been used exhibiting any contortions, or marks of suffering, it left upon the features nothing but the calm and placid quiet of repose. Its effects, and indeed its very existence, were but recently known in this country, though it had for some time been used in other nations of Europe; and it was supposed to be a discovery of the German chemists, and to be produced by a powerful distillation of the seed of the wild cherry tree, so abundant in the Black Forest.

But the fact being ascertained, that the cause of the death was poison, left open the much more momentous question, by whom was it administered? It could hardly be supposed to be by the deceased himself! there was nothing to induce such a suspicion; and there was this important circumstance, which of itself almost negatived its possibility, that no phial, or vessel of any kind, had been discovered, in which the poison could have been contained. Was it then the prisoner who administered it? Before he asked them to come to that conclusion, it would be necessary to state more distinctly what his evidence was. The prisoner's family consisted only of himself, a housekeeper, and one man-servant. The man-servant slept in an out-house adjoining the stable, and did so on the night of Thomson's death. The prisoner slept at one end of the house, and the housekeeper at the other, and the deceased had been put in a room adjoining the housekeeper's. It would be proved, by a person who happened to be passing by the house on the night in question, about three hours after midnight, that he had been induced to remain and watch, from having his attention excited by the circumstance, then very unusual, of a light moving about the house at that late hour. That person would state, most positively, that he could distinctly see a figure, holding a light, go from the room in which the prisoner slept, to the housekeeper's room, and the light disappeared for a minute. Whether the two persons went into Thomson's room he could not see, as the window of that room looked another way; but in about a minute they returned, passing quite along the house to Smith's room again; and in about five minutes the light was extinguished, and he saw it no more.

Such was the evidence upon which the magistrates had committed Smith; and singularly enough, since his committal, the housekeeper had been missing, nor could any trace of her be discovered. Within the last week, the witness who saw the light had been more particularly examined; and, in order to refresh his memory, he had been placed, at dark, in the very spot where he had stood on that night, and another person was placed with him. The whole scene, as he had described it, was acted over again; but it was utterly impossible, from the cause above mentioned, to ascertain, when the light disappeared, whether the parties had gone into Thomson's room. As if, however, to throw still deeper mystery over this extraordinary transaction, the witness persisted in adding a new feature to his former statement; that, after the persons had returned with the light into Smith's room, and before it was extinguished, he had twice perceived some dark object to intervene between the light and the window, almost as large as the surface of the window itself, and which he described by saying, it appeared as if a door had been placed before the light. Now, in Smith's room, there was nothing which could account for this appearance; his bed was in a different part; and there was neither cupboard nor press in the room, which, but for the bed, was entirely empty, the room in which he dressed being at a distance beyond it. He would state only one fact more (said the learned counsel) and he had done his duty; it would then be for the jury to do theirs. Within a few days there had been found, in the prisoner's house, the stopper of a small bottle of a very singular description; it was apparently not of English manufacture, and was described, by the medical men, as being of the description used by chemists to preserve those liquids which are most likely to lose their virtue by exposure to the air. To whom it belonged, or to what use it had been applied, there was no evidence to show.

Such was the address of the counsel for the prosecution; and during its delivery I had earnestly watched the countenance of the prisoner, who had listened to it with deep attention. Twice only did I perceive that it produced in him the slightest emotion. When the disappearance of his housekeeper was mentioned, a smile, as of scorn, passed over his lip; and the notice of the discovery of the stopper obviously excited an interest, and, I thought, an apprehension; but it quickly subsided. I need not detail the evidence that was given for the prosecution; it amounted, in substance, to that which the counsel stated; nor was it varied in any particular. The stopper was produced, and proved to be found in the house; but no attempt was made to trace it to the prisoner's possession, or even to knowledge.

When the case was closed, the Judge, addressing the counsel for the prosecution, said, he thought there was hardly sufficient evidence to call upon the prisoner for his defence; and if the jury were of the same opinion, they would at once stop the case. Upon this observation from the Judge, the jury turned round for a moment, and then intimated their acquiescence in his lordship's view of the evidence. The counsel folded up their briefs, and a verdict of acquittal was about to be taken, when the prisoner addressed the court. He stated, that having been accused of so foul a crime as murder, and having had his character assailed by suspicions of the most afflicting nature, that character could never be cleared by his acquittal, upon the ground that the evidence against him was inconclusive, without giving him an opportunity of stating his own case, and calling a witness to counteract the impression that had been raised against him, by explaining those circumstances which at present appeared doubtful. He urged the learned Judge to permit him to state his case to the jury, and to call his housekeeper, with so much earnestness, and was seconded so strongly by his counsel, that Lord Mansfield, though very much against his inclination, and contrary to his usual habit, gave way, and yielded to the fatal request.

The prisoner then addressed the jury, and entreated their patience for a short time. He repeated to them that he never could feel satisfied to be acquitted, merely because the evidence was not conclusive; and pledged himself, in a very short time, by the few observations he should make, and the witness whom he should call, to obtain their verdict upon much higher grounds, upon the impossibility of his being guilty of the dreadful crime. With respect to the insinuations which had been thrown out against him, he thought one observation would dispose of them. Assuming it to be true that the deceased died from the effect of poison, of which he called God to witness that he had never even heard either the name or the existence until this day, was not every probability in favour of his innocence? Here was a perfect stranger, not known to have in his possession a single article of value, who might either have lost, or been robbed of, that property which he was said to have had at Hull. What so probable as that he should, in a moment of despair at his loss, have destroyed himself? The fatal drug was stated to have been familiar in those countries in which Mr. Thomson had travelled, while to himself it was utterly unknown. Above all, he implored the jury to remember, that although the eye of malice had watched every proceeding of his since the fatal accident, and though the most minute search had been made into every part of his premises, no vestige had been discovered of the most trifling article belonging to the deceased, nor had even a rumour been circulated that poison of any kind had been ever in his possession. Of the stopper which had been found, he disowned all knowledge; he declared, most solemnly, that he had never seen it before it was produced in court; and he asked, could the fact of its being found in his house, only a few days ago, when hundreds of people had been there, produce upon an impartial mind even a momentary prejudice against him? One fact, and one only, had been proved, to which it was possible for him to give an answer, the fact of his having gone to the bed-room of his housekeeper on the night in question. He had been subject, for many years of his life, to sudden fits of illness; he had been seized with one on that occasion, and had gone to her to procure her assistance in lighting a fire. She had returned with him to his room for that purpose, he having waited for a minute in the passage while she put on her clothes, which would account for the momentary disappearance of the light; and after she had remained in his room for a few minutes, finding himself better, he had dismissed her, and retired again to bed, from which he had not risen when he was informed of the death of his guest. It had been said, that, after his committal to prison, his housekeeper had disappeared. He avowed that, finding his enemies determined, if possible, to accomplish his ruin, he had thought it probable they might tamper with his servant; he had, therefore, kept her out of their way; but for what purpose? Not to prevent her testimony being given, for she was now under the care of his solicitor, and would instantly appear for the purpose of confirming, as far as she was concerned, the statement which he had just made.

Such was the prisoner's address, which produced a very powerful effect. It was delivered in a firm and impressive manner, and its simplicity and artlessness gave to it an appearance of truth. The housekeeper was then put into the box, and examined by the counsel for the prisoner. According to the custom, at that time almost universal, of excluding witnesses from court until their testimony was required, she had been kept at a house near at hand, and had not heard a single word of the trial. There was nothing remarkable in her manner or appearance; she might be about thirty-five, or a little more; with regular though not agreeable features, and an air perfectly free from embarrassment. She repeated, almost in the prisoner's own words, the story that he had told of his having called her up, and her having accompanied him to his room, adding that, after leaving him, she had retired to her own room, and been awakened by the man-servant in the morning, with an account of the traveller's death. She had now to undergo a cross-examination; and I may as well state here, that which, though not known to me till afterwards, will assist the reader in understanding the following scene:—The counsel for the prosecution had, in his own mind, attached considerable importance to the circumstance mentioned by the witness who saw the light, that while the prisoner and the housekeeper were in the room of the former, something like a door had intervened between the candle and the window, which was totally irreconcilable with the appearance of the room when examined; and he had half-persuaded himself, that there must be a secret closet which had escaped the search of the officers of justice, the opening of which would account for the appearance alluded to, and the existence of which might discover the property which had so mysteriously disappeared. His object, therefore, was to obtain from the housekeeper (the only person except the prisoner who could give any clue to this) such information as he could get, without alarming her by any direct inquiry on the subject, which, as she could not help seeing its importance, would have led her at once to a positive denial. He knew, moreover, that as she had not been in court, she could not know how much or how little the inquiry had already brought to light; and by himself treating the matter as immaterial, he might lead her to consider it so also, and by that means draw forth all that she knew. After some few unimportant questions, he asked her, in a tone and manner calculated rather to awaken confidence than to excite distrust,—

During the time you were in Mr. Smith's room, you stated that the candle stood on the table, in the centre of the room?—Yes.

Was the closet, or cupboard, or whatever you call it, opened once or twice, while it stood there?—A pause; no answer.

I will call it to your recollection; after Mr. Smith had taken the medicine out of the closet, did he shut the door, or did it remain open?—He shut it.

Then it was opened again for the purpose of replacing the bottle, was it?—It was.

Do you recollect how long it was open the last time?—Not above a minute.

The door, when open, would be exactly between the light and the window, would it not?—It would.

I forget whether you said the closet was on the right, or left, hand side of the window?—The left.

Would the door of the closet make any noise in opening?—None.

Can you speak positively to that fact? Have you ever opened it yourself, or only seen Mr. Smith open it?—I never opened it myself.

Did you never keep the key?—Never.

Who did?—Mr. Smith always.

At this moment the witness chanced to turn her eyes towards the spot where the prisoner stood, and the effect was almost electrical. A cold damp sweat stood upon his brow, and his face had lost all its colour; he appeared a living image of death. She no sooner saw him than she shrieked and fainted. The consequences of her answers flashed across her mind. She had been so thoroughly deceived by the manner of the advocate, and by the little importance he had seemed to attach to her statements, that she had been led on by one question to another, till she had told him all that he wanted to know. A medical man was immediately directed to attend her; and during the interval occasioned by this interruption to the proceedings, the solicitor for the prosecution left the court. In a short time the gentleman who had attended the witness returned into court, and stated that it was impossible that she could at present resume her place in the box; and suggested that it would be much better to allow her to wait for an hour or two. It was now about twelve in the day; and Lord Mansfield, having directed that the jury should be accommodated with a room where they could be kept by themselves, adjourned the court for two hours. The prisoner was taken back to gaol, and the witness to an apartment in the gaoler's house; and strict orders were given that she should be allowed to communicate with no one, except in the presence and hearing of the physician. It was between four and five o'clock when the judge resumed his seat upon the bench, the prisoner his station at the bar, and the housekeeper her's at the witness-box; the court in the interval had remained crowded with the spectators, scarce one of whom had left his place, lest during his absence it should be seized by some one else.

The cross-examining counsel then addressed the witness—I have very few more questions to ask of you; but beware that you answer them truly, for your own life hangs upon a thread.

Do you know this stopper?—I do.

To whom does it belong?—To Mr. Smith.

When did you see it last?—On the night of Mr. Thomson's death.

At this moment the solicitor for the prosecution entered the court, bringing with him, upon a tray, a watch, two money bags, a jewel-case, a pocket-book, and a bottle of the same manufacture as the stopper, and having a cork in it; some other articles there were in it, not material to my story. The tray was placed on the table in sight of the prisoner and the witness; and from that moment not a doubt remained in the mind of any man of the guilt of the prisoner. A few words will bring my tale to its close. The house where the murder had been committed was between nine and ten miles distant. The solicitor, as soon as the cross-examination of the housekeeper had discovered the existence of the closet, and its situation, had set off on horse back, with two sheriff's officers, and, after pulling down part of the wall of the house, had detected this important place of concealment. Their search was well rewarded: the whole of the property belonging to Mr. Thomson was found there, amounting, in value, to some thousand pounds; and to leave no room for doubt, a bottle was discovered, which the medical men instantly pronounced to contain the very identical poison which had caused the death of the unfortunate Thomson. The result was too obvious to need explanation.

The case presents the, perhaps, unparalleled instance of a man accused of murder, the evidence against whom was so slight as to induce the judge and jury to concur in a verdict of acquittal; but who, persisting in calling a witness to prove his innocence, was, upon the testimony of that very witness, convicted and executed.

A man whose great qualities want the ornament of exterior attractions is like a naked mountain with mines of gold, which will be frequented only till the treasure is exhausted.—Johnson.

Argument is to be invalidated but by argument, and is in itself of the same force, whether or not it convinces him by whom it is proposed.

STORY OF THE COUNTESS OF STAIR.

This house was occupied by the Dowager of the celebrated general and statesman, John, second Earl of Stair, who died in 1747. Her ladyship, after long exercising a sway over the haut ton of the Scottish capital, died here, November 21st, 1769, at a very advanced age. The late Mr. Mackenzie, author of the "Man of Feeling," informed the author that he recollected her ladyship living in this house. The close takes its name from her ladyship. Some remarkable circumstances in the early life of this lady formed the groundwork of a tale by the author of Waverly, under the title of "Aunt Margaret's Mirror." They are now related here in a more ample form. She was the youngest daughter of James, second Earl of Loudoun, and consequently was grand-daughter to that stern old Earl who acted so important a part in the affairs of the covenant, and was Lord Chancellor of Scotland during the troublesome times of the civil war. While very young, about the beginning of the eighteenth century, she was married to James, first Viscount Primrose, a nobleman of extreme bad temper, and what was worse, of very dissolute character. Her ladyship, who had a great deal of her grandfather in her, could have managed most men with great ease, by dint of superior intellect and force of character, but the cruelty of Lord Primrose was too much for her. He treated her so barbarously, that she had even to apprehend that he would some day put an end to her life. One morning, during the time she was laboring under this dreadful anticipation, she was dressing herself in her chamber, near an open window, when his lordship entered the room behind her with a sword drawn in his hand. He opened the door softly, and although his face indicated a resolution of the most horrible nature, he still had the presence of mind to approach her with the utmost caution. Had she not caught a glimpse of his face and figure in her glass, he would, in all probability, have approached her near enough to execute his bloody purpose before she was aware, or could have taken any measure to save herself. Fortunately, she perceived him in time to leap out of the open window into the street. Half dressed as she was, she immediately, by a very laudable exertion of her natural good sense, went to the house of Lord Primrose's mother—where she told her story, and demanded protection. That protection was at once extended; and it being now thought vain to attempt a reconciliation, they never afterwards lived together. Lord Primrose soon afterwards went abroad. During his absence, a foreign conjurer or fortune-teller came to Edinburgh, professing, among other wonderful accomplishments, to be able to inform any person of the present condition of other persons, at whatever distance, in whom the applicant might be interested. Lady Primrose, who had lost all trace of her husband, was incited by curiosity to go with a female friend, to the lodgings of this person in the Canongate, for the purpose of enquiring regarding his motions. It was at night, and the two ladies went, with the tartan screens, or plaids of their servants, drawn over their faces by way of disguise. Lady Primrose having described the individual in whose fate she was interested, and having expressed a desire to know what he was at present doing, the conjuror led her to a large mirror, in which she distinctly preceived the inside of a church with a marriage party arranged near the altar. To her infinite astonishment, she recognized in the shadowy bridegroom no other than her husband, Lord Primrose. The magical scene thus so strikingly displayed, was not exactly a picture; or if so, it was rather like the living pictures of the stage than the dead and immoveable delineation of the pencil. It admitted of additions to the persons represented, and of progress of action. As the lady gazed on it, the ceremonial of the marriage seemed to proceed. The necessary arrangements had at last, been all made; the Priest seemed to have pronounced the preliminary service; he was just on the point of bidding the bride and bridegroom join hands, when suddenly a gentleman, for whom the rest seemed to have waited a considerable time, and to whom Lady Primrose thought she recognized a brother of her own then abroad, entered the church, and made hurriedly towards the party.

The aspect of this person was at first only that of a friend, who had been invited to attend the ceremony, and who had come too late; but as he advanced to the party, the expression of his countenance and figure was altered very considerably. He stopped short; his face assumed a wrathful expression; he drew his sword and rushed up to the bridegroom, who also drew his weapon. The whole scene then become quite tumultuous and indistinct, and almost immediately vanished entirely away. When Lady Primrose got home, she wrote a minute narrative of the whole transaction, to which she appended the day of the month on which she had seen the mysterious vision. This narrative she sealed up in the presence of a witness, and then deposited it in one of her drawers.

Soon afterwards her brother returned from his travels, and came to visit her. She asked if, in the course of his wanderings, he happened to see or hear any thing of Lord Primrose. The young man only answered by saying that he wished he might never again hear the name of that detested personage mentioned. Lady Primrose, however, questioned him so closely that he at last confessed having met his Lordship, and that under very strange circumstances. Having spent some time at one of the principal Dutch cities—it was either Amsterdam or Rotterdam—he had become acquainted with a rich merchant, who had a very beautiful daughter, his only child, and the heiress of his enormous fortune. One day his friend, the merchant; informed him that his daughter was about to be married to a Scotch gentleman, who had lately come to reside there. The nuptials were to take place in the course of a few days, and as he was a countryman of the bridegroom, he was invited to the wedding. He went accordingly, was a little too late for the commencement of the ceremony, but, fortunately, came in time to prevent the union of an amiable young lady to the greatest monster alive in human shape, his own brother-in-law, Lord Primrose! Although Lady

Primrose had proved her willingness to believe in the magical delineations of the mirror, by writing down an account of them, yet she was so much surprised and confounded by discovering them to be consistent with fact, that she almost fainted away. Something, however, yet remained to be ascertained. Did Lord Primrose's attempted marriage take place exactly at the same time with her visit to the conjuror? To certify this, she asked her brother on what day the circumstance which he related took place. Having been informed, she took out her key, and requested him to go to her chamber, and open a drawer which she described, and to bring her a sealed packet which he would find in that drawer. He did as he was desired, when, the packet being opened, it was discovered that Lady Primrose had seen the shadowy representation of her husband's abortive nuptials, on the very evening they were transacted in reality. The story, with all its strange and supernatural circumstances, may only excite a smile in the incredulous reader. All that the narrator desires to say in its favor is this—it fell out in the hands of honorable men and women, who could not be suspected of an intention to impose on the credulity of their friends; it referred to a circumstance which the persons concerned had the least reason in the world for raising a story about; and it was almost universally believed by the contemporaries of the principal personages, and by the generation which succeeded.

HYMN TO THE STARS.

BY D. MARTIN.

Ye burning blazonry of God!
Ye glittering lights that never die!
That pave the realms by seraphs trod!
And hold untiring watch on high!
And circling Heaven's eternal King,
Ye dwell—His glorious fashioning!

Creation saw your timeless birth,
When from your own clear sapphire skies,
Ye gazed upon the virent earth—
An everlasting paradise!
And seemed to mock with silent gaze,
Nature's green garb and tuneless lays!

Since then ye've read the world's black page,
And seen a stream sublime,
Roll its dark waters o'er an age,
Of countless years of time!
In whose deep, dark, unletter'd caves,
Earth hides her mighty, as in graves.

Life's wasting—but ye still shine on,
And seem to me to be—
The lights upon the horizon
Of Eternity's black sea!
Pointing to the far-off sun-lit west,
Where all immortal spirits rest!

No man can possibly improve in any company, for which he has not respect enough to be under some degree of restraint.

Mental pleasures never cloy; unlike those of the body, they are increased by repetition, approved by reflection, and strengthened by enjoyment.

MARK LEE'S NARRATIVE.

"Toward Heaven's descent had sloped
"His waltzing wheel."

Milton in Lycidas.

An amiable youth, like thousands of others as young, as amiable, and as poor, was not many months since on the point of setting out for the Hesperia of the United States, or in plain English "The Western Country." This young man a few days before his departure, brought his Album to me, requesting the insertion of a piece as remembrancer of a friend. I put the Album in the drawer of my desk, and in the silence and quiet of the evening, drew it forth and spread it open on my table.

The circumstance roused all my own recollections. There was a something of more than common interest, of even awful in the very sound of "The West" which sighed to my heart in whispers of days, months and years, gone into the past. In the very first settlement of western Pennsylvania, amongst the emigrants were several families, from the banks of Swatara, in the neighbourhood of Hummelstown. Many of these were the intimate and cherished friends of my parents, who naturally sighed after their associates. Then, fifty-two years ago, "The West" was not what it is now, a smiling and widening garden. Even ideas of distance were then very different from what they are now. It is a fact which may well excite a smile, that in my native neighbourhood, "Illinois" was used as a term to express in the simple minds of a primitive people, the utmost limit, the Neplus Ultra. As late as 1785, when residing near Washington, then "Cat Fish's Camp," the first Geographical work ever put into my hands, contained a map on which the mouth and a very limited part of lower Missouri river were represented, with the following note:

"Traders and hunters, it is said, have ascended this river thirteen hundred miles, but its sources and branches are unknown."

The then mysterious West, was limited by Illinois river. I cannot resist relating an anecdote, as it illustrates the feelings and knowledge of the times.

On Swatara resided a poor itinerant Irish weaver or taylor, by the name of Eneas Grymes, and also a poor, but very corpulent Irish woman, named Jane Montgomery. The youngsters, for mischief, had much pleasure in teazing Grymes about Jane; and one day his good nature was tested beyond all bearing; Grymes in violent wrath, after a most bitter oath, exclaimed, "Before I'd marry Jenny Montgomery, I'd go to Illinois." If any man was now to swear, that in place of marrying any given woman, "He would go to Van Diemen's Land or New Zealand," the asseveration would have little force when compared with a trip in 1779, or 1780, from where Herrisburg now stands, to Illinois. Many, perhaps most of my readers, will doubt, perhaps if they do not actually deny the fact, that a voyage at present to New Zealand, and back to Philadelphia is, in point of difficulty and danger, a very inconsiderable affair to what was a journey fifty-five years ago from Philadelphia to the spot where stands Vandalia.

Is there not something seductive in vague or undefined danger? Can the conduct of man be otherwise explained, in the operations of voyages by sea; caravan journeying over trackless desarts; or those of land and naval warfare? I should reply myself in the affirmative, for long and severely was I schooled to the movements and motions of my fellow men in the settlement of the West, where danger presented itself in all the aspects from that of mere light shadowy terror, to death in all the terrific frowns which imagination can conceive, or that the most infuriate rage could inflict.

Though a child, I might say an infant of five years of age, well do I remember while playing on the floor with one brother older and one younger, on a very stormy night of the winter 1780–81, that after some conversation between my parents respecting their friends, already gone there, that my father exclaimed, half in jest, I believe, "why can't we go to 'the Western country?'" My mother replied in the same playful careless strain, "Why not?"——

In as short a time as preparations for his journey could be made, my father, early in 1781, put his design into effect; went to the West, made a cross on Buffaloe, about five miles westward of the now fine borough of Washington.

Think not kind reader, from the preceding, that you are to be treated with "My Life written by myself," no, that is a legacy I have bequeathed to posterity, the reversion to oblivion, and the above glance of self biography is introduced to establish the fact, that in this and many other Border Tales which may follow—I am writing of events, to which I was either an eye witness, or a very close hearer. To what I have already given as personal to myself, let me add, that from 1781, to 1815, or from my sixth to fortieth year, I resided in "The West." This residence of thirty-four years, has sometimes appeared to me as a troubled dream, when some works have been put into my hands, purporting, to give the character of that generation which subdued the wilderness. "These are not the men or women that I have seen," have I often mentally exclaimed; and have I not seen the men and women of the West, from the lakes of Canada to the Mexican Gulf? Have I not seen this people under every form that this new born society could offer, and under almost every vicissitude which could excite them to action?

To say there was nothing peculiar in the color and substance of Border Society, would be to run into the opposite extreme to the disgusting caricatures, which represent a most efficient generation as composed of Yahoos.

Before resuming the thread of my story, I must intrude one more remark. What has been called the distinguishing character of any given people, has never, in any case, been the real character of one tenth part of the individuals. The fact is, that the far greater part of every nation or fraction of nations, have to conduct the business of life, and have neither leisure or inclination to act those deviations from the ordinary pursuits of their respective callings, which afford travellers element for what they choose to entitle National Character. To sum up in a word what is, in most instances, given as the character of a nation, is almost invariably the most striking exception that can be given to the true character of that nation. Many, and fatal are the instances also, where this remark applies to individuals.

* * * * * *

Traversing the mountain valley in October, 1781, my infant eye first caught a view of the parade of war. It was at the very moment that Lord Cornwallis and his army found themselves in a position, from whence, either advance or retreat was alike beyond their power. The rumour of war on the Potomac, was far from the most appalling to families with little children advancing every day deeper into the gloom of the West. Yes, gloom I may repeat; with the very partial exceptions of a few recently founded villages and farms, "so few and far between," that they rather rendered the untamed face of nature still more striking, a dense forest swept over the mountains, and spread between the rivers to the then unknown regions in the interior of the continent.

Every day travellers on horseback passed in both directions our slow moving little caravan, and by both directions came reports of thrilling interest; but on the mother's heart of most appalling effect. Still we advanced to the bank of the Monongahela, to Chaffinch's Ford, where Brownsville now stands.

The season was rainy and unpleasant; the Ferry-house formed of two of the roughest log rooms joined into one cabin, and the whole joined to a constant stream of travelling both ways, gave a pavement of mud in and out doors. Young as I was, the scene was imprinted on my mind by incidents I seem to see at this moment. The morning after our arrival at Chaffinch's, my father and mother were sitting in the back part of the house; my sister, an infant not three months old, on her mother's breast, and myself and younger brother, still hanging on our father's knees. My poor terrified mother was pleading to stop, and my father, who had no dread of any particular danger, encouraging her to go on to the Buffaloe settlement, when their attention was arrested by a stranger on horseback, who winding down the hill, stopped at the tavern door, (tavern and ferry-house in one) and giving his horse to one of Chaffinch's sons, walked into the front room. This same front room already contained several persons, some of them loiterers from the neighbourhood, as it soon appeared. Every traveller was at the moment, a news-carrier, come in what direction he would, and the stranger had not even time to order his breakfast, until half a dozen mouths were open with questions regarding the continental and British armies. The stranger, with eyes sparkling replied:

"Oh! friends, fine news, Cornwallis has surrendered!"

A very rough man who was sitting near the fire-place, sprung to his feet, and without giving the stranger a moment to explain, gave him the lie direct, and in the next breath swore, that "No British army would surrender to the Buck-skins."

The stranger, a fine athletic looking man, took fire like tinder at the individual and national insult, and his eyes flashing fire, replied "Dont give me the lie again." But the instant the defiance was pronounced, the advocate of the British flashed the bright blade of a scalping knife in the face of the stranger, who sprang back, throwing off his coat. The whole house was in immediate uproar—women and children mixing their screams with the loud, hoarse, and angry voices of the men, and murder ready to be committed, when in stepped a man in the full dress of the western hunter warrior; his rifle poised in his left hand, and tomahawk in his right. Rushing between the combatants, he gently pushed the stranger back with his rifle hand, while he struck the knife from his opponent, who sunk back into his seat in the utmost terror. *

The hunter-warrior, a short, but very broad shouldered man, stood an instant viewing the crest fallen knife drawer, and then burst forth "Jee Timmons, do you know who I am?—Answer in a moment." "Mark Lee," at length replied Timmons, in great trepidation.

"Yes, it is Mark Lee, you infamous coward—you could draw your knife upon a stranger, and an unarmed stranger;—you could deny the success of a cause you never had courage to either oppose or support with even a knife in your hand; and —— but I need not say what all knows who ever knew you, that you are a villain. I have now, God forgive me, saved your life from this young man, in his own defence, or from being hung for wanton murder."

Timmons seemed now ready to make a move to get away, but the tomahawk of Lee once more flashed in rapid whirls over his head, as the warrior in a most astounding voice, exclaimed, "Keep your seat, or I'll not leave an ear on your head,—the head itself is not worth cutting off." This invitation Timmons obeyed, and Lee eyeing him again, burst into a laugh, which to be felt, must be heard, and then observing, in a most sarcastic tone "What a good soul it is"—then another laugh followed by—"Timmons, you have done my bidding once, now take up that knife and throw it behind that fire"—that order was obeyed, "Now, my good fellow, I have one more advice to give you," says Lee, "never be seen again with a knife by your side, for, if you do, I'll take care to find it employment on that scalp," and sheathing his tomahawk, continued, fitting the action to the word, "just so," and seizing the burly hairs of Timmons, he shook him round the room, while the poor wretch screamed with pain and fright.

At length Lee, with another laugh, whirled Timmons into his seat, and turning round, called out "Mr. Chaffinch, bring us a pint of your best; here's poor Joe Timmons breaking every tooth in his head with the ague; but I'll cure him." The spirits was brought in, and Lee filling a horn, handed it with a mock bow to his writhing victim, saying, "Toss it off my dear fellow, and streak it."

Timmons obeyed both orders promptly, and I saw no more of him that I ever knew of. Lee I knew long and well in after life. As soon as Timmons was off the scene, Lee turned to the stranger, observing, "Well friend, you say Cornwallis, and his red coats, have surrendered to our Buckskins!"

"I have been told so, and believe the fact," replied the stranger.

"And I have been told so before, and I believe the fact," replied Lee, "for two reasons I have no doubt. First I helped to trap Burgoyne and his red coats, and in the second place, I don't think a red coat is more in one place than in another."

Here the keen eye of the hunter glanced through the inner door on my mother and her children, and with the manly freedom, exempt from rudeness, which marked the men of his cast, rose, entered the room, and seated himself by her side, lifting little brother upon his knee.

"Well, good woman, I suppose you have come amongst us,—ticklish times—where are you going to settle."

Before my mother could answer, my father relieved her by satisfying the inquirer, and then adding, in an air far more careless than he felt, "Mr. Lee, you seem to be well acquainted with this country,—you don't think there is any danger of the savages?"

"You have a little family, so have I," replied Lee, "and it will not do to stop your fears by a falsehood—I do believe there is two kinds of danger from these savages. One from them, and another from our own foolery."

"In going in their way," said my mother, timidly.

Lee smiled and replied, "Yes, in going in their way, but not in the manner perhaps you mean."

"We are strangers to the country," said my father, solemnly, "we have entered it with our three little ones; as to myself, I have seen much of war, but nothing of Indian war, and as you appear friendly, and if you have time to spare, we would gladly receive from you some knowledge of the dangers, if any, before us."

* Let not the reader suppose that this was a man of straw, manufactured to be shot at; he really existed and made use of, in my hearing, of the very insulting expression recorded above; but it was not until many years afterwards, that I learned, that he was one of a similar set, who had from the commencement of its settlement, infested the vicinity of Redstone Fort. Mr. Withers, in the 167th page of his "Chronicles of Border Warfare," mentions this band, and then proceeds to state; that "So far did their opposition to those who espoused the cause of American liberty, blunt every finer and more noble feeling, that many of them were willing to embrue their hands in the blood of their neighbours, in the most sly and secret manner, and in the hour of midnight darkness, for no offence but attachment to the independence of the colonies. Mr. Withers then proceeds to relate, that a conspiracy had been formed to murder the Whigs, and for acceding to the terms offered by the Governor of Canada. This plot was discovered, and as our author states, only the ring-leader "of this fiendish league lost his life." He then concludes his account of the cowplot, by stating, that:—"A Court, for the trial of the conspirators was held at REDSTONE FORT, and many of them arraigned at its bar. But as their object had been defeated by its discovery, and as no further danger was apprehended from them, they were released, after having been required to take the oath of allegiance to the United States."

"What I have I'll give you freely," replied Lee, "I am one of the men called spies, and part of my duty is, to put people on their guard; and perhaps I cannot do my duty in your case better than just telling my own story."

By this time we were joined by several other persons, and all seemed anxious to hear Lee's little history, and the warrior seemed as willing to fight his battles once more, then commenced.

"Myself and two brothers were amongst the young men who left the banks of Potomac with Col. Cressap. In health and youth, and raised pretty much in the woods—in the woods we were at home. The Indian enemy, and hard beds on the ground, or on a rock, were what never disturbed our thoughts. Before crossing the mountains, I had from every mouth heard of that madman Braddock, and the scrape he had led his army into, and his own end. The name of this thing of feathers and cocked hat always came with Fool, Scoundrel, Rash Blockhead, or some other title, all of which it is likely he deserved, but I had not been long on this river, before I learned that General Braddock had left fools behind him. By the way, stranger, you say you have seen something of war, and of what you would call disciplined troops. When a boy I saw some of these disciplined troops, and by my gun that's now in my hand in these woods, they are the most undisciplined, confused, and stupid rabble that ever went blindfolded to be shot at. Why in their way, the Indians are the most completely disciplined men in the world. Were their arms as good, and their numbers half as great as ours, they would pick us out of these woods too soon. You, me, or any one else may call Braddock a fool, and tell no lie, but we are from the mountains to Ohio, doing in the small way, what this English fop did in the large. Now let me give you a bye-tale or two."

Old Cressap's advice always was, "when you fear Indians, never kindle a fire; eat meat raw, eat worms, or if you cannot do otherwise, why fast, but never kindle a fire—why an Indian," says Cressap, "can smell a fire as far as white man can see one."

"These things I laid by for use, and after I made that campaign under Capt. Van Swearingen, and General Morgan, and came back to the Monongahela, after having helped Burgoyne, and his red coats, to case themselves of their guns and shot-pouches, I had become just wise enough to know, that the only fire to make where you have these red rascals to fight, ought to be from the lock of your gun.

"Well, we were amusing ourselves in and about Old Red Stone Fort on the hill yonder, when in come a runner and told us, that a whole family was murdered on the head of Ten Mile Creek, not much above twenty miles from where we sit.

"Now we had a number of young chaps here, to whom General Braddock was as shy as an Indian. Not cowards, but careless, heedless, and of course conceited. To hear half a dozen of such talking, and if you believe all they said, one was a match for any three Shawnees. You know as you are an old soldier, that a barrel with its head knocked out does not much quicker lose its contents, than soldiers do their courage if they doubt their commander; and so every militia man is his own commander, if he loses confidence in himself, away he goes, and then catch him if you can.

"To head a few such heroes, in order to proceed to the scene of the late murder; give aid to the inhabitants, and bury the dead, I, Mark Lee was named. In all ten, and light on our occasions, we set out on our march. Another of Cressap's maxims, as he called them, was now given to this little army, "Keep your mouths shut, and never speak a word if you can help it, and never loud when an Indian enemy is near," but I might as well have attempted to stop the Monongahela, as the tongues of my companions; for it is useless to say they were under my command. Says I to myself, "I hope you'll receive a lesson before long, that will be of benefit to you, and one you'll never forget." Two of my terribles made themselves particularly merry as we marched along, by every once in a while levelling their rifles at some distant object, and exclaiming, "If that was only an Ingen," and in a thousand fooleries of the kind.

"As I had learned enough of the enemy, to know there was never so little to fear from them, as immediately after they had made a Stroke as we call it—I did not so much care, though much vexed. As I expected, we met no interruption until we arrived near the place of blood, at a block-house, where I joined, and was superseded in command, by a captain from the waters of Cheat River, who, with twenty men, and myself and nine, made thirty.

"I soon found that the hot blood of my boys was cool when compared to that of our captain. Nothing was listened to short of pursuing the red villains to the Ohio. With the captain I found a man of the name of Lewis Bonnet, who was a volunteer, and the only man of the whole thirty who really knew the country between us and the Ohio, and except myself, the only man in the company who understood the enemy.

"We reached the place about ten in the morning—and I will not shock you with any long description. The little clearing did not occupy or extend over three acres of a very narrow valley at the outskirts of the settlements. The woods were very heavy all around; the ground rich, and the high weeds and pea-vines give any person who really knew the manner of Indian marching, the means of tracking where they had come in and went out. We first buried the dead, and while the others were so employed, Bonnet and myself undertook to search for the Indian trail, as the captain would listen to nothing less than pursuit. The trail was soon found in advance and retreat, and the place where the Indians had lain watching their poor victims. We were both as anxious for vengeance as it was possible for men to be; but we found, by the broken and withered weeds, that the enemy had been gone long enough to have crossed the Ohio.

"We've fount dhe drail, Captain," says Bonnet, in his Pennsylvania broken English; "put dhe Ingens are far enufe—dhese fellers know wat dhere apout."

This was throwing a candle into the whiskey bowl. The captain was determined before, and more determined now.

"Vell, vell," says Bonnet, "away, I left town en Veeling," and turning round with a twitch of his nose, cries, "Come, come, Mark, vee'll go before."

"Show me the trail, says the captain, in thunder, 'do you suppose I'd lead you into danger, and then skulk behind?' No! I'll march before."

"Could Braddock beat this think you?" says Lee, and then proceeded with his narrative.

"We fell back, of course, after showing the trail, Bonnet observing to me in a low voice "Mine got ve'd pe in a fine bickle if dhe Ingens vere here." I made no reply, and all proceeded up the deep hollow about may be a mile, when our Commander in Chief, scrambling over a log, fell backwards under the feet of Bonnet, as the sharp crash of a rifle echoed through the woods. I was in all the battles with Morgan, in taking Burgoyne, but such a scream and such groans I never heard before or since.

"Bonnet who was at once our natural commander, and thought the captain mortally wounded, sprung himself behind a tree, calling out "Dhree poys dhree und spreat out." As many as remained obeyed the order; and some indeed, got as near the ground, as the ground would let them. To do my warriors justice, none ran away, but several of the captain's men were never again heard of by me, except while tearing the pea-vines behind us. There we all lay in breathless expectation, peeping past our trees, as far as we dare, in order to watch our enemy, no sound was heard except the dying groans of the heroic captain, and the cracking through the thicket behind us of some of our men who broke through the pea-vines and bushes with astonishing speed.

Bonnet, who may be, began to suspect the truth, but with the true caution of a really brave and disciplined man, examined the pan of his rifle, loosened his knife and tomahawk in their scabbards, and in a commanding tone ordered us to keep our places, crouched on his hands and knees to the expiring commander, demanding, in a half whisper,

"Captain, vere aare you vounded?"

"Oh, in my side," replied the captain.

"I see no plood," replies Bonnet, reaching at the same time to the captain's rifle lying beside him. As soon as Bonnet had the rifle in his hand, he sprung to his feet with a most boisterous laugh, exclaiming, as soon as he could get breath—

"Here poys, cume ant let us pury our captain; he ish not det, put he vill tie, for he is shot trough and trough mit his own rifle."*

We all crowded around them to see how matters stood. The captain, it appeared, in scrambling the lanes and commons of human life, and was also the companion and friend of Lewis Bonnet. Sitting together one day, when the course of conversation led me to repeat the incidents related to me by Bonnet, and now incorporated into this tale.

"Of the facts, I have no doubt," replied Jolly, for after I returned from the continental army, all caution was worse than neglected by our whites, because they confounded it with cowardice. It was only such men as Lewis Bonnet, Lewis, John, and Martin Wetsel, the Zanes', and a few others, and I may say myself, who then dared to oppose the Indian mode of warfare to themselves. Our young men would actually kindle a blazing fire, and lie down by it in the Indian country, and you see they are not yet cured of their madness."

The concluding remark of Jolly was pronounced with much bitterness, and alluded to the tragic event which led to our conversation. An event, which many of the old inhabitants about Wheeling, will very distinctly remember, should their eyes fall on this tale.

In the fall of 1794, thirteen years after the capture of Cornwallis, two men by the name of Scott, went over the Ohio, on a hunting expedition, taking with them, as a hireling, a man of the name of Thomas Mannery. The Scotts were fine looking men, and excellent riflemen; Mannery, a squat, and very ordinary person in appearance, only indeed fit for the woods; but low as was his stature, when in the woods he was fit for his business. The Scotts, unfortunately for themselves and families, despised poor Tom Mannery too much to take his advice.

After all that had happened under their eyes, these men fixed a camp, and at night made up blazing fires, setting their rifles against trees or other places, as it happened. Mannery, to whose mind all this was wrong, never quit his piece, even when eating or sleeping, nor sat in the open glare of their fire at night. So were the little party situated a few nights after their arrival in the woods. Mannery was seated where the light fell but faintly, but the two Scotts were fully exposed. A party of Indians advanced, and fired on them. One of the Scotts fell dead on the spot; his brother, wounded, ran a short distance, but was overtaken and murdered.

Mannery received a ball which broke his left arm just above the elbow, but having his weapon in his right hand, and observing the golden rule of war against Indians, reserved his fire. The rapid tact of Indians, who, in a moment, from the motions of their enemy, see whether that enemy is dangerous or not, taught them in this case not to rush upon Mannery with the tomahawk, and aided also by the dark, this wounded man made good his escape. Two of these blood seekers pursued him some distance, but as they pressed too close, Mannery took to tree. Several times, he said afterwards, he could have shot one, but such was his coolness, he reserved his fire and saved his life. I saw him in Wheeling often after his return, and heard him relate the adventure, while his broken arm was healing.

While on the subject of the closing of the Indian depredations in the vicinity of Wheeling, and as I may not again have as appropriate a place, I must introduce two circumstances more, to which I was in part an eye witness.

Mr. Alexander S. Withers, in his Chronicle of Border Warfare, published at Clarksburg, Harrison county, Virginia, 1831, after detailing the murders committed on a family of the name of Bozarth, on the Buchannon branch of Tygart's valley river, in the summer of 1795, sums up by saying

* The reader may think this scene overwrought, but with a few imaginary incidents, not at all material to the story, I have now put it on paper, as I heard it related by Bonnet himself, in his own house in Wheeling, forty years since. It was related when many of the actors were living; and with that and the character of the old warrior himself, I had no doubt of its truth; but in the ensuing year I received the full confirmation of its truth. Captain Henry Jolly, one of Gen. Morgan's immortal rifle corps, was residing in the village, now flourishing town of Wheeling. Jolly was a man of excellent natural sense, and not devoid of that kind of education which is picked up along bling over the fallen tree, had cocked his piece, and slipping, fell backwards, and the rifle discharging in the fall, as he struck his side on a broken limb; the poor man in the confusion, actually thought he was shot, as he was indeed severely hurt in the fall. When all was explained, the situation of the captain was about such as that of Joe Timmons, a while ago, except that the poor captain was really badly bruised, and no Tory. You might say he was a coward, but I believe no such thing. He was only employed upon what he knew nothing about—and what more or less could be said of Braddock?—But to go on.

The captain, you may well suppose, felt as good as dead, when his danger was removed, and Bonnet did not spare him in his distress, observing:—

"Now my tear captain, I'll gife you one biece of advise, zust go home, and neever again go hoonting Ingens undil you laarn how."

How far the captain followed the advice, I know not, as I never heard of him since. He and those of his men who remained with him, now separated from Bonnet, and myself, and nine men. There we were in the woods, and after the departure of our warriors over the river Bonnet asked me if I intended to return to Redstone. I told him, I had orders to proceed, after I had performed my first duty, to Ryerson's Fort, which I was to assist to garrison until further orders. He then informed me, that he was himself to pass by that place on his way home, and would act as guide if necessary. This I very gladly accepted, and we set out. Late in the evening we reached the Fort, or stockaded Block-House, and next morning parted with our guide."

To all this none listened with perhaps such intense interest, as my mother, but Lee, fixing his eye on my father, observed, "I see by your looks that you think I am using a hunter's liberty; but wait a few moments, and you will hear worse, and all true, marvellous as it may be.

"Joe Timmons is only a worthless, cowardly scoundrel, but Simon Girty is an infernal villain, such a villain as can only be formed by a mixture of all that's bad in Indian and white. This monster is amongst the Indians, and as an example of how completely our people can be decoyed to destruction, by men they call savages, let me just relate the attack on Wheeling Fort, and the massacre above Grave Creek.

"Wheeling is not alone our outpost—it is the

"This was the last mischief done by the Indians in North-western Virginia."—Chronicles, &c. page 319.

In this, though I am not certain, I am inclined to think Mr. Withers mistaken. In the same year, the Indians fell upon a family whose name I cannot now recall, though I knew the man personally, who resided on the waters of Wheeling, and within one mile of the house of Lewis Bonnet. The mother, and I think two small children, were murdered; the man, though badly wounded, escaped, and was brought to Wheeling, and there cured of his wounds.

The last human blood, however, shed in war near Wheeling was that of an Indian, on the morning of March 21st, 1795, and as the circumstances illustrate, in a very striking manner, one of the objects of this tale, I shall introduce them into this note, with some detail.

The Indians had been defeated on the 20th of August, 1794, and all fears of them ever again appearing near Wheeling, in a hostile manner, had subsided. Early in March, 1795, a party was made up in Wheeling, to proceed to the Muskingum, on a land jobbing expedition. This party crossed the Ohio on the 20th, and proceeded to near where St. Clairsville now stands. Some of these men had been so long in the habit of regarding themselves in danger, when west of the Ohio, that they suggested some caution, and on the morning of the 21st, when ready to move, two men, whose names may as well as not be omitted; noted hunters they were, and acquainted with every part of the adjacent country, and now volunteered their services to advance ahead of the main body as a guard. This was accepted, and to the wonder of the party, a young man by the name of Denny, only a short time from Ireland, insisted on also being of the advanced guard. With some little mirth, at the latter circumstance, all moved forward.

Denny, kept in the rear of his more experienced companions, and was no little amused by one or other repeatedly raising his rifle and levelling it on some object, exclaiming, "if that was but an Indian." At length they came to a place on the trace where it wound very abruptly back upon its course round a very deep and thickly wooded hollow. Denny, who was in fact, the only one of the three who was really attending to the duty they had to perform, espied through the intervening branches, three men, who, as the path curved, were walking in the same direction with himself and comrades, and must have met face to face at the loop of the road. Denny thought at once that they were Indians, and stepping up to the man next to him, and by a jerk brought him round, pointed out the enemy.

The Indians had not yet seen the whites, but the instant that the two heroes who so much desired to see Indians, were gratified, they thought a small part of the show would answer, actually turned and ran backwards at the top of their speed.

If all the Zanes, and all the Wetzels, had been training Denny from his cradle, he could not have behaved much better. It was only when the two white men turned to run, that the Indians espied them, and without following the road, they dashed across the ravine. It was not even known whether or not they saw Denny, who had "taken the tree," until they were rising the bank near him, where they tree'd also. With their unerring keeness of eye, the Indians saw by his movements, that Denny was not a practised warrior, determined to draw his fire. In this they succeeded, but with a consequence they did not probably expect. One discharged his piece, calculating what happened, that the white man would do so also. The Indian intentionally threw away his fire, but Denny did not, for the savage received a ball through his heart, and through the smoke of his own rifle. If he had been unsupported, such a proceeding would have cost Denny his life in all human probability. But the whole affair transpired in less time than I have been making the record, and as soon as the rifles were discharged in rapid succession, the main body, seventeen or eighteen in number, raised a shout and set forward. The two surviving Indians fled, and the party returned with his scalp and gun, as the spoils of a man, who like myself had never before seen such a trophy, and such a memento of what man may be.

I close this note, by stating, that though bred from an infant in the frontier, this was the only one of these disgusting memorials of victory I ever actually beheld.

outpost of white inhabitants on the continent of North America. This Fort, if it can be called one, was established by authority of Government, in 1769, by the Zane family, Ebenezer, Andrew, Silas, and Jonathan, and in fourteen years has become the defensive point of a settlement extremely flourishing, if we allow for its position. It is the most important post on the Ohio, from Fort Pitt, downwards, and yet, four years ago, when we were busy catching Burgoyne, Wheeling, though in name a garrison under the Government, had not in it, or nearer than Fort Pitt, a single regular soldier. The only true guard of the country was, and is, our *Scouts. These men are too few in number, however, and generally, too young to have much influence beyond their individual exertions. In the spring, and early in the summer of 1777, four years since, our scouts reported Indian signs, and as no very remarkable outrages had been committed, suspected the warriors who made the marks to be spies, examining the state of the country. Information was sent in at the same time, from friendly Indians, of the Moravian towns, that preparations were making at Detroit, and in the towns of the hostile Indians, to organize a force which was, no doubt, intended to invade the Ohio settlements. Having no regular troops, the inhabitants were left to their own resources, and all was activity. The Fort at Wheeling was put into a state of defence; and the scouts became more than usually active. By some means, the Indians and their allies were made acquainted with the fact, that the whites on the Ohio were on their guard, and the invasion was delayed.

As week after week passed, and no invading force appeared, the whites gradually relaxed their vigilance, attended to their crops and other business, and finally relapsed into careless security.

"From this security, the people were awakened late in August. The dreadful news reached Wheeling, that an army composed chiefly of Indians, of the Northern confederacy, but commanded by Simon Girty, had reached the Moravian towns on the Muskingum. General Hand, who then commanded Fort Pitt, and was the superior military officer in the country, was made acquainted with the state of things in the Indian country.

"The intermediate country was supplied with Block-Houses, but the only village below Fort Pitt, was at Wheeling. Eight years before, a forest untouched. That place in the summer of 1777, had already a town of thirty houses. Fine farms had been opened, and stock of horses, cows, and hogs, increased beyond belief. In fact, a wealthy little colony had risen on Wheeling Creek. Lulled into forgetfulness of the necessity of more watchfulness and preparation, though so recently advised of their danger, these people were at last taken by surprise.

"Ebenezer Zane, though a regular officer, and himself and brothers, as wary as men could be, they had no legal authority over the people. The erection of a defensive enclosure for their stock, had been urged, but neglected; and on the first morning of September, Wheeling, and all around it had the appearance of peace and safety. The approaching Indians, conducted their march with consummate skill, avoiding the usual routes of approach. Captain Ogal with twelve men, had been engaged several days, in scouting through the woods to guard against the approach of danger, returned to Wheeling on the evening of the first of September, reporting that no enemy was near, and yet, in that very night the invading Indians, (near four hundred strong) approached, and made their dispositions within very little more than rifle shot of the fort. The lights seen in the fort, occasioned in part by the arrival of Captain Ogal and his party, induced the Indians to suppose the very reverse of what was true, that the people were on their guard. This mistake caused the enemy to delay the attack, and change their dispositions; this saved the whole body of inhabitants from destruction. I have said, that the Indians in their own way, are the most disciplined of men; but I may here observe, that like all other men, it is only in their own manner of fighting that they are so well disciplined. Against the most feeble fort, a block-house, or even a well defended common house, they are in fact a contemptible enemy. On the contrary, however, it is real matter of astonishment; the skill with which these men of the woods, draw the whites into positions, to give themselves the full advantage of their forest mode of warfare.

*Scouts, or spies, as they were indifferently called, were men employed to scout the woods, and watch the approach of Indians. They were generally young, active and sober men, and in the then condition of the West, were of the most pre-eminent service to the settlements. It may be here remarked, as an instance how quickly and surely men accommodate themselves to their situation. They were remarkable in their ordinary intercourse with society, for taciturnity and watchfulness. Of the two most eminent Scouts in North Western Virginia, this could be said emphatically. Lewis Wetsel, and Jonathan Zane, were almost as careful of their words as of their ammunition. These men are gone to rest, and most of their gallant, brave, and generous companions sleep with them, and their usefulness is rapidly fading from memory, but no language can now convey an idea of the estimation in which they were held upwards of twenty years, from Dunmore's campaign in 1774, to the treaty of Greenville, 1795.

It is because I personally knew many of these hunter-warriors, and because the general character of the caste to which they belonged, was long exposed before me, that I have no patience, nor pretend to patience, when I read the trash that is yet issuing from the press as descriptive of their manners, and language—the latter in particular. I was in the country in the fourteenth year after its original settlement by Whites—Red Stone Fort, where the Scene of "Mark Lee's Narrative," was laid on the basis of fact, was established in 1767, and Wheeling two years afterwards. The language, habits, manners and customs of the western people, if to any very sensible extent, were found different from the same characteristics east of the Mountains, the contrast was far indeed from being to the disadvantage of the West. Amongst the circumstances of my existence, the most felicitous to myself, is, that after half a century is past, I live to give my feeble, but sincere testimony to a body of people whose intrinsic worth is not hearsay, but experience; and shall be remembered until I follow to their home.

"Wheeling creek, in its windings, meets the base of a hill about one mile above its mouth. Inflected by this hill, the creek winds to the southward nearly parallel to the Ohio, and curving again, is lost in that river, having a tongue of land between the two streams. The bottom next the Ohio, on which the fort and village stands is rather high, but narrow, and is followed by the hills, here very steep. Most of the hill was in wood when the Indians came before the fort, but there were some naked spots in full view from the fort and village. The Indians were formed in two lines, extending from the river below the fort, across the bottom, and around the southern extremity of the hill. In the front line a considerable interval was left on both sides of a road leading into some of the cleared bottom, and along the lower margin of one of the cleared spots on the hill side. So silently and skillfully were all their arrangements made, that in complete security the people saw day breaking over the high hill to the east.

"The most sufficient man in the fort, was certainly Ebenezer Zane, and under him were ranged the inhabitants of the village and neighbourhood; but the militia drawn from the settlements more eastward, who were then in the fort at Wheeling, were about equally divided between Captains Mason and Ogal, and did not amount to thirty men.

"Samuel Mason, an ignorant man, now living in the very neighbourhood to which you are moving, and except being rashly brave, and a good rifleman, is utterly unfit for any command. Pretty near the same may be said of Captain Ogal. Very early in the morning, two men left the fort, and passed the first line of Indians in search of horses. Six Indians had been stationed in the centre, who as the two white men advanced, shot one down, and suffered the other to escape; and then showing themselves openly, taunted the garrison, holding up the bloody scalp. The Zanes, and every other person in the fort, who had any knowledge of the Indian character, pronounced at once, that the six warriors were a decoy; but Mason became outrageous, and insisted on marching out, which he did in defiance of all advice, calling those cowards who refused. The worst of such conduct, is the dreadful alternative which it presents to brave men. There is little doubt, but that the most of Mason's men knew they were rushing to destruction, yet twelve followed him to the fatal field. The six warriors provoked the party on past the first line, were enveloped, and Mason himself wounded in two places, was the only one of the whole thirteen who escaped instant death. *

* Well would it have been for Capt. Samuel Mason, if he had fallen with his gallant companions on the field at Wheeling. After the end of the war of the revolution, he removed with his family to the southward, and when advanced beyond middle age, about 1800 to 1805, became the leader of a band of highway robbers, between Natchez and Tennessee. Though I believe neither Mason, or any of his band, ever imbrued their hands in human blood, they were a very severe evil to the country on both sides of their wilderness haunts.

About 1802, one of Mason's sons was brought to Natchez, under a charge of robbery, tried, convicted, and punished by whipping. This poor man, it appeared afterwards, was not only innocent of the offence with which he was charged, but that he was opposed at heart to his father's conduct, and was convicted merely from the natural connection. One of the jury, whose name I omit, made himself very conspicuous on the trial of John Mason, wishing before the whole court and audience, that "the rascal might be hung."

By some means, Samuel Mason received a report of this speech, with additions, no doubt, but the affair passed at the moment. Some months afterwards, the juryman was returning to Natchez, from a journey he had made to the upper part of the then white settlements, and alone on horseback, bending his way along a mere bridle path, through a very heavy brake of cane. This enormous grass presents in such places a wall impenetrable to the eye to any distance beyond a few feet. On this lonely path, suddenly issued from the cane, and before the rider, a man armed with tomahawk, scalping knife, and shining rifle. Mason at any time of his life, or in any situation, had something extremely ferocious in his look, which arose particularly from a tooth which projected forward, and could only be covered with his lips by effort. This, with the thousand and one tales afloat at the time respecting "Mason the robber," and the conduct of the man towards his son, all combined to render his presence unspeakably frightful.

Stepping into the path and presenting his rifle, the horseman stopped, and the two stood eyeing each other a few moments.

"Your name is ——— I presume, ?" said the footman.

"That is my name," replied the horseman.

"And mine is Samuel Mason," rejoined the footman, knitting his brows and clinching his teeth.—"two days have I waited your coming, to blow your brains out."

"Oh! Mr. Mason I have a wife and children."

"Children," replied Mason, in a voice which pierced the very heart of the trembling horseman—"children, and d—n you, do you think I don't love my children as much as you can yours. You thirsted for the blood of my son;—did ever John Mason do you any harm?"

"Never."

"Did I myself ever do you any injury?"

"None whatever."

"Did you ever hear of me committing murder, or suffering murder to be committed?"

"I have not, Mr. Mason."

"Thank God," asseverated Mason, with great earnestess, "I have never shed blood—but now—come down Sir. If you have any-thing to say to your Maker say it,—I give you five minutes."

The terrified man sunk off the horse, and fell on his knees, uttering a fervant prayer, addressed rather to the man, who stood beside him with his gun cocked. At length his words failed him, and he burst into a violent shower of tears.

The man himself, who afterwards related the whole circumstance, and could scarce ever do so without tears at the remembrance, said, he every moment expected death; but Mason regarding him with a bitter smile, swore his life was not worth taking, wheeled round, and in an instant disappeared amongst the cane.

Recently, a tale has went the rounds, of the public papers, in which it was stated, that Mason was finally executed. This to my certain knowledge, was untrue. Sometime, I think in the latter end of 1803, or early in 1804, Charles C. Claiborne, then governor of the Mississippi territory, offered by proclamation, a reward of five hundred dollars, for the head of Samuel Mason, dead or alive. This was done in order to "The situation of the whites was now terrible; the people of the village flying, with scarce their common clothing, to the fort; the screams of Mason's men, who were hacked to pieces with the tomahawk, and the still more piercing cries of the women and children, who every moment expected the appearance of their enemy in the village. In the midst of this fearful tumult, Captain Ogal led his men into exactly a similar snare, which had drawn Mason's party to destruction. Ogal advanced with twelve scouts, across the narrow plain, between the fort and hill; the men were in front of their commander, and were suffered to pass the outer line of Indians, and when fired on, the Captain being still on the outside of the enemy's line, threw himself into a thicket, where he remained until next day, and finally regained the fort. Out of twenty-six men thus stupidly exposed by these two officers, three only escaped, and one only unwounded.

The only benefit obtained by such waste of blood, was to admit the escape of many of the inhabitants into the fort; a result, which would have been much more securely obtained, by the two parties of militia uniting, and by adopting their own mode, awed the Indians, and covered the retreat of the inhabitants.

Incredible as it may appear, the events I have been relating happened in little more time than I have employed in giving the relation. The gates of the fort had scarcely been closed, when the comparatively overwhelming army of Indians issued forth, headed by that worst of villains, Simon Girty, who summoned the fort to surrender, in the name of the king of Great Britain, and under the terms offered in Governor Hamilton's proclamation—pledging protection in case of submission, and instant destruction in case of resistance. To meet this terrible alternative, Col. Ebenezer Zane had thirty-three men, in a feeble fort, crowded with women and children, whose terrors influenced them to plead for surrender. In this moment of horror, a saviour appeared in the form of a young woman, a Pennsylvania German—Betsy Wheat, who answered Girty in no measured or flattering terms, shamed such of the men who appeared disposed to yield, and encouraged the women, by telling them that their own lives, and that of their children depended on their arms.

Thus supported Col. Zane pronounced defiance, and the assault commenced, and continued until nearly the same hour the next day, when Girty, and the other savages finding they made no impression on the fort, and dreading the reinforcement which would of course march to the relief of the place, gave up the enterprise; but before commencing their retreat, left not a living animal of the stock of the inhabitants which they could find, or a cabin unconsumed. Upwards of three hundred head of horses, cows, and hogs were shot down, and their dead bodies left to taint the air. And mingled with the carcasses of their domestic animals, lay the corpses of twenty-three men, imprudently, but generously sacrificed in their defence.

Such a lesson any one would suppose, would have been effectual for some time at least—but hear a little more. The dead slain at Wheeling were scarce cold in their graves, when a Capt. Foreman, with a company of militia, arrived from beyond the mountains, to take station at Wheeling, and protect the people. Indian signs were often seen, and the spies were frequently making reports of lurking war parties; and to watch these parties, was the peculiar duty of the spies.

On the 26th of September, Capt. Foreman led forty-five men down the Ohio, to Grave Creek, and was on his return, when about three miles above Grave Creek station, he encamped for the night. Unpractised in Indian warfare, and as obstinately bent on taking no advice from those who were, as even Braddock could be—Foreman suffered his men to kindle large fires, and lie down by them, as if provoking danger, and enabling the Indians to approach and examine his number and force in safety. A young man of the name of Lynn, had accompanied Foreman with three or four more settlers as spies. The kindling fires in the night was so utterly contrary to Lynn's notions of propriety, that he remonstrated—but finding his caution neglected, retired to some distance with his own men, and thus spent the night.

The dawn found Lynn and his little party on the watch, and even before day Lynn and his men felt convinced they heard the breaking of sticks by men walking slowly, and also the splashing of water in the Ohio, made by men pushing canoes.

These signs were made known to, and scouted by Foreman, who, with his men recommenced their march towards Wheeling, and soon reached the lower end of the Narrows; and again ventured to suggest the great impropriety of continuing through the pass, and advised following the hill top, as they would there see all around them. Captain Foreman replied by some insulting language. The vigilant spy preserved his temper, and observed:—

destroy their mutual confidence, and had the effect on Mason's band, as his head was actually brought to Natchez, in the spring of 1803, or 1804, I cannot distinctly remember in which year, by two men, of the names of Sutton, and May. Never did a more striking instance of retributive justice occur. Mason was shot by one of these villains, expecting the reward. The Governor, it is probable, would have cheerfully paid the sum, to any citizen, who had abated such a nuisance, and proved the head; but never intended to screen any of the gang from justice, for such a service; refused the demand of Sutton, and May, unless full proof was given, that the head offered, was really that of Samuel Mason, the robber.

While these wretches were altercating about their claim, Col. —— Winter, of Kentucky, or Arkansa, who had been robbed on the Mississippi river, sometime before, by the very same Sutton, and May, arrived at Natchez. This active and determined man had warrants issued, and they learning their danger, fled from Natchez, but were taken in Jefferson county, Mississippi, and confined in Greenville jail; and in due time, tried, convicted, and executed.

These were the leading facts, which broke up a nefarious band, and such was the real termination of the life of Mason, whose rashness, occasioned the Wheeling massacre. When Mason fell, and his destroyers met a due reward, I was myself residing near Natchez.

"Captain Foreman, if there is an Indian on this side of the Ohio, and that there is a large party, I am sure, they are now at the head of the Narrows, and my advice is to keep the ridge and avoid the bottoms."

"This was responded to, by the term "Coward."

"Lynn stood a moment, and then replied "You and your men may do as you please, but we, addressing his own companions, will keep the ridge; and thus the two parties separated, and set out on their march in return to Wheeling. The intention of Lynn at first was to ascend the hill to its summit, but his generous feelings prevailed, as he felt convinced, that Foreman and his men would be attacked at the head of the Narrows, and if so far off as the hill top, he could give no aid. The five men then turned along the hill side, as near the other body as he thought prudent.

"Immediately at the head of the Narrows, there is a hollow of the bottom, a kind of basin or sink, near the margin of which the path winds. As Foreman and his men reached this fatal spot, one of them picked up some Indian ornaments found lying on the path, and all halted to examine the object, closing upon one another, and while in that position received a volley, every ball of which pierced a man—and then a second, and it is almost certain that every man would have met instant death, had it not been for Lynn and his four companions. The moment the Indians opened the fire, Lynn and his men in place of flying, which they could have done in safety, raised a shout as loud as in their power, separating from each other to a considerable distance, and discharging their guns. This brave and gallant conduct alarmed the Indians, who now thought themselves exposed to a large reinforcement, retreated at their utmost speed. But Captain Foreman with two of his sons, with eighteen more men, found a grave in the very hollow place where their crafty enemy lay concealed. It was the opinion of the spies, and of Ebenezer Zane, on examining the ground and Indian signs, that the whole number of Indians did not exceed, if it equalled, that of the slain."

Here the veteran Ranger paused an instant; grasping his rifle, as if in the act of rising, but as if struck with an after thought, slaunted his piece between his knees, resting the barrel on his left shoulder, and casting his keen grey eyes on my parents, continued "Pass yon river, and you are in a country of bold action, and where thoughts rest not on trifles. The woods and the Indians are your enemies; brace your mind to set both at defiance; your hands are your friends. The picture I have placed before you, is the worst view. How strongly are even the faults of some, and crimes of others, met by the opposite characters in the progress of these new settlements. To Braddock, have we not to oppose George Washington, and on a more confined scale, and in events of lesser importance; if we have a white Girty with the Indians, we have also with them Isaac Zane. Have I not, indeed, in every instance I have mentioned shown you the extremes of rashness, and cool deliberate caution. These things faintly described by me, a man of the woods from youth, will become stronger in your eyes every mile you tread towards Ohio. Farewell."

A mountain seemed to be removed from the breasts of both my parents, and in a few days afterwards, the Rubicon of that day, the Monongahela, was passed by us all; and in those regions were spent the early and middle life of

VERSES

Written on reading Miss WIRT's letter descriptive of the last moments of her father.

The bird that sung thy sire's funeral lay,
Hath never hymn'd such lofty strains as thine!
The sun which did, upon that mournful day,
Bless with his light thy dying parent's shrine,
Appeared less lovely in the house of death
Than thou, fair lady! blessing with still breath
The heaven-summoned soul, who, made divine
By the rich mercy of his Saviour's grace,
Was soon to meet his Master, face to face.

Lady! I would each parent of your land
Did own a daughter of as fair a mind
As thine must be; then would affection's hand
Support declining years, and old age find
Not only sustenance from children's wealth,
But a far nobler boon; a holy health
Blessing their spirits;—as a genial wind
Is to the dying flowers of the spring
A valued treasure past imagining.

Is it not beautiful, when manhood's prime
Fades into Age, to see a gentle girl
Guarding the feelings of her childhood's time,
"Nature's inheritence," from the rude whirl,
The spirit-killing whirl of Folly's sea?
Whose scarcely noticed waves continually
Make shipwreck of our hopes, and then unfurl
Over the regions of the happy past
Destruction's banner to life's very last.

Long be thy womanhood's blotless page
Writ in the Book of Life, where we may trace
Much that is lovely; till a green old age,
Silently changing every youthful grace
Into its heavenly nature, you ascend
Unto your father's kingdom; and each friend
Known, loved, and valued on this earthly stage,
Shall joy, their sister in an honored grave
Hath passed Affliction's troubled bitter wave.

Thou wilt not know Affliction. 'Tis for thee
The shadow of a shade. Its bitter tear
May dim the brightness of thine eyes, and be
Its mirror on thy hectic'd cheek;—its fear
(Mail'd in such holy armor as thou art)
Can never pass the threshold of thy heart.
And strives in vain to gain admittance there,
The spirit of Affliction is its fears;
Bereft of them, it perishes in tears. E. G.

The Drop Scene.

BY THE REV. MOSART CAUNTER.

I had at all times a restless propensity for practical jokes, but I have lived long enough to find that, "like young chickens, they always come home to roost." Experience is a stern disciplinarian; she is, nevertheless, the nurse of wisdom, and but for her sage lessons, how often should I have disgraced my grey hairs by frolics which were once dear to my heart, and which I have only relinquished because I so frequently found that they left either a sting or a bitter behind.

Propensities and antipathies are merely converse qualities of our moral nature, both equally difficult to subdue. It is perhaps impossible to struggle against either with any certainty of success, until the actual cautery of experience has been long enough applied to deaden the one, or correct the other. My propensities in early life were always active. There was a natural vehemence in my moral temperament, which I found it scarcely possible to control; and both in mind and body I felt a restless impatience for action, which was perpetually involving me in some difficulty or danger. Nothing could exceed the delight which I took in the execution of a practical joke; and to praise my dexterity in an acquirement so perfectly unexclusive, was at once to open the nearest passage to my heart. With me this propensity was an absolute monomania. I was however cured of my fits of agreeable delerium, without being subjected to the discipline of a shorn crown or a strait waistcoat. I have made up my mind, as a penance for past folly, to record my own shame, by telling how I was cured of my volatile propensities.

I was born in a village in Staffordshire, in the vicinity of numerous coal-pits, into which I had descended with that eager thirst of curiosity so prevalent in young and ardent minds. To me the scene was new and inspiring; and when I gazed upon the wonders beneath the earth, I derived from them a greater zest in contemplating the wonders above it. I took infinite delight in listening to the superstitious legends of "goblins damned," so readily and gravely related by the old pit men; and these subterranean tenements were the frequent resort of my holiday hours. As I was of an active and buoyant temperament, excitement with me was the one thing needful, the ne plus ultra of moral enjoyment; and that particular excitement occasioned by the plan and execution of a practical jest, was above all things what I most dearly loved. This was in truth but a childish predilection; nevertheless, it grew up with the man; so that though in my adolescent year I could truly say, that "I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child," yet I could not predicate of myself that "when I became a man I put away childish things." Matrimony it was thought would sober my restless and mercurial habits, and I was accordingly, soon drawn within the circumscribed boundaries of a domestic circle. I was still, however, for a joke, in spite of connubial bliss; and my wife, who was as good humored and affectionate as she was beautiful, only laughed at my hallucinations, and persuaded her friends to do the like, which gave a stimulus to my habits, and this increased momentum soon brought them to a climax.

On the eve of some great day, as I well remember—the annual fair of a neighboring town, or something as eventful—the workmen of a large pit near my rustic dwelling had obtained leave to work during the night, in order that they might be free to enjoy the fun of the fair next day. I accordingly determined to descend into the pit at the "witching time of night," in the character of a goblin, and terrify these dark rustics, in order to quicken their relish for the day's pleasures. I prepared the necessary disguise, and tied it up in a dark bandanna, and having arranged with a friend to assist in my descent into the valley of black diamonds, waited that much dreaded hour.

"When churchyards yawn, and graves give up their dead," with most restless impatience. I almost counted the moments; but time, as if to mock my anxiety, seemed to have folded his wings, and

"Like a wounded snake, drag his slow length along,"

Anxiety is never comotase; I had therefore no desire to sleep, for the fever of anticipation had got so strong a hold upon me, that my pulse outran the tickling of the clock by at least sixty in a minute. The hand of the dial, to my very great joy, at length pointed to three quarters past eleven, when I sallied forth, and my friend at the mouth of the pit, awaiting my arrival. It was a beautiful moonlight night. The heavens were starred and cloudless. In spite of my sinister project, I could not be insensible to the loveliness of the scene around me. The blue vault of heaven was studded with innumerable stars, sparkling with light and life, radient in celestial beauty, and recording in a language mute indeed, but universally intelligible, the omnipotence of HIM who hung their glories in the firmament, as the paragons of his creation. Where can we so legibly read the power and wisdom of the GODHEAD, as in the language of the skies, when night is hanging out her lamps on the wide battlements of heaven, and its azure plains stream with the effulgence of their glories? There is a vital loveliness in the clear, calm, moonlight, which at once lifts the soul to the GOD of its existence, and makes it exult in the consciousness that it is a part of that mighty scheme of motion and intelligence, by which it is surrounded, and in which it is absorbed. The beauty of the scene still lingers upon my memory; nor was I so entirely engrossed by the anticipations of a droll adventure, as to have abandoned all relish for beauties which have never failed to kindle in my bosom the most impressive emotions of wonder and admiration.

The mouth of the pit was encircled by a rude rail. The mode of descent was by a rope fastened to a windless; at the end of which was a piece of strong chain, terminated by a cross bar of iron. As I had been accustomed in my boyish days to descend into these dark and dismal excavations by a similar mode of conveyence, I had no fears upon the present occasion in repeating the freak. My friend placed himself at the windless in order to regulate my progress, and having first dropped my bundle into the pit, I fixed my feet firmly on the bar at the end of the chain, and commenced my somewhat perilous descent. The harsh creaking of the crazy machine, as the tightened rope gradually uncoiled from the wooden cylinder round which it was rolled, seemed amidst the silence of midnight, like the muttering of unquiet spirits

"Doom'd for a stated time to walk by night," when

"Upon a corner of the moon
There hangs a vaporouse drop profound;"

and a tremor of something like dread came over me when light was entirely excluded from my view, and the very "blackness of darkness" fearfully closed in around me. My progress appeared to be extremely rapid, so much so, that I felt a sudden faintness steal upon me, but this soon passed; yet when I considered that my safety depended upon the strength of a rope scarcely more than an inch in diameter, I confess I felt for a moment that my life was held upon a very uncertain tenure, and the throbbings of my heart become almost painfully accelerated. It was by this time so dark that I could not distinguish the sides of the shaft, while the small fragments of earth which occasionally fell as they were disturbed by my progress, sounded in my ears with a loud and terrifying indistinctness, like the multiplied re-percussion of echoes amid the vaults of a cemetry.

I had not been long on the rope when, to my great surprise, I found my progress suddenly arrested. I waited for a few moments with much impatience, under the idea that some impediment had arisen in the machine above, but finding, after a lapse of several minutes, that the rope, on which I was balanced still continued stationary, I concluded that I had reached the bottom of the shaft, and prepared to quit the chain. I forebore calling to my friend above, lest I should alarm the pitmen, and thus at once expose myself to their coarse raillery, and mar my own diversion. I now became keenly sensible that I had done a very foolish thing in venturing by night into a pit which I had not examined by day, and some very unpleasant apprehensions began to steal over me; however, summoning my resolution, and persuading myself that I must be within a yard at most of terra firma, I slid down the chain until my hands grasped the cross bar, when, to my utmost consternation and horror, my feet rested upon nothing and I found myself swinging with the most fearful oscillation in the "empty air." I stretched myself to my utmost length, but in vain. I still swung, and there appeared to be a supernatural power in the dark void around me, dragging, me down into the gulf beneath;—the whole mass of my blood seemed as it were to circulate only downward, and I became, for the first time, most painfully sensible of my own gravitation. That mysterious principle, by which all material objects are attracted to one common centre, appeared to be increased a thousand fold, and I already fancied that I saw my brains whitening the black pavement below. My blood curdled. I strove to regain my former position on the chain but found myself unable to raise my body to a sufficient elevation enable me to grasp it above the bar from which I was suspended. My arms were stretched to their utmost tension, and I felt all the pangs of luxation. My sensations were appalling. It seemed as if an enormous weight were attached to my extremities, and the most fearful noises met my ears, as though the dismal ministers of doom were exulting in the near possession of their victim. It was clear that I could not long maintain my hold. I shuddered; my temples were bedewed with drops of bitter agony. My eyes, stretched open to their utmost extent, could still distinguish nothing in the pitchy void around me. My tongue was parched with the violence of my exertions. How did I curse my folly in having wantonly brought myself into such jeopardy! What a situation! To hang between time and eternity, about to drop from one into the other, and to quit reality for uncertainty; to be suspended over a dark and horrible pit, were no eye could behold my sufferings but His to whom "darkness and light are both alike;" about to perish, without one expression of consolation, or of sympathy from her who was the depository of my tenderest affections, though I had so often laughed at her gentle rebukes whenever she attempted to check the exuberance of my wayward will. Reflections rushed like a whirlwind through my brain; though the period of my involuntary suspension had been but a few minutes, as many painful thoughts crowded into my mind, as under ordinary circumstances would have filled up the melancholy void of years. I remembered my child and groaned—"Thou wilt soon be fatherless, my boy, and thy father"—Oh God! What a reflection. Tears, scalding and bitter, streamed down my heated cheeks, but I had no hand to dash them off, for although I felt destruction to be near, I still clung to life with that instinctive energy which is common alike to the coward and the brave, in the hour of extremity. I thought for the first time, upon my iniquities, and felt that I had a fearful reckoning to make with Him before whom I was about to appear, but for which I was altogether unprepared. How should I meet that omnipresent which had read my inmost thoughts, and therefore knew, but too well, that I had rather been a worshiper of the idols of this world, than of Him who "founded it upon the seas, and prepared it upon the floods." A pang pierced through my bosom as my mind confusedly reverted to my spiritual insecurity. The possibility of what my futurity might be, flashed like a stream of lightning through my brain. I shouted to my friend above—in vain. He heard me not. Feeling my strength fast deserting me, I concentrated all my energies in one resolved effort, and lifting myself above the bar made a plunge at the chain. The endeavor was unavailing; I missed my hold, and from the violence of the exertion, was swung round and round with a velocity that almost deprived me of consciousness. I now hung by one hand over the dark abyss. I felt that I had but a few moments between life and death. My brain reeled; I put up a short prayer to heaven, and scarcely conscious of the action, unclasped the bar, and dropped into the terrible abyss. I was all but insensible when I fell, yet a something of consciousness remained to me and it appeared to my fading fancy that I was some time whirling in the air before I met the earth. My senses now utterly deserted me. When I recovered them, I found myself supported on the smutty knee of a pitman, who was chafing my temples with fingers that had not known the wholesome application of water since their hebdomadal abolution just five days before. I gazed around me with an expression of stupified amazement. I looked up, and saw the awful chain swinging scarcely a yard above my head; and upon putting myself in the position I had just so fearfully quitted I discovered to my inexpressible surprise and mortification, that from the distance between my toe and the ground, when my body was at its utmost stretch—I had fallen from the prodigious height of TWO INCHES!!

CHRIST IN THE TEMPEST.

BY WHITTIER.

Storm on the midnight waters!—The vast sky
Is stooping with its thunder. Cloud on cloud
Reels heavily in the darkness, like a shroud
Shook by some warning spirit from the high
And terrible wall of heaven. The mighty wave
Tosses beneath its shadow like the bold
Upheavings of a giant from the grave,
Which bound him prematurely to its cold
And desolate bosom. Lo—they mingle now—
Tempest and heaving wave, along whose brow
Trembles the lightning from its thick cloud fold!

And it is very terrib'e!—The roar
Ascendeth unto heaven, and thunders back,
Like the response of demons, from the black
Rifts of the hanging tempest—yawning o'er
The wild waves in their torment. Hark—the cry
Of strong man in peril, piercing through
The uproar of the waters and the sky;
As the rent bark one moment rides to view,
On the tall billows, with the thunder cloud
Closing around, above her, like a shroud!

He stood upon the reeling deck—his form
Made visible by the lightning, and his brow,
Uncovered to the visiting of the storm,
Told of a triumph man may never know—
Power underived and mighty—"PEACE—BE STILL!"
The great waves heard him and the storm's loud tone
Went mourning into silence at his will:
And the thick cloud, where yet the lightning shone,
And slept the latent thunder, rolled away,
Until no trace of tempest lurked behind,
Clinging upon the pinions of the wind,
To stormless wanderers, beautiful and gay.

Dread Ruler of the tempest! Thou before
Whose presence boweth the uprisen storm—
To whom the waves do homage, round the shore
Of many an Island empire!—if the form
Of the frail dust beneath thine eye, may claim
Thy infinite regard—oh—breathe upon
The storm and darkness of man's soul the same
Quiet, and peace, and humbleness, which came
O'er the roused waters, where thy voice had gone,
A minister of power—to conquer in thy name!

Love and Prudence.

OLD SCOTCH SONG.

It was an important night to the bright-eyed belles of Washington. The elegant Mrs. Secretary R———, by way of varying the eternal routine of drawing-rooms (properly soirées) at the Executive Mansion, and dull conversation parties—or (we beg pardon of our polite readers) converzasiones elsewhere,—had projected a concert at her own house; not, like those got up abroad, a regular musical entertainment, where some professional lion was to thrill forth, no less for the profit of his patroness than for his own—but an amateur concert, at which several young ladies très distinguée, had volunteered themselves for performers. As the appointed hour of seven approached, many a fair bosom among the uninvited swelled with chagrin and envy, for this was to be a very exclusive affair; while those, fortunate enough to boast of a card, made themselves ready in a flutter of joyful pride and expectation. Our present business lays with two of this last number. One of these rather petite in stature, but of an easy shape, moved slowly about her chamber, in the principal hotel of the Metropolis—or stood before the dressing-glass on her toilette table, giving the finishing touches to her coiffure. If the figure of this "nymph intent" was deficient in the height and dignity necessary to constitute a grace, it was in recompense surmounted by a head worthy to serve as a model of symmetrical beauty. The set of features reflected in the mirror before her, were cast in the finest mould of the Grecian line with a pair of hazel eyes, large, languidly lustrous, and rolling with that sleepy glance said to "speak a melting soul;" her tresses, not luxuriant, but of a rich glossy auburn, where braided back from her low white brow, and bound up by a single string of pearls, crowned her head with a cluster of careless curls, which falling and gleaming with every turn of her neck, shone like the plumes of the golden bird of Paradise. This classic style of adjustment, which would have impressed most countenances with an air of sternness, harmonized finely with a face, resembling in sweetness and pale placidity of outline, that of a marble statue. But this immobile and faultless beauty was less happy in the rest of her person, which if not positively awkward and misshapen, was distorted by attempts at majesty and attitudinizing. Her dress was a petticoat of white satin, as short and as full as those of a Dutch peasant-girl, or second-rate Parisian élégante, which, drawn down at the shoulders and in front of the corsage à la Rozelaine, by loops of pearl, exhibited so much of a bosom and scapula not quite perfect in their proportions, as clearly proved the heedless owner to have merged her modesty in a blind compliance with the most impolitic of fashion's whims. From beneath the silver fringe that edged the voluminous folds of the skirt, a sleader ancle and foot fully displayed themselves, (for, now-a-days women of the world scorn the affectation of letting such commodities peep forth by stealth,) arrayed in an open web of flesh-coloured silk, and shod in a sandal à la Grecque, laced with silver cords. As the fair damsel drew on her glove of French kid, gaily worked on the back in floss silks, with a smile of triumph occasioned partly by the certainty that not another belle would "sport" a pair costing five dollars, and partly by a consciousness of her surpassing appearance,—a lady, over-rouged and over-dressed in all the tinsel of false taste,—who middle-aged according to our rude notions, showed by her minauderies, that, in this particular, the reckoning of her own vanity coincided with the statutes of Viennese gallantry,—burst into the room, panting for breath, as she waddled along under the weight of super-abundant flesh and finery, and crying out in a shrill treble, the very antipodes of sotto voce tones of ton—"Bless my soul! Eliza, love, are you goin' to keep us waitin' all night? Dear! now you do look nice and spruce, love, all in silver and white sating! I guess Mrs. Tilley done her best in that dress—and I know somebody'll be down in the mouth when they see ye. But make haste, love,—that's a dear! 'Tis nigh upon eight o'clock," looking at a superbly chased watch as she spoke; "the concert'll be half over before we get there; that don't make much odds, to be sure: but Mr. Webster's gone!!! only hear that!! just this minute gone! and now we're finely dished about goin' in along side of him, as if all come together. Come along, Eliza, I say; for the third and last time. Mercy on us! if she han't left her fan, and her six dollar cambric pocket hankerchief." "Give me the 'kerchief, if you please, ma'am," responded the soft voice of the languid daughter, "and the bunch of artificial flowers to take on my hand. I don't want the fan; statues never carry them—and you know"—Here they found themselves in the passage—and the lovely speaker was cut short in her dissertation on antique costume, by a general rush of the gentlemen out of the dining-room, sacred to the Congress mess, all eager to hand the not merely admired, but the rich Miss Bassett, to the well appointed equipage of her father, one of the wealthiest and most prominent members of the House. Leaving her to be whirled onward to the place of rendezvous, we turn to a personage less conspicuous in the beau-monde, but not less essential to the progress of our tale.

In a large parlour, respectably but plainly furnished with the massive relics of ancient grandeur, sat in a huge arm chair with a high backed ebony frame, and cushion heavily embroidered, a lady, whose matronly majesty of mien and dress, "costly, not fine," were those of other and grander days. The remains of a great beauty, and the simplicity and stateliness of a manner consistent with her age which was past the prime of life, rendered her an object as truly noble and interesting, as her pedigree was, for this country, illustrious. Her looks rested with a pure and profound expression of maternal fondness, that yet broke not forth in words, on her sole and only companion. This was a young lady, who critically considered, had no claim to beauty—but, wherever seen, bore off the belle from insipid regularity of feature, by her varying and resistless play of countenance, and the superiority of her tournure. Above the middle height, her's belonged to the "first order of fine forms," and was set off by a careless and airy grace of demeanour, a buoyant and undulating sorcery of motion to be found only in the step and gait of a highly accomplished dancer. Her eyes and hair were brown, of a shade so deep as to pass usually for black, and the latter possessed in an abundance, that might have vied with the silken growth of any Spanish head. was part wreathed about her leaf-shaped comb of carved tortoise shell, in a diadem the most becoming that can encircle a female head—and part fell in large, loose ringlets over the lofty brow, where "Her eye-brow's shape was like the aerial bow."

The half severed lips, full and red, gave glimpses of a double row of pearl within, exempting our heroine at least from the foul reproach, flung at the American fair by Moore's sarcontemptuous lines. The clear brown of a complexion constitutionally pale, and the whole contour of her face, betrayed a foreign descent as decidedly as every look and gesture did the patrician air and graceful ease of a high-bred fashion: in short, the whole presence, manner and style, were, at a glance, those of a supreme ton—such as would be obeyed as an "Open Sesame" by the difficult doors of Almacs. This forlorn but fascinating creature, was, likewise, in evening costume as bidden and bound to the so talked of musical party. The dress of black crépeline, unornamented with jewels, and simple in the extreme, was made and worn with that style so rare and recherché, which adorns whatever it touches; its flowing drapery, that fell about the prettiest feet in the world, and the decorous height of the corsage, which, shaded without concealing the perfect outline of a bust, equal to that of the far-famed Lady Charlemont, were in unisonalike with delicacy and good taste; and each one of the flowers, composing the bouquet inserted amid her dark locks, was perfumed according to its natural scent. The fan of carved ivory, the mouchoir brodé, the essence bottle, was, each impayable, of its kind; but unlike the toast, whose person and pretensions we have already described, it was evident that no part of her garb or equipments here occupied the chief portion of the wearer's thoughts. After a few minutes chat with her august looking parent, and having kissed her forehead and cheek at parting, Monimia de Rozelle, not forgetting a last glance at the bright reflection of herself

"In the fair mirror pictur'd true,"— flitted like a sylph to her carriage, and was driven to the house of her friend.

Dissimilar as we have represented these two young ladies to be, there was yet one point of resemblance between them: both were, at that instant, secretly engrossed by the same male subject. Edward Vere, nephew and reputed heir to the chief magistrate of Washington, was a handsome young man, who concealed beneath an almost feminine shyness and softness of exterior, a character replete with energy and passion. Despite his want of tact and address, an engaging figure and amiable temper, endeared when once known, and the wealth and worldly dignity of his uncle were such as reflecting on his protégé, rendered him a great object in the circles of high life. Gen. Vere was a widower, without children, and had, so far, shown no intention of taking a second wife. His house, his gardens, his plate his equipage, were all unrivalled in elegance; and the kinsman who was heir at law to so much splendour, seemed likewise, invested with the stronger claim of an adopted son. Miss Bassett, an only daughter, but not an only child, had just made her début with vast applause in the fashionable world of Washington. Her father, long ranking as one of the "merchant-princes" (as they have been ironically called) of New York, was also a man whose pre-eminent talents gave him a proud place among the legislators of the Republic. He was passionately fond of his beautiful Eliza, and disposed to humour her in every wish: hence a union with young Vere, who though himself without fortune, had its substitute in birth and brilliant prospects, was not likely to displease him, even in a prudential point of view. Installed as the belle of the season, the fair and rich Miss Bassett, had she been governed by the precepts of her maternal chaperon, would have scorned to look below a foreign minister, or attaché at the least; but frightened by the broad hints of the purse-proud mother, the diplomatic principals all fought shy of a matrimonial scrape,—and their secondaries, though covered with gold lace on coat and chapeau, were none of note sufficient to inveigle into the golden nets, spread to snare their betters. The young lady, herself, of a gentle and affectionate disposition, and hitherto a passive spectator of the plots for her aggrandizement had worth—alloyed to be sure by a little vulgar affection—to make the happiness of any man; and from the evening of her first appearance at the President's, had evinced by her peculiar complaisance to Edward Vere, that in choosing a husband, her preference was for private felicity rather than show. But her smiles, while they could not fail to flatter his vanity, took no farther effect upon a heart prepossessed beyond recall in favour of another.

Monimia de Rozelle, though living with her parent in almost conventual seclusion, had long been intimately acquainted with the gentleman in question. She had formerly mixed a good deal in the gay world, of which she was so formed to be an ornament; but circumstances of deep domestic affliction, had given her a distaste for haunts of pleasure, and confirmed her natural bias to less ephemeral and more ennobling enjoyments. With a genius fit for the highest studies, she had a surprising aptitude to all elegant accomplishments—and an air and manner such as belongs to the inhabitants of a court. Of French extraction by the father's side, she joined the wit and vivacity of his nation, with the sterling qualities and modest virtues of a Virginia house-wife—and sublimed them all with a lofty reach of thought and a capacity of heroic purpose peculiarly her own. Yet was the attractive and accomplished Monimia, no "faultless monster!" She was proud, satirical, refined to fastidiousness, and too apt to despise others for their lack of the fortitude and strength of mind, which, in her, regulated, without impairing feeling. Devoted unto the death to the few she valued, she had little sympathy with, or tolerance of the many; and though an hereditary generosity, and that compassion innate in her sex, moved her eagerly to extend relief to all who craved it—and her keen sense of the ludicrous, enabled her to extract amusement from the most ordinary things and characters; still she was no general lover of her kind. But proud as our heroine was, and took pride in being, hers was not of that revolting species which alienates by arrogance and supercilious condescension to inferiors. Her pride taught her to spurn a mean action as unworthy Monimia de Rozelle—to adhere to a high strain of principle and conduct, as transmitted to, and alone befitting that name. Of a sensibility profound, rather than vehement, she had long been deemed not merely "chaste," but cold as > "The icicle that hangs on Dian's temple;"

and yet twice had this "seeming marble-breast been softened, nay melted into the warmest love. Her first passion, such as can be felt only once, and on its termination, leaves life a desert, and the heart a waste—was repaid with interest by him who excited it; but as proud and shy, as he believed her frigid and haughty, the lovers owed their eventual disappointment to a mutual misapprehension of character. For a long time Monimia, with the impatient despair of a youthful mind, had fancied all the amatory ends of life to be over with her; but after the death and worse than death, of a three year's constancy and grief, she began to perceive herself, gradually but surely, imbibing the same dangerous sentiments for another. But, though alike intense in degree, what a difference in nature between the wild energy of her early adoration, and the soft bondage of her present attachment. Under the resistless rage of the one her heart had been seared and blighted like the "sweet leaves" of the opening flowret beneath the fierce splendour of the noon-tide ray: the other, like "the refulgent lamp of night" ensilvering a summer landscape, diffused a gentle and delicious serenity—a tender moon-light over her soul, as mild as it was voluptuous. But a new and unlooked-for impediment speedily disclosed itself to mar the delight attendant on these reciprocal and exquisite sensations—and to verify the celebrated complaint of Hermia,

> "Ah! me! for aught that ever I could read,
> Could ever hear by tale or history,
> The course of true love never did run smooth!"

Edward Vere on his introduction to the graceful De Rozelle, had been wonderfully struck by the fascination of her figure and a further acquaintance ripened this impression into an idolatry as lasting as it was violent, and romantic. At first he sought her society for the sake of that lively elegance and witty badinage, which seemed to put every body at immediate ease; then as the symptoms of his disorder grew stronger upon him, he persuaded himself it was only and when at last aware of the extent of his enslaver's empire over him, the discovery was productive of no unpleasant anticipations or regrets. Judging by the rank and opulence of the young lady's family, the inamorato took it for granted that she inherited a moderate competency; without which, on the one side or the other, prudence urged the impossibility of a marriage between them. This was, however, but an after-thought; for in the beginning of their courtship, Edward concluded, his mistress to be as plain and unexpensive in her habits as she really was. Under this belief, his visits increased in frequency; and soon passion prevailing over timidity, he spoke of love. Though Monimia replied not, she blushed—she listened,—and Vere was encouraged to persevere in his suit. But this avowal from him, led, on her part, to the like sincerity on one point: as soon as she perceived herself seriously sought by him, she frankly and fully declared her portionless condition. The immense possessions of Monsieur de Rozelle, had been dissipated in extravagance and sumptuous living,—and his daughter was left utterly unprovided for, save in the slender pittance secured by the clever management of his widow, and now well nigh consumed in their joint support. This piece of news was as unexpected as undesired by the lover, not however that he thought of, or feared for himself. Any thing but mercenary in temper, he was proud, sensitive, jealous and faint-hearted at the thought of Miss de Rozelle's immeasurable superiority over him, and his own destitute state. He could with firmness, indeed rapture, brave all privation and suffering with Monimia for his partner; but how, he asked himself, would it fare with her? Each day's intercourse convinced him more and more of the luxury, the magnificence that she was bred to, and in which all her connexions basked: and he felt shocked, debased at the idea of humbling her to his poverty and dependence. Sometimes swayed by the promptings of a suspicious diffidence, he dreaded that, accustomed to the glare and lavish expenditure of wealth, her gracious reception of him, was wholly interested and based on a calculation to re-instate herself by his means in her original sphere,—and that on learning his actual pecuniary position, she would spurn a wooer with only "wisdom and worth" to recommend him. But even if she should say in the words of the tender Angelina, "but these were all to me," he was too well versed by an experience the most injurious to a generous mind, in the endless mortifications, the corroding misery inseparable from a paucity or uncertainty of means to commit, in order to his own gratification, the villainy of subjecting a girl so born, and habituated to the elegancies of life, to the precarious chances of one without income or property. His expectations of heirship deemed so certain by others, and whose influence he mistrusted over the mind of Monimia, he knew to be held by the frail tenure of another's will; and recent demonstrations on the part of his uncle, made it probable that they would ultimately end in smoke: at all events, nothing would so much incense him as an imprudent match on the part of his nephew. It is true he had strongly and repeatedly urged Edward to marry—but always with the proviso that he must win a wealthy bride; especially had he warned him to beware of an entanglement with the bewitching De Rozelle. High-spirited and tenacious of his rights, the young man secretly resented this interference with his freedom of choice, which it only tended to rouse; but considerations of the most sacred and delicate nature, forced him to be cautious of flying in the face of the General's recommendation. Besides his self-love was nettled at the coldness, which shrunk from openly confessing a return of regard. Hence his behaviour was influenced by all the fluctations of hope, doubt and despair; and Monimia, to whom he had, without reserve, laid open the whole state of his affairs, was, by turns, charmed and vexed at an irresolution, now realizing the line—

"I loved thee well, and yet I wooed thee not."

Sure of herself, knowing that her mind was firmly fixed on its own centre, and not to be shaken by difficulties or indigence, of which she had already an ample foretaste—she was willing—indeed eager to encounter any lot with Vere; and the forbearance of his disinterested attachment, struck her sometimes as admirable—then as capricious and provoking in the extreme. At length, after divers alternations of warmth and coldness—after many a covert declaration de part et d'autre, and joint railings at "the foul house-wife, Fortune,"—the lovers came to understand themselves as tacitly pledged to await, disengaged and in patience, some favourable change of circumstances. Matters stood thus between them when one of the lady patronesses of Washington amusements, bestirred herself in getting up the concert just about to commence.

We accompany our young people to the scene of gaiety at the Secretary's mansion. The Bassetts, as their coach outstripping the hack filled with the beaux of their party, drew up without difficulty to the door, found themselves, to the infinite satisfaction of the corpulent lady-mother, almost the last arrival,—though Gen. Vere's carriage drove off to make way for theirs—and they saw his nephew ascending the steps before them: in the entry they overtook him. The eyes of the gentle Eliza invited his advance as plainly, if not as loudly, as the tongue of her consequential mamma, and their male attendants lagging unaccountably behind, in civility he could but proffer his service to assist the daughter in uncloaking, while Mr. Bassett performed that office for his wife. One act of politeness entailed another; Edward's arm was, of course accepted, as the corollary to his involuntary duty about the clasps and furred overshoes of the reigning beauty,—and they went in, together en partie carrée. The drawing-room was empty, or nearly so,—Mrs. R——, had left her station of reception near the door,—and they passed through into a larger and inner apartment, were the etherial sounds of a harp divinely played, arose above the buzz of voices, the hum of motion, and the clatter of spoons and saucers. All heads were turned to see who entered so late, and immediately reverted in their previous direction. "Mrs. R——, has taken her seat," proclaimed one gentleman, as he bowed en passant. "Keep on, sir,—keep on—a little more to the right; you will find the lady near the fire-place," said another, as drawing her husband after her, and jostling and discomposing those on either side, the protuberant leader of the double file, undauntedly forced her way through the dense mass in front of her. "Oh! my hair!" screamed one poor girl in agony, whose head, dressed after Lafore's best fashion, suffered sad derangement from the ponderous gold tassels, pendant from Mrs. Bassett's magnificent turban, hitching in its elaborate puffs. Good Lord! what ails the woman, to come smashing my sleeves out of all shape?" demanded a second, facing angrily round to repel the aggression, as bobbing her head about and twisting her fat body into various fantastic contortions intended for courtsies, the soi-distant dame of ton moved majestically onward regardless of the damage she had done, like a mighty galliot wrecking a parcel of fishing-smacks. The elegant hostess, who from the lateness of the hour, had given them out, came hastily forward to meet the new-comers; but Edward Vere, transfixed in excess of credulous consternation, neither noticed nor returned her cordial greeting. A sight, as hideous and as fascinating as the Gorgon's head, glared full upon him. Through an opening in the half-circle formed around her, he saw Monimia de Rozelle, bending over the most picturesque of instruments, in an attitude of inimitable negligence and grace, and singing with a depth of expression, carefully banished from her glance only to luxuriate in a voice comparable to Garcia's, the impassioned air of "Di tanti palpiti;"—while his uncle leant over her chair, his ardent eyes rivetted on her peerless figure—and on the other side, a foreigner of distinction, with all the exuberant gesture of his country, kept time to her performance, and seemed lost in exstacy. The disconcerted lover saw "the white rising of her hands upon the harp;" he saw those usually pale cheeks, dyed with the deepest crimson—and those orbs full and "darkly bright," now downcast and "beautifully shy," as they drooped before the gaze of her numerous auditors. The agony of ages seemed condensed in the deadly pang, that shot through his heart, as he reflected that Monimia had, that very morning, playfully evaded his inquiry as to whether she was to be at Mrs. R——'s. And yet here she was, in spite of her half-denial—the being he fancied so fond and so faithful—so dependant on his suffrage for her own approbation; here she was, radiant in gaiety and grace—resistless in her regal supremacy—smiling and playing in careless coquetry—encouraging the applause of others besides himself: and most horrible of all, attracting the homage, perhaps, the love, of his uncle. At once his jealous fears suspected himself supplanted by this, his second parent. Misjudging the flush and embarrassment of a modest confusion at finding herself the object of general attention, he translated these evidences of woman's instinctive virtue, (rather obsolete they were in truth) into testimonies of a delightful consciousness of his rival's obvious admiration. He turned away from the odious spectacle, scarce knowing what he did,—and dropping the arm, that lay so lovingly within his, retreated without one syllable of apology—or even leading his fair charge to a seat. Yet he had not reached the next room, ere a moment's reflection convinced him of his absurdity; a sense of triumph involuntary triumph blended itself with his chagrin—and urged his return, to witness the success of her, whom, in some measure he considered as belonging to himself. The last full chords of the symphony vibrated on his ear, as he made his way back to the side he had so abruptly deserted; but the great press around the nominal orchestra, hid the syren from his view. "Charming! now an't it?" "How sweetly she plays!" "Now, really she has a fine voice,"—was uttered by the would-be dilletanti, and mechanically re-echoed by simpering belles, and starched and lounging beaux. At length as Edward with Miss Bassett, now, for the first time, unheeded and overlooked, followed in the wake of their bulky conductress, who resolutely wrestled forward to gain a conspicuous place,—the undulations of the crowd afforded him a nearer glimpse of the soul-subduing musician. She now stood beside the harp, putting on her gloves, and bowing in acknowledgment of the compliments heaped upon her,—among which the agitated lover caught the words from his courtly uncle, "What can we say of your voice, and of yourself, but that both are exquisite as this" odorous chaplet of sweet summer buds?" And plucking a sprig of the lilacs interwoven with scarlet and geranium in her hair, the General apparently shunning a marked attendance on Monimia, suffered the Italian signor to lead her away to Helen and Nancy R——, the lively and amiable daughters of the Secretary. Here her enthusiastic escort endeavoured to place himself so as to keep off all intruders—but he was not allowed to achieve his impertinent monopoly. "Who is she?" "What is she?" "Where is she from?" were questions eagerly and repeatedly asked, and as often answered by Mrs. R——. The long estrangement of Miss De Rozelle, from promiscuous society, rendered her as new to the dashers of the grand monde, as if she had been, in reality, the French woman her name and manner denoted her; except to her own particular coterie, her person and rare endowments were utterly unknown, and their effect proportionally great. They now blazed forth like lightning out of a cloud, eliciting general wonder and commendation. The New York star disappeared before this brighter luminary; the tame and automaton-like regularity of her beauty and motions undergoing a transient, but entire eclipse, by the animated attractions of grace and talent, enhanced by the perfection of ton and tournure. Foiled in his aim at an exclusive appropriation of the débutante, as she might, in some sort, be termed, the obsequious Neapolitan found himself, every moment, disturbed in his discourse by some fresh presentation to the prima-donna of the evening. By the Corps Diplomatique she was completely obsédé; and when a French chargé, with the easy assurance and civil pertinacity of his nation, edged himself within speaking distance of his compatriote, as he styled her; the disappointed Italian, quite out-talked, was fain to resign his station in extremity of despair.

The company had now divided into groups—conversation, partially suspended during our heroine's excelling strains, revived apace; the clamorous chorus of tongues entirely drowning the clatter of the piano-keys, whereon one of the fair band of harmonists made out with false notes, and discords innumerable, to stumble through the "Overture to Der Freyschutz. Then came "Le Portrait," that tenderest of French romances, sung in pure style, and a fine mellow tone—but with a pronunciation so barbarously variant from the original, that Madame la Consule Générale, who knew no "Angloise," gravely thanked the songatress for gratifying her with English words to her favorite air.* Another and another succeeded; but in vain was the spell of "sweet Lydian measures" exerted in opposition to our natural and national indifference to melody. Few, or none listened to the music; the men disscussing political and gambling topics with all the more freedom because less liable to be overheard,—and the ladies, as dull of ear, bandying compliments with such gallants, as they could per force detain them—else whispering scandal, or audibly indulging in rude and sneering personal remarks. Miss De Rozelle continued the queen of the scene, and paid the costs of her popularity among the gentlemen, in many a bitter or insidious critique from the female part of the assemblage. Now the witchery of her speech and address shone out in their full lustre, as pleased rather than piqued by the stealthy, yet earnest observation of her anxious adorer, who hovered around without accosting her—and inspired by the desire of showing off before him, she became engaged in a lively dialogue with her new and vivacious acquaintance. Speaking his vernacular like a native, and her elegant and varying countenance lit up by the glow of genius and excitement, their colloquy soon assumed that peculiar and happy turn, which conversation possesses only in French; that play of words and ideas—that correspondence of phrases and gestures—that union of sentiment, and sprightly sense, so expressively designated by the epithet spirituel. While the two thus talked in high spirits together they gradually become the centre of a circle, and the subject of various commentary.

"There's a shape for you! Mills," said a gentleman joining a cluster near, and pointing as he spoke to Miss de Rozelle.

"Truly, it is very fine! small by degrees and beautifully less, from the soft bosom to the slender waist,"—"said the honourable member appealed to and famous for quotation, to his friend, a "buck-horse" Kentuckian.

"Yea, strait as a pine-splinter, and nimble as a wild-cat," was the comparative reply.

"And yet in some points, I hold her inferior to that nymph-like beauty, with her "glossy tresses loosly bound," observed the pompous orator, in the tone and manner of one declaiming before a public assembly.

"Like enough—like enough," rejoined his blunt companion, "for one's rich, and t'other's poor, as I understand—and let alone your Yankee speculators for smelling out and hanging on to a good bargain. But I'll be blessed if that an't the girl for a back-woodsman—eyes like a snake's—sings like a mocking bird—and could run up a tree like a squirrel. Its' a cursed shame though, to see her turn her back on her own country-folks, and stand there jabbering away with that outlandish cretur, that looks plagey like a monkey with its tail cut off."

"Oh! horrid, Mr. Wildth," drawled out with what she fancied the true Clara Fisher lisp, a maiden somewhat in the wane, with her hair hanging dishevelled about her scraggy throat—her robe fantastically bedizened with as many flowers as Ophelia's—and pantalettes on (that most unfeminine usurpation) deeply frilled with lace. "Abominable! now an't it, to thee a young woman tho bold and tho inthulting to we Americanth. I declare I had rather have a bean from the Wetht, than a forrin duke." And the bashful querist slipped her hand within the Kentuckian's arm, saying as she looked-up in his face with a grimace meant for an insinuating smile, "but leth walk about a little—do. I'm tired to death thitting thill ever thince Col. Hutton went to get me thome ice-cream."

"Come on, Madam, I must be at your service, since you seize upon me with the gripe of an alligator. Here we go, as large as life, and twice as natural. Let's walk round this way; I want to take a look at that pretty little Bassett: she's hooked a fine fellow in young Vere—worth a thousand imported ninnies like that, I can tell you."

And aptly representing a huge bear led captive by an ape, the couple sauntered towards our hero, in whose breast the universal admiration and delight, contended with the suggestion of a morbid jealousy. With Miss Bassett, who suffered the sensations of a deposed sovereign, still leaning on him, Edward Vere stood, writhing under worse than the fabled agonies of Tantalus, as he contemplated the brilliant and beloved being before him. Enchanted by her seductive spells—enraged at her flirtations, as he ungratefully miscalled those innocent efforts to appear to the utmost advantage in his eyes, he inwardly execrated her as a heartless and deceptive coquette, while all her powers were put forth solely to please and dazzle him. Under this erroneous judgment, he tried to repay the false girl in her own coin, by the most glaring dedication of himself, to his fair and forsaken conquest,—and gazed with his soul in his eyes, on the first, while apparently, absorbed in interesting communion with the latter. For once in her life, the discontented Eliza, overjoyed to engross Edward, but mortified at her temporary dethronement and desertion, felt the touch of envy, as even while blushing and whispering to the man of her choice, she beheld her fickle court of "well-dressed males," crowding eagerly about the new "CYNTHIA of the minute." In vain the ex-belle twirled her pensonnial posy—in vain she practised her softest glances, and best classic postures; and if amid the first raptures of requited love, female vanity missed, and bewailed its lost empire, it was a pardonable weakness, especially as her "dear five hundred friends," lady-like, took the opportunity of revenging themselves on the past triumphs of her beauty, by their invidious condolence on her present forlorn plight.

"Now, positively, 'tis too bad to see your beaux run away from you so," said one bosom-companion kindly, as several gentlemen recognizing their late divinity by hasty bows, pressed forward to render fealty to her successor.

"To be sure 'tis vastly provoking," continued another of the sympathetic comforters, who set up for a wit, "but then Eliza knows it can't be helped—and some comfort is her recreant knights will soon tire of that flirting Euterpe. There's no holding the men, any how; they are as fugitive as time, or as our fairest charms,"—and the speaker surveyed Miss Bassett, as if to imply the decay of her boasted face.

Numberless hits of this sort somewhat tended to ruffle the wrapt serenity of a heart secure in the return of its affection; and it was natural they should—(she had been no woman else:) but after all, pleasure predominated commensurably over pain, when the fond girl looked upon him, whom she had long sighed thus to enthrall.

Mrs. Bassett, baffled in her attacks on the diplomatic dignitaries, was well enough pleased to believe her daughter sure of the first young man about town. Wholly intent upon fastening herself for the evening to Madame Huggens, she had left the "young folks" to their own discretion, and was busy in chasing that lady from room to room—sometimes lucky enough to walk abreast with her—then holding on to the gown of the ambassadress, that she might not lose her in the throng; a calamity, which nevertheless occurred more than once. A wealthy Georgian, returning from the medical school at Philadelphia, espied her sedulous servility to Madame la Baronne, and mischievously thwarted it in every possible way. Once as the lady of an American, and a member of Congress, thus abased herself into a train-bearer (or something below it) he whistled her off by name, as if calling his dog,—"Here, Bassett—here, fellow, here," to the infinite amusement of the bystanders.*

Meanwhile the rivals stood a few paces apart,—offering, in all respects, the strongest contrast; the Northern representative, with her exquisite head, and ordinary person, reminding one of a peerless fragment of Grecian art, placed on the shoulders of some modern piece of sculpture, and her airs and attire, no less unsuitable, and the lovely Virginian, no incongruities of costume or manner marring her attractions, but all ease and elegance, now and then embellished by the superb affectations and graceful folly of a Farren, or an Abingdon, looking not like a deity or a muse (however much her acquirements assimilated her to this last)—but, like what she actually was, the most polished and gifted of her sex,—the Devonshire of our Western Continent. Young Vere, as he alternately surveyed the confronted competitors, acknowledged the full force of superiority in her he adored, but whom, at this moment, he thought he detested. Their eyes met—they were too close to avoid a recognition; a bow, stiff and distant on his side—slight and non-chalant on her's, was all the salutation exchanged between the two, who, for months had been all in all to each other. But Monimia felt the blood mount to her very temples, and the lover's whole frame was shaken by a tremour, that communicated itself to the lady upon whom he waited with such praise-worthy constancy.

It was now time for the concert to re-commence,—and Mrs. R——, who, evidently, relied on Miss De Rozelle, to make the frais of the entertainment, came to summon her to the piano which was her forte. The General, whom his nephew had remarked to keep at a little distance, warily noting the motions of Monimia, contrived, for a miracle, to forestall the officious chargé, and handed her to her seat before the instrument, calling out, as he did so, to those around, "Come, come, silence! silence! now we'er going to have—

"A fearful battle rendered us, in music."

and the jealous Edward fancied that he overheard his uncle, as he led the young lady along, make some allusion to the lilac-flower, taken from her hair, and proudly worn in his button-hole, as the floral type of "the first emotions of love," then agitating his heart. This supposition was enough to send him, for a while, away from her vicinity. But her Parisian friend was not to be so easily shaken off. He took up his post behind the chair of the matchless pianist,

"Whose voice, thro' melting mazes running,
With wanton heed, and giddy cunning."

first warbled to her own accompaniment, and the chorus of sundry assistants, the pretty rondeau of "Depuis long-tempe." He adjusted and turned over the leaves of the piece next in order, which was a set of brilliant variations to a popular air; at the conclusion whereof, the room resounded with cries of "Encore—encore!" Miss De Rozelle arose with dignity, and retired to a sofa, still pursued by the devoirs of her assiduous attendant; he flirted the fan,—he held the handkerchief,—he presented the flacon, with a happy mixture of empressement and self-complacency; and Edward, who despised, yet coveted this knack at polite trifling, had much ado to refrain from inflicting, on the spot, summary punishment upon the coxcomb, who thus presumed, and was repaid by those sunny smiles due to him alone. His uncle, who, like himself, he knew to be perfectly indifferent to the "concord of sweet sounds," continually interupted the chat of the fluent egotist with petitions to the captivating minstrel for a renewal of her performance; and at last, in order to escape the sight of Edward's ostentatious devotion to Miss Bassett, she consented to resume the place just vacated by one of the lady-musicians. At first she began the appointed air of "Auld Lang Syne," and sang a few bars with a spirit and feeling, that stirred a sympathetic string in every breast. Suddenly her voice failed her—she could no longer dissimulate; and changing the touching strain for one of sportive brilliancy, she dashed off a waltz with a rapid yet masterly hand, and bade the listening throng obey the dictates of the dance. The proposal was rapturously received; for her auditors—all but a few passionate amateurs—were long ago—weary and yawning over the musical treat. Chairs were pushed back—sofas wheeled aside—tables rolled out of the way—and couples instantly arranging themselves in a circle. The scientific Frenchman, who had been deploring with vehement pathos, the monstrous solecism of a "Concert" in an apartment carpeted and crowded with furniture,—now horror-struck at the worse anamoly about to be enacted, was moving off with a pantomimic expression of pity and contempt at such vulgar ignorance,—when the mistress of the revels approaching, insisted for Monimia to go and join the set, adding, "I am competent to this—and 'tis time you should enjoy yourself a little." Miss De Rozelle yielded up her seat,—and the chargé pausing in his flight, seized her hand exclaiming, "Quelle horreur! Mais que c'est une barbarie, cette mode-la! I was abous to run away wid my-sel—mais qui-si vous voutexi lein me faire l'honneur to take one letteel turn in de valtz."

"Excuse me, Monsieur le Compte," said Monimia, speaking purposely in English, "I would with pleasure, if 'twere any other dance, but I never waltz in company."

The Frenchman dropped her hand—bowed slightly, and shrugging his shoulders and wringing his chapeau, retreated in huge disdain, repeating half-aloud as he went off, "Not valtz in compaynie! Mais, mon Dieu! quelle précieuse ridicule! Vraiment, she be bourgeoise and Américaine after all."

"Edward heard the request and the repulse; new life sprung up in his heart; snatching her hand, and pressing it fervently, he ejaculated, "Thank you, a thousand times for this forbearance!"

Confused at his own impetuosity, which, however, passed unnoticed in the general bustle, he relinquished the soft fingers so tremulous in his grasp,—with a thrill of delight, that beamed in her magic smile, Monimia disengaged a bunch of roses from her breast, and threw them on the chair beside him, with a whispered application of the line,—

"May you be pleased, and your sorrows mine!"

given in Lady Montagu's Turkish love-letter as the symbolical meaning of the queen of flowers; which quotation had once before, sanctified a similar gift from his idol. He caught up the emblematic treasure, and pressed it to his heart,—while she turned away her blushing face; and for once, the lovers understood, and were satisfied with each other.

But fate frowned adverse to their flame. The beautiful Eliza, whose attention during this short scene, had been diverted elsewhere, now turned towards Edward Vere,—and seeing the living cluster he held, in disparagement of her own artificial garlands, stretched out her hand for it, saying, "What lovely roses! are they for me?"

Edward's constitutional mauvaise-honte, and his dread of the discovery of his attachment, hindered him from answering, "No"—but he did say "Yes." He suffered her to take the bouquet expecting its instant return; but while she was smelling at, and admiring its fragrance, they were separated by some crossing between them; and ere they met again Miss Bassett, whose revolted subjects had, one or two of them, resumed their allegiance, was led out to dance. Edward, who never joined in that lively exercise, had nothing better to do than to look on, and compare her rectangular and constrained movements, with the elastic step and swaying shape of his aerial De Rozelle, who, when the waltzers tired of their awkward whirling, formed into cotillions, took the floor, and when nigh transformed the whole company into spectators, by an exhibition, which might have reconciled the superfine French functionary to her tasteless rejection of the gliding German measure. Her dancing, as perfect and as modest as that of Taglioni, had an effect on her lover, which her harmonic powers had failed to produce; but when he sought to tell her this by his glances of fond admiration, he found her's hardly cast on him, and averted with an expression of bitterest scorn and anger. The bouquet, bestowed in a moment, and with a feeling so tender—that bouquet gathered from the rose-bush, his sole present to her, and whose blossoms had been culled only for him,—now reposed on the bosom of her wealthy rival, who seemed thus to inhale the sweets of Edward's love, while she felt its sharpest thorns beset her breast. But pride rallied to her aid,—and the attentions of her partner, a young English attaché, afforded an opportunity of retaliation not thrown away. The unwitting offender, who saw the momentary direction of her eyes, and was distracted at her subsequent agacerie, hastened to reclaim the fatal nose-gay, but it was all to late. Glowing with a resentment, which she was too haughty to vent in words or glances of reproach, Monimia carefully avoided looking towards him,—but divided her smiles and her sparkling sallies between Gen. Vere, and her handsome foreign partner. At length the endless evening came to a close. Edward, who lingered till the last moment, in hopes of being able to to make his justification, was standing in the passage, as Monimia with her friend, Helen, came down stairs. The gay tones of that silvery voice, still in pleased converse with her English cavalier, grated dissonant on his ear; he witnessed the care, almost tenderness, with which this happy man enfolded her in her cloak; he heard her coquettish reply to his entreaty for leave, to wait upon her next day; "I permit you to shawl me,—to see me to the carriage—and now," as he put her in, and stood hat in hand on the step, "au revoir." Miss R———, who was going home with Monimia, followed with her brother—the door was shut—they drove off; and devoutly cursing the object of his dotage, for an errant jilt, the indignant lover flung himself into the coach, which had, long since, conveyed his uncle home, and now came back to fetch him.

This night was decisive of the lovers' implied engagement. Monimia, glowing with a displeasure all the more intense because it scorned crimination or complaint, never admitted Edward to a chance of explanation or apology. Love had enjoyed his day—and the reign of prudence, was about to succeed that blind rule. She had long been aware, though her tenderness for the nephew's feelings, had shrunk from conceding the fact, that very little encouragement was necessary to convert Gen. Vere into her declared lover. Her only parent's means of subsistance, were fast dwindling into nothing; she had sacrificed every thing for the benefit of this beloved daughter, who now appeared, fatally bent on throwing away her whole life upon an imprudent attachment, the issue whereof was precarious and protracted to the last degree. Extremely partial to young Vere, and deeming Monimia the best judge, in a measure involving her own happiness, Mrs. De Rozelle was quite willing for her to take the consequence of a union with a man, whose merit, at least, was equal to his poverty; but she had no patience with such unusual and interminable procrastination. Her pecuniary affairs were perplexed in the extreme; and want and difficulty together, or a separation insupportable to either, she foresaw as the inevitable lot of both mother and child, except the latter speedily retrieved her fortune by marriage. There was small likelihood of this, with the nephew,—while the overtures of the uncle were as eligible as mortal woman could wish; rank, affluence, an amiable character, a fine mind, every advantage but the questionable one, of youth, seemed included in the offer of his hand. All this, and much more, had been enforced over and over again, by the urgent arguments of Mrs. De Rozelle; but so long as the prepossessed Monimia could hug to her heart, the faintest prospect of a settlement, at however distant a date, with the object of her preference, she turned, not a deaf, but a cold ear, to the grave counsel of wisdom and experience. But weeks had grown into months, and months into years, since the beginning of her intimacy with young Vere; and still the lovers languished on in "single blessedness,"—their lives embittered by the agonies of "hope deferred."

Miss De Rozelle, alive to a full sense of her own dignity, and quickened by an extraneous impulse began, at last, to get impatient, under the idea that Edward trifled with her—and that it was high time for him to "wed, or cease to woo." She felt at a loss how to apprehend his conduct; he haunted her company incessantly—was miserable if she spoke to, or of, any other man, and consulted and confided in her precisely as if they were an affianced couple; yet with all these marks of impassioned interest in her, there was no correspondent hurry to bring matters to an ordinary conclusion. Nevertheless Monimia, believing herself truly and honourably loved, found no fault with a hesitation founded on the purest motives of regard for her ease,—till she accidently heard from a source entitled to implicit credit that Mr. Vere was the favorite suitor of the rich beauty, Miss Bassett. Several corroborating circumstances gave authenticity to this rumour; and though not prone by nature to mistrust without cause, the suspicions of the lofty girl, were not, when once roused, to be removed or allayed without sifting the story to the bottom. Besides, apart from any misgivings of Edward's fidelity, she readily conceived that, unless kept up by constant excitement, the strongest passions are liable to "sink by slow decay,"—and that holding himself sure of her whenever he pleased, both from her predilection for him, and that mode of life, whose privacy guaranteed the absence of all rivals,—her lover might be apt to wear off the chains of an affection so calm and monotonous, and with the inconstancy synonymous with the lordly gender, to run after those, who, from their own attractions, and a commanding position in the realm of fashion, there flashed with a meteor's light across his path. The sequestered maiden knew that, endowed beyond most of her sex, she must tower above any, if placed upon equal ground! but the finest painting requires the advantage of a proper light,—and she was sensible that, owing to a want of opportunity for their exercise, her lover remained unconscious of the one-half of her talents and graces. Under this aspect of the case, she resolved to try what their full display could do.

Mrs. R———, who was particularly fond of the elegant recluse, had always chided her impolitic retirement, and begged to produce her at a select party. Many a long day had elapsed since Monimia had made one in a gay assembly; but, now emulous of annihilating the petty disturber of her right of pre-emption to Edward Vere, and in order to ascertain the truth of what had so deeply galled her,—she consented to perform, with other belles at the famous Concert. Coming out there in all the eclat of her extraordinary accomplishments—outshining the élite of society—and taking her lover by surprise; she hoped the happiest effect from this sudden developement of her splendid powers. Nor were such anticipations false or unreasonable, though the event so cruelly belied her wishes. She saw Edward make his appearance with Miss Bassett—and that he left not her side during the evening; still, for some time, she made allowances for that shy and wayward nature, so well known to her,—and excused that distance and apparent inattention to herself as characteristic alike of his love and his delicacy. But as he wrongfully irritated at her gaiety and apparent disregard of his feelings, redoubled his assiduities to the fair boast of New York,—Monimia began to tremble and to recognize more than a casual flirtation in their deep and exclusive intercourse. Her heart ached with anguish, at the bare supposition—and she felt faint and sickening under the pangs of a jealous suspense, while singing or moving in the height of her loveliness with the joyous smiles and grace of a Euphrosyne. Edward's emotion and delight, so unexpectedly expressed at her refusal to waltz, renovated her drooping hopes and spirits; and they rose elate in airy rapture at the very moment, that was doomed to crush them forever. When the confiding girl beheld the pledge of her fondest faith, transferred before her eyes to the keeping of another—and that other her superior—not in intrinsic worth, but in mere worldly and sordid dross, her whole being seemed to undergo a sudden and radical convulsion,—and that bosom, so long the seat of purest passion, became at once its grave. The agony was tremendous, but salutary. The studious neglect, the insulting preference, for her beautiful rival, by him she had so much distinguished, had been eagerly extenuated and forgiven; but not so this last, and grossest affront. In an instant her resolution was formed, and subsequently acted upon. The claims of the dearest and most affectionate of mothers, the consideration of her own interest, the dictates of prudence hitherto stifled,—all now interposed in aid of outraged pride, and womanly dignity, pierced in its tenderest nerve; and after the glance that showed her the palpable proof of not only Edward's disloyalty, but of his disdain, she stood "regenerated and disenthralled," and his influence over her expired forever.

He, on his part, deemed himself no less wronged and insulted, when, after every effort to regain Monimia's ear, he heard her abrupt reserve and obstinacy accounted for by the certain news that she was receiving the addresses of his uncle. Incredible as this seemed, it was notwithstanding, as true as horrible; but far from ascribing this denouement of their out-standing engagement to his own blunder, the blame was all laid upon female venality and caprice. Edward believed that Miss De Rozelle had some right to be offended at his momentary surrender of her precious token; but he trusted in her candour and kindness to do him justice, and he had no doubt of her being as eager to listen to, as he was to render a satisfactory apology for his apparent slight. But when he found his long-worshipped idol not implacable, but indifferent—when he contrasted her late and last favour, with this sudden and complete estrangement—when he was able to recognize in her severe and deceitful course, no semblance of her former self,—he could not but conclude, not that both were somewhat in the wrong, but that she had never loved—that his truth and ardour, all his sufferings on her account, reciprocal as he had weakly dreamed them, were in vain,—and that prudently determined to dispose of her charms at the best market, she had now accepted a wealthy bidder, while he was "whistled upon the wind, a prey to fortune." All that was manly and sensitive within him rebelled against the insolence of her cold-blooded desertion; and with a precipitancy as instantaneous as that of Romeo, he abjured a haughty and unfeeling Rosalind for a Juliet, as artless as she was fair and fond. In doing this, he but followed the example of her, to whom he had been too long and deeply devoted,—and who had stung him to the quick, by a treachery long meditated, and masked beneath the most seductive tenderness. He would thus lessen her triumph, by showing that he could be as changeable and as prudent as herself,—and that the beautiful daughter of a millionaire, was well worth a portionless and unprincipled coquette, even though she were the most elegant and accomplished of her sex.

Some two or three months after the concert at the Secretary's, a double marriage was celebrated in the Vere family. That of the General, to Monimia de Rozelle, took place in Washington, at St. John's Church; while Edward led the fair Miss Bassett to the hymeneal altar in her native city of New York. And now contrary to every rule of romance, which dooms those guilty of sacrificing Love to Prudence, as martyrs to fate and fine feelings; a regard to truth compels us to record that both matches turned out extremely well. Monimia, as a wife, performed her duty to admiration, and reaped the reward of her principled and rational conduct; while the force of her example and conversation insensibly cured the young Mrs. Vere (as Eliza was called) of those little defects engendered under the pernicious tuition of her mother; and she too made her husband as happy as if he had wedded his first love. It is true the world, with all its customary good nature, affirmed that the quodum lovers still maintained a secret commerce, and hinted shrewd surmises, that all was not right between them, as the General would one day find to his cost. But these charitable conclusions invaded not the better part of society, among whom the Vere's long continued to be esteemed as among the happiest and worthiest couples in the District; and Monimia, exemplifying the triumph of virtue and good sense, never had a moment's reason to repent her surrender of Love to Prudence. TO ——.

You say I love the moon,—I do
And why? It whispers dreams of you!
I love the moon, though 'neath its light
Is often hid the darkest night,
And many a heart that ill could brook
The sunshine, steals at eve, to look
On that pale moon.

I love the moon; though pale its beam,
'Tis truer than the sunny gleam
That glads awhile our summer's day,
Then passes like a dream away,
And leaves behind a broken spell,
Upon our night of thought to dwell.
I love the moon!

I love the moon, that silent thing
Of night and dreams, to see her fling
Her robe of light o'er earth and sea,
To wake us to her witchery
Of loveliness; mine eye could rest
For ever on a scene so blest.
I love the moon!

I love the moon, earth, sea, and sky,
The summer's sun, the autumn's sigh,
The winter's blast, though wild and drear,
Has fell like music on my ear.
I love the spring, but ah! to me
The moonlight whispers dreams of thee.
I love the moon!

VANITY.—All is vanity among men, their joy as well as their sorrow. It is better, however, that the soap-bubble should glitter with gold, or wear an azure tint, than be overcast with clouds, or what painters of nature call a dim obscurity.

A mediocrity in writing is quicker perceived in poetry than in any thing else. Who would not buoy on the surface sometimes, than always anchor in the mud.

A TALE OF BLOOD.

If further proof were wanting that not unfrequently "truth is stranger than fiction," the inhuman atrocities detailed in the following bloody tale would present unanswerable testimony. The moral turpitude of the hardened villain who forms the subject of our story is almost without a parallel, and the agony and suffering resulting from his crimes are shocking in the extreme; his situation drove him to desperation, and love of life prompted him the the execution of deeds at which we shrink from the mere recital.

A few months since a Mulatto named Eriaz, at Hayti, Port au Prince, was sentenced to die for the murder of a merchant of the island. The murder was attended with horrible circumstances, and a robbery to a large amount. A few days after, Dardeza, a young Portuguese, was condemned to death for stabbing his mistress in a fit of jealousy.

The two convicts were confined in the prison, but in different cells; Eriaz, whose ferocity made him an object of terror, was confined in a dark cell; a small grating to give air opened on the passage, but not a single ray of light could penetrate this abode of wretchedness. Dardeza, the Portuguese, whose crime could not entirely obliterate sympathy for his fate, was better treated; his cell was larger, more airy, and the grated window opened on the country.

Both convicts were ironed at the feet and hands. They were informed that their execution would take place in three days, and bread and water sufficient for the period was delivered to them.

They both meditated their escape. Dardeza, who was permitted to see his friends, received from them instruments to enable him to effect his purpose, but the young man, weak and inexpert, gave up the attempt in despair, and waited in sullen horror the moment of the hangman's visit.

Eriaz, bold and resolute, resolved to surmount every difficulty, and effect his escape.

From the road to his cell, he fancied that one side of it was the outer wall of the prison, and if so he might get off. He set to work, and to prevent his being heard, he moistened the wall, and with the irons on his hands scratched it; he thus removed some fragments; he continued to moisten it and scratch; he slept not; he never ceased working an instant, save when the jailor came with a lantern to peep at him through the grating; he then crouched down before the hole, and pretended to sleep. He continued to remove small fragments of stone, but as day brought no light to his dungeon, he was not aware how long he had worked, nor how long he had to live; he neither knew the thickness of the wall, nor into what place the breach would lead, but the hope of life triumphed over every obstacle. His situation was horrible; every noise he heard made him fancy the fatal hour was arrived; despair for a moment paralyzed him; but instantly arousing all his energies, he resumed his labour, the stone yields to his efforts—it falls—a passage is made large enough for him to pass; but, alas! to his sorrow he finds that instead of the outer wall he had only penetrated another cell; he heard the moan of despair—it was the call of Dardeza!

Eriaz approached him, told him of his plan, and showed him what he had done. He perceived the grating open on the air of heaven—he considers flight certain; but how long it was before the fatal hour he knew not. Dardeza informed him that the coming night was the last. Eriaz overjoyed at the thoughts of one night more, considered their flight secure. Dardeza had a watch spring; with this feeble instrument they severed the iron bars of the grating—they were able to pass; but, to their horror, they found the window 60 feet from the ground. Yet this fall must be risked. There now only remained to file off their chains; both could not use the spring at once; the time before the fatal hour would not suffice for liberating both from their irons, and to escape with them on was impossible.

A terrible discussion now arose between the wretched convicts. The file was in the hands of Dardeza, and he resolved to use it himself. Eriaz, rushed on him to take it from him; a dreadful struggle took place. Eriaz, more vigorous, threw his adversary down. Dardeza feels himself vanquished; he approaches the window to throw out the file, for if it cannot save him it shall not save another. Eriaz perceives his object and prevents it. "Thou shalt not have it," exclaimed Dardeza, who put his hand to his mouth, and swallowed the file.

Eriaz threw himself down, in a state of stupification. "It is over then," said he, with the accent of despair—"I must die."

Dardeza was stretched on the ground—there was a rattling in his throat—the file had stuck in it, and was suffocating him. A horrid thought entered the mind of Eriaz—he rushed on Dardeza, seized him by the throat, strangled him, dashed out his brains against the wall, thrust his fist down his throat, seized the instrument, drew it forth reeking with the blood of his victim! In this state he applied it to sawing off his irons. He stript the body of Dardeza—tore up his clothes to form a cord, which he tied to a bar of the window. He descends by it. When arrived at the extremity, he sees with a fright 30 feet below him—he falls—a platform breaks the violence of the fall—he rolls to the earth covered with bruises.

Here new difficulties await him—he is not out of the prison, but in the outer round—he has still a high wall to scale before he can be free.

While he sought for the best place to attempt this last obstacle, one of the prison mastiffs rushed on him. Eriaz met him courageously, and thrust his still bloody hand into his mouth to prevent his barking. The dog made an effort to disengage himself, succeeded, and bit off the hand of Eriaz. Thus mutilated, he fought and conquered the dog; but there was not a moment to lose, the day was beginning to break, he found a part of the wall filled with crevices, he had only one hand, yet he succeeded in climbing the wall. He was free!

At day-break the jailors went to visit the prisoners to prepare them for their fate. They found only the corpse of Dardeza, horribly mutilated.

A general alarm was given, and a proclamation made; from the traces of the blood and the hand ly ng near the dog which Eriaz had strangled, they found that the convict had lost his right hand; this circumstance was noticed in the description of his person.

Eriaz had run as fast as his legs would carry him an hour—he perceived a small hut, he was dying with hunger and fatigue, he entered it to solicit hospitality, for he could not reach that isolated spot. An old negress, who inhabited the hut, gave him some food, he was about to depart, when a mulatto named Caro, the son of the negress who had so generously entertained him, entered.

He had just came from Port au Prince, and began telling the wonderful story of the flight of Eriaz and murder of Dardeza. Eriaz turned pale, and concealed the stump of his right arm under his clothes. Caro perceived it, and the intrepid young man rushed upon him, tore off his cloak, and discovered his bleeding wound. Eriaz retreated, and spying a hatchet, he advanced against Caro, who had seized a large stick. Eriaz aimed a mortal blow at his adversary; Caro warded it off; the hatchet slided along the stick, and fell on the head of the poor negress, who had tried to part them—she fell bathed in her blood; Caro, furious, rushed on Eriaz, and struck him down senseless. He attempted to raise his mother—she was no more! At this time three horsemen belonging to the police entered to enquire if Eriaz had passed that way; they discovered him the author of a new crime. He was handcuffed, and fastened to the tail of one of the horses, and conveyed thus back to his prison.

Eriaz had no sooner arrived there, than he asked for a bottle of rum and a priest; to whom he related with the greatest sang froid all the details of his evasion. He then swallowed a bottle of rum at a draught. The priest had scarcely withdrawn when Eriaz fell senseless on the floor, and when the executioner came to convey him to the gallows he was no more.

IMPORTANCE OF RELIGION TO SOCIETY.

BY DR. CHANNING.

Few men suspect, perhaps no man comprehends, the extent of the support given by religion to the virtues of ordinary life. No man perhaps is aware, how much our moral and social sentiments are fed from this fountain; how powerless conscience would become without the belief of a God; how palsied would be human benevolence, were there not the sense of a higher benevolence to quicken and sustain it; how suddenly the whole social fabric would quake, and with what a fearful crash it would sink into the hopeless ruins, were the ideas of a supreme Being, of accountableness, and of a future life, to be totally erased from every mind: Once let men thoroughly believe that they are the work and sport of chance; that no superior intelligence concerns itself with human affairs; that all their improvements perish forever at death; that the weak have no guardian, and the injured no avenger; that there is no recompense for sacrifices, to uprightness and the public good; that an oath is unheard in heaven; that secret crimes have no witness but the perpetrator; that human existence has no purpose, and human virtue no unfailing friend; that this brief life is every thing to us, and death is total, everlasting extinction; once let men abandon religion, and who can describe the extent of the desolation which would follow? We hope perhaps that human laws and naturally sympathy would hold society together. As reasonably might we believe, that were the sun quenched in the heavens, our torches could illuminate, and our fires quicken and fertilize the earth. What is there in human nature to awaken respect and tenderness, if man is the unprotected insect of a day? and what is he more if atheism be true? Erase all thought and fear of God from a community, and selfishness and sensuality would absorb the whole man. Appetite knowing no restraint, and poverty and suffering having no solace or hope, would trample in scorn on the restraints of human laws. Virtue, duty, principle, would be mocked and spurned as unmeaning sounds. A sordid self interest would supplant every other feeling, and man would become in fact, what the theory of atheism declares him to be, a companion for brutes.

It particularly deserves attention in this discussion, that the christian religion is singularly important to free communities. Indeed we may doubt whether civil freedom can subsist without it. This at least we know that equal rights and impartial administration of justice, have never been enjoyed where this religion has not been understood. It favors free insutitions, first because its spirit is liberty; that is, a spirit of respect for the interest and rights of others. Christianity recognizes the essential quality of mankind, beats down with its whole might those aspiring and rapacious principles of our nature, which have subjected the many to the few; and by its refining influence, as well as by direct precept, turns to God, and to Him only, that supreme homage which has been so impiously lavished on crowned and titled fellow creatures. Thus its whole tendency is free. It lays deeply the only foundations of liberty, which are the principles of benevolence, justice, and respect for human nature. The spirit of liberty is not merely, as multitudes imagine, a jealousy of our own particular rights, an unwillingness to be oppressed ourselves, but a respect for the right of others, and an unwillingness that any man, whether high or low, should be wronged and trampled under foot. Now this is the spirit of christianity; and liberty has no security, any further than this uprightness and benevolence of sentiment actuates a community.

In another methed religion befriends liberty. It diminishes the necessity of public restraints, and supercedes in a great degree the use of force in administering the laws; and this it does, by making men a law to themselves, and by repressing the disposition to disturb and injure society. Take away the purifying and restraining influence of religion and selfishness, rapacity and injustice will break out in new excesses; and amidst the increasing perils of society, government must be strengthened to defend it, must accumulate means of repressing disorder and crime; and this strength and these means may be, and often have been turned against the freedom of the state which they were meant to secure. Diminish principle, and you increase the need of force in a community. In this country government needs not the array of power which you meet in other nations—no guards of soldiers, no host of spies, no vexatious regulations of police? but accomplishes its beneficent purposes by a few unarmed judges and civil officers, and operates so silently around us, and comes so seldom in contact with us, that many of us enjoy its blessings with hardly a thought of its existence. This is the perfection of freedom; and to what do we owe this condition? I answer to the power of those laws which religion writes on our hearts, which unite and concentrate public opinion against injustice and oppression, which spread a spirit of equity and good will through the community. Thus religion is the soul of freedom, and no nation under heaven has such an interest in it as ourselves.

THE COLOSSEUM, ROME.

The Coloseum, which is of an oval form, occupies the space of nearly six acres. "It may justly be said to have been the most imposing building, from its apparent magnitude in the world; the pyramids of Egypt can only be compared with it in the extent of their plan, as they cover nearly the same surface." The greatest length, or major axis, is 620 feet; the greatest breadth, or minor axis, 513 feet. The outer wall is 157 feet high in its whole extent. The exterior wall is divided into four stories, each ornamented with one of the orders of architecture. The cornice of the upper story is perforated for the purpose of inserting wooden masts, which passed also through the architrave and frieze, and descended to a row of corbels immediately above the upper range of windows, on which are holes to receive the masts. These masts were for the purpose of attaching cords to, for sustaining the awning which defended the spectators from the sun or rain. Two corridors ran all round the building, leading to staircases which ascended to the several stories; and the seats which descended towards the arena, supported throughout upon eighty arches, occupied so much of the space, that the clear opening of the present inner wall next the arena is only 287 feet by 170 feet. Immediately above and around the arena was the podium, elevated about twelve or fifteen feet, on which were seated the emperor, senators, ambassadors of foreign nations, and other distinguished personages in that city, of distinctions. From he podium to the top of the second story, were seats of marble for the equestrian order; above the second story, the seats appear to have been constructed of wood. In these various seats eighty thousand spectators might be arranged according to their respective ranks; and indeed it appears from inscriptions, as well as from expressions in Roman writers, that many of the places in this immense theatre, were assigned to particular individuals, and that each might find his seat without confusion. The ground was excavated over the surface of the arena in 1813; a great number of substructions were then discovered, which by some antiquaries are considered to be of modern date, and by others, to have formed dens for the various beasts that were exhibited. The descriptions which have been left by historians and other writers of the variety and extent of the shows, would indicate that a vast space and ample conveniences were required beneath the stage, to accomplish the wonders which were doubtless, there realized in the presence of assembled Rome.

When the imperial power was firmly established, the sports of the amphitheatre were conducted upon a scale to which the Consuls of the republic had scarcely dared to aspire. Caligula, on his birth-day, gave four hundred bears, and as many other wild beasts to be slain; and on the birth-day of Drusilla, he exhibited these brutal spectacles, continued to the succeeding day on a similar scale. Claudius instituted combats between Thessalian horsemen and wild bulls; and he also caused camels to fight for the first time with horses. Invention was racked to devise new combinations of cruelty. Many of the emperors abandoned themselves to these sports, with as passionate an ardour as the uncultivated multitude. Sensuality debases as much as ignorance, because it is ignorance under another name. Claudius rose at daylight to repair to the Circus, and frequently remained, that he might not lose a single pang of the victims, while the people went to their afternoon meal. Sometimes, during the reigns of Claudius and Nero, an elephant was opposed to a single fencer; and the spectators were delighted by the display of individual skill. Sometimes, hundreds and even thousands of the more ferocious beasts, were slaughtered by guards on horseback; and the pleasure of the multitude was in proportion to the lavishness with which the blood of men and beast was made to flow. The passion for these sports required a more convenient theatre for its gratification, than the old Circus. The Colosseum was commenced by Vespasian, and completed by Titus (A. D. 79.) This enormous building occupied only three years in its erection. Cassiodorus affirms that this magnificent monument of folly cost as much as would have been required for the building of a capital city. We have the means of distinctly ascertaining its dimensions and its accommodations, from the great mass of wall that still remains entire. Such a building can never again appear in the world, because mankind have learned that the expenditure of princes upon useless monuments to their own pride and power, can only be wrung from the hard labours of the people themselves; and that the wealth thus diverted from the channels of usefulness, perpetuates the abuses of misgovernment, and at the same time impedes the progress of the many in knowledge and comfort. Public happiness and the ostentation of despotism cannot exist together.

STIRLING CASTLE, SCOTLAND.

Stirling, was in former times, one of the most important towns, in a military point of view, in the Scottish realm. From its position on the Forth, it was the key to the Highlands—"the bulwark of the north"—as Scott has called it in his 'Lady of the Lake.' It stands on the south bank of the river, and used to command the only bridge by which it was crossed.

Stirling has been called the Windsor of Scotland; and it has some pretensions to that appellation. The view from the castle is of vast extent, and comprehends the richest variety, both of the beautiful and the grand in the natural scenery. Towards the west, the prospect is bounded by the solitary Benlomond, rising in the sky, at the distance of about thirty miles, to the height of above 3000 feet. The intervening space is a level valley, through which the Forth is seen stealing its way with a thousand meanderings. Round the northern horizon sweeps the almost continuous chain of the Grampians. To the south lie the green hills of Campsie; turning round from which towards the east the eye rests on a plain of rich and cultivated beauty, with the sister towers of the capital cresting the distance, and between, the broad and fertile plains of Carron on the one hand, and on the other "the many Forth unravelled" in a succession of beautiful windings, till it spreads out from a slender stream into a great arm of the sea. Some idea of the singular manner in which the river lingers over this part of its course, may be formed from the fact that it travels over about twenty-four miles in making its way through a space not more than six miles in length. The innumerable green peninsulas, of every variety of shape and dimension, which it forms in its sportive progress, present a picture which certainly has not often been surpassed in bright and animated beauty.

"Grey Stirling, with her towers and town," is unquestionably a place of very high antiquity. The oldest existing charter of the burgh is dated in 1120; but it bears to be a confirmation of former grants, and there can be no doubt that the fort at least was of importance a considerable time before this. The first mention which historians have made of it, is in the ninth century, about the middle of which it is recorded to have been taken and thrown down by Kenneth II, the King of the Highlands of Scotland, when he overcome the Picts, whose principal fortress it was, and that which guarded the most exposed extremity of their territory.

It was afterwards repeatedly attacked and taken by the English, and by the several factions whose contentions continued to distract Scotland with little intermission, during nearly all the time it remained an independent kingdom. But even to enumerate all the sieges it sustained would lead us far beyond our present limits. The last time it was attacked, was by the Highlanders in the rebellion of 1745, when it was successfully defended by the governor, old General Blackeny, throughout a siege of several weeks.

Stirling appears to have become a royal residence about the middle of the twelfth century; but probably none of the present buildings of the castle are older than the middle of the fifteenth, when James I., on his return from his long but fortunate detention in England, made this place his principal royal seat.

One of the buildings in the Castle is called the Palace; being a quadrangular edifice, with a small court in the centre. It was built by James V. Here is a room designated the King's Room, or the Presence, the roof of which was formerly adored with a series of carvings in wood, in the very highest style of art. About half a century ago one or two of these ornaments fell; and the incident was taken advantage of, to pull down the roof altogether, and to convert the hall into a barrack.

The ground immediately around the Castle, and which is walled in as a royal park, contains various monuments of antiquity. Among them is an eminence, on the north-east, where criminals used to be executed, alluded to in the 'Lady of the Lake,' in the speech put into the mouth of Douglas, as he makes his way up the rock:—

"Ye towers! within whose circuit dread
A Douglas by his Sovereign bled;
And thou, O sad and fatal mound!
That oft has heard the death-axe sound,
As on the noblest of the land
Fell the stern headsman's bloody hand!"

Here also is the round table, where it is said that tournaments were anciently held, with the adjoining seat from which the dames of the court viewed the contest, still distinguished by the name of the Lady's Rock. This, too, is introduced by Scott:—

"The vale with loud applauses rang,
The Ladie's Rock sent back the clang," &c.

And so frequently in ancient times, was the country in the neighbourhood of this important fortress, the scene of the meeting of hostile armies, that no fewer than twelve battle-fields are pointed out from the summit of the rock,—the glorious field of Bannockburn, the Marathon of Scotland, among the rest.

The Bibliotheque Choisie of French literature, though no longer published under its former title, is united with another publication, that of the Revue Francaise, published by Hoskin and Snowdon, New York. This work in typographical neatness, general appearance, and intrinsic excellence, may be compared with any publication of its class, that we meet with either at home or abroad. It is, as its name imports, not a library of French literature, but a collection of flowers for the great literary parterre, which is no where more watered with genius, or cultivated with more care, than in France. Monthly we have in each number a bouquet, comprising selections from all departments, the useful the fragrant, and the beautiful. There is something in the French literature so spiritual and aspiring, that a charm is thrown over the most jejune subjects, and it is rendered more attractive in this, than it can possibly be in any other language.

The Revue Francaise is valuable to all who read the French language well, but particularly so to those who are learning it, as the contents of a periodical are much more easy mastered than the heavy pages of a voluminous work. The sprightliness of the lighter branches of French literature is exceedingly attractive, as may be seen by the following translation from the number now before us, furnished by an intelligent literary friend.

A SOIREE AT LADY N'S.

I had returned one cold evening in December, disappointed enough, from a visit where I had found no one at home. I was dressed, and as I do not like the labour of such preparations, I stopped mechanically before the well-lighted shop of an apothecary, turning over in my mind what I should do, in honour of my Cashmere vest, my granate coloured coat, with gold chased buttons and my boots a Suisseki. I was in a sort of indolent indetermination, unable to find any means of turning to advantage, my fine dress, which I cursed, and which prohibited my going to spend the evening gaily with my friends, when a well known voice called out

"Well! Henry! what are you about, planted there by the cold, opposite that bottle of water for the cure of chilblains?"

I turned, and pressed the hand of one of my best friends.

"You look fine this evening," said I, folding my arms in my cloak! "do you visit in this neighbourhood!" added I with a half sigh.

"My dear fellow, I am going to take tea with Lady N. If you were only dressed,——I'd take you along."

"Oh, thank you," says I, throwing the cloak off my shoulders under the pretext of consulting my watch.

"See now! you are dressed like a bridegroom!—Zounds! I'll take you along."

"Not so fast, if you please," says I, "you don't know yet it would suit me. Besides I don't know ——"

"Good Heavens, my dear fellow, these English are so fashionables. Come along, you will be amused."

"Are there any young ladies there?" said I. "Ay, are there; delightful ones my dear boy, who speak French like ourselves—come."

"Agreed!"

Ten minutes afterwards, we entered a magnificent hotel in Helder street, glittering with cut glass, gilding and drapery, divinely arranged, blue and granate.

On a spacious sofa, at the extremity of the saloon, three young ladies, negligently placed, were amusing themselves in turning over the leaves of an album.—Their feet were upon the rich hair cover of Gobelin manufacture.

We advanced near the fire, around which were seated a number of ladies and gentlemen.

"Milady," said Evariste, addressing the mistress of the house, "allow me to present to you one of my best friends; I ask of you for him, the same kindness you have shown for me." And Lady N, a large, cold statue-like woman, opened, as she fixed her eyes upon me, a great toothless mouth, from whence issued a certain noise like the crackling of a piece of parchment. I made her a profound bow—this finished the ceremony.

"This is your house, my dear fellow," said Evariste; "Your tea will be served here every evening—there are charming women here—and you will form delightful acquaintances."

While he thus vaunted the pleasures attendant upon the tea parties of Lady N, I surveyed all parts of the saloon, which contained about twenty persons. But my eyes fell with most pleasure, upon the charming beauties upon the sofa; and as in a bouquet, we recur ever to the freshest and most fragrant flowers, my attention, abandoning all other portions of the room, was riveted upon the three rosy and splendidly dressed young ladies, who were immersed in a sea of light, shed from a rich candelabra, on a table by them.

One of them, the middle one, and the merriest, was especially beautiful. She was not too large;—of a fair complexion, with a rich frontlet around her forehead, like the rich cream which mantles over the milk below it—cheeks and lips animated with laughter; black eyes, the sparkling expression from which varied, as from the facettes of a chrystal pendant: the whole enclosed by a wreath of hair, which fell in voluptuous ringlets, around her enchanting visage:—then a waist so surprisingly slender. In short, of a form, the most perfect, languishingly inclined in the most coquettish attitudes over the album, with which all three were amusing themselves. The other two young ladies were likewise well enough; but her! the lady of the album, she was the most winning, for winning is the word; not beautiful,—winning!

"Who," said I, in addressing Evariste, "who, is this charming sportive fair one, seated between the two English ladies."

"Ah, my dear boy; charming! charming! that is Miss Florine de , one of the jolliest dames of Paris. She's brilliant—all talent, my dear fellow!—unsurpassed at the piano forte!—witching when she sings—ravishing when she dances! and ——"

"Enough! enough," said I, interrupting him, "you have already worked yourself into such a passion, as to fix her attention—see how she observes us; let us move away—"

"What!—on the contrary," said he, "let me present you."

"By no means—it is not a good time," said I, drawing him to another part of the saloon.

"Zounds, you remind me!—shall I tell you a good story, little known I assure you, in regard to her, the beautiful Florine? You know Gustavus Angot, the only son of the rich banker de ——"

"Well.—He is a gay young fellow, full of talent and spirit. He was much sought in the beau monde. His social rank and financial station, assisted also the elegance of his manners, for —"

"Yes, yes!"

"Well, my dear fellow, fancy him, madly in love with this fair lady. She loved him also—I believe so at least. Their approaching union, was the grand topic of the saloons. Marquisses, Countesses, Baronnesses, surrounded the gay Florine, praising Gustavus and his good taste. Finally, the demand in marriage was seriously made. That lady there upon the sofa, asked eight days to reflect upon it."

"Eight days," said I "'twas but reasonable—a young girl must be familiarized to the idea of the transition to a—young woman."

"But after these eight days, eight more. Then eight more; in fine, as much reflection in taking a husband, as in the choice of a colour for a ball. The old Chevalier de , visited his daughter one evening, to know finally from her own lips, what hopes Gustavus might entertain. Think what he must have suffered, from this procrastination, poor fellow, enamoured of this enchanting girl."

"My daughter, my Florine," said the Chevalier, "I came to know of thee, what we must definitely reply to those, who do us the honour to seek our alliance. One month thou hast been reflecting upon it. It is time thy mind was made up."

She put on a prudish look, pursed up her little mouth (just as I'd like her to do to me for reconciliation) and twisted the lace border of her work apron.

"Come, my Florine, open thy heart to thy father; come my dear child!"

"Papa!" she stammered forth.

"Well; dost thou love him? Hast thou any thing to say to thy mother!—come be not a child!"

And she looked prudish again, and she made a charming little mouth, and she twisted the corner of her silk apron!

Then.

"Listen—dear papa,—you know how much I love you—It would be so hard to me to leave you! True Gustavus is very amiable! he is the most gracious cavalier of our saloons! but—"

"But!"—replied the old Chevalier.

"But," said she, half concealing her pretty face in her silk apron, "to be called—Papa, dear papa, do not be angry, but it would be dreadful to be called—Madame Angot!"

"'My child,' said the Chevalier, suddenly rising, 'you are mad. In truth, this is the strangest reason.'"

"'Dear Papa,' said the cajoling girl, throwing her arms round her old father, and playing with his cross of honour: 'fancy then, when I should arrive at the saloon, the ball, after the Countess de —, the Marechale ——, had been announced; how I could bear to hear the thundering voice of the footman, cry out: madame Ang ——! oh, every body would turn to look at my hoop, my neck, my carlin, my green paper fan. You see now, dear little papa, that is quite impossible. And besides, I have the headache now."

"In fine, my dear friend, she put into play a thousand other whimsicalities, and that is the reason, dear Henry," said Evariste, that Miss Florine is still a young lady."

"What would you; her ideas are of the highest aristocratic cast. I believe she would like to see on the head of her spouse, the plumes of the peerage. I wish it for her. Tell me, now, is not that a delicious anecdote?"

"It is a queer story, and hardly credible! I confess, I should like to hear her chat.

"Are you willing now to be introduced?"

"Very."

I passed my hand through my hair, and we approached. A thought struck me, and I squeezed the arm of Evariste. "But a simple untitled name, like mine! will it be well received, said I?"

"You are right—stop. I'll add the name of your mother to your own, and that will make a magnificent name."

Then ten steps farther!

"Ladies," said he, pulling at his silk doublet, "I have the honour to present to you M. L. de B——, officer in the royal marine corps, and my best friend; he draws and sings like an angel, and speaks English nearly as well as these two Misses. I am happy and proud, ladies, of this circumstance, which gives me some claim to your remembrance."

He bowed and disappeared.

I was struck dumb by this tirade of my Mæcænas; I reddened, and stood rooted before the three young ladies, who gazed at each other, without understanding my first observation. I was about to begin with common places, when the gay French girl, supplied me with a delicate opportunity. That instant I forgave her, her mania for titles.

"How does Monsieur like that head of G don? we have rarely seen any thing so beautiful—I think, that could not have been conceived, save in the imagination of an artist, and that never."

"It is said, Miss, that Lawrence sees in his dreams at night, the delightful heads of young ladies and children which he subsequently animates upon the canvass. If the artist has dreamed this here, I, more happy, may recollect having seen one which surpassed it."

She reddened, with pleasure, else I know little—and turned over the leaves of the album. It was a book of marine views of Eugene Isabey, taken from the Revue Maritime.

"Oh—the poor little boats," said she with charming terror—"look there, Ellen!"

Ellen looked.

Oh it was fine, the three heads of those young girls. The interest with which they invested those barks, made me proud of being a sailor.

"What is the name of that little boat?" said Ellen, (in English) to me, raising her two black, lustrous eyes.

"Miss (cursed Evariste, who asserted I could——) it is—it is a cutter!"

And the gay French girl laughed—in mockery perhaps! I got enraged. I wanted none of its aid however, except in regard to her—for I believed that alone with the other two, any English would have proved sufficient.

Happily, just at this moment, a waiter came to inform the ladies, that they were waited for at the tea table. They arose, and light as leaves, they glided over the floor—Miss Florine replaced the album; I offered her my hand, and we crossed the saloon.

I was seated near her.

The cups of tea went round—I drank two—three—four. That was enough—my four words of English had already singularly heated me.

Still, I kept taking tea, when all the rest had finished. There was but one old Englishman, and myself who drank—Evariste was talking near the window, and yet I drank—the old Englishman gave over,—and still I had to drink.

Hardly, could I get my cup down upon the table but an arm was stretched out over the table and filled it. The perspiration stood on me in large drops—I was inundated, drowned, yet dared say nothing—Miss Florine, each time presented me the sugar bowl with a mischievous look—and it was nearly empty—and ten individuals talked English, with their eyes fixed on me—I was in a desperate state—I turned myself, I removed my cravat,—but the moment I could get my cup down upon the table, it was filled again.

It is perhaps the fashion in England, said I, to myself, to drown people in this way the first time they honor them with a reception. Oh, I shall remember this.

But, there was the sixteenth cup, and the stiff, statue-like lady, gibbered out something that my mischievous neighbour translated thus:

"Lady N begs you will excuse her Monsieur; she says she has no more warm water,—but if you desire it, she will order some."

"Not at all—no—no—I ask your—pardon—madam,—for the trouble—I have drank—my lady, I am sensible—"

And I could not find words to tell, quickly enough that I had had an hour ago as much tea as I wanted—that my stomach was inundated—that—

Miss Florine began to laugh; after looking full at me, she began to laugh in her cambric handkerchief,—the witch!

"You don't know then, Monsieur, that among the English, it is usual to place the spoon in the cup, and not at the side, when you have tea enough."

"What? I—and you would'nt tell me, Miss!"

"Monsieur—I thought you were thirsty—I saw great drops of perspiration running down—I believed you took pleasure in drinking."

"Mercy!"

And the sugar bowl was emptied before the three last cups. She fixed her eyes on me, still laughing. The adventure went the round of the circle.

"There," said Florine, after having well enjoyed herself; "they are going to dance, I believe; is Monsieur a musician? here is some charming music."

"I play the flute Miss, and like you I find these country dances charming."

And I rose with the rest.

She followed me with her eyes—I put my mouth to the flute, laying on the piano, and I sounded some musical notes, but firmly decided not to ask Miss Florine to dance, who had permitted me to drink sixteen cups of tea,—I picked up my hat.

"Do you go?" said Evariste, "what's the matter? Stay, they are about to dance, and you will spend a delicious evening! An't these amiable people? You had some gay chat with Miss Florine—hey. Every body had their eyes on you. Remain; here is a flute, and you shall play; some warm wine will be handed this evening."

"Heavens," I replied, "I have drunk sixteen cups of tea—I can't dance, and I can't make others dance—I am going to bed."

"I am sorry for you," said he, squeezing my hand; "adieu then, since you wish it."

"Good by, till to-morrow," and I went out.

Seeking my cloak in the antichamber, I heard Florine say to Evariete:

"Your friend has drunk sixteen cups of tea—He'll feel some indigestion to-night."

"Oh," said he, "he's furiously fond of it; these sailors drink like fishes."

Had it not been for that tea, I should have fallen in love with Florine. JULES LECOMPTE.

There was pith in the short reply of Mr. O'Connell in the British House of Commons, to a speech of Lord Althorp, against the repeal of the Irish Union. His Lordship ended with expressing his inability to comprehend "how a poor country could suffer by its union with a rich one." "The leech swells upon the blood it sucks," was the brief comment of Mr. O'Connell.

A THRILLING PASSAGE.

THE DEATH OF CHASTELAR.

There is a powerful article in the last number of the American Magazine, under the title of "Passages in the Life of Mary Stuart." Unable to find space for the whole of it in our columns, we cannot refrain from giving the following extract, which, we perceive, has already won a compliment from the New York American. The illfated Chastelar, having first confessed his love to the object of it, had been indignantly dismissed. The scene is thus continued.

An hour had scarcely elapsed, before the lights were extinguished throughout the vaulted halls of Holyrood; the guards were posted for the night, the officers had gone their rounds, the ladies of the royal circle were dismissed, and all was darkness and silence. In Mary's chamber a single lamp was burning in a small recess, before a beautifully executed painting of the virgin, but the light was not sufficient to penetrate the obscurity which reigned in the many angles and alcoves of that irregular apartment, although the moonbeams were admitted through the open casement.

Her garb of ceremony laid aside, her lovely shape scantily veiled by a single robe of spotless linen, her auburn tresses flowing in unrestrained luxuriance, almost to her feet, if she had been a creature of perfect human beauty when viewed in all the promp of royal pageantry, she now appeared a being of supernatural loveliness. Her small white feet, unsandalled, glided over the rich carpet with a grace, which a slight degree of fancy might have deemed the motion peculiar to the inhabitants of another world. For an instant, ere she turned to her repose, she leaned against the carved mullions of the window, and gazed pensively, and, it might be, sadly upon the garden, where she had so lately parted from the unhappy youth whose life was thus embittered by that very feeling which, above all others, should have been its consolation.—Withdrawing her eyes from the moonlight scene, she knelt before the lamp and the shrine which it illuminated, and her whispered orisons arose, pure as the source from which they flowed—the prayers of a weak and humble mortal, penitent for every trivial error, breathing all confidence to Him who can alone protect or pardon; the prayers of a queen for her numerous children, and, last and holiest of all, a woman's prayers for her unfortunate admirer. Yes, she prayed for Chastelar, that strength might be given him from on high to bear the crosses of a miserable life, and that by divine mercy the hopeless love might be uprooted from his breast. The words burst passionately from her lips, her whole form quivered with the excess of her emotion, and the big tears fell like rain from her uplifted eyes. While she was yet in the very flood of passion, a sigh was breathed, so clearly audible, that the conviction flashed like lightning on her soul, that this most secret prayer was listened to by other ears than those of heavenly ministers.—Terror, acute terror, took possession of her mind, banishing by its superior violence every less engrossing idea. She snatched the lamp from it niche—waved it slowly around the chamber—and there, in the most hallowed spot of her widowed chamber, a spy upon her unguarded moments, stood a dark figure. Even in that moment of astonishment and fear, as if by instinct, the beautiful instinct of purely female modesty, she snatched a velvet mantle from the seat on which it had been cast aside, and veiled her person, even before she spoke—"Oh God! it is de Chastelar."

"Sweet Queen,"—replied the intruder—"bright beautiful ruler of my destinies, pardon—"

"What ho!"—she screamed in notes of dread intensity—"a moi, a moi mes Francois. My guards!—Seyton—Carmichael—Flemming—will ye leave your Queen alone! alone with treachery and black dishonor!—Villain! slave!—she cried, turning her flashing eyes upon him, her whole form swelling as it were with all the fury of injured innocence, "didst thou dare to think that Mary—Mary, the wife of Francis—the annointed Queen of Scotland, would brook thine infamous addresses—Nay, kneel not, or I spurn thee—What ho! will no one aid me in mine extremity—"

"Fear naught from me," faultered the wretched Chastelar; but with a voice like that of some inspired Pythoness, she broke in, "FEAR! think'st thou that I could fear a thing, an abject coward thing, like thee? —a wretch that would exult in the infamy of one whom he pretends to love? FEAR THEE! by heavens, if I could have feared, contempt must have forbidden it."

"Nay Mary, hear me! hear me but one word, it that word cost my life—"

"Thy life! had'st thou ten thousand lives, they would be but a feather in the scale against thy monstrous villainy. "What ho!" again she cried, stamping with impotent anger at the delay of her attendants, "Treason! My guards—Treason!" At length the passages rang with the hurried footseps of the startled inmates of the palace, with torch and spear ,and brandished blades, they rushed into the apartment; page, sentinel, and chamberlain ladies, with dishevelled hair, and faces blanched with terror. The Queen stood erect in the centre of the room, pointing with one white arm bare to the shoulder toward the wretched culprit, who with folded arms and head erect awaited his doom in unresisting silence. His naked rapier, with which alone he might have foiled the united efforts of his enemies lay at his feet, his brow was white as sculptured marble, and no less rigid, but his eyes glared wildly, and his lips quivered as though he would have spoken. The Queen, still furious at the wrong which he had done her fame, marked the expression. "Silence!" she cried—"Degraded! would'st thou meanly beg thy forfeited life? were thou my father, thou should'st die to-morrow! Hence with the villain!—Bid Maitland execute the warrant—Ourself—Ourself will sign it—away! Chastelar dies at day break!"

"'Tis well" replied he calmly, "it is well—the lips I love the best pronounce my doom, and I die happy, since I die for Mary! Would'st thou but pity the offender, while thou dost doom the offence, de Chastelar would not exchange his shortened span of life, and violent death for the brightest crown of Christendom. My limbs may die, my love will live forever! Lead on minions—I am more glad to die, than ye to slay! Mary—beautiful Mary—think! think hereafter upon Chastelar!"

The guards passed onward, and last of the group, unfettered and unmoved, de Chastelar stalked after them. Once, ere he stooped beneath the low browed portal, he paused, placed both hands on his heart, bowed lowly and then pointed upwards, as he chanted once again the words "Pensez a moi—Noble Dame—Pensez a moi." As he vanquished from her presence she waved her hand impatiently to be left alone—and all night long she traversed and retraversed the floor of her chamber in paroxysms of the fiercest despair. The warrant was brought to her, silently, sternly she traced her signature beneath it; not a sign of sympathy was on her pallid features, not a tremor shook her frame; she was passionless, majestic and unmoved. The secretary left the chamber on his fatal errand—and Mary was again a woman. Prostrate upon her couch she lay, sobbing and weeping as though her very soul was bursting from her bosom, defying all consolation, spurning every offer at remedy. "'Tis done!" she would say—"'Tis done! I have preserved my fame—and murdered mine only friend."

The morning dawned slowly—and the heavy bells of all the churches clanged the death peal of Chastelar. The tramp of the cavalry defiling from the palace gates struck on her heart as though each hoof dashed on her bosom. An hour passed away—the minute bells still tolling, the roar of a culverin swept heavily downwards from the castle, and all was over! He had died as he had lived, undaunted; as he had lived, devoted! "Mary, divine Mary," were his latest words. "I love in death, as I have loved in life thee and thee only. The axe drank his blood, and the Queen of Scotland had not a truer servant left behind, than he, whom for a momentary frenzy she was compelled to slay: yet was his last wish satisfied, for though the Queen might not relent, the woman did forgive, and, in many a mournful hour did Mary think on Chastelar.

THE BATTLE OF NICKAJACK.

BY THE REV. JAMES GWIN.

In reading over in your paper two or three weeks since the remarks made in Congress by the Hon. Mr. PEYTON, of Tennessee, on the Nickajack expedition, it brought afresh to my mind events long since past by. I called to mind the forms of my old companions in arms, with whom I suffered in those times of tribulation which tried men's souls; but alas! there are few now living who bore a part in our earlier Indian wars. I concluded I would write a brief sketch of the events of that expedition, for insertion in your very interesting paper.

The Indian town called Nickajackt was settled by an amalgamation of different tribes of Indians, called by the general name of Chickamaugas. It was situated in what is now Indian territory, on the south bank of the Tennessee river, at the base of Look-Out mountain, between two creeks that disgorged their sluggish waters into the Tennessee. This town or Indian fort was called by the Indians the "Yellow Jackets' nest." It was the rendezvous of all the southern as well as northern hostile warriors; here they formed their plans of attack on the white settlements. They considered their situation impregnable, and boasted of being able to raise three thousand warriors in one day from the adjacent towns and forests (as we were informed by Fenelstone, a half-breed, who deserted from them, gave us information of their intended attack on Nashville, and was our guide when we assaulted Nickajack.) Proud and haughty in their independent security, they paid no attention to treaties.

At length they become so troublesome that no alternative was to be chosen between breaking them up or leaving the country. Tennessee, at that time, could not boast of men enough to ensure success to the expedition, and at the same time leave enough at home to guard and protect the women and children. Gen. Robertson, therefore, sent to Kentucky for help; it was granted. The brave Col. Whitney (who fell in the last Indian war at the battle of the Thames) soon appeared at Nashville with 180 brave Kentuckians, well armed and appointed; our men were all ready; we were joined by Major Ore, of East Tennessee, the commander of the rangers, who had been on an expedition searching for the Indians on the Cumberland mountain; having heard of our expedition, he hastened and joined us with 80 men, just as we were ready to start. We now numbered in all 600 men: we took the wilderness, with Fenelstone for our guide. Passing on in good order, we reached the Tennessee river on the fourth day of our march, about midnight. It was in the month of August, about the year 1798—warm and sultry. We commenced making a few boats with frames of sticks, on which were stretched raw hides that we had packed up and brought along for that purpose. While the boats were getting ready, two men swam across the river and kindled up a fire on the opposite shore, so as to direct us across, and the men soon commenced crossing. The boats carried the guns and those soldiers who could not swim, others swam across, so that before eight o'clock in the morning, 272 men had crossed over safely.

We were then four miles below Nickajack, and three miles above Cow Town, and the morning was so far advanced we could not safely wait for any more to get over for fear of being discovered. We resolved to make the attack even with this small number. Col. Montgomery had got over and took command of the Tennessee troops, and Col. Whitley of the Kentuckians. As the lower creek cut off our direct approach to the town, we had to take a circuit of seven miles and cross over a spur of the mountain so as to descend upon the town in the rear. We would run with all our speed a few moments, and then lie down flat on the ground, until we took breath and then would run again. We thus soon reached the mountain undiscovered, and sat down and rested on the cliffs quite overlooking the town. We sat here in gloomy silence nearly half an hour—then slid down the rocks unperceived and formed in the underwood in the rear of the town. Whitney commanded the right wing, Montgomery the centre, and Ore the left. We advanced and found the Indians at breakfast. They knew nothing of us until they saw the flash and heard the rifles speak; and then so much were they deceived, that the warriors near the bank of the river, when they heard our guns, came running with drums and shouting for joy, supposing that some of their own people had returned from a successful excursion against the whites, and were firing off their guns in triumph.

Many of the Indians were shot down on the spot, and the remainder made for the river; and as many as could getting into their canoes, and others swimming with their heads the most of the time under water; yet when they rose to take breath, the unerring rifle would send them down again, while a red gush of blood boiling up to the surface of the river showed too plainly that they would never rise again. Those in the canoes could not lift a hand to use their paddles; they lay stupified in the bottoms of their frail barks, while the rifle ball would search them out like an inevitable death warrant.

During the space of forty-five minutes, we killed 143 Indians, took all the women and children whom we could find as prisoners, and brought them off with us. In this affair we had only two men slightly wounded.

Long Town lay on the river 2 or 3 miles above.—The troops hastened on to attack it. The path lay along the river bank, and close under the ridge of the mountain. When about half way between the two towns, the Indians made a furious attack upon us from the mountain above. The firing was quite sharp for a few minutes—but as their chief lifted his head over a rock to fire, he was shot through the scull and came rolling down the mountain like a huge lump of shapeless flesh. The Indians immediately fled. The brave Thomas, of Nashville, here got his death wound.—The savages firing from above shot him in the bosom, and the ball came out behind quite low down his back. We brought him off alive on a horse litter, but he died soon after our return.

Our men advanced, burnt Long Town and some other smaller towns unopposed, as the Indians had all fled; we then returned and crossed over to our camp without any other loss than the three wounded (one mortally) mentioned before. We took about 20 canoes, on which we put the wounded, the prisoners, and the goods found in Nickajack—for the Spanish had a store in this fort, and no doubt many villainous Spaniards were killed in the battle, who had often stirred up the Indians against the early American settlers.

After the canoes had started down the river, a band of Indians on the other side of the river from Nickajack commenced an attack, but desisted when told by Fenelstone, in the Indian language that, if they fired another gun their women and children and prisoners should be instantly put to death. At this moment a squaw who had her infant lashed to her back sprung from one of the canoes and swam to the shore in sight of all our troops, and made her escape.

Thus closed one of the days of severest fatigue ever experienced in the West. The day's work closed the Indian wars which had raged for many years with great barbarity. Gen. Robertson left a written notice at his camp, informing the Indians, that if any more murders were committed on the whites, he would raise an army, destroy all their towns and burn their corn. They took the alarm; their strong hold was broken up: many of their chiefs killed, and they sued for peace. A treaty followed—and from that time until the last war, they lived in peace.

All their prisoners were returned to them. The squaws informed us that they had often advised their young men and warrior chiefs to quit killing the white people and stealing their horses, or that we would come and kill them all—but their men would not mind them. When they saw us come suddenly upon them on the morning of the battle, they concluded that we came out of the clouds.

RELIGION AND POETRY.

BY JOHN N. MAFFITT.

The connection between religious emotion and poetic enthusiasm, is a subject worthy of more than a transient reflection. The sensibilities and emotions connected with religion, have perhaps less of fervency than the ardor of poetry—but they have an energy, a power to mould, transform and sustain beyond any earth-born feeling. Religion, in its moments of triumph, calls in the aid of poetry to sustain with its ministry the wing of devotion rising towards its native heaven. In seasons of religious despondency, too, the harp is taught to moan with melancholy music. Plaintive thoughts—the remembrances that come over the mind of the captive,—the bright anticipations of faith, spontaneously clothe themselves in poetic drapery —and, from this circumstance, a very common error has originated; which is, that religious emotion is nothing more than the action of the mind under a high state of excitement.

The advocate for the individuality and the supernatural origin of religion, has a marked advantage over the champion, for the excitements of genius, taste, passion, or sublimity, derived from the last scenes of life, when time gives up the being of a few years, to the unchanging dominion of eternity. It is but seldom, that a man of genius retains in the hour of death, the enthusiasm which distinguished his life. A man of genius, may indeed, have the noble enthusiasm of religion, to sustain him when earthly objects cease to interest him; but in a very general extent, men feel at death the impotency of fame, riches, power, or human grandeur in any of its varieties, and reach out their imploring hands towards the mighty spirit, whose influence is supposed to extend beyond the boundaries of this world, and cantrol the destinies of the future.

It is just to consider poetry as the servant of religion, bending its vivid perceptions of beauty, and the melody of its song, to the service of a better one than itself. Miriam, on the farther shore of the Red Sea, could not praise the author of her country's deliverance, without calling to her aid the triumphant measures of the Hebrew verse; and throughout the volume of inspiration, the higher emotions of devotional triumph are poured forth, by different writers through the language of impassioned song. An analysis of the pleasurable sensations created in the cultivated mind by poetic imagery, will at once detect the difference between religion and poetry. Mongtomery, who is an excellent authority on both subjects, spurns the idea advanced by Dr. Johnson, in his life of Waller, and subsequently in his life of Watts, that sacred subjects are unfit for poetry, nay, incapable of being combined with it. He considers the native majesty and grace of religious emotions far above the reach of human embellishment, yet would advocate the propriety of pressing into the service of religion the noblest powers of men; and remarks, that a poet of christian character, can find no more difficulty in blending beauty, simplicity, and sublimity, with heavenly aspirations, than in combining the same qualities of song with the dreamy flights of fancy, or the pictorial descriptions of nature and the human passions.

Montgomery has given examples from authors of the last generation of pure simplicity and pathetic expression which would have been most admirably suited to sacred themes. We give two of his quotations in his own language:—

'See the wretch that long has tost
On the thorny bed of pain,
At length repair his vigor lost,
And breathe and walk again:
The meanest floweret of the vale,
The simple note that swells the gale,
The common sun, the air, the skies,
To him are opening paradise.'

Gray's Fragment on Vicissitude.

It cannot be questioned that this is genuine poetry; and the beautiful, but not obvious thought, in the last couplet, elevates it far above all common-place. Yet there is nothing in the style, nor the cast of the sentiment, which might not be employed with corresponding effect on a sacred theme.

The following stanzas are almost unrivalled in the combination of poetry with painting, pathos with fancy, grandeur with simplicity, and romance with reality:

'How sleep the brave, who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest!
When spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than fancy's feet have ever trod.

By fairy-hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There honor comes a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And freedom shall awhile repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there.'—Collins.

The unfortunate author of these inimitable lines, a little before his death; in a lucid interval of that madness to which a wounded spirit had driven him; was found by a visiter with a bible in his hand. "You see," said the poor sufferer, "I have only one book left; but it is the best."

It is too late in the age of mental philosophy, to make the assertion that poetry has no power to pour its notes of sweet, and transporting melody into the quiet recesses of a deeply humbled heart. The genius of poetry, comes at the call of the holy affections. The most enduring monument of mind on earth, are the productions of the muse. Homer, embalmed in his own immortal verse, survives his country; Maro, is destined to a longer remembrance than the "eternal city"— and later poets have exerted an influence over the hearts of men, and the manners of generations, other than those in whose time they wrote, far mightier than regal authority, or the patronage of governments could command. But if a stranger to the poetry of the world, from Hesiod to Byron, should inquire in what other poetry than that found in the bible is the purity, the sublimity, the pathos, the elevating and spirit sustaining themes of our holy religion best illustrated, and most invitingly presented to the eye of taste and genius,—we must, with a few reservations, say—it is yet unwritten.

Second Verse.

And now alas! I weep alone,
By thee, by joy, by hope forsaken;
'Mid thoughts that darkest fears awaken,
Trembling for thy fate unknown:
And vainly flows the bitter tear,
Shed for thee, my sister dear.

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

Principle causes of the decrease of Marriages.
A word in your ear, Messrs. Editors.

I'll tell you why young ladies do not go off quite so soon and so frequently as formerly. They are too nice and too proud, &c. &c.

I know a young lady—not very young now indeed—who, to my certain knowledge, has refused above fifteen offers!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

One, because the gentleman could not afford to keep a carriage.

Another, because he could not speak French.

A third, because he knew nothing of the Italian Operas.

A fourth, because he stooped in the shoulders.

A fifth, because he had not fortune enough.

A sixth, because he was a tradesman.

This lady's own fortune is as follows:—

In bank stock,	$0 00
In permanent bridges do.	0 00
Turnpike roads, do.	0 00
Insurance Company, do.	0 00
Money at interest,	0 00
Lottery tickets,	6 00
Houses,	0 00
	$6 00
To which in cash, diamonds, &c. may be added,	0 00
Making in all,	$6 00

With a fortune like this you may judge with what propriety a lady rejects a tradesman, or insists on keeping a carriage. CHERAPHILUS.

An eccentric genius stepping into the door of a landlady, observed, "Will you, ma'am, give me a drink of water, for I am so hungry I don't know where to stay to-night." We doubt whether more meaning could be embodied in so few words.

Keep me from my friends.—Mr. J. (in his juvenilia) went to a club, and as his appearance was any thing but respectable, he borrowed a pair of breeches of a friend. In the course of the evening the lender called out to him, 'J——, don't you sit down in the damp there in my breeches.' A friend who condoled with the embryo critic upon this expose, offered to lend him a pair of unmentionables for the next meeting—he did so, and J—— had hardly entered, when his benefactor exclaimed aloud, 'J——, you may sit down wherever you like in my breeches.'

Some years ago, a fellow was sentenced to be cropt for perjury. When the executioner came to fulfil the sentence of the law, he found that the prisoner had undergone the punishment before, which threw the hangman into a passion. "What, the deuce!" said the convict cooly, "am I obliged to furnish you with ears, every time I am sentenced to be cropt?"

More Plain than Pleasant.—A lady playing on the piano-forte, on being called upon for a dead march, asked Mr. H., a celebrated professor of music, what dead march she should play, to which he replied, "any march that you may play will be a dead one, for you are sure to murder it."

Fashion.—A puppy grower was offering for sale a fine litter of young spaniels, a day or two since, when a barbarian enquired why he did not cut off their tails. "Why, sir, ye see as how it be'aint the fashion now. I diskivered by the last lot, that if I go for to curtail 'em, I can't retail 'em no how!—Lowell Journal.

Manley acted before his majesty George III. at Weymouth, when the farce of the Spoiled Child (a favourite of the king's was played; and a remarkably masculine woman sustained the character of Miss Pickle. On lighting their majesties to their carriage, the king said to the manager, "Very good, very good Hughes; farce well played, well played!—clever man that Miss Pickle; clever man, clever man!" "Man!" exclaimed Hughes, "your majesty is deceived; the person who sustained Miss Pickle is Mrs. ——, a very respectable woman!" "No, no, Hughes," rejoined the laughing monarch—"a man, Hughes—a man, a man." "With all submission," rejoined the astonished manager, "I assure your majesty Mrs. —— is a woman!" "It won't do, it won't do, Hughes," continued the delighted sovereign; "a man, Hughes, a man!—hey, Charlotte, hey? hey?—clever man, Hughes,—saw his beard—saw his beard!—a man, Hughes, a man!" The next morning Hughes entered the green-room, and addressed the assembled company: "Ladies and gentlemen, I am happy to tell you their majesties were very much gratified by the performance of last night—much gratified! And (turning to Mrs. —— who sat in gigantic dignity in one corner of the room) I am most happy in saying, madam, that his majesty particularly noticed you!" "God bless the king!" exclaimed the delighted lady. "And the queen also distinguished you," continued Hughes. "Lord love them!" said the lady, "I saw they were looking at me, bless their dear hearts." "Yes," said Hughes, "his majesty was vastly pleased." "May the king live for ever!" rejoined Mrs.——, brightening with smiles. "But his majesty," proceeded Hughes,—"God bless him," interrupted Mrs.——. "His majesty insists that you are—a man!" "The nasty beast!" cried Mrs.——, as she rose with offended dignity and stalked out of the room.—Nine Years of an Actor's Life, by Robert Dyer.

Knowing one's place.—A lady, sending her footman to fetch home some clothes, strictly charged him to take a coach if it rained, for fear of wetting them. But a great shower of rain falling, the fellow returned with them dripping wet; and being severely reprimanded for not doing as he was ordered, he said he had obeyed his orders. "How then, answered the lady, "could they be wet, if you took them into the coach with you?" "No, no," replied the man, "I know my place better, I did not go into the coach, but rode behind, as I always do."

A person who had rendered himself obnoxious in trade by all manner of roguery, was met upon change by a merchant who told him of some of his tricks with a freedom the other did not relish, but irritated at the recital, asked with some heat, "Sir, did you call me a knave?" "No," replied the merchant, "but I'll give five guineas if you'll find a person here, who will say you are an honest man."

Southey relates an instance, where two Smithfield drovers (a sort accustomed to cutting and slitting) tossed up for each other's ears. Nor was it in mere play; for the winner proceeded forthwith to take possession, by cutting off his adversary's "souse" close to his head.

An honest Hibernian was in the House of Commons gallery on Thursday, and asked who that sleek Member was (pointing to Mr. Pease, the Quaker)? He was told that it was Mr. Pease, the chief (there) of the Q's. And who is that sturdy stalking gentleman (meaning the new Member for Leeds, who was at the time passing along the side gallery)? "That is Mr. Baines." "Faith, then" (he rejoined), "the House is well off: it has Pase and Banes; and Peel gives Bacon."

NEVER HOLD YOUR HEAD TOO HIGH.—One day, a little bantam-cock, with a high top-knot, was exceedingly vain, because he had so many feathers on his legs, that he could hardly walk, seeing a goose duck her head in passing under a bar at least six feet high, thus accosted her: "Why, thou miserable, bare-legged caitiff! thou shovel-nosed, web-footed, pigeon-toed scavenger of the highways! thou fool of three elements! not content with ignominiously crawling under a fence, thou must even nod thy empty pate by way of confessing thy inferiority. Behold how we bantams do these things!" So saying, with a great deal of puffing and fluttering, with the help of his bill, he managed to gain the top of the fence, where he clapt his wings, and was just on the point of crowing in triumph, when a great hawk, that was sailing over his head, pounced down on him, and seizing him by the top-knot, carried him off without ceremony. The goose, cocking her eye, and taking a side view of the affair, significantly shook her feathers, and the next time she passed under a bar, bowed her head lower than ever.

TRICK OF A PAINTER.—A capital story is told of Basici, an Italian artist. He had painted the portrait of a young sprig of nobility, without any previous agreement as to the price; and after it was finished, his customer, upon learning his terms, took himself away, and neither returned nor sent for the portrait. Whereupon the knight of the easel painted a grate over the portrait, and wrote beneath it, "imprisoned for debt." An uncle of the young man paid for the painting to liberate his nephew's face from imprisonment.

A QUEER AMUSEMENT.—A London paper relates an account of a single wager between the son of an Earl, and a member of the Royal Household. The former, a lad of 14, had a bet of fifty guineas that he would sail in a washing tub from Blackfriars to Westminster, having six geese harnessed to take him in tow. He performed this feat without the least difficulty, in presence of a number of distinguished personages, among whom was Queen Adelaide. Whenever the geese were inclined to deviate, they were gently guided by the aid of a stick into the right course again. This young man had trained the geese in question on a large pond on his father's estate. He had a boat made on purpose, and could guide them in calm weather, to any part of the pond, which was several miles in circumference. The sailing on the Thames, in a wash tub, however, was an experiment in which he was entirely successful.

LAUGHABLE INCIDENT.—One day last week two itinerant travellers, accompanied by an enormous bear, were coming from Coventry, when bruin took it into his head to jump into a ditch. His keepers tried every effort to get him out, but in vain. A farmer's servant coming with two horses, he offered his assistance to displace the bear, by yoking his horses to him, and he was soon displaced, but in an instant gave a hideous roar. Away went the horses, with the bear secured behind, at full speed, leaving all parties far behind. A traveller coming up to them, they asked if he had seen a pair of horses with a bear along with them? "Yes," replied the man, "I did see the horses, but no bear—it was the devil driving the horses at the rate of 20 miles an hour!"

Peterson, the comedian, lent a brother actor two shillings, and when he made a demand for the sum, the debtor, turning peevishly from him, said, "Hang it, I'll pay you to day in some shape or other." Peterson good-humouredly replied, "I shall be obliged to you, Tom, to let it be as like two shillings as you can."

ASTONISHING FEAT.—A raw-boned youth, without shoes or stockings, started from Frome on Wednesday morning with the Frome coach, and ran a-head of it all the way from that place to Devizes (19 miles), accomplishing the distance in two minutes less than two hours, apparently without the slightest fatigue!—Soon after his arrival in Devizes, he was told that a stag was to be uncarted about four miles off. Thither the youth immediately proceeded; and, after waiting a short time, he followed with the horsemen, and, throughout a remarkably fine run, kept up with the fleetest horse in the field—cleared every fence—hedge, brier, and ditch—was in at the taking; and on his return to Devizes (having run altogether nearly 50 miles) offered to lay a bet that he would then run two miles in 10 minutes!—Devizes Gazette.

A Bear's Conscience.—The Indian includes all savage beasts within the number of his enemies. This is by no means a metaphorical or figurative expression, but it is used in a literal sense, as will appear from what I am going to relate. A Delaware hunter once shot a huge bear in the back bone. The animal fell and set up a most plaintive cry, something like that of a panther when he is hungry. The hunter instead of giving him another shot, came up close to him, and addressed him in these words: "Hark ye bear, you are a coward, and no warrior, as you pretend to be. Were you a warrior, you would show it by your firmness, and not cry and whimper like an old woman. You know, bear, that our tribes are at war with each other, and that yours is the aggressor. You have found the Indians too powerful for you, and you have gone sneaking about in the woods stealing their hogs—perhaps at this time you have the hog's flesh in your belly. Had you conquered me, I should have borne it with courage and died like a brave warrior; but you, bear, sit here and cry, and disgrace your tribe by your cowardly conduct. I was present at the delivery of this curious invective, and when the hunter had despatched the bear, I asked him how he thought the poor animal could understand what he had said to it. "Oh," said he, "the bear understood me very well; did you not observe how ashamed he looked, and how he blushed when I was upbraiding him?"

CHEAP TRAVELLING.—We have been told that a son of the "Green Isle"—recently took his seat in the new Omnibus, after travelling from the Point to Howard street was asked to "poney up."

"How much is it that you ask?" inquired he.

"A levy only, sir," replied the boy.

"A levy, did you say? och! to the devil with ye, but I hav'nt got the value of a cent about me, but to make accounts square, all you've got to do honey, is jist to lave me back in the place where you took me up."—Balt. Visiter.

Ask any saddler what a saddle is put on a horse's back for, and he will give some foolish answer as the following: "The ease of the rider, or to help the rider to hold on." Let us tell them that they are not right, and that so far from the saddle helping to keep on, it is much more difficult to sit on them the bare back, and if riders only wanted to stick on, they should ride on a cloth, or adopt the plan of the Marquis of Tweedale—ride with plush breeches on a saddle made of the same material, the nap of this being turned the reverse way to the breeches, so that they worked into one another.

A man seeing an oyster vender pass by, called out, "Give me a pound of oysters." "We sell oysters by measure, not by weight," replied the other. "Well," said he, "give me a yard of them."

THE MERRY SUMMER MONTHS.

BY L. E. L.

They come, the merry summer months of Beauty,
Song and Flowers;
They come! the gladsome months that bring thick
leafiness to bowers,
Up, up my heart! and walk abroad, fling cark and care aside,
Seek silent hills, or rest thyself where peaceful waters
glide;
Or, underneath the shadow vast of patriarchal tree,
Scan through its leaves the cloudless sky in rapt tranquility.

The grass is soft, its velvet touch is grateful to the hand,
And, like the kiss of maiden love, the breeze is sweet and bland;
The daisy and the buttercup, are nodding courteously,
It stirs their blood, with kindest love, to bless and welcome thee;
And mark how with thine own thin locks—they now are silvery grey—
That blissful breeze is wantoning, and whispering
"Be gay."

There is no cloud that sails along the ocean of yon sky,
But hath its own winging mariner to give it melody:
Thou see'st their glittering fans outspread all gleaming like red gold,
And hark! with shrill pipe musical, their merry course they hold.
God bless them all, those little ones, who far above
this earth,
Can make a scoff of its mean joys, and vent a nobler mirth.

But soft! mine ear upcaught a sound, from yonder wood it came;
The spirit of the dim green glade did breathe his own glad name;—
Yet, it is he! the hermit bird, that apart from all his kind,
Slow tells his beads monotonous to the soft western wind;
Cuckoo! Cuckoo! he sings again—his notes are void of art,
But simple strains do soonest sound the deep founts of the heart.

Good Lord! it is a gracious boon for thought-crazed
wight like me,
To smell again those summer flowers beneath this summer tree!
To suck once more in every breath their little souls away,
And feed my fancy with fond dreams of youth's bright summer day,
When, rushing forth like untamed colt, the reckless truant boy
Wandered through green woods all day long, a mighty heart of joy!

I'm sadder now, I have had cause; but oh! I'm proud to think
That each pure joy-fount loved of yore, I yet delight to drink;
Leaf, blossom, blade, hill, valley, stream, the calm unclouded sky,
Still mingle music with my dreams, as in the days gone by,
When summer's loveliness and light fall around me
dark and cold,
I'll bear indeed life's heaviest curse—a heart that hath wax'd old!

THE FEATURES.

That mortals are made up of quarrelsome clay,
My tale, I imagine, will prove as it goes;
For the Features composing the visage one day
Most cruelly fell to abusing the Nose.
First the Lips took it up, and their reason was this,—
That the Nose was a bane both to beauty and love;
And they never, moreover, in comfort could kiss,
For that horrid protuberance jutting above!

Then Eyes, not behind in the matter to be,
With a sparkle began, as I've oftentimes seen 'em,
And said it was perfectly shocking to see
Such a lump of deformity sticking between 'em.
The Cheeks, with a blush, said the frightful shade
By the Nose o'er their bloom and their beauty was thrown;
And Ears couldn't bear the loud trumpeting made
Whenever that troublesome member was blown!

So 'twas moved and agreed, without dallying more,
To thrust the intruder at once from the face;
But Nose, hearing this, most indignantly swore,
By the breath of his nostrils, he'd stick to his place!
Then addressing the Eyes, he went learnedly through His defence, and inquired, when their vigour was gone,
Pray what would their worships for spectacles do,
If the Face had no Nose to hang spectacles on?

Mankind, he observed, loved their scent as their sight,
Or who'd care a farthing for myrtles and roses?
And the charge of the Lips was as frivolous quite;
For if Lips fancied kissing, pray why mightn't Noses?
As for Ears, (and in speaking, Nose scornfully curl'd,)
Their murmurs were equally trifling and teazing;
And not all the Ears, Eyes, or Lips in the world,
Should keep him unblown, or prevent him from sneezing!

To the Cheeks, he contended, he acted as screen,
And guarded them oft from the wind and the weather;
And but that he stood like a land-mark between,
The Face had been nothing but cheek altogether!
With eloquence then he repell'd their abuse,
With logical clearness defining the case;
And from thence came the saying, so frequent in use,
That an argument's plain "as the nose on your face!"

SINGULAR OLD SONNET,

The longer life, the more offence,
The more offence, the greater pain;
The greater pain, the less defence;
The less defence, the lesser gain—
The loss of gain long ill doth try,
Wherefore, come, death, and let me die!
The shorter life, less count I find;
The less account, the sooner made;
The count soon made the merrier mind;
The merrier mind doth thought invade
Short life, in truth, this thing doth try,
Wherefore, come, death, and let me die!
Come gentle death, the ebb of care,
The ebb of care, the flood of life:
The flood of life, the joyful fare:
The joyful fare, the end of strife—
The end of strife, that thing wish I,
Wherefore, come death, and let me die!

A man who was imprisoned for bigamy, (marrying two wives) complained that he had been severely dealt with for an offence which carries its own punishment along with it!

"Still one great clime, in full and free defiance,
Yet rears her crest, unconquer'd and sublime,
Above the far Atlantic! She has taught
Her Esau brethren, that the haughty flag,
The floating fence of Albion's feebler crag,
May strike to those whose red light hands have bought Rights cheaply earn'd with blood."—Byron.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Thomas Jefferson, the third president of the U. States of America, was born April 2, old style, 1743, at Shadwell, in Albemarle county, Virginia, and was the eldest of eight children. His father, though his education had been entirely neglected in early life, being a man of strong mind, acquired by subsequent study, considerable information. He died when the subject of our sketch was about twelve years old, having previously given him every means of knowledge that could be procured, and left him a considerable estate. After going through a course of school instruction, young Jefferson entered the college of William and Mary, where he remained for two years. He then commenced the study of law under the guidance of the celebrated George Wythe, by whom, in 1767, he was introduced to its practice, at the bar of the general court of the colony, at which he continued until the revolution. In 1769, he was elected a member of the provincial legislature from the county where he resided, and made a fruitless effort, in that body, for the emancipation of the slaves. By this time, a spirit of opposition had been excited in the colonies to the arbitrary measures of the British government; and when the governor of Virginia dissolved the general assembly, in 1769, in consequence of the sympathy which was displayed by the majority of its members with the feelings which had been manifested in Massachusetts, they met, the next day, in the public room of the Raleigh tavern, formed themselves into a convention, drew up articles of association against the use of any merchandise imported from Great Britian, and signed and recommended them to the people. They then repaired to their respective counties, and were all re-elected, except those few who had declined assenting to their proceedings. In 1773, Mr. Jefferson associated himself with several of the boldest and most active of his companions in the house ("not thinking," as he says himself, "the bold and leading members up to the point of forwardness and zeal which the times required,") and with them formed the system of committees of correspondence, in a private room of the same Raleigh tavern. This system was adopted as the best instrument for communication between the different colonies, by which they might be brought to a mutual understanding, and a unity of action produced. This end was completely accomplished, as well as another object—that of exciting throughout the colonies a desire for a general congress. It was accordingly resolved that one should be held, and in Virginia a convention was assembled for the purpose of choosing delegates. Of this convention Mr. Jefferson was elected a member; but, being suddenly taken ill on the road, as he was repairing to Williamsburg, its place of meeting, he sent on to its chairman, Peyton Randolph, a draught of instructions which he had prepared as proper to be given to the delegates who should be sent to congress. It was laid on the table for perusal; but, though approved by many, the sentiments contained in it were too bold to be adopted by the majority: "tamer sentiments," in his own words, "were preferred, and, I believe, wisely preferred; the leap I proposed being too long, as yet, for the mass of our citizens." The position that he maintained was, that the relation between Great Britain and the colonies was exactly the same as that between England and Scotland, after the accession of James, and until the union, and the same as her relations with Hanover, having the same executive chief, but no other necessary political connexion. In this doctrine, however, the only person who entirely concurred with him was George Wythe, the other patriots "stopping at the half-way house of John Dickinson, who admitted that England had a right to regulate our commerce, and to lay duties on it for the purposes of regulation, but not of raising revenue." Though the paper was not adopted, the convention, nevertheless, caused it to be printed in a pamphlet form, under the title of a Summary View of the Rights of British America. Having found its way to England, it was taken up by the opposition, and, with a few interpolations of Mr. Burke, passed through several editions. It procured for its author considerable reputation, and likewise the dangerous honor of having his name placed on a list of proscriptions, in a bill of attainder, which was commenced in one of the houses of parliament, but was speedily suppressed. June 21, 1775, Mr. Jefferson took his seat for the first time in congress, having been chosen to fill the place of Peyton Randolph, who had resigned. In this new capacity, he preserved in the decided tone which he had assumed, always maintaining that no accommodation should be made between the two countries, unless on the broadest and most liberal basis. After serving on several committees, he was at length appointed a member of that, whose report has linked the name of its author with the history of American independence. June 7, 1776, the delegates from Virginia, in compliance with the instructions of the convention, moved that congress should declare the United Colonies free and independent states. This gave rise to a warm and protracted debate; for as yet there were many who continued to cling to the hope of a peaceful adjustment. In the course of the discussion, it appearing that several colonies were not yet fully ripe for separation, it was deemed prudent to defer the final decision of the question for a short time; and, in the mean while, a committee was appointed to prepare a declaration of independence, consisting of John Adams, Doctor Franklin, Roger Sherman, Robert R. Livingston and Mr. Jefferson. The last named gentleman was requested to draw up the paper, which he did, and it was reported to the house, after receiving a few alterations from Doctor Franklin and Mr. Adams. On the first of July, the day selected for deciding upon the original motion of the Virginia delegates, it was carried in the affirmative by a large majority, and two or three days afterwards by a unanimous vote. The declaration of independence was then brought before the house, by which, though generally approved, it was in some respects, modified. Those passages, especially, which conveyed censure upon the people of England, were either greatly softened, or entirely omitted, as the idea was still entertained that the colonies possessed friends in England, whose good will it would be proper to cherish; and a clause reprobating the slave-trade was cancelled, in complaisance to some of the southern states, who were largely engaged in the traffic. The debates respecting the declaration occupied three days, on the last of which, the 4th of July, it was signed by every member present, except John Dickinson, who deemed a rupture with the mother country, at that moment, rash and premature. September 2, 1776, Mr. Jefferson retired from his seat in congress, and on the 7th of October, took his place in the legislature of Virginia, of which he had been elected a member from his county. In this situation, he was indefatigable in his labors to improve the imperfect constitution of the state which had been recently and hastily adopted, before a draught of one which he had formed on the purest principles of republicanism, had reached the convention, which was deliberating at Richmond. The chief service which he performed was as a member of a commission for revising the laws, consisting, besides himself, of Edmund Pendleton, George Wythe, George Mason and Thomas Ludwell Lee, by whom no less than 126 bills were prepared, from which are derived all the most liberal features of the existing laws of the commonwealth. The share of Mr. Jefferson in this great task was prominent and laborious. June 1, 1779, he was chosen the successor of Mr. Henry, in the office of governor of the state, and continued in it for two years, at the end of which period he resigned, "from a belief," as he says, "that under the pressure of the invasion under which we were then laboring, the public would have more confidence in a military chief, and that, the military commander being invested with the civil power also, both might be wielded with more energy, promptitude and effect, for the defence of the state." General Nelson was appointed in his stead. Two days after his retirement from the government, he narrowly escaped capture by the enemy, a troop of horse having been despatched to Monticello, where he was residing, for the purpose of making him prisoner. He was breakfasting, when a neighbor rode up at full speed with the intelligence that the troop was ascending a neighboring hill. He first sent off his family in a carriage, and, after a short delay for some indispensable arrangements, mounted his horse, and, taking a course through the woods, joined them at the house of a friend—a flight in which it would be difficult to discern any thing dishonorable, although it has been made the subject of sarcasm and reproach without end, by the spirit of party. June 15, 1781, Mr. Jefferson was appointed minister plenipotentiary, in conjunction with others, to negotiate a peace then expected to be effected, through the mediation of the empress of Russia; but he declined, for the same reason that had induced him, in 1776, to decline also the appointment of a commissioner, with Doctor Franklin, to go to France in order to negotiate treaties of alliance and commerce with that government. On both occasions, the state of his family was such that he could not leave it, and he "could not expose it to the dangers of the sea, and of capture by the British ships, then covering the ocean." He saw, too, that "the laboring oar was really at home," especially at the time of his first appointment. But, in November, 1782, congress having received assurances that a general peace would be concluded in the winter and spring, renewed the offer which they had made the previous year; and this time it was accepted; but the preliminary articles being agreed upon before he left the country, he returned to Monticello, and was chosen (June 6, 1783) a member of congress. It was during the session at Annapolis, that in consequence of Mr. Jefferson's proposal, an executive committee was formed, called the committee of the states, consisting of a member from each state. Previously, executive and legislative functions were both imposed upon congress; and it was to obviate the bad effects of this junction, that Mr. Jefferson's proposition was adopted. Success, however, did not attend the plan; the members composing the committee quarrelled, and, finding it impossible, on account of their altercations, to fulfil their duties, they abandoned their post, after a short period, and thus left the government without any visible head, during the adjournment of congress. May 7, 1784, congress, having resolved to appoint another minister, in addition to Mr. Adams and Doctor Franklin, for negotiating treaties of commerce with foreign nations, selected Mr. Jefferson, who accordingly sailed from Boston July 5, and arrived in Paris August 6. Doctor Franklin was already there, and Mr. Adams having, soon after, joined them, they entered upon the duties of their mission. They were not very successful, however, in forming the desired commercial treaties, and, after some reflection and experience, it was thought better not to urge them too strongly, but to leave such regulations to flow voluntarily from the amicable dispositions and the evident interests of the several nations. In June, 1785, Mr. Adams repaired to London, on being appointed minister plenipotentiary at the court of St. James, and, in July, Doctor Franklin returned to America, and Mr. Jefferson was named his successor at Paris. In the February of 1786, he received a pressing letter from Mr. Adams, requesting him to proceed to London immediately, as symptoms of a better disposition towards America were beginning to appear in the British cabinet, than had been manifested since the treaty of peace. On this account, he left Paris in the following March, and, on his arrival in London, agreed with Mr. Adams on a very summary form of treaty, proposing "an exchange of citizenship for our citizens, our ships, and our productions generally, except as to office." At the usual presentation, however, to the king and queen, both Mr. Adams and himself were received in the most ungracious manner, and, after a few vague and ineffectual conferences, he returned to Paris. Here he remained, with the exception of a visit to Holland, to Peidmont and the south of France, until the autumn of 1789, zealously pursuing whatever was beneficial to his country. September 26 of that year, he left Paris for Havre, and, crossing over to Cowes, embarked for the U. States. November 23, he landed at Norfolk, Va., and, whilst on his way home, received a letter from president Washington, covering the appointment of secretary of state, under the new constitution, which was just commencing its operation. He soon afterwards received a second letter from the same quarter, giving him the option of returning to France, in his ministerial capacity, or of accepting the secretaryship, but conveying a strong intimation of desire that he would choose the latter office. This communication was produced by a letter from Mr. Jefferson to the president, in reply to the one first written, in which he had expressed a decided inclination to go back to the French metropolis. He then, however, consented to forego his preference, and, March 21, arrived in New York, where congress was in session, and immediately entered upon the duties of his post. It would be altogether inconsistent with our limits to give a minute account of the rest of Mr. Jefferson's political life. This could not be done without writing the history of the U. States for a certain period. We must, therefore, content ourselves with stating that he continued to fill the seretaryship of state, until the 31st of December, 1793, when he resigned. From that period until February, 1797, he lived in retirement. In this year he was elected vice-president of the U. States, and, in 1801, was chosen president, by a majority of one vote over his competitor, Mr. Adams. At the expiration of eight years, he again retired to private life, from which he never afterwards emerged. The rest of his life was passed at Monticello, which was a continued scene of the blandest and most liberal hospitality. Such, indeed, was the extent to which calls upon it were made, by foreigners as well as Americans, that the closing year of his life was imbittered by distressing pecuniary embarrassments. He was forced to ask permission of the Virginia legislature to sell his estate by lottery, which was granted. Shortly after Mr. Jefferson's return to Monticello, it having been proposed to form a college in his neighborhood, he addressed a letter to the trustees, in which he sketched a plan for the establishment of a general system of education in Virginia. This appears to have led the way to an act of the legislature, in the year 1818, by which commissioners were appointed with authority to select a site and form a plan for a university, on a large scale. Of these commissioners, Mr. Jefferson was unanimously chosen the chairman, and, Aug. 4, 1818, he framed a report, embracing the principles on which it was proposed the institution should be formed. The situation selected for it was at Charlottesville, a town at the foot of the mountain on which Mr. Jefferson resided. He lived to see the university—the child of his old age—in prosperous operation, and giving promise of extensive usefulness. He fulfilled the duties of its rector until a short period before his death, which occurred on the 4th of July, 1826, the fiftieth anniversary of the declaration of independence, and within the hour in which he had signed it.—In person, Mr. Jefferson was tall and well formed; his countenance was bland and expressive; his conversation fluent, imaginative, various and eloquent. Few men equalled him in the faculty of pleasing in personal intercourse, and acquiring ascendency in political connexion. He was the acknowledged head of the republican party, from the period of its organization down to that of his retirement from public life. The unbounded praise and blame which he received as a politician, must be left for the judgment of the historian and posterity. In the four volumes of his posthumous works, edited by his grandson, Thomas Jefferson Randolph, there are abundant materials to guide the literary or historical critic in forming an estimate of his powers, acquirments, feelings and opinions. His name is one of the brightest in the revolutionary galaxy. Mr. Jefferson was a zealous cultivator of literature and science. As early as 1781, he was favourably known as an author, by his Notes on Virginia. He published, also, various essays on political and philosophical subjects, and a Manual of Parliamentary Practice, for the use of the Senate of the U. States. In the year 1800, the French national institute chose him one of their members. The volumes of posthumous works, in addition to an auto-biography of the author to the year 1790, consist principally of letters from the year 1775 to the time of his death, and embrace a great variety of subjects.

For the Casket.

The following feelings and reflections, excited by an uncommonly beautiful summer evening, are with diffidence submitted to the judgment of the editor. The author would never have presumed to offer it for publication, but several of his friends, who are of sober, thinking minds, and lovers of the quiet, simple scenes of nature, think there are many of your numerous subscribers of like minds and feelings, who will read it with interest.

SUMMER EVENING.

Be it my theme to sing mild evening's scene,
The soft'ning beauties of a summers' day,
When lengthning shadows stretch across the green,
And broken clouds imbibe the solar ray;
O! could my feeble muse the scene portray,
Catch all its touching beauties as they rise,
Impress each glowing colour ere decay,
Snatch all their radiance from my gazing eyes,
And in one undistinguished shade, enwrap the skies.

From western skies the horizontal sun,
Throws o'er the hills his last bright blaze of light;
The forest's smile around, and one by one,
Resign their gleam to the dull shades of night;
While scattered clouds, till now, a snowy white,
Catch the warm tints of Sol's refracted ray,
Their crimson hues attract our ravished sight—
We gaze, astonished at this grand display
Of mingled light and shade, which mock the boldest lay.

See far south-west, yon glittering pile of clouds,
Like shining mountains lift their heads on high,
Whose humid bosom deep and dark, enshrouds
Soft evening lightnings to illume the sky;
Whose mild broad glare, gives pleasure to that eye
Which loves to watch in twilight's deep'ning gloom,
The ragged clouds, and mark successively,
Each separate gleam the various folds illume,
While all their abrupt points rich different tints assume.

Presiding Genii, o'er this quiet hour,
O! guide my foot-steps to some calm retreat,
Where nature's hand has wildly dressed the bower,
And formed with nicest care, the mossy seat—
Near to a running stream, whose murmurings sweet,
Just reach the ear with intermitting sound,
Where social caty-dids' their comrades greet—
There let me sit in musing thought profound,
And mark the solemn stole of night, slow closing round.—

Or, unincumbered with oppressive thought,
Turn loose the heart to feel its lonely way:
Its warmest interests often comes unsought,
When general native feelings bear the sway—
Released from all the anxious cares of day,
The heart luxuriates in the quiet eve,
For nature's scenes and peaceful sounds, convey
More perfect bliss than costly joys can give,
Or the loud laugh of those who in wild riot live.

Hail potent fancy! thy creative ear
Can hear sweet music in the passing breeze!
Melodious strains float on the evening air,
How sweet, how slow, with what harmonious ease
The lengthened cadence dies among the trees—
Then in a lower, and softer key, resumes
The distant strain, with ampler power to please,
Till fancy's full excited power assumes
Ascendance o'er the heart, dispelling all its glooms.

No village murmurs reach my lonely seat,
No "gabbling geese" my tortured ears assail,
No sportive children seek this lone retreat,
Yet active life and joyous sounds prevail;
For here the crowds of happy insects hail
The mild, the soft impressive evening hour,
The cow-bell's rural sound winds up the vale,
Mellowed by distance, to my silvan bower,
While thousand nameless notes, soft mingling round me pour.

Hark! the dull screech-owl sings his drowsy note,
And bats, scarce seen, in giddy circles fly,
All objects fade, save yonder orbs remote,
Whose kindling lustres catch the gazing eye—
Thousands on thousands glittering in the sky,
The sober mind to serious thoughts excite,
While meditation's favourite hour draws nigh,
Wrapt in the awful deep'ning gloom of night,
For here no rising moon throws round her silver light.

Let contemplation spread her eagle wings,
And try her strength through yonder blue profound,
Trace the just order of created things,
Harmonious moving through the mighty round
Of endless space to great creations bound;
Here musing, pause upon the awful brink,
Conceive thy arduous labours amply crowned;
Yes, pause one moment, and reflecting, think,
And thou wilt find thyself still on the central link.

There's no proportions in infinity,
A finite principal can never scan,
Then let me turn the contemplative eye
To the great author of his wond'rous plan;
But sinking ere the lofty theme's begun,
My feeble muse abruptly makes an end,
And pausing, mourns the impotence of man,
Whose mind in wise humility may bend,
But all her boasted powers can never comprehend.

LOVE'S LAST REQUEST.

"Farewell, farewell, I falt'ring cried,
When I return thou'lt be my bride,
'Till then be faithful;—sweet adieu,
In absence oft I'll think of you."
The glist'ning tears stained her bright eyes,
Her thick'ning breath is choked with sighs
Her tongue denies her bosom's sway,
'Farewell'—I tore myself away.

"One moment stay," she stammered out,
And quick as thought I wheeled about;
"My angel, speak? can ought be done,
To comfort thee when I am gone?
I'll send thee specimens of art,
From every European mart;
I'll sketch for thee each Alpine scene,
To let thee see where I have been—
A stone from Simplon's dreadful height,
Shall gratify thy curious sight—
I'll climb the fiery Ætna's side,
To bring home treasures for my bride,
And oh, my life, each ship shall bear,
A double letter to my fair."

"Ah George," the weeping angel said,
And on my shoulder fell her head,
"For constancy my tears are hostage,
But when you write, pray pay the postage."

DRAMAS OF THE WEST.

Cyrus Lindsay and Ella Moore.

"When we now (1828) consider the horror of women and children, in conceiving such an enemy (Indians) always about them in the pathless wilderness, it astonishes us, that settlers could ever have been found, who would put their lives in their hands, and march so far away from their native country and home, to encounter these dangers. We are surprised, that they could cheerfully meet the labors of cultivation and the field, constantly surrounded by these dangers; and still more, that they would expose themselves to the greatest dangers of hunting, under such circumstances. But notwithstanding all these difficulties and dangers, in number and magnitude not to be described, the population of Kentucky was constantly increasing."—Flint's Geography and History of the Western States.

With one exception, what posed Mr. Flint in retrospect, as greatly poses me, who was an eye witness to the mysterious effect of the spirit of emigration to the West in the face of death in his most appalling forms. But long since have I ceased to wonder that women were found to face such horrors! as I have lived long enough and seen sufficient evidence to prove, that wheresoever, fathers, sons, brothers, and husbands, will go, daughters, mothers, sisters, and wives will go, and go cheerfully.—Not to speak of another connexion, which if possible, sublimes the soul of a virtuous woman, above even the feelings of a wedded wife—but are they not wedded in the highest sense of the term? * * *

This entire self devotion of women to those to whom they are connected by blood, or still stronger ties, is neither the exclusive virtue of the cabin nor the palace, nor is its exertion found alone in the middle rank; it belongs to human nature, and consoles us in misfortune, in sickness, wounds and death, as it sweetens prosperity, and sheds a brighter sunshine over our days of joy and gladness.

Amongst those who floated down the great western current, very few were wealthy, but many were they, who had seen better days and were wafted to the wilderness, by the storms and tempests of life. Many were females, reared in the very lap of ease, and whose bright and buoyant minds, long thought only of such days to come in future as they had seen in the past.

Of all the early parents of the now populous Kentucky, of either sex, there were few if any more remarkable than was Ella Moore. In Ella was combined beyond any other woman with whom I was ever acquainted, the masculine and feminine in feeling. She seemed to neglect the graces of a polished woman, and yet, was eminently graceful in every act; she seemed to speak from impulse without reflection, yet never spoke what herself or others could wish unsaid. In her manners there was a careless veil, but it was a veil only to the common crowd; to those who knew her intimately and were capable of appreciating her true character, she was regarded as possessing deep reflection in an eminent degree. This was shown at an early age, in her keen insight of the true character of those presented to her notice. Though never known to speak with asperity or even with severity of any one in their absence, her resentments were as deep, intense, and durable as her attachments. The one course of feeling led, however, to un wearied and unshrinking acts of kindness and love under every change of fortune; the other led only to coldness—revenge, even by a whisper was too far below her nature to be even for a moment thought of. This exalted woman was an only child, of wealthy parents in the city of ———. Her father a merchant for a long series of years regarded as amongst the most prosperous of his class. Engaged in very extensive concerns with the mother country, the colonial disputes involved him with many more in ruin, and in 1775, the once rich and honoured Henry Moore was a bankrupt and a widower. With no stain upon his integrity, but the reverse, and though an Englishman, an ardent advocate of the colonial cause! yet Henry Moore, who thought he saw, perhaps he was not deceived, the frown of public scorn on him, found most powerful support, from the person who of all others in ordinary cases, who would have most contributed to aggravate his misfortunes; that person was his daughter. But we must go back in time, and retrace other events.

Henry Moore was a branch of an aristocratic family, in whose views the pursuits by which every society must be supported, were dishonorable, and considered commerce amongst the degrading pursuits. In these high or low notions as different minds place them, Henry Moore might have passed uselessly through life, if his fortunes had not been diverted from their course. With a natural disposition in which slept the latent fire which only demanded some violent blow to strike into a flame—at a fashionable watering place, like every other person of sense, in like condition, sauntering about with contempt in his heart for the very pleasures in which he participated, he was on a certain day leaning against a pillar, which formed a part of the front of a Hotel, and enjoying one of the few rational amusements the place afforded; that was, gazing on the ocean, spreading like an eternity before him. Several pleasure boats were skimming along shore, when a sudden flaw of wind threw one of these light barks on her beam ends, and precipitated the persons on board into the deep. This incident was one of those which always restore such minds as that of Henry Moore to full energy. His hat, shoes, and upper garments, with a very valuable watch, were in an instant thrown on the pavement and the intrepid young man in the waves. In a few moments he was again on shore with the only person rescued from the wreck. That person turned out to be the only daughter of a rich London merchant, and by a very natural consequence, Henry Moore as soon as he discovered the intrinsic value of his prize considered himself at liberty to claim its possession. So thought not his family, but as it is probable, not one amongst them ever suspected the true cast of his character, they threw oil on the flame, which was blown to a conflagration by the father of the young lady. This true Englishman, returned with compound interest, the contempt of the aristocracy for his mercantile profession, and when Henry Moore made proposals for his daughter, received them with the following blunt address.

"Young gentleman, we live in a country with two codes of laws, one for the nation and the other for the nobility, as you choose to entitle yourself. My daughter is of too good a family to be made an object of neglect. She is a true born Englishwoman, with neither spot nor blemish on her or her blood kindred—don't interrupt me. You may think yourself an object of great consequence, but you are only one, and cannot if you would, protect my child against the whole of your clan. My consent therefore, depends on one condition, and one only, and remember, that my child will not, even to be your wife, desert her father—either come into my family or never again speak on the subject."

The Moore family had conducted their side of the affair in such a manner as to fully prepare the way for a total breach between them and Henry, and it is probable, if they had succeeded in separating him from the object of his choice, the breach between him and his family would have been still irreparable. Sufficeit to say, that Henry and Mrs. Moore, with their father was in a few days in London, and in a few years, Henry took place in the counting house, so long and so honorably filled by his wife's father.

Time who tames the most restive of our feelings, if he does not soften our hearts, brought reflection to Henry Moore, and on several occasions, he found that his own embittered relations, if they were determined to shew him no favor, they were as inveterately determined to do him injury, when chance put it in their power, which happened more than once. These, with political reasons induced him to transfer his family and business to the colonies, whose cause he espoused with all the energy and rectitude of his nature. His wife, long declining, survived her removal little more than a year, and Henry Moore in his adopted country had, when the storm burst in 1775, of all that shared his blood or family affinity, only his energetic daughter Ella. It need hardly be said that the education and early habits of Henry Moore, were the opposite of such as fitted him for the pursuit which fortune threw him into, and that such a change demanded a corresponding moral change; a demand very seldom complied with. Moore had also a generosity of feeling, which when indulged, is the rock of ruin to the merchant. He became security for a villain, who realized as much money as he could secure, sailed to Europe and left Henry Moore a bankrupt.

Ella Moore was one of those human beings, who in an intellectual point of view, have no infancy. From twelve years of age, she was her father's house keeper and domestic adviser. Now in her seventeenth year, Ella saw that grief was preying on the heart of her only parent. She redoubled her care and attention, but obtruded not into what she, however, suspected. But the cloud became deep, and Henry Moore sat down one evening to his tea in a state of utter depression. Ella saw at length the tear falling down his wan visage, and what child can withstand the tear of a parent! She threw her arms round his neck and sobbed, "My dear Father I know all."

"That we are ruined"—burst from the heaving heart of the father.

Ella released her embrace and stepping back, assumed that commanding and inspiring attitude and look which distinguished her through life.

"Ruined, no my father, we are not ruined, nor can we be ruined, whilst we can set the world at defiance. Your character no one can or dare touch. Let the world have all it can take from us. Our peace of mind, our integrity, and our power of laboring for our support, are goods which God and ourselves can preserve."

Moore eyed his daughter for a moment, feeling the whole energy of his powerful mind again called into action. "Sit down Ella and fill up my cup of tea, my cup of joy you have filled—a fortune is well paid away to have such a child in its place."

A frown of regret was never again seen to cloud the brow of Henry Moore at the remembrance of loss of fortune. The next morning after the scene we have described, he was engaged in the arrangements of his own bankruptcy, and Ella in her domestic preparations; it having been resolved upon between the father and daughter to go to the "back woods," as "the west" was then quaintly called, with all they could save after every debt was paid.

Some months before the bankruptcy of Moore, a man in all the uncouth dress of a hunter, but with a fine countenance beaming health, entered his store. In the stranger, there was a strong contrast of appearance and language. The dress bespoke a man of the forest, but the conversation, the man of education, keen observation, and acquaintance with men and manners in all their extremes.

"Is this the store of Mr. Henry Moore?" demanded the stranger.

"My name is Henry Moore," replied the owner, handing a chair.

"And mine," said the stranger, seating himself, "is Cyrus Lindslay. I am here a stranger, and without money or acquaintance."

Most men, in Moore's place, would have asked "what brought you here, where you have no acquaintance, and moneyless"—but Moore merely smiled, and awaited explanation, whilst his visiter drew from his shot-pouch a large bundle, enveloped in dressed deer skin, and while opening it, continued—"I am here as I have truly told you; here are some Virginia land warrants, the titles are good, though the land is distant; it is in Kentucky."

"In Kentucky," interrupted Moore, repressing an open laugh with difficulty.

"Yes," replied the stranger smiling, "and not in the Moon," I have been on the land, examined and surveyed it."

Moore, like almost every other human being of the time who dwelt on the sea board, indulged an unrestrained curiosity to hear from the vast unknown regions beyond the mountains, no sooner heard the stranger say he had actually been in Kentucky, than he interrupted him at once by saying "well! well! never mind saying any more now about the titles, I hear the dinner bell; come and dine with me and my daughter, and tell us something about Kentucky."

With perfect self possession, Lindsay put up his papers, and with the tact of a real gentleman entered the splendid dining room with unpretending confidence, in the full dress of the woods.

If all the philosophers of all the schools, were to write each a volume to prove the contrary, the whole together would never beat it out of my head, but what there are attractions between young men and younger women, that draw those of congenial minds with a force beyond their power to controul. At the first glance on the stranger, Ella was surprised, but she belonged to a class who only laugh at the ridiculous, and only scorn the vicious, she therefore received the introduction with all her dignified politeness, and well was she rewarded, even at the first interview. The stranger warmed by the manner of his hosts, entered on a full, flowing and entrancing account of the unheard of rivers, and mountains he had passed, and in the current of his narration named Boone.

"Boone," interrupted father and daughter, "we have heard of that man."

"And in him you have heard of a man" replied Lindsay, "who is never alone. For reasons I shall not now repeat, I, when only twenty years of age shouldered my rifle and crossed the mountains into that wide wilderness. I had heard that Boone and Findlay had lived alone amid the wilds and I resolved to follow their example. For many months I saw no human face. Meat alone was my food, and I found that with health, man might live alone, but a raging and consuming fever taught me at length the penalty of being alone. Tortured with a consuming thirst, but extremely weak, I sat me down under the shade of a tree on the verge of a very high rocky precipice with a river flowing at its base. Worlds would I have given for a cup full of the water I saw flowing almost under my feet. Delirium followed, and when my senses returned, I felt a delicious coolness, and as my eyes opened, I found myself lying by a cool fountain and a man dressed pretty much as I am now, sitting beside me. I was truly surprised, but he was not, and as he saw me rousing from what had been a refreshing sleep, he observed, "young man I have been following your track for two days. I knew by the signs you left, that you were a white man. My name is Daniel Boone; from whence have you come.

I then satisfied his inquiry, and he continued, "come with me;" but it was with his powerful support, I could accept the invitation, but what was my astonishment to find myself in a short time and distance in a camp of civilized men. My strength rapidly improved and in a few days I was able to take my share in hunting and surveying, and by such means have become a land owner in Kentucky. Our business is now to find settlers, and men to fight Indians. With these views I have returned to this side of the mountains, but my business here was in pursuit of a man who absconded deep in debt to my father. This knave I learned this very day has taken passage to England, and here am I without a penny and where deer and Buffaloe are rather scarce. "Not much more so than genuine honesty," rather bitterly replied Henry Moore, but resuming his gaiety and turning to Lindsay, observed, half laughing "come, let us have a look at some of your Kentucky land deeds, who knows Ella, but your husband, if you ever find one may not wish to become the head of a colony?" This speech brought a brighter glow into the cheeks, which Lindsay scanned with his hunter's eye, as he spread the maps, and warrants, on the table.

"That fine curving bend and high commanding bank is my choice," said Moore, preserving his high spirits in appearance at least, what is your charge for that whole tract?"

"I should suppose it is worth—worth," and for the first time in a hesitating manner, at last brought out "fifty dollars."

"Fifty dollars!" almost vociferated Moore, "why man you are crazy surely."

Lindsay, a little abashed and misunderstanding the drift of his host, replied "very well perhaps I have set too high a price."

"I hope, Mr. Lindsay, that you understand hunting better than selling land—now if you will make me a deed of that very land, I will pay you in hard money fifty sterling pounds."

Lindsay with all his self possession was fairly astonished, and sat looking first at father and then daughter, without being able to bring out a single word. But the noble minded Moore who sat in the full and deserved enjoyment of a generous action, soon relieved the hunter, by observing,

"You have told me Mr. Lindsay, that you have no acquaintance here, then you will do me the favour to accept a room in my house and a seat at my table until we can see matters arranged."

This invitation was accepted with cordiality on both sides, and Cyrus Lindsay, the Kentucky surveyor and hunter became an inmate in the elegant mansion of Henry Moore. The afternoon, (even persons of quality then dined in the afternoon) was spent in hearing of buffaloes, and bears, wild deer in thousands, wild turkeys in millions, and Indians, far too many, in hundreds. Never had Ella Moore been so entranced with history, novel or epic; indeed she now heard all those blended, and new regions of the earth spreading wide and far on her really vivid fancy. Her soul seemed as if disembodied, and transported to another life; she felt her heart mingling in new and exciting scenes; her sympathies caught new inspiration and shared danger, braved death, and fell or triumphed with beings of whose very existence, only a few hours before she could have had no conception. Did she not in reality soar for a moment into futurity, and gain a glance of her future destiny?

Henry Moore made the purchase and paid the price, but his guest seemed to have got over any excessive hurry in his return to Kentucky, and his entertainers gave no symptom of being weary of his society. The weather, political rumour, and other subjects of excuse were, however, nearly exhausted, when on Sunday evening after returning from church, Lindsay with unaffected gravity observed, "to morrow morning I set out for Kentucky." Ella was rising to quit the room when a knocking at the door was heard, and in an instant a new actor appeared on the scene.

If there is any thing beyond the utmost depth of philosophy to account for, it is the human heart, and of individual hearts to render the problem more intricate, it is the most gifted and most powerful minds who enact the most glaring inconsistencies.

Deming Rostraven, the young man who now entered the parlor of Henry Moore, and was introduced to Cyrus Lindsay, was a man no one could see and forget; his form was larger and taller than common, and in structure was a model of ease and grace; his high and retiring forehead and deep sunken, but dark and keen eye gave him something of repulsive, which his ease of manner and cultivated politeness could not remove. His name for the first time since his arrival at the Moore mansion threw a gloom approaching to a scowl upon the face of Lindsay; and his presence taught Ella Moore, that she was wretched.

Deming Rostraven was a distant relation, and for some months the affianced husband of Ella Moore. Being compelled to go on a journey of business to Boston, and from thence found it necessary to sail to England. Letters had informed Moore and his daughter of these movements, but the vessel in which Rostraven sailed was forced back to New York, by stress of weather, and there, the political aspect of the time caused him to abandon his intended voyage, and setting out by land, arrived very unexpectedly to all, and by a strange change or rather developement of feeling, a very unwelcome visitor to his betrothed wife.

Ella Moore was one of those strong minded persons who deceive themselves, in thinking that intense passion is not only necessary to their happiness, but incompatible with their character. Many such pass through life undeceived in this matter, but fearful is the discovery when made too late, that with the strength rises the extent of feeling. There was with an imposing exterior, a negation of character in Deming Rostraven; on the contrary with an exterior, little if any, less attractive, the qualities of Cyrus Lindsay, were active, daring, yet circumspect. Rostraven represented the many and Lindsay the few, and if the latter had not appeared to her presence, Ella Moore, would probably have become Ella Rostraven, without either much joy or sorrow—he had been the chosen of her father and again filial affection aided his cause. But a rapid and durable change was preparing for all parties.

Rostraven and Ella met, as too many in their relative situations meet. He gave to herself the common place account of the cause of his return, did not remain long, but rose to take leave as his expected father-in-law followed him to the door, calling out "Deming, we expect you to breakfast to morrow morning"—"very well," replied Deming as his footsteps died away on the pavement. That moment decided the fate of all parties, as Lindsay whispered to Ella with intense energy, "I must speak with you this night;" "in this parlor at twelve"—"replied Ella," as her father re-entered laughing and observing "Deming is too good a whig to leave his country at this time. Neither his daughter or guest made any reply, but most likely both would have been just as well pleased if he had sailed to England as had many other loyal subjects of George III.

At the appointed hour when all was silent around them, Lindsay and Ella found themselves together. With all her self-command and purity of intention, Ella felt that something was wrong in the step she had taken, but an irresistible and invisible power seemed to impel her forward and to sustain her in the trial. The intrepid hunter was not himself free from a hesitation he had never experienced before, but the hour of his inevitable departure pressed, and approaching the now trembling Ella, and seizing her hand as he seated himself beside her, observed very solemnly,

"Ella Moore most sincerely do I thank you for this proof of confidence. If I had not felt the absolute necessity to the future happiness of my life—never would I have dared to request such a meeting or to put the question," and he hesitated; "are you really engaged to the man whom I saw here this evening?"—"I am," replied Ella in agitation.

"As to any misery it has or may inflict on me, that is nothing, but on your account dear Ella"—

"Why on my account? demanded Ella, with some surprise, and with rallied spirits.

"Because," answered Lindsay, "you never were made for each other. I shall not say, but that with such a man you may not be wretched; yes, you may vegetate as thousands do, but I mistake your character most egregiously, if with such a man you can ever be happy."

"And I mistake your character also Mr. Lindsay," rejoined Ella, "if you would not advise misery in preference to violated faith."

"My advice either way," replied Lindsay, is neither given nor shall be given, it is what I have no right to do:—but Ella Moore, if the engagement was now to be made with Deming Rostraven, would you?"—

Both remained long silent, whilst Ella, leaning her left hand on her forehead, was lost in a conflict of contending reflections, at length as if awaking from a dream, she replied, "no not for worlds."

"Oh! Ella, dare I ask another question, if this engagement should by any means be broken?"—

The very idea of a release was too much for the presence of mind of even Ella Moore, and with a smile her secret was revealed.

Mountains seemed to be raised from the head and heart, not of one but both, so seductive is hope—

Next morning as Deming Rostraven entered the breakfast room, he even started back in astonishment at seeing Lindsay in the full garb of the hunter. It was a phenomenon to the cit, he was unprepared for; and strong indeed was the contrast between the two; one in the full dress of European fashion, and the other, in his own way, as fully equipped. It never once entered the head of Deming, that such a savage could be his rival in the affections of the city bred and accomplished Ella Moore; and each of the party indulging their own reflections, completed their breakfast, and Cyrus Lindsay, shouldering his rifle, turned his footsteps towards the setting sun.

"If that young man was dressed like a christian," said Deming to Moore and his daughter, as Cyrus left the house," I declare he would not look so shocking—he would appear more like a man."

"Then in your opinion," observed Ella, "it is dress that makes men and christians—high compliment to taylors and barbers." And she left the room with a something in her manner which gave a sting to her betrothed, his sagacity could not account for, but his self complacency came to his aid and all was soon at ease in his heart. But even Deming Rostraven, had his trials to encounter. Every breast is exposed in some way or other, and vanity was the weak point of Deming, and in that quarter he received some severe wounds. The happy day was put off under various pretences, and even the father of Ella seemed to become less anxious for the connexion; but that was attributed to, in some respects to the true source, perplexities of business; and to which was daily added with accumulating force, the political difficulties of the times.

The patience of even the half in love, Rostraven, like all things human, was waxing to its term, and the great day pressed and still prolonged from very opposite motives in the parties. The very evening before the open declaration of the bankruptcy of Henry Moore, and whilst, as many declared afterwards, they knew it was one of the certain coming events, Deming visited his intended, whom he met with his own even blooming smile, but on her side a solemnity, even a sadness of manner, which would have greatly damped if not pained a heart of real affection; and struck up a light in a head of a little more penetration. But coldness and darkness have their benefits, such as they are.

Ella was seated on her usual evening seat, and was, contemplating a most splendid setting sun, with an air of thoughtfulness, and of anxiety as if she was seeking to allay earthly care by soaring in thought to higher regions. Such consoling and exalting reflections were broken by a repetition of those expressions from her intended, which like all other set forms are repeated on all necessary occasions, by all the extremes from devoted sincerity to the most deeply concealed hypocrisy. Ella heard rather than listened to the effort of memory, whilst her mind was perhaps following the western sun, and the steps of some other than Deming Rostraven. At length, after a hundred dry responses of yes, or no, or a mere inclination of the head, and with all her equanimity, a little ruffled by being distracted from a train of most pleasing thought, by the proposal of all others, which she most dreaded and loathed to hear, turned round and fixing her eyes with all their power upon Rostraven, observed.

"Deming Rostraven, as matters seem now to admit but little more delay"—and she paused some time, and then proceeded, "this day two weeks"—

At the joyful sounds, Rostraven in transport was ready to clasp her to his bosom, but his raptures were allayed by a look and wave of her hand, as she continued in a still more impressive tone—

"Mr. Rostraven, you think me rich."

"Oh my Ella," exclaimed the betrothed" "who with you can think"—"of wealth" interrupted Ella, "few men in your situation, think of much else before, or talk of much else after marriage; but oh! grant me now one favour Deming Rostraven."

"Any thing in my power to grant," replied the devoted lover.

"Perfectly in your power," subjoined Ella with a look which would have cooled a real lover to zero. "It is only to leave me alone."

With the most prodigal profusion of expressions of devoted attachment that his death alone could obliterate, Deming Rostraven was measuring his steps from the house, and Ella was left alone, or far more correctly, she now entered the assembly of beings fancy created, and whispering hope in her heart.

The reader will remember the annunciation of his ruin to make his daughter, and his heart-felt compliment, when he said, "Sit down Ella, and fill up my cup of tea; my cup of happiness you have already filled—A fortune is well paid away to have such a child in its place."

From the unwelcome presence of Rostraven, Ella had been but a short time relieved, when the always cheering sounds of her father's footsteps roused her to action. The elegant table and smile awaited him, and the eventful explanation followed.

The father and daughter sat for some time silently sipping their tea when Ella at length broke silence—"Deming Rostraven"—

"Has been here this evening," interrupted the father.

"Yes, he has been here—and this day two weeks," replied Ella, very composedly.

"My God," emphatically as he dropped his cup, exclaimed Henry Moore, "what circumstances for the espousals of my child."

"Be comforted my father, and best friend," rejoined Ella, "those espousals can never take place."

"Why Ella, my child, do not let any considerations for me, permit you to break"—

"My plighted faith," interrupted Ella, with one of her looks, which even her father felt—"If I have read Deming Rostraven rightly, you and I will both be saved from any breach of faith."

These words, and their manner struck so forcibly on the heart and head of Henry Moore, that involved in profound reflection on the past and present, on the character of the man he so long desired to make his son, and on the almost sublime character of his daughter, that his lips were sealed.

Ella, absorbed also in her own reflections, and on her release, for with all her strength of mind, Ella was but a woman at last; and reader, I must really whisper my suspicions, that though his name is not mentioned, Cyrus Lindslay, some how or other, contributed his share to fortify her mind at her change of fortune, and to reconcile her to cross "the mountains Blue." As to Deming Rostraven, on the very morning which proclaimed Henry Moore a Bankrupt, he received letters demanding his presence in New York, and of so pressing a nature as not to leave him one moment to even pen a tender adieu to his Ella. She saw him no more.

This desertion was soon known, and carefully added to the story of Henry Moore and his daughter. To Ella it was communicated by several of those friends who never fail in the hour of misfortune, and was treated by the disconsolate lady in such a manner as to convince the kind creatures that their labour was lost, and so they desisted.

"He's not at all to be blamed," said the many.—"He is what we always thought him, a mean spirited wretch," said the few. The person who in the common course of things in this world, ought to have been most concerned, said nothing, and thought little about the recreant. The father and daughter with hearts and minds, which only a few admired, for few were they who could appreciate their conduct, arranged their affairs, paid their debts to the last penny, and one fine sunny morning left the town of——, and in a few weeks were no more thought of in the town of——.

Boonesboro', a fine little village on the southern side of Kentucky river, and on the northern border of Madison county, and twenty miles south-east of Lexington, stands now near the centre of the most densely inhabited, most highly cultivated, and most highly civilized section of Kentucky, was founded in the spring and summer of 1775 by Daniel Boone, and a small party from Holston river. The extraordinary man, who was the father of Kentucky, was a native of Maryland, but in early life removed by his parents into Virginia, and thence into North Carolina. In 1769, this still very young man was in the wilds of Kentucky, with a man of the name of Finley. After a residence of three years, sometimes accompanied by one of his brothers, but often alone, visiting his family in North Carolina, in the autumn of 1773, Boone entered Kentucky with his family, and a small colony, in all about fifty persons. This little band was attacked by the Indians, on the 10th of October, and the first settlement of Kentucky delayed about 18 months. In the eventful 1775, the wife and daughter of Boone were the two first white women who inhabited Kentucky, now blooming in beauty.

There is a something indescribable in the romantic characters of such men as Boone, and with more of education and polish, Cyrus Lindslay was of similar cast. Generous, open, manly, brave and humane, Lindslay joined Boone in 1773 and innumerable were the instances in which without other companions, those two men sought the forest. With equal keenness of eye the Indian trail was plain to them as the beaten road. With a precision which very seldom failed, the direction of their march and the number of their enemies, were known to Boone and Lindslay, at a moment's examination.

"Dark and Bloody Ground," was indeed Kentucky in her early days. Every man was compelled to be a warrior and every house was made a fortress. Many of the present flourishing villages scattered over Kentucky, attest the location, and perpetuate the names of the patriarchs of this beautiful state. Boonsboro', and Harodsburg carry us back to 1775.

It was drawing towards evening, of a rather heavy day, late in the fall of 1775, that Daniel Boone and Cyrus Lindslay, were treading the tangled woods, whose to tread on a dry stick or cane was avoided. Indian signs had been seen, and these two weary spies, had traversed the forest to examine the trail, and circumvent the enemy. They were on the elevated ground from which issues the sources of Rockcastle branch of Cumberland river, the higher sources of Dick's river, and those of some branches of Kentucky river. Along this section extended the path by which most of the whites entered central Kentucky at that time. The two spies rose a hill, and reaching the wood examined carefully whether any recent marks had been made. It was sometime before either, with all their tact, could observe that any person or horse had passed for many days, but, at length, they both started as if roused by some important discovery, and in complete silence, but intense scrutiny of every weed, they slowly went to some distance; when Boone stopped and whispered, "these marks are not made by an Indian, but by some person, I think a girl flying in great haste." Both, without further parley, took the track at their utmost speed, and had not proceeded more than two or three miles, until they saw before them the object of their pursuit. That object was as Boone surmised, a female almost exhausted, and crawling rather than walking. In order to alarm her, but as little as possible, Boone made a slight noise by striking his rifle with his knife. At the sound she turned round in great terror, but Boone in a voice which calmed her fears, called out to her, "Why my girl, we are white men." At the welcome sound she sunk to the ground utterly exhausted. The two humane spies gave her every aid and comfort in their power, but it was considerably advanced in the night before she was sufficiently restored to be able to account for being alone in the wilderness of Kentucky; but when she was restored they found her to be a remarkably intelligent girl of about fourteen years of age, and from her they learned, that she was with her parents and several others, some families and some single men, removing to Kentucky; that their place of destination was Boone's station. The men, she said, were well armed with guns, but that they were always making a noise, and that a woman of the party was always telling them that they ought not to do so, as Indians might be in the woods, but that the men said there was no danger. So they travelled on until the evening before, when the party encamped for the night near a creek. The strange woman, she said, had always before got some of the men to sit up and watch, but this time she failed, as a quarrel arose amongst the men, who should watch, which ended by no one of the men doing so, but that the woman did watch.* The girl stated further, that, after the party had stopped, she accidentally noticed a large hollow tree, a little distance down the creek, from the encampment, but with the rest of her family had lain down and fallen asleep, from which she was awakened by the most terrible shouts she ever heard, and the screams of the white people and shots. She said she had lain down in her clothes, and supposed the Indians had not noticed her, as she ran and crouched into the hollow tree.

* The tragical event interwoven in our tale, is here but very slightly changed from fact, as to either place or incident, and was far from a solitary instance of similar infatuation. The girl who escaped in the manner we have related, became a married woman and the mother of a large family in Kentucky.

From her place of safety to herself, the terrified girl beheld the destruction, and heard the death cries, as she thought of both her parents, brothers and sisters, with many more, and beheld also several others bound and led captive. After the Indians had completed their work of destruction, satisfied their hunger, and collected the horses, they departed with the booty and prisoners. Several times whilst driving up the horses, the girl said, "The ugly Ingens came so near the tree, I was afraid to breathe for fear they would hear me."

Thus alone in the wilds of Kentucky, in circumstances, under which man might be excused for losing his presence of mind, this intelligent female child reflected that as she had heard her parents and others say, that in two days more they would be able to reach Boone's station, and knowing the many days they had travelled since leaving the settlements, she at once, as soon as day dawned, took the track to the westward, and was found as we have related.

Such men as Boone and Lindslay, have their faculties rendered more clear, and presence of mind strengthened by danger. They ascertained from the girl that the Indians had went in a northerly direction.

"The villains," said Boone, "intend to cross the Ohio about the mouth of Sciota, and we must get this child to the station, and see whether we cannot come up with them and save the prisoners."

Without farther delay, except to give the exhausted Sally, as she called herself, some short rest, they set out, supporting, or actually carrying Sally by turns. Their fatigue was lessened and objects promoted by meeting a party of ten men, some fifteen miles from the station. From this party Boon selected four, on whose active courage and endurance of fatigue, he could most depend, directing the others to return to the station and deliver Sally to his family.

As Boone and his men were shouldering their guns, and bracing their minds, to the very daring and apparently very unequal contest they were exposed to, as both Boone and Lindslay were convinced there were at least twenty warriors of the Indian party, the former very coolly observed, "My boys, I think I know exactly where the Ingens intend to cross the Ohio, it is our business to get there before them, for two reasons. First, one man placed between them and their own country is worth two on the other side of them; and secondly, the recovery of the prisoners is much more certain." This short speech, and a "Now for it," from the mouth of the whole party, our six warrior hunters were on their way, in loose Indian file, the most silent in voice and tread of any living being of the wide waste. To the citizen who is most severely fatigued by a walk round three or four squares, or to the young country dandy who will go one mile to a field to catch a horse to ride another mile, it would be vain to say, that six men, would leave the southern end of Madison county, Kentucky, and be on the banks of the Ohio a little below where Maysville now stands, a distance of near one hundred miles, in less than two days; but yet many are they of the west, yet living, who will regard such an effort as only one of many others as extraordinary.

Boone and Lindslay were correct in their calculations and tactics, and they not only obtained the advantage they sought, but had turned the Indian mode of watching the motions of their adversaries on themselves. This success was, however, in part owing to the Indians still regarding that part of the left side of Ohio, as their own country. A very few years afterwards, these wily children of the forest, come to consider themselves in an enemies country, at any point south of Ohio, hence their extreme vigilance, in their advance and retreat, after crossing that stream, and hence, from 1776, until the final destruction of Indian power in the valley of Ohio, by the United States' army in 1794, under General Wayne: it is yet a matter of astonishment how deeply Indian war parties could penetrate, strike their murderous blows, and retire in safety to themselves, unseen and unheard except by their victims. In 1775, their true position, and advantages and disadvantages, were not so well understood, and on more than one or two occasions, were circumvented by Boone.

On the same evening after Boone and his party left the head of Dick's river, they fell on the Indian trail, and as darkness came on, Lindslay was stationed in the rear with three of the men, while Boone with another on whom he had great confidence, advanced and succeeded to completely examine the camp, in which were found twenty warriors. Boone saw by their conduct that the Indians were in full security, and without any suspicion of an enemy hovering on their skirts, and having gained what he wished, returned and joined Lindslay and his other men. By his admirable knowledge of the country, Boon led his little troop round the Indians, and gained the Ohio before the sun of the second day had reached the "Tree Tops."

The only general order given, was, that if the Indians attempted to cross the Ohio that night, they must be attacked that night, as the prisoners were not to be, if possible, exposed to be taken over the river; but if they encamped, the attack was to be delayed until day-break next morning; and in either case, Boone himself on the right, was to fire first, and then the next man, and so in rapid succession from right to left; no one to fire without being sure of his mark, and then every man remembering he had still more than two to one to contend with, was to seize his tomahawk, rush into the camp and do his best. Thus, like crouching tigers lay these six determined men, awaiting every moment, the arrival of more than three times their number of well armed enemies. Nor had they long to wait, as just at sun-set, the Indians appeared with their wretched captives, whose last hope expired at the view of the Ohio, which appeared to them as the very vale of death. As Boone and his men anxiously hoped, the Indians prepared to encamp, evidently considering it too late to cross the river; and neglecting also what no Indian party would have neglected, two years afterwards, that was, a careful examination of the coverts around them.

In this state of confidence in their safety, on one side, and determination and watchfulness on the other, the night was passed, and the grey dawn of morning was opening to the poor forlorn captives, the still darkly shadowed vale of Ohio. The Indians were still wrapped in their blankets, when the mellow but heart-moving tones of a woman's voice, rose in prayer to the FATHER OF LIGHT AND LIFE. The distinct words they could not hear, but the voice fell upon the very souls of their deliverers, and if possible inspired them with ten-fold confidence in victory; but it was on Lindslay that the sound fell as if from HEAVEN. There was a something in the thrilling aspiration which so transported him as for a moment to render him forgetful of where he was. He felt as if in the regions of the blest, and as if listening to a disembodied spirit, but his trance was short; the Indians began to rise until near half their number was on their feet, when the still profound silence was broken by the clear, sharp sound and deadly aim of Boon's rifle, followed in less than one minute by the discharge of five more, and the death struggles of as many Indians. With a shout loud and terrible forward rushed the little band, and so rapid were their motions, that several warriors were tomahawked as they rose in terror. All who could, fled at the first surprise, still, however, numbers were on the side of the Indians, but the presence of mind of Boone on the evening before, decided the battle. In the creek, were Boone expected, lay the Indian canoes, which were by his express order not even approached only near enough to ascertain they were there. In their terror, the warriors who escaped the first volley and charge, made for the canoes and pushed them as speedily as possible into the Ohio, very naturally supposing from the suddenness of their onset, that the whites formed a numerous party, and the whites were indeed very speedily re-inforced by two men whose bonds were cut by the hands of the woman, whose voice in prayer, had first burst on the silence of that fearful morning scene.

Though the Indians were defeated with the loss of near half their numbers, and the despairing prisoners released, their conquerors did not all escape. One of the Indians, a very active and athletic man, who was amongst those who were cut off from retreating to the canoes, turned and fled into an adjacent thicket, overtopping a ledge of rocks, into which he was closely pursued by Cyrus Lindslay. Both for a few moments disappeared, but the report of two rifles fired so near together that their sounds were scarcely distinguishable, told that the strife of death was commenced. Boone and one of his men were returning from their pursuit after two more enemies who had fled and escaped in an opposite direction, when they beheld the flying savage, and Lindslay in rapid pursuit towards the covert; the other three, and one of the released prisoners were discharging shots, some of which took effect on the retreating canoes. The impulse of Boone and his companion were to speed to the aid of Lindslay; but even in a moment, when their every power of mind and body was on the full extent of exertion, an incident occurred which turned their attention to unexpected allies. As Lindslay with the fleetness of an Apollo and his flying enemy no less fleet, seemed to fly past them, the woman we have already introduced, screamed, "Father, Father, Cyrus Lindslay," and in frantic gestures seized the tomahawk of one of the dead Indians, and shot with swiftness almost superhuman past Boone and his attending warrior, and also disappeared amongst the brambles at the instant that the shots were heard. Boon and his man followed; the released prisoner exclaiming, "My child, my child," also endeavoured to fly after his daughter, but his limbs cramped by the thongs with which he had been bound, refused their office, and in excruciating agony he sunk down at the foot of the ledge exclaiming, "My child, my child." His suspense was short, as a rustling amongst the branches, stifled expressions of rage from men in the strife of death, and the cries of a female voice, which rent his soul, was followed by the rush of the two combatants, already covered with blood, to the edge of the precipice, down which they hurried each other in tiger grasp. They struck upon some branches projecting from the rocks which broke the force of their fall, and brought them to the ground on their feet, within a few yards from the anxious father. Both fell, however, to the earth, and Lindslay, under the triumphant Indian, who had before made abortive attempts to draw his knife, but now succeeded. His yell as the blade flashed was his last; the heroine seemed to drop from the impending rocks, and a tomahawk was sunk to the handle in the brain of the savage.

The victory was now complete—need I say that the heroine was Ella Moore—Yes! it was Ella, the same Ella amid blood and death on the wilderness banks of Ohio, who erst shone in the splendid saloon. If we were describing the heroine of a novel in place of a woman who really did exist, we would be compelled to describe her as rushing into the arms of the man she loved and saved; but plain truth compels us to describe her in an infinitely more elevated sphere of action. Her feelings were repressed, but her energies called into rational action. Lindslay was literally covered and blinded with his own blood and that of his antagonist. The ball of the Indian had pierced his right arm above the elbow without breaking the bone, whilst the Indian received a severe flesh wound through one thigh. In the heat of the battle neither was much disabled by their wounds, though that of the Indian brought him to the ground, and enabled Lindslay to seize his prey. But the great loss of blood, as an artery had been cut, soon exhausted Lindslay, who fainted as they bore him to the camp. With a wave of her hand, and imploring gesture, Ella prevented her father from arousing by any ill-timed expression, the recollections of Lindslay. With the aid of Boone and a part of the dress of Ella, the bleeding was staunched, and the wound bound up, and not then considered very dangerous. The blood was then washed from his blinded visage, and his senses gradually restored. As returning consciousness confusedly brought back the remembrance of where he was and in what fearful conflict he had been engaged, his sight first fell upon a countenance, black and haggard, intently fixed upon him.

"What vision have I seen? what voice have I heard? inwardly murmured Lindslay," "Ella Moore! no that cannot be."

"Why should the voice not have been that of Ella Moore?" mournfully exclaimed the man before him.

"And that voice"—"is the voice"—of Henry Moore, surely all this must be a dream."

"It is reality," exclaimed another mouth whose breathings of anxious affection could be no longer repressed. "It is reality," and for the first time Cyrus Lindslay was enfolded in the arms of Ella Moore.

Boone whose mind untaught in the dark intricacies of artificial human policy, but who never had a superior in intuitive knowledge of the finest feelings of the human heart; Boone, who loved his species, and entered into the every joy, care, and danger of his friends, and his friends were all of mankind, not his enemies with whom he ever had to act, and who now from conversation formerly held with Lindslay, perfectly understood the characters and scene before him, but felt that on him devolved the safety of all, and that retreat to his station must be prompt and speedy. Orders were given to the young men to collect the horses without any avoidable delay, and then seizing the hand of Henry Moore, observed with his native blandness:

"Mr. Moore you are not altogether unknown to me,—that young warrior, I believe did not receive his first wound to day."

"Can you be Daniel Boone," exclaimed Moore.

"Daniel Boone is my name"—replied the warrior—"don't attempt thanks to me," and Boone in the Indian and most impressive manner pointed to the Heavens. Moore felt the appeal and turning his tearful eyes upon his daughter, exclaimed fervently, "Oh! my God! my daughter."

"We must be off," said Boone; and in less than two hours from the break of day, and firing of their first rifle, the party was on their way. We need not describe their retreat, suffice it to say, they arrived safe at Boone's station; but we cannot omit a most affecting incident, which took place on approaching the station. We have mentioned, that two men had been spared by the Indians from massacre and made prisoners. One we have accounted for, in the person of Henry Moore; the other was a plain, but kindly looking man, who seemed steeped in the bitterest grief. He spoke seldom, and when the party halted, retired to commune and mourn with his own thoughts. Boone, Henry Moore, and his daughter, indeed all others of the party, were fully employed in their respective duties, and the three former, in care of Cyrus Lindslay, whose wound had become excessively painful. Boone had learned from Henry Moore, that the disconsolate man, with a wife and five children, had joined their party in Powell's valley, and that he believed the mother and all the children had perished.

On the third day, and as they had hopes of arriving at the station that night, Boone led the mourner gradually into a conversation on his loss, in which the man at length observed, "I know I should not,—but how can I help envying Mr. Moore, he has suffered much, but his daughter is safe."

"You had a daughter?" interrupted Boone.

"Yes! two, and one fourteen years of age."

"Her name?" demanded Boone.

"Sally," replied the man fixing his inquiring eyes on Boone.

The look was returned with earnestness, as Boone seized the hand of the anxious father, for hope had beamed in his bosom.

"Be comforted, friend," continued Boone, "you see a man who has been witness to the death of a child by Ingen hands—be comforted, your Sally has been the means under that," and Boone again pointed to the heavens, "of saving her father," and the astonished, and delighted parent, that very evening pressed to his bosom, the remnant of his earthly treasures; for little did he bring into the wilderness beside his family. * * * * * *

The fatigue of his journey, with the defective means of healing his wound, had thrown Cyrus Lindslay into a violent fever, which was burning his brain when brought back to Boone's station. For many days his mind roamed under the rack of pain and anxiety, according to the access of his complicated malady. All that the tenderest care which the circumstances of the place admitted, was done. Surgical aid was not wanting, as Boone himself was no mean surgeon—and there was beside him, a professional man at the station.

"Either his life or his arm must go," said at length the surgeon to Boone and Henry Moore." On that, he must himself be consulted," said both the latter, and he was consulted. When the dreadful alternative was placed before him, for the first time in his life, the manly spirit of Lindslay shrunk back upon itself, and fixing his still fine countenance first on the surgeon, next on Boone, and at length as if he dreaded the appeal on the working visage of Henry Moore, faintly, but impressively observed.—

"My father, my friend, for well may I call upon you by both names. When a stranger you received and cherished me—will the surgeon have the kindness to retire?" The surgeon rose and left the room; while Moore and Boone sat too much affected to interrupt the invalid, who seemed to gain strength by effort, and proceeded. "I had hoped that these arms would have—but alas! I must see Ella." And raising his eyes to the roof, for other ceiling was not over his head, seemed a moment lost in most bitter reflection from which he was diverted by a hand laid softly on his devoted hand.

Long, deep and painful was the silence of the whole party, but some relief came at length from the bursting heart of Ella, who with a smile, such as ministering angels smile upon those they are sent to bless and comfort—"I know all and in the name of him who speaks life or death, let it be so—but oh Cyrus upon one condition only."

"What condition Ella."

"That before that hand is severed from its arm I receive your plighted faith; that I may watch over you as a wife.

"Incomparable woman," energetically exclaimed, Lindslay, "Oh! I cannot wed thee Ella thus, if I survive the trial how am I to support—."

"Cyrus Lindslay" interrupted Ella as her face fell on his bosom, "these hands—with you in this wilderness will I labour cheerfully."

"And God will bless you both," exclaimed Moore and Boone transported to enthusiasm, as they rose to their feet, so powerfully had fallen on their hearts the words of the devoted woman. At this moment the evening clouds parted, and a ray of sun-shine fell upon the bed and on the faces of Lindslay and Ella, rich, clear and golden, it seemed a smile from Heaven, and in the next hour in presence of Boone and his family, of Henry Moore and the surgeon, Cyrus Lindslay and Ella Moore were united in the most holy of all human bonds. If ever a union was formed refined from all the dross of selfishness, and if ever affection without alloy prepared two hearts for such union, such was the union of Cyrus Lindslay and Ella Moore.

If ever the sordid foresight of common mortals was confounded, it was in this instance. A man deprived of his right hand, and a woman bred in all the indulgence of wealth, with but little resource beyond their personal labor, in the midst of an untamed waste, on what were the foundations of their hopes based? on purity of heart, on unstained minds, on dependence placed where none but the pure in heart can place their hopes.

Cyrus and Ella were not deceived. The amputation was successfully performed, and from that day the health and strength of Lindslay, slowly, but surely recovered; wealth, the least reward of such minds also slowly, but surely increased in their hands, and the aged and happy Henry Moore lived to see his name multiplied, as the first son received the name of Moore Lindslay, and the second Henry Lindslay.

In their plain and neat mansion, many is the traveller who felt and expressed unqualified astonishment at finding with the most unaffected hospitality, manners, not always even approached, in mansions glittering in splendor.

PLEASURE.

Vain is the hope that pleasure's dazzling blaze,
Will chase the shades of grief's nocturnal hour!
Vain is the gay delusion that betrays
The child of sorrow to her magic bower!
True, she will gleam and glitter on the sight,
And e'en the brow of pallid wo illume,
As the wild meteor of the wintry night
Suns the lost wanderer through the deepening gloom;
'Till faint it dies on the dark river's wave,
In whose cold breast the pilgrim finds a grave.

VIRTUE.

Saw you the sun obscur'd at noon
Burst through the mist and fiercer blaze?
Saw you at eve the clouded moon
Shine out and shed soul-soothing rays?
Oh, thus shall youth's eternal beam,
Consume foul falsehood's venal shroud!
Thus, thus shall lovely virtue gleam
Through calumny's malignant cloud.

TO JUNE.

Hail bright-eyed daughter of the year!
Thy varied charms through all our senses steal;
We touch, we taste, thy glories;—and we hear,
We look, upon thy loneliness!—we feel
The tingling pleasure course its veinward flight,
In all the rich, deep, fullness of delight!

And O, thy balmy breath!—its fragrant flow,
Bathing the earth with perfumes;—or, in freak,
Lifting the early ringlet from the brow,
With fairy fingers;—or, upon the cheek
Of beauty lingering, playfully,—as though
Enamored of its sweets, and loth to go!

And then thou com'st all smiles!—as if thy face
Were quite unused to storms, and loved not gloom!
A very laughing one!—and then the grace
Of thy light foot-steps, where the spring-flowers bloom!
The forest's peopling, with its leafy vine—
The south-wind's music mid the whispering pine—

And all the glory of thy deep blue sky—
O, these are beautiful! how came they thine?
Methinks they fit thee not. Thy length'ning hours,
Can they but fit us less to die?
But bring fond hopes, to crush them ever;
But being fond hearts,—and rudely sever
Love's most indissoluble tie!
What then should spring,—its opening flowers,
What should they have to do with such as thee?

LINES TO ELLEN.

BY JOHN C. M'CABE.

She was one of those beautiful beings we meet with once in a long life time, and part with too soon! whose large black eye sends its silent, (oh no!) its thrilling eloquence to the soul of man; whose voice like the Æolean harp, captivates the spirit with its wild witching numbers;—in short, whose form and action would lead us to suppose some spirit from the abodes of the blessed, had come to point to erring man the pathway from the earth to the skies.

Heaven would be surpassing lovely with but one such to tread its sapphired floors with.

Thou'rt young and beautiful, sweet girl,
And o'er that polished neck of thine,
In many a love fraught glossy curl
The rival raven ringlets twine.

And o'er that brow so pure and white,
Young hope her joyous lines doth trace,
In characters so chaste and bright,
That wo may not, cannot efface.

Yet why of wo? dear Ellen, why?
No sorrow shall that bosom know,
No tear of anguish dim thine eye,
Or mine shall freely with it flow.

Around thy path may lovely flowers,
Spontaneous throw their bursting bloom;
On Seraph pinions pass thy hours,
Without one cloud thy soul to gloom.

And when in death, that large dark eye
Of thine shall glaze, oh breathe for me,
One little prayer, that when I die,
I may but die, sweet girl like thee!

Farewell! the sunshine's all thine own,
The storm is mine; farewell! farewell!
My back is on life's ocean blown,
The plaything of each rival swell.

THE MINIATURE.

"Look on this picture.—Shakspeare.

CHAPTER I.

Mr. Diaper Garnet was standing at his shop door, diving his hands into his pockets; anon rubbing, and causing them to revolve over each other with a leisurely satisfaction; presently, introducing his thumbs into the arms of his waistcoat, casting one eye occasionally at the sunny atmosphere around; and, in short, betraying evident comfort with the most perfect composure.

And indeed, as things went, Garnet might very reasonably deem himself well off. Just married to a pretty little creature, who, in addition to a constant flow of high spirits, and an inexhaustible stock of good temper, had brought him a sufficient dowry; established in a jeweller's shop, which, although small, contained, not to mention that priceless gem, Mrs. G., many others of inferior value and lustre; and blest with an inimitable skill in the adjustment of jewellery, and irresistibly persuasive in the recommendation of plate, what could possibly thwart his advancement in life?

His thoughts had been occupied all the morning by a review of the flattering circumstances of his situation. He called to mind the pithy and profound sayings of his master, old Agate, now deceased, and lying in the adjacent churchyard; by a heedful interpretation of which he had caused himself to prosper. He remembered, with a triumphant smile, (for he had now discarded them,) his juvenile faults, vices, and indiscretions; he conjured to memory that auspicious day, when twitching from its congenial cotton, one of his own wedding rings, he insinuated it on the left hand fourth finger of his Lucy; and, above all, he had the eye of retrospection upon those three per cents transfered into his own name in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, just over the way.

To have seen Garnet at this moment, you would have sworn that he deserved all these blessings. There was a seraphic delight in his round and cherubic countenance, as he warbled a soft and sentimental air. He was gorgeously dressed in an open blue coat, a velvet waistcoat, enriched by a gold chain, and pantaloons of amazing tightness. He was going presently to the exhibition with Mrs. Garnet.

The approach of a young lady, dissipated the concluding shake of "Love's young Dream," and brought signals of recognition into his visage. "Ha, my dear Miss Lucy Penfold," said he, with kind solicitude, "'tis a world since I saw you! how is your excellent father?" Miss Lucy satisfied him upon that point.

"Mother?"

"Quite well."

"Yourself?"

"Also quite well."

"Why then, all's well," retorted Garnet, laughing at his own wit. "But pray walk in, the pathway is so narrow, and we have so many accidents from the cabs at this corner. A dreadful accident happened just now. Oh! there are many lives lost by cabs—this was a young man, a fine young man too;—here's his card—"Mr. Henry Augustus Fogg." But what ails you, my dear Miss Penfold? you turn pale—sit down—that's right—hilloa!—what the deuce?—fainted, by the Lord!"

With these words Mr. Garnet leaped over the counter, and sought to restore the young lady by the application of salts. As he hung over her, he could not help thinking that he had never seen her look so charming before. Miss Lucy Penfold was, certainly, a very pretty girl, but Garnet had tender recollections that rendered her additionally interesting. He had once sighed for her, and sighed in vain. A desperate thought crossed the threshold of his brain. He quailed at the idea of welcoming it. "Eh? what? shall I? Mrs. G's not in the back parlour. No one will be the wiser. I'll snatch a kiss."

Just as he was about to perform this felonious feat, Miss Lucy revived, and murmured in a faint voice, but with a trembling emphasis, "Did you say, sir, that the young man was killed?"

"Killed, Miss!" said Garnet, striving to recover a composure, which the surprise of her revival had in some measure disturbed; "killed, Miss!—young gentleman?—ey—Fogg—oh, no—killed—no—bruised his elbow, or some such small matter. No, I said dreadful accidents did sometimes happen; but, you're so susceptible. Miss Penfold, pray be calm;" and he attempted a glance of tender interest at the invalid with one eye, while he sought to include, with the other organ of vision, a prospect of the back parlor.

"And now, Miss Lucy," resumed the indiscreet goldsmith, "that you are a little composed, pray take the protection of my arm to your father's;—nay, I will not be refused."

"Well, since you are so very kind," said the young lady, "and as I'm still very weak, I will defer the business I came about, and accept your offer;" and the pair slowly departed from the shop.

CHAPTER II.

"I'll teach Mr. Garnet to pay attention to ladies in the shop," exclaimed a pretty little woman, as she issued from the back parlor, with a roguish smile upon her small lips. "I do believe the man was going to kiss the young person. Oh, these men!—Well, he shall never hear the last of it. I'll take care of that—but what's this lying upon the ground?"

It was a miniature portrait of a young gentleman in a blue coat, yellow waistcoat, white kerchief, and a somewhat ostentatious frill; his hair neatly curled for the nonce, and his eyes directed sideways, as though he were looking for the frame; in which ornament, however, the picture was deficient.

"Well, I declare," said Mrs. Garnet, sitting down on the shop stool, and leaning her hand on one knee, "a very nice young man, indeed. I wonder who he can be; how different from Mr. Garnet?—Certainly," she resumed, after a pause, looking obliquely at the picture with her head on one side, the more critically to examine it, "certainly G's face is that of a griffin by the side of this—he shall smart for this morning's impudence, the little villain." So saying, and carrying the painting with her, Mrs. Garnet re tired again to the back parlor.

Presently in runs Mr. Garnet, wiping the perspiration from his forehead, and drawing his watch from his fob. "My dear Lucy, are you ready?" said he with forced vivacity, for his conscience smote him, as he popped his head through the opening door of the back parlor, "we shall be too late for the exhibition."

"Not in such a hurry, Mr. Garnet," said his wife, calmly, "we are too late as it is, I'm sure. Pray, sir, come in." Garnet crept forward with the look of a culprit.

"Who was that young lady in the shop this morning, sir?"

"Who—in the shop—this morning?" faltered the goldsmith; "ha! ha! ha! that's a secret, Mrs. G— a little private affair of my own," added he, with a rueful pleasantry, as though, by gaily avowing a secret intrigue, he should ward off suspicion; "a secret, I say, not to be divulged," rubbing his hands, and winking his eye knowingly.

"Then you should keep your secrets better, Mr. Garnet, that's all I know," said the lady; "you think I did'nt see you kiss the girl, I suppose?" Ah! Mr. G., Mr. G."

"God bless my soul, Mrs. Garnet," cried the jeweller, with a cool confidence worthy of a better cause, yet inwardly quaking at this unexpected discovery, "really you make such strange charges; you're such an eccentric woman;" hardly conscious of what he uttered; "you are such a little quiz, you know you are, aren't you now?" and here he attempted to pinch her waist coaxingly, and began to dance about the room to hide his confusion.

"Well, well—it's no matter, Mr. Garnet, it is a happy thing for me that I have a consolation elsewhere," said Mrs. Garnet, pouting, and looking tenderly at the same time, at something which she held in her hand. "What have you got there, my dear," cried Garnet, with renewed nerve and vigor of speech—"a lock of my hair? Come, come, you must not shear off Sampson's hair by stealth, thou fond Delilah."

"It cannot concern you what I have in my hand," returned the wife, kissing the precious treasure fondly.

"Nay, now, I insist upon seeing what it is Mrs. Garnet—resistance is vain—ha! a portrait!"

"Yes, a portrait, sir."

"Really, Madam, this is very indiscreet, not to say culpable," said Garnet, seriously—"I never had a portrait taken. Let me look at it. The portrait of some fellow, I'll be sworn."

"Why, Lord bless me! Mr. Garnet, how you tease," exclaimed the lady with provoking coolness—"as though it could signify to you whose portrait it is. I had other beaux in my time, you may be sure."

"The beaux may go to the devil," cried Garnet, with a look of defiance, exploring the remotest corners of his pockets, and striding about the room in a fury.

"For shame, Mr. Garnet, to mention the devil in my presence," simpered the lady, without lifting her eyes from the portrait at which she was fondly gazing.

"I will see it!" shouted the jealous jeweller, as, like Woodworth's cloud, which "Moves altogether, if it move at all,"

with a simultaneous spring, like a tiger, he obtained possession of the miniature. "Pretty doings, pretty doings, upon my word!" exclaimed he with a hysterical chuckle—"this is excellent, upon my word—ha! ha! ha! upon my life," it's good—not three months married, and—capital!—ruin and misery,—glorious!—despair and madness,"—and the overpowered little man rushed madly into the shop with the portrait.

CHAPTER III.

"I certainly was a great fool," said Mr. Henry Augustus Fogg, a young gentleman of imposing appearance, as he stood musingly at the front of the Royal Exchange, "to quarrel with Lucy as I did, and to fly in the face of old Penfield, by beating him at cribbage;—besides, that trip to Margate was in every respect ruinous; and now I find the door shut in my face, and the servant inaccessible to silver. I'll go down to the little goldsmith who helped me up, after my fall from the cab—he may, perhaps, assist me."

So saying, our soliloquist walked down the street, and soon found himself in Garnet's shop.

That distracted man was seated on a stool behind his counter, upon which both his elbows rested—his head having fallen into his extended hands. He was busily engaged in examining something before him. "I come, sir," said Fogg, with respectful politeness, "to thank you for your kind attention to me. I am the ex-cab passenger of this morning."

"Sir," sighed the goldsmith, slowly raising his head, "the unfortunate are ever entitled to such services as—ah! what?" and he fell to a second scrutiny of the counter, and then, tilting himself back upon his stool, leaned against the edge of a glass case behind him, and pushing his fingers into his waistcoat pockets, gazed with a wo-begone countenance at the stranger.

"May I ask, sir," said the other with surprise, —"what have you been, and are gazing at with, permit me to say, such lack-lustre expression? —a portrait?—by heavens! my portrait. How came you by this? Speak, goldsmith; where did you get it? Confess, jewel-setter, confess."

"Where did I get it?" returned Garnet, in a deeply moral tone, as though it were a prelude to a religious discourse, shaking his head and pointing to the door of the back parlor—"there!—my wife."

"Your wife!" shrieked the other, falling upon the shop stool with all the immobility of the national debt, and, like that incubus, as though he were never to be removed.

"My wife, I say," repeated Garnet, beating his forehead—"Lucy, there, reluctantly gave it to me."

"Lucy!" screamed Fogg, burying his face in his hands—"lost, for ever lost!"

"Lost, forever lost!" echoed the goldsmith, "my good sir, do take your elbows off that glass case; if it should give way, they'd play the deuce with the brooches below: lost! then there's a pair of us—God bless my soul?"

"Please, sir," said a man, as he entered the shop, pulling off his hat, and smoothing two inches of straight hair on his forehead—"you promised to wait on Mrs. Deputy Tomlins at three—it's now half past."——

"By the by, and so I did," cried Garnet, as he bustled from his stool, and drew a small case from a drawer. "I'll be with her instantly. Pray, Mr. Fogg, don't stir till I return—this matter must be investigated," and seizing his hat and throwing up his eyes and hands, he darted from the door.

Mr. Henry Augustus Fogg remained for a considerable period buried in profound grief; —at length, raising his head, he murmured with a vindictive pressure of his teeth together, "ass that I was—idiot—incurable fool—to go to Margate—on pleasure, I think I said to myself—on pleasure, ha! ha! and left my Lucy to be snapt up by a mercenary and morose brooch-seller. But why, why do I reproach myself? Is she not to blame? Is not perverse Penfold culpable? Then welcome revenge! Come hither, immense Roland, for a prodigious Oliver: the thought pleases me; yet how?—But why?" he resumed, deviating into another train of thought, "why do I sit here like a fool?"

"I don't know, I'm sure, sir," answered a boy who had been called to mind the shop during the absence of Garnet, looking up under an enormous brim of a hat, six sizes too large for his small skull.

"Peace, mysterious cub, peace," cried the distracted one, eyeing him with a baleful look—"I am ill, faint, weak, and wo-begone;"—then, sitting bolt upright upon the stool, and elevating his eyes, he turned round as on a pivot, till his face fronted the glass door of the back parlor. "In there, in there, boy," darting his finger before him—"a glass of water might be procured?"

"Pray, sir, walk in," said Mrs. Garnet, who had been eye-piercing through the corner of the cambric blind for a considerable time, and now opening the door—"you seem unwell—pray come in and rest yourself."

"Ten thousand pardons—but I am indeed indisposed;" cried the bereft, as he tottered into the parlor.

"I fear, Madam," said he, when he had swallowed a glass of water, "that I gave you much trouble; but an announcement on the part of your brother has so agitated me."

"My brother, air!" interrupted Mrs. Garnet, calling up from the depths of memory a little boy who had died of the measles twelve years before—"my brother! what do you mean?"

"Your brother, madam, I repeat," answered Fogg impatiently, "just now stepped out to Mrs. Deputy Tomlins—has agitated me so by a communication—he is blessed with the possession of a lovely wife."

"Do you think so!" returned Mrs. Garnet, with a soft smile, which, however, was instantaneously exchanged for a vissage of extraordinary gravity, as she recognised the original of the portrait, and noted the strange manner in which he confounded relationships. The wildness of his eyes, also favored the idea that he was a recently self-emancipated maniac.

"Has he been married long?" said Fogg, with an alarming start, as a torturing reminiscence shot through his brain.

"Oh, no, sir! a very short time, indeed," said the trembling wife, a vision of the incurable department of St. Luke's intruding itself into her mind.

"But why do I ask idiot questions?" he continued, querulously; "my dear madam, you are goodness itself to listen to my ravings; permit me when I am more calm, to call and repeat my acknowledgements of your kindness; then seizing her hand, and kissing it, "farewell," he cried, and opening the door, tumbled over the couchant form of Garnet.

That blighted goldsmith was, indeed, drawn up into a compendious mass of concentrated misery. His hands were tightly clenched upon his stooping knees, his neck sunk between the shoulders with the lax pliability of a turtle's; and the one open eye was endeavoring to peer through the blind, with a ten argus power of vision. "Wretch!" he gasped as the other tumbled over him, but further utterance was denied him—"Wretch! ah! you say true, I am indeed a wretch," said Fogg, rising, with a grim smile, "but you—oh! how much the reverse! too happy in the possession of such a wife;" and he retired shuddering from the shop.

CHAPTER IV.

Garnet thought verily that his lot was too much for man to bear; and, accordingly, applying to a closet just behind him, drew forth a bottle, and directed the neck to his mouth, leaning leisurely back that a sufficient portion of the cordial might find its way to his inner man. While in this constrained posture, he was interrupted by the entrance of somebody into the shop, and turning round, and hastily replacing the cork, the presence of Miss Lucy Penfold greeted him. "Oh! my dear Mr. Garnet, pray tell me," said that young lady, "do you know the gentleman that just left your shop?"

"I do Miss, I do," answered he with unnatural emphasis, setting down the bottle in the closet, "his name is Fogg—a fog that has obscured my sun of happiness for ever; look there, look at that room; it contains my wicked wife."

"Your wicked wife, sir!" said Lucy, confused: "what do you mean? you surely aint so foolish as"— "I have discovered all," he roared. "I have discovered an attachment subsisting between Fogg and my wife!"

"Gracious heavens! Mr. Garnet," cried the young lady, sinking upon the stool, "you do not mean"——

"I mean revenge," said he, clenching his teeth and hands.

"Oh, for mercy's sake, sir, do not talk so; it is I who am the most miserable of human beings;" and she sank back faintingly.

"God bless my soul!" cried Garnet, "why you are going to faint again, I hope; you're subject to fainting fits, I fear;" and he scrambled to the closet, and seized the bottle; but, finding that the young lady was recovering he stealthily placed it to his own lips in a trice, and returned—"What's the matter, Miss Lucy, what is the matter!" he whimpered, wringing his hands, "I have trouble enough of my own, Heaven knows; surely"—and lifting his head, he met the reflection of his own face in a glass opposite. A thought flashed across him: he drew up his shirt collar, "Surely," he continued in a softer tone, "this concern cannot be for me. Oh! might I hope that in that bosom?"

"Oh! no, no, no," cried Miss Penfold, weeping, and pushing him from her.

"Oh! yes, yes, yes," returned he—"say yes, then at least I shall be blest.

"You will, will you, Mr. Garnet," cried a voice with terrific shrillness in one ear, while the other was seized upon and wrung excruciatingly; these are your sly ways, are they? to pretend jealousy of me, in order to cover your own designs. Oh! Mr. Garnet, Mr. Garnet"—and here his partner fell into a passion of tears.

"Something strikes me that I shall go distracted," said Garnet, hopelessly raising his spread palms to his head, and sitting down upon the stool—Oh misery!"

"Misery, indeed," retorted his wife, sobbing with convulsive sighs, "you have made me miserable, you know you have."

"There now!" cried Garnet, appealing to Miss Lucy, as he sprung from the stool, with his extended hands sticking out from his sides like the fins of a fish, "did you ever hear the like?—the woman has lost all sense of shame; didn't I see the man kiss your hand through the blind?—didn't I see it, I say, with this eye," shooting his finger towards the organ in question.

"And didn't I see you this morning, Mr. Garnet—now, confess—through the very same blind"—

"Hush, hush, woman!" interrupted Garnet, solemnly, "you know not what you say, deserted alike by reason and virtue."

"I am sorry, madam," said Lucy, interposing, "that there should be any misunderstanding, but I trust that I am in no measure the cause of it."

Mrs. Garnet made no answer, but retired into the parlor.

"I came, Mr. Garnet," she continued, "about a trifle which I fear I must have lost; nothing was picked up in your shop this morning?—not that it is any longer valuable to me."

"Nothing, nothing, Miss Lucy," answered Garnet, not heeding the question. "Picked up? yes information that has distracted me."

"Good morning, sir; I hope to find you calmer when I see you again;" and the young lady departed.

"Calmer! yes in the stiffness of death, perhaps," murmured Garnet, with a bitter grim.

"Mr. Diaper Garnet," said his wife, coming forward with red eyes, a white handkerchief, and a serene placidity of countenance, "we must part; your unjust suspicions of me, coupled with your own shameful proceedings, render it absolutely necessary that we should part."

"Ha! ha! this is too much, this is too much, upon my soul," chuckled Garnet, with a stifling and in a fearfully guttural tone—"ha! ha! ha! ha! ha! and now reason seemed to be taking an eternal leave of him, but that, as he tossed his head back at the last interjection, it came into contact with the edge of a glass case, with a crash that threatened the cleaving in twain of his scull.

"What need of this violence, Mr. Garnet?" resumed his wife, alarmed at his forlorn aspect; "we can never more agree on this side of the grave; it is better, therefore, that we should separate."

"Oh, hour of wo! that it should come to this," —groaned the goldsmith, physical and mental pain struggling for the mastery. "Go in, Mrs. G. and we'll talk of it presently. You are right, we never can be happy again;" and when his wife was out of sight, he fell into a fit of tears.

CHAPTER V.

In the meantime, Fogg had betaken himself to a shop-house in the neighborhood, and there (for even despair has an appetite) solaced himself with a beefsteak. He, however, found himself, in half an hour, opposite Garnet's shop. "Yes, I will see her for the last time,—I will learn from her own lips the reasons of her cruelty and desertion of me, and then leave this hated country for ever." So determined, he drew himself up before the shop window, and examined with a vacant eye the gold pins and bracelets. Garnet observed him, as he stood at the back of the shop bathing his afflicted head with an embrocation of vinegar. "Oh! I am looked upon as a mere cipher in my own house, that's quite clear,—deuce take the fellow's impudence, he's coming in; well, I'll confirm my suspicions at all events, I will not wrong Mrs. G. rashly," and under the counter dived the goldsmith. Mr. Henry Augustus Fogg now walked in, and tapping at the door of the back parlor, was admitted. "I am come, madam," said Augustus in a melancholy tone, "for a purpose which true lovers must applaud, to take a last farewell of your sister-in-law—lead me to her."

"My sister-in-law!" cried Mrs. Garnet; "oh, sir, do leave me! You have been the innocent cause of much misery in this family. Your unhappy infirmity can alone excuse"——

"Madam," interrupted Fogg, "where is Mr. Garnet's wife—fate shall not hinder our final interview."

"She is here, sir; I am Mr. Garnet's wife."

"Gracious heavens! what mystery is this?—Propitious powers! who then is the young lady I met coming into the shop this morning? Oh, joy unutterable!"

"I know not who she is," said Mrs. Garnet; "but this I know, that in consequence of her, I am the most miserable of women."

"How, madam,?" cried Fogg, "what horrible mystery is this?—explain."

"Must I confess my husband's shame, and my own despair?" cried the lady, in a state of doubtful perturbation.

"Do, madam, by all means, I entreat—let Garnet's disgrace be made manifest, or any thing rather than my suspense should continue."

"There is something wrong, then?"

"Something wrong? Madam, you tremble."

"An unfortunate and guilty attachment between Mr. Garnet and that young person."

"Ha!" bellowed Fogg, seizing a pair of scissors which lay on the table; "where are the unprincipled pair; even this small instrument would suffice,"—and he stalked about the room, opening and closing his weapon with demoniac violence; "but oh! why do I rave? forgive me, best of women! that I have put you to that torture of confessing this degrading fact," and he fell upon one knee before her, "Ha! what noise was that?" rushing to the glass door, the pair were just in time to behold Garnet, as he rose up, strike his head against the counter, over which he scrambled, and rushed from the shop.

"Is Miss Lucy within?" cried Garnet, panting, as the door of Penfold's house was answered, in obedience to his peremptory knocking.

"She is, sir."

"Send her here instantly."

Miss Penfold, who, alarmed at the extraordinary noise, was loitering on the stairs, approached. "Put on your bonnet and shawl, and come with me," said Garnet.

"Really, Mr. Garnet, after this morning's"

"Pho, pho, nonsense," said he, "you're wanted. I say;" then lowering his voice to a whisper, and putting his forefinger on the side of his nose—"they're there."

"Who are there, sir? I do not understand you."

"My wife and"—and he swelled up his cheek as though he would fain enact Boreas, "and Fogg! come, come." Miss Penfold made no further objection, but suffered herself to be hurried by the excited goldsmith to the scene.

"Ha! ha! have we caught you?" cried Garnet, with a triumphant shout, as he dragged Lucy after him. "Miss Lucy Penfold, look there I beg of you; here's a caution to wives and families."

"Unheard of audacity!" said Mrs. Garnet, "to bring her into the very room with us! look; sir, do you see? Do you mark the very shamelessness of the guilty parties?" Fogg did indeed look and see, but he seemed to be curiously examining vacancy.

"Come, come, this won't do, Mrs. Garnet," said her husband, "it is discovered."

"It is, indeed," retorted Mrs. Garnet; "and now, sir, I look to this gentleman for redress and protection;" turning to Fogg.

"From me! madam," said Fogg upon his knee, "expect that love which ungrateful Garnet has transferred to another.

"Say you so?" quoth Garnet, in like manner going upon his knee, and addressing Lucy,

"Deign, Miss, to receive assurances of my affection; and if this portrait will avail to impress"——

"My portrait again, by heaven!" cried Fogg.

"Which I lost this morning," said Lucy.

"Which I found"—said Mrs. Garnet.

"Lost and found! what is the meaning of this?" exclaimed Garnet. "Ha! I see it all," exclaimed Garnet. "Ha! I see it all," springing into his wife's arms. My dearest Mrs. G. but how is this? explain Fogg, explain. Do you know Miss Lucy Penfold?" Lucy blushed.

"I do indeed," answered Fogg.

"Oh, your most obedient! I see how it is;" and the joyous goldsmith danced about the room—"let's be merry"—and he drew out the decanter and glasses; "you shall stay with us, and we'll all go together this evening to old Penfold."

"Well, there never was such an extraordinary mistake, was there?"

"Never!" answered all, in simultaneous concert with the goldsmith.

DEATH OF LA FAYETTE.

A thousand hearts have mourn'd his doom,
A thousand bells have toll'd,
A requiem o'er the hero's tomb—
The hero brave and old.

With all the mighty dead,
With Washington and Greene
On glory's lap he rests his head—
Honor'd as he hath been.

Toll for the patriot brave
The bell of liberty,
And garlands weave for the warrior's grave—
Sons of the brave and free.

Can freedom's sons forget,
What glorious deeds were done,
By the generous hero La Fayette,
In the land of Washington?

In the morning of his life
He left a brilliant Court,
For the battle field of savage strife—
For the forest and the fort.

His purse was freely given
In the cause of liberty,
And his glorious spirit is now in Heaven
With the brave Montgomery.

A thousand halls are hung
In mourning on our shore,
And a thousand harps our bards have strung
To sing his brave deeds o'er.

No marble monument
Need deck the good man's grave,
For Freedom's sons with France have bent
In sorrow o'er the brave.

In the hearts of millions he
A monument hath won,
And his name forever blest shall be
With that of Washington.—MILFORD BARD.

BEAUTY: HOW EVANESCENT.

The downy cheek so red and fair,
The bosom's snowy whiteness;
The coral lip so red and rare,
The eye with sparkling brightness:
Are beauties like the summer leaf,
With length of years decay—
Which envious time, that jealous thief,
Will surely steal away.

But when with sense and grace we find
Charms that surpass all beauty;
A virtuous heart, a feeling mind,
Our love becomes a duty;
How foolish those, who idly range,
To all but beauty blind;
For time, nor place, can never change
Those beauties of the mind. S. A. A.

HOPE.

BY LYMAN WALBRIDGE TRASK.

Hope, according to Dr. Webster, is a desire of something good, accompanied at least, with a slight expectation of obtaining it; or a belief that it is attainable. Hope, differs from wish or desire, in this, that it always implies some expectation of obtaining the good desired, or the possibility of possessing it. Hope, therefore always gives pleasure or joy, whereas wish or desire may produce or be accompanied with pain or anxiety.

The present is full of sorrows and vicissitudes—the past is a book bearing record of almost unparalleled turpitude and crime; of distress and anguish,—of uncertainty, misfortune, and disappointment. When we turn over the pages of the past, we are convinced beyond a doubt, of the uncertainty of human affairs, and are constrained almost to cower beneath the withering influence and cold unmerciful grasp of despair! Do you read of a nation, in the highest bloom of prosperity—peruse the page a little farther, and some error, crime, mismanagement, or fatality, will reduce it to a depopulated desert—a field for tygers or hyenas—or savage barbarians! Did men co-operate for the amelioration of their condition of their race,—conscious of the noblest generosity and philanthrophy,—still, they died the death of Socrates or Stephen—fell beneath the poisoned arrows of persecution, and their systems crumbled into atoms. Did a man engage in an honourable pursuit—and persevere with devotion,—still some sinister circumstance prostrated him in the dust. A bounding ship spurning the billows that dashed by her side, sailed with streaming banners from her port—but she returned no more—the hurricane made her its sport, and the foaming waves engulphed her forever! An individual, or individuals, engaged in the most laudable enterprise, of increasing the stock of human knowledge and happiness by discovery in travels or voyages, and perished on polar icy mountains—desert islands, or among tropical savage barbarians. MERCIFUL HEAVENS! it seems that this world is the grave of every thing high,—noble,—generous—and philanthropic!—It seems that the past is only a history of prosperity in mourning,—of honesty in rags,—of virtue in sackcloth,—of friendship violated,—of love unrequited—of confidence betrayed,—of prospects blasted,—of enterprises defeated,—and of the highest and most generous feelings of the human mind in ruins, by the blighting influence of uncertainty and disappointment! But there must be some animating influence to keep us from despair, and is not that the contemplation of the future? The past and the present are dark gloomy and fearful—but the future must be delightful, or we should absolutely sink to the lowest depths of despair. No, it is not. If the past is full of gloom, and the present full of misery—the future carries in its bosom, a thousand unrevealed—latent sorrows. How many a heart is doomed to be broken, and many a spirit of energetic power to quail, beneath the long catalogue of miseries stored away in the dark, impenetrable and mysterious future! In view of the miseries of the past—who can contemplate the future with pleasure? Perhaps, we have escaped the miseries of years that have rolled by us, but who will give us indemnification for those years that are to come? No one can do it.—Perhaps, we are now treading on the grassy turf beneath which an earthquake slumbers, which will break forth and involve us in destruction. Perhaps, our honourable exertions may not be prospered; perhaps our present happy condition as a nation, or as individuals, may not exist one day longer. Perhaps our social family circles may be invaded by the hand of death, and the cheering voices of surpassing melody be hushed in the cold damp grave. The experience of the past reveals to us with considerable certainty—that our highest pleasures may be blighted—that our present independence and comfort, may soon end in dependence and misery. And that our present unhappy condition (if we are so circumstanced) may continue. It is clear, then, that the miseries—perplexities—and uncertainties incident to our existence in this world, would merge us in despair—would paralize all our exertion, and render us nothing more than passive statues—without any incentive to action,—if it were not for the existence of some powerful principle to counteract the influence of the evil and unhappy circumstances which surround us. That animating principle is hope. It smiles at despair,—warms and invigorates us,—like an angel of benevolence, it comforts the afflicted,—dries the briny water of sorrow from the eye,—chases the wan, ghostly picture of despair from the cheek,—smooths the agony of disease and death,—cheers the wanderer,—animates and beautifies the green bowers of home,—makes icy mountains or burning deserts in some degree to be borne,—gives pleasure in youth—support in manhood—and consolation in old age. Like the angel of Spring, it beautifies—and embellishes. Nature, and every glen, mountain, valley and stream, awakens more exquisite pleasure—and gives rise to innumerable associations—from that inspiring, pleasing, enchanting angel of our happiness—that delightful principle of Hope! Its benefits are incalculable;—it exerts its influence upon every mind—extends to every scene and department in life, the high and the low, the rich and the poor participate in its benefits. From the first dawnings of intellect to its final extinction by death, the human mind feels the animating principle of Hope. As the sun's influence, frees the earth from the icy fetters that bind it—warms its bosom—and brings forth plants, flowers, leaves and verdure, so the influence of Hope upon the human mind—frees it from the icy fetters of despair—causes a thousand flowery anticipations of pleasure, profit or enjoyment to spring up and become the incentives to action. What inducement would man have to act at all, if it were not for the promptings of Hope? Surely he would have none. What man or number of men, in their senses, would boldly step forward, as did our forefathers, and risk their reputation, property and lives, to fight a powerful foe, and establish a new government—if they knew their purposes would be defeated—and their lives sacrificed, as the records of the past would have taught them to expect, by a great number of instances of defeat and disgrace? But their ignorance of the future clothed their undertaking with uncertainty—it was not absolutely certain they would succeed, nor certain that they would be defeated. Here Hope whispered to them to persevere—"You will succeed," she said,—"you will form a new government, unequalled in the annals of time for its advantages;—solid as the rock of Gibraltar, and enduring as the everlasting hills.—Although the Republics of Greece and Rome fell, yours will be eternal! Some attempts, indeed, of this kind have failed, but that relates to the past—not to the future. You have better destines in store; persevere, in after ages your names will descend to posterity as the benefactors of your race, and in stead of dying an ignominious death—you will live respected and die regretted. They did persevere, and triumphed, and did not the inspiring principle of Hope bear them through the hardships of that tremendous struggle? The Hope of enjoying their liberties—of protecting their defenceless wives and children, and of triumphing over the foe!

Inspiring Hope still led them on,
Their glorious land to save;
And awful power to the Hero's arm,
That conquering power gave.

The principle of Hope, inspires the husbandman in his toils. Although the forest must be prostrated and burnt up, which requires immense labour; yet Hope smilingly whispers that he will be rewarded with an abundant harvest, she pictures the rich comfortable home—the extended fields—filled with flocks and herds—the beautiful garden full of luxuries and perfumes—the generous woodbine and beautiful morning glory, entwining around the summer house; where he, and the partner of his bosom, could sit down with their friends and be happy! These powerful inducements cause the death of many a sturdy forest tree, and if he dies before his object is accomplished, the pleasures of Hope will have abundantly repaid him for his labours. The mariner embarks on the uncertain ocean, on a voyage of discovery, on a commercial enterprise, or to carry passengers to a destined port. Hope whispers, the voyage will be prosperous, that the ship will again re-visit the port in her pride, how enthusiastically will the signal gun be hailed on its return! The ship proceeds on her voyage—a tempest rises, and threatens to plunge the ship beneath the waves. Does Hope forsake the mariner? No: he thinks the storm will cease, and the voyage yet be prosperous. The storm is calmed, and tranquility returns to the ocean. Soon a second tempest rises, more furious than the first—the ship seems completely at the mercy of the waves! Does Hope forsake the mariner now? No: he cries make increased exertion, we may hope to save the ship. "Home, sweet home," occurs to his mind,—there is the little white gate—the beautiful gravel walk—his aged father and mother seem coming out to meet him—there is his little sister, with flowing hair and sylph-like form—in whose eye a tear started when he left her—now, her face is brilliant with smiles. But, alas! a sudden plunge of the ship awakens him from his revery—it is his last moment—the ship sinks beneath the waves forever! Another vessel sails from the same port—the mariners having a knowledge of the foregoing circumstances, would be discouraged, did not Hope whisper that their voyage would be more prosperous, that, although the former vessel was overwhelmed in the ocean, theirs would ride the waves in safety—and return in triumph. The latter vessel sailed—was prosperous—and did return. The sustaining pleasures of hope were enjoyed in as great a degree by the former ship, as by the latter. The traveller may pass through solitudes, or traverse mountains infested with banditti or wild beasts—yet Hope sustains him there. She whispers that the robber is hid in his far off place of concealment—and the savage beast reposing in his mountain den.—He may pass in safety, or he may not—yet Hope nobly sustains and animates him in either case. Or he may travel in barbarous countries, as Mungo Park, and the Clapperton's have in Africa. The noble design and Hope of increasing the sum of human knowledge prompt him to risk the danger and the toil—and the pleasures of Hope sustain his mind in all the vicissitudes through which he may pass. Hope, says, or seems to say, that he will discover the mouth of some mysterious Niger, or the source of some majestic Nile, or make splendid discoveries in the interior of some uncivilized country, isolated from the rest of the world by its barbarism. Some savage chief may lead him into captivity, he may be doomed to be a slave among barbarians—to drink the cup of human misery to the bottom. But Hope will sustain him—will smooth his sorrows—will present distant prospects of release—some certain and final means of return to his native land; and even when nature sinks under accumulated miseries—the pleasures of Hope will brighten his eye, and soften the pangs of death, when he thinks for the last time on the endearments of home!

"Alas! nor wife nor children more shall he behold, Nor friends nor sacred home."

Unfortunate beings, shipwrecked on inhospitable shores—carried captive on burning deserts, receive supporting consolation from the pleasures of Hope, amid their sufferings. Hope pictures, murmuring rivulets, when thirst oppresses—abundance of provisions when hunger gnaws, and sure deliverance from the dominion of their savage masters. Deprived of food, of clothing and of drink—doomed to melt beneath a burning sun, like Riley and Robbins,—and reduced to skeletons—yet Hope made that even to be borne. And when they seemed more like mummies, rescued from the long silence and gloom of a catacomb and covered with the hieroglyphic marks of savage cruelty,—than human beings—they entertained unshaken faith that they should see their native land again! The writhing victim of disease, receives his most powerful consolation from the pleasures of Hope—when pain forces his body into contortions and spasms—and almost insufferable agony, would seem to be sufficient to drive him to destruction—yet Hope whispers that the violence of disease and pain will soon be over—that a speedy recovery will ensue—and this unshaken confidence in future good fortune—this beneficial pleasure of Hope, is perhaps one powerful means of recovery.—The victim of consumption—whose pale emaciated form—sunken eye—and hectic cheek—denote immediate dissolution—yet feels the powerful sustaining pleasures of Hope—it paints future years of pleasure—strengthens the mysterious chain that binds to life—awakens new associations;—and perhaps when the person is engaged in a pleasing revery of future prospects, the destroyer steals along and calls away one of the most happy beings in existence. Hope even cheers the maniac; in those wild creations of his distorted fancy, he builds and dedicates a temple to Hope. And the inspiring being that presides in that temple administers more comfort and joy to his ruined and wrecked mind, than all the world besides. There is no form of the thousand ills that "flesh is heir to," where the pleasures of Hope are not equal to the "good Samaritan,"—pouring wine and oil into the wounds and ailments that mankind is subject to—to heal, comfort and restore. We cannot estimate the benefit of the pleasures of Hope, to those labouring under disease. But the most triumphant view of Hope, is that of the Christian—his well-grounded Hope of future good is more pleasureable than any earthly Hope can be—it raises him above all earthly misfortunes and dangers. In view of the future good which he has in anticipation—all temporal vicissitudes dwindle into insignificance—the keenest pain can be borne without a groan—death can be encountered without fear—and this fickle, uncertain world can be resigned without regret. Hope spreads her most enchanting touch upon his future destiny—it is all happiness—all flowers—all consolation. What signify a few trials and uncertainties in this world—if we can have confidence that our existence in another, will be one unbroken series of unspeakable joys! The pleasures of Hope enjoyed by the Christian, elevate him above temporal and fading objects—and direct him to unfading and eternal treasures and enjoyments—in that realm of everlasting glory—where trouble, pain and anxiety, can never come! Triumphant Hope! thou sustainest us from the pressure of this world's misfortunes—paintest the future in happiness and flowers, and banishest that utter hopelessness, into which the disagreeable, unfortunate and insufferable tribulations, with which we are surrounded, would inevitably plunge us, where it not for thy sustaining, cheering, balmy influence. Thou art our anchor in the voyage of life—in difficulties our guide—in sorrows, our consolation. Without thine aid, man would be as a sensless statue—without mind or purpose to perform those sublime destinies for which he was created.

Eternal Hope! thy realm is unfading—thou art strong even in the maniac—thou art present in high and low condition—thou art a balm for every wo—thou leadest us to the *Himlayan summit of Time—spreadest Eternity before us like one grand Panorama—and shewest us joys at GOD'S RIGHT HAND, that shall never pall nor fade while Eternity endures! Oh! when marble shall moulder—when arts shall crumble—and worlds in flaming fire decay, thou shalt light thy torch with the last blazing fragment of expiring nature, and live eternal in the SKIES!

THE BROTHERS.

BY MRS. JANE E. LOCKE.

"At the siege of Bommel, in 1599, two brothers, Spaniards, who having been separated in early life and had never seen each other since that time, suddenly met on the field of battle. Having recognised each other, they ran and fell on each other's necks, and while in that close embrace, their heads were at once carried off by a cannon shot, their bodies falling to the ground together."

Death, death, how couldst thou there,
'Mid those crested ones find place;
Mingling with ought so fair,
As love's full fond embrace!
Thy task, with weary ones should be,
To hush th' abodes of misery.

Their dreams were not of thee—
On the battle field they met,
The stern heart, and the free,
With shield and banner set,
With quivering steel, and glittering spear,
And blood red plumes high waving there.

No, not of thee, they dreamed;
Those brothers, Spain's early lost;
Where hall and banquet gleamed,
Far from the servied host,
Their hearts were fixed—the magic word,
Freedom alone their bosoms stirred.

But now upon their path,
A thrill, and a yearning came;
Spirit in spirit, hath
Kindled a glowing flame,
Quenched with the light of childhood's dream,
A spell broke with their cradle dream.

The shield and helmet fell,
From those mail-clad men of might;
Their plated bosoms swell,
And shrink from battle fight!
Spain, Spain, thy sons of lofty brow,
Are feebler than thine infants now.

The lance aside was thrown,
As their childhood's dream came back;
With voice of tender tone,
On memory's startled track—
Their vintage sports, the olive shade,
And mingled prayer, as nightly said.

They rushed, those warriors there,
And met in long embrace—
Death, death, with ought so fair,
How couldst thou find a place!—
Kindly ye slumber, men of Spain,
In love's fond clasp—ye noble slain!

From the New York Mirror.

The following is translated from the "Bibliotheque choisie de Litterature Francaise." The original is written in a style of piquancy and sprightliness usual with the French journalista. It exhibits the effect of a sense of disgrace on a delicate and sensitive mind, educated under the principles of that nice notion of honour which considers a blow as an irreparable offence, and not to be atoned for but by blood. The story is told with much cleverness; and the circumstance of making the high opinion of the honour and character of the young man entertained by his mistress, the very cause of his utter despair and final suicide, is well conceived. But the most striking part of the moral, if it may be so called, is the reckless selfishness of the journalist, who, to further his own views, in establishing for himself a character for courage, engages his friend in a scandalous imposition, and is even upon the whole pleased and satisfied that that friend had committed suicide, as he might otherwise have betrayed the imposition which had been practised. How much it is like some editors, who, provided they can make up a smart paragraph in their paper, are little solicitous about its truth, or what wound they may inflict upon the feelings of others.

A COWARD.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS—CHAPTER ONE.

Two ladies, seated at a table in a saloon of the Rue Larochefoucauld, were surrounded by a number of gentlemen, and engaged in animated conversation. One of the ladies was named Madame de Nerville, the other, her daughter, was named Marie. Marie was naturally pale; she had light hair; large, swimming blue eyes, shaded by long, dark lashes, and full, strongly-marked eyelids, indicated one of those elevated, thoughtful souls, which burn and glow in secret. Just then her usual paleness had left her, her eyes dialated and sparkled, and her voice was deep and broken, as though she was much moved.

"How, M. Lascour," said she, "did the man receive a blow?"

"Yes, miss, some time ago, at the Pavillion d'Ermenonville."

"And did not return it?"

"He did not."

"And has not demanded satisfaction of the aggressor?"

"He would be more likely to beg his pardon!"

"And what is the wretch's name, so that, in case I ever meet him, I may show him plainly that I despise him?"

"His name!—it will be difficult to ascertain it; for probably no one witnessed the circumstance but the friend who mentioned it to me, and you would do wrong in despising him—he may be a very fine man."

"What! he, the coward!"

"Coward! coward! that is your great argument. Is it the man's fault? Courage is a matter of nerve; we cannot command resolution any more than we can appetite. Thus Captain Derriere, with whom you are well acquainted, mentioned to me, the other day, the case of a young man who, having been grossly insulted, on the ground, fainted away three times, when he came to lay hand on his sword. Would you despise this man? Can we control our swooning? He is perhaps of very delicate sentiment, and very pure in soul, only his organs are weak; find fault with his limbs, therefore, not with his feelings.

"Very well," replied Marie, "I say, for my part, that were there is no courage, there is no honour. Let a man be an assassin, a deserter, nay, even a traitor, love can pardon it all; an assassination is but a crime, treason perhaps no more than hatred, and hated and crime may both proceed from a great soul. But a coward! oh, the very name sickens me—and were the man you saw insulted there at my feet, beautiful as an angel, noble as a king, with a revenue of a million, I would not marry him were I but the servant-maid of an inn."

As she was saying this, a young man who was leaning on a console at the other end of the room, and had taken no part in the discussion, let an album fall. Marie turned at the noise, and her eyes assumed an indescribably sweet and tender expression, as she rose and approached the young man.

"Savigny, my friend," said she, in a whisper, "come along—why do you remain alone in this distant corner? Do you not approve of what I have said?"

At these words, uttered with captivating grace and submission, Marie's betrothed turned toward her, disclosing mild and noble, but somewhat disturbed features.

"Excuse me, Marie," said he, "I was looking at the sketch of Roqueplan in your album, and did not hear you."

"Ah! I am sorry for it," said she, "you are so pure and noble-minded, you would have been pleased with the sentiments I expressed."

"Marie," said Savigny, in an agitated voice, and showing her the album, "pray look at this head of an old woman—how expressive! how true to nature! It reminds me of my poor grandmother, who loved me so much."

"Ah! my friend," said Marie, "I see a tear standing in your eye—hide it, pray, or I must weep too. My Savigny, how tender hearted you are!"

Meanwhile the discussion was going on at the table at which Madame de Nerville was seated.

"No," said Lascour, "I don't set much value on courage, and yet if I have a son who is like myself, I will tell him, 'Never submit to an insult.'"

"Well, for my part," said Madame de Nerville, "if I had the good fortune to have a son, and he had received what you call an insult, I would beseech him on my knees not to fight.—What difference does it make to me whether my son is a coward or not? What I want is to have him live. I am no Spartan. I will not tell my son, 'Return with your shield, or upon it.' I would say to him, 'Do not go at all.'"

"Neither would I fight Madame," said Lascour, "if I were your son; for if I were your son, I would have twenty thousand a year—if I were your son, I should need no one's good offices—if I were your son, I would have horses, a good table, a thousand pleasures, and I would not be fool enough to risk my happy life against that of a wretch who has nothing else to lose."

"But, sir," rejoined Marie, quickly, "suppose that wretch should offer you an insult?"

"I would understand it as a compliment."

"And if he gave you a blow?"

"I would walk off to avoid a second."

"But the dishonor!"

"Which?"

"You love yourself very much then?

"Very much, miss. Besides, why do people fight except from self-love? Bullies fight because they value their reputation—I would not fight because I value my bones. Self-love against self-love—mine is the most reasonable of the two. For after all, where is this honour lodged? You say, his honor has received a fatal blow—yet people live a hundred years after such a mortal wound. But a blow with a cudgel—oh! that I should feel very deeply, and that's the reason why I am not anxious to get a shot with a pistol, inasmuch as that is still more painful."

"But, sir, what would your conscience say?

"My conscience? it would be dumb if I were rich!"

"And then men who would insult, the women who would despise you!"

"But, miss, nobody is despised now-a-days You are a coward—who knows the fact?—two individuals out of a hundred, or ten in a thousand. And do you think that it would prevent those ten individuals from drinking my champagne, accepting my money, and calling me 'my dear friend?' They would abuse me in private, but what is that to me? I would know nothing of it, and even if I should, I repeat, what is that to me? I would rise—I would go and look in the glass—and when I found my complexion clear, my eye bright, my lip ruddy—when I felt in my writing-desk and found some bank notes in it—when I looked around me, and saw splendid hangings and elegant furniture, I would say to myself, 'Upon my word, I did very wisely in retaining all this.' I would soon forget all they could say of me. I would mount my bay, and take my Greek greyhound with me; when I reached the park, all the pretty women I knew would stretch their necks out of their carriages to salute me, and I would be happy, be envied and honoured. And yet, spite of all I have said, if I, Alfred Lascour, was insulted tomorrow, I would fight in a moment."

"How so, sir?"

"Oh, because with me, Lascour, the case is very different! I must be a man of honour; I need it for my support. I am the ostensible editor of a newspaper;-I must be brave. Only consider that I am employed to be courageous for all my anonymous coadjutors; I am the shield of their wit, or folly, as the case may be; courage, with me, means champagne, trifles, and a pheasant a la royale, and I am very fond of pheasants and champagne, therefore I must needs be very courageous. But could I find money any where else than in my pen, I would be willing to be a coward, and to let the whole world know I was one; I would have the word coward engraved on my cards as my title, and I would not be the less liked; and I would wear mustaches, and I would find people who would tell me it was a great pity I was not in the army; and I would make a gallery of the miniatures that the ladies would send me."

"No, sir," answered Marie; "no woman of honour would love such a man. A lover is a protector, as well as a husband. What, suppose I loved a man, took his arm, and went out with him, and he was to let the first puppy that chose insult me, and I must reflect that the man who pretended to love me would yield me up to the first threat made him! If I fall in the water, he will let me drown; if I am in a fire, he will let me burn up; if I fall in the hands of villains, he will let me be dishonoured. A coward, sir, is a man who knows neither love, pity, nor friendship; a coward can never be a husband, a son, or father, for he could not protect his wife, his mother, or his daughter. And can a woman love such a man?—oh, never, never!"

"It is singular," said Madame de Nerville, "Savigny has gone, without saying a word to us."

CHAPTER TWO.

The next day, Savigny was seated at home, in a sad and melancholy mood, when he heard a voice, which he recognised at once, ask the servant if he was within; and in a few moments the door opened, and Lascour was announced. Lascour entered with an ease, which bordered on familiarity; and after Savigny had, with ceremonious politeness, requested him to be seated, began as follows:

"Sir I have had the honour of meeting you at Madame de Nerville's, and I now come to do you a service."

"What, pray?"

"Sir, you are a coward."

"Sir, you shall make me atonement for this insult, and I will prove to you—"

"Don't get vexed, I entreat you; for you are not angry—only afraid, that's all. But I did not come to insult you; therefore, spare yourself a display of courage, which does not deceive me. I resume then, and tell you, you are a coward."

"Sir!"

"Allow me to finish—"

"No, sir, nor will I suffer—"

"What a man! when I tell you that I did not come—"

"Such an insult, in my own house!"

"Listen to me, do. I am as great a poltroon as you—a greater one—a thousand times greater. Be cool, and let us talk over our business quietly, and like men of sense. I will not repeat that you are a coward, since that word wounds your feelings, but will tell you that you are not a brave man. Neither am I, as I have already given you to understand—and that is what brings me here. You don't understand, I suppose?"

"Not in the least sir."

"I presume so; but have patience a moment. Do you recollect that, a few days since, you were breakfasting at the Pavillion d'Ermenonville, in the Bois de Bologne, and that a man with mustaches—"

At these words, Savigny turned pale, and said in a hoarse voice, covering his face with his hands, "Pray, pray, spare me!"

"Be not alarmed, sir," replied Lascour, with his usual sang-froid, "I will not recall to your mind the degrading insult you have received, for I have come as a friend: all that I want you to understand is, that I saw you insulted, and saw you pocket the insult. You cannot conceive the object of my visit yet, I conclude?"

"No, sir."

"I will proceed. You were speaking with Madame de Nerville about marrying her daughter. The young lady is beautiful, has a dowry of half a million, and every thing is nearly arranged. But yesterday, after you went away, I told the family that you were the person insulted in the Pavillion d'Ermenonville; and the young lady declared openly, that she would never marry a dishonoured man. The opportunity is a fine one, the fortune large, and it would be hard to lose it; it is therefore absolutely necessary, for you to have a brilliant affair of honour, which may retrieve your reputation, but without exposing you to danger—you understand—without exposing you to any danger—and I now arrive at the object of my visit."

Here Lascour paused for a moment. Monsieur Savigny listened, immovable, with his eyes nailed on the ground, as though choaked with emotion, except that now and then a big tear rolled down his cheek. And Lascour, balancing himself carelessly on his chair, watched his unfortunate patient with an ironical smile. He resumed:

"I too, need an act of courage, which will make a noise, and for this reason:—I am an editor, as you know. To live by that business, we must be piquant: to be piquant, we must sink the truth, in a measure; we must use personalities and scandal; but I am afraid of those who will take offence at this. I want a brilliant duel as a shield, sheltered behind which, I can attack all my dimi-courageous acquaintance, who, if I had never fought, would come to demand satisfaction from me; and when they know I have been out once, will pretend not to have seen the offensive article. When I saw you receive that insult at the Pavillon d'Ermenonville, it occurred to me, at first to follow you every where, to seize the first opportunity to insult you publicly, and to build up a reputation for courage on your cowardice. But, I know not why, I esteem you, spite of that insult. I watched your conduct in that unfortunate dispute, and you are a man of honour: you were angry at yourself; you did all that you could to fight, and it was your nature only that refused. I am sure that you have wept many a night when you thought on that outrage! therefore, I at once gave up my plan of insulting you, and have discovered a means which reconciles every thing, which retrieves your reputation, establishes mine, brings about your marriage, and assures my position in society; it is this:"

Monsieur Savigny, who had not spoken for a quarter of an hour, and sat like a criminal, before the inquisition, rallied his trembling limbs, and by a painful effort raised his head abruptly, approached Lascour, and said—

"Sir, I understand and despise you; leave the house!"

Lascour smiled, and answered, in no way disconcerted, "If it was not for my interest, as well as for yours to remain, I would not stay a minute longer, but I have need of you, as well as you of me, and I will do you a service in spite of yourself."

"Sir, said Savigny, with dignity, yet embarrassed, you have heard."

"Listen to me," answered Lascour, "I ask your pardon for mentioning Madame de Nerville's fortunes to you just now, I know that you are above all interested views, but this is what binds you to me; you are in love, passionately in love with Mademoiselle de Nerville—have you courage enough to resign her voluntarily?"

"Yes, it is better to resign her, than win her by a trick."

"But reflect that you not only lose her, but remain dishonoured, in her eyes; that she will always see the mark of insult on your cheek, and will never meet you without saying to herself, 'there is a man who has received a blow!'"

"Oh, 'tis the torture of hell!" said Savigny, and the sweat poured off his forehead.

"Say but a word, and that torture is at an end."

"But after all," said the young man in despair, "what do you intend to do?"

"Listen. Go to the opera this evening, place yourself in the front seat in the balcony, on the left; I will come a quarter of an hour after you; in the middle of the piece, I enter, you approach me, asking me by what right I presume to slander you; I answer you rudely, you call me an impertinent scoundrel; I grow angry, you lay hands on me, the spectators rise and surround us, and when a good many people are collected, I call you by name, that all may know it is you, and we make an appointment for the next morning."

"Never, never!" said poor Savigny, panting for breath.

"You do not love Mademoiselle de Nerville, then?"

"Not love her! heavens! not love her!" said he, striking his forehead.

"Well, let me go on then. The next day, that is to-morrow, we go on the ground."

"I tell you I will not go," answered Savigny, with fury, "no, I will not go! Do you know that what you propose, would be the eternal torment of my life! What! obtain the greatest blessing of the world; the esteem of my fellow-men, by fraud! Owe the respect I enjoy only to a stratagem, my friends to a trick! to reflect, in the midst of love's purest endearments, that I am stealing them—to see myself looked up to as a man of honour, and to feel that I am the most vile and degraded of created beings. No, sir, no! since I am a coward, I will pass for one, but I will not steal a character for courage; I will not go."

"Very well," said Lascour, coolly, "very well; I'll go and tell Mademoiselle de Nerville."

"For mercy's sake, do not name that name," cried Savigny. "What shall I do—what agony—ah, you are my evil genius, Lascour. Marie—dishonour—the world—my conscience—my head is wandering—oh heavens! If I have thirty years more to live, take away five-and-twenty, and give me courage!"

"I offer it to you without expense; why do you not except it?"

"Shall I have been the less insulted?"

"I alone saw the insult offered you, I alone make it known; you attack me as having slandered you, and all is blotted out. Listen to me, and let me finish. We go on the ground to-morrow morning; we place ourselves at twenty paces—no, at fifteen, it is more in form. The pistols are loaded; we fire, at the same time, six inches too high, you understand me? six inches too high. After the first fire, the seconds will declare, that the laws of honour are satisfied. But you, for I yield up all the glory to you—you declare that the atonement is not sufficient, otherwise it would look like a duel between two deputies. They load—we fire, without touching either; they load a third time—we miss again; then the seconds interpose forcibly; you yield, at the same time declaring, that if you were in my place, you would not be satisfied. However, we are reconciled, we shake hands, I am a brave man, you are a hero, your reputation is re-established, you marry Mademoiselle de Nerville, and I announce it in my paper. What do you say to my plan?"

Savigny did not answer; his hand twisted convulsively in his hair, he seemed devoured by one of those internal conflicts, which exhaust ten years of our life in an hour; his knees shook, and his contracted lips showed his teeth firmly set. He remained in this situation before Lascour, five minutes, who alarmed himself at the sight of this silent, motionless agony, forgot his selfishness, was silent, and almost turned pale. All at once Savigny removed his hand, rose, and said to Lascour, in a hoarse voice, "this evening, at the opera!" and fled into his chamber.

CHAPTER THREE.

At eleven next morning, the following scene was enacted in the Carrières Montmartre, behind a wall; an open pistol-case lay on the ground, and two men, fifteen paces apart, had their weapons still in their hands. Then one of the seconds, stepping between them, said with a resolute air, "Gentlemen, six shots have been fired; it is enough for your honour, and too much, perhaps, for our conscience; the duel must cease, or I leave the ground." M. Lascour approached Savigny, and requested him to give him his hand.

"I have no right to refuse you, sir," said Savigny, and gave it to him.

"Now, gentlemen," said Lascour, addressing the seconds, "before we part, I will ask you to sign a declaration that M. Savigny and myself have acted like men of honour."

The seconds sat down on a grassy bank, and wrote hastily, in pencil:

"A meeting took place at Montmartre, this morning, between M. Savigny and M. Lascour, principal editor of the ——. Three shots were exchanged on each side, and we declare on our honour, that the two combatants proved themselves men of courage.

[Signed]

"Delaunay, Dercourt, Lenoir, Morval."

This document being finished, M. de Launay, one of Lascour's seconds, drew near Savigny, and said—

"Sir, I earnestly desire that our acquaintance, began under such unpleasant circumstances, will not end here; your honourable and spirited behaviour to-day, ensures you my friendship for ever. If you will vouchsafe me your's in return, I shall be proud of it, as that of one of the most honourable men of my acquaintance."

Savigny, bowed.

"Allow me, gentlemen," said Lascour, approaching, and taking Savigny one side, "allow me to say a single word to one who was, a moment since, my antagonist, and who I trust is now my friend. "Well! what is the matter with you?—you seem quite anxious, and yet our plan has succeeded beyond my hopes. Do you know that I was afraid for a moment, at your first fire. If you had taken aim and shot me!"

Savigny, made an indignant gesture.

"It would have been an original idea, at all events, my dear fellow. Luckily, every thing went off as well as could be. Here is our second's declaration; I will take it to all the papers; it will be printed this evening, known by all parties to-morrow, at the end of a week, we shall have two hundred friends more, and in a month's time, we shall not be able to accept half the invitations, that will pour in upon us at the Rocher de Cancale. Meantime, let us go to breakfast. What say you, gentlemen?—suppose we adjourn to the Pavillon d'Ermenon—" but seeing Savigny turn pale at the name, he added, hastily, "no, I am wrong, to Gillet's."

"Gentlemen, excuse me for not joining you," said Savigny, "I feel somewhat unwell." And he got in his cabriolet alone, and drove off rapidly.

"What a strange fellow! how cool!" cried Delaunay, as he went away. "Do you know my dear Lascour, you have had a lucky escape, with such an antagonist."

CHAPTER FOUR.

It is noon. A young girl in her morning-dress; her hair in disorder, and her eyes swollen with weeping, goes incessantly from the door to the window of the saloon; leans as far as she can out of the balcony; stretches her neck out of the window, watching the entrance of the street, with fixed gaze: removes the locks which shade her forehead, to see the clearer, and then throws herself on a seat again, sobbing and concealing her face in her hands.

"He is dead! he is dead! I am sure he is dead!"

"My daughter; my dear daughter, do not give yourself up to despair, in this way."

"And I, who suspected him of cowardice; I, who could think that he had tamely let himself be insulted, when at the same time——"

"He will return, my daughter; he will return."

"Oh, if he returns! I will beg him to forgive me; I will throw myself at his feet: he will forgive me; I will repeat so often and so tenderly that I love him, that he will forgive me. But he will not return! and heaven punishes me, for having dared to suspect the noblest of men. He is dead! I shall never see him again! Savigny, Savigny, oh, heavens!"

All at once, a slight noise was heard in the adjoining room. "'Tis he!" cried the young girl, and hurried to the door. Savigny entered in fact, very pale, and let himself drop on the first seat he could find. "You are not wounded, are you?" cried she: "no no, you are not—oh, what happiness! It is he, mother, look, it is he; how I weep! but these are no painful tears; I would be glad to shed such always. Dear Savigny! how kind heaven has been to us. But pray, speak to me, say one word—one single word; I want to hear your voice; say only Marie, and I will understand it. What, still silent? Oh, I know you have heard of what I said, and are displeased with me. Oh, forgive me, my friend; I have been sufficiently punished for it: I have suffered so much. If you were told that your Marie had disgraced herself, you would die with grief; would you not? Well, then, judge of my sufferings, when a man assured me he had seen Savigny put up with an insult; my brave, my pure, my noble-minded Savigny; I ought not to have believed him, and yet he swore to me, that he had seen it; and then it is your fault too, if I am too nice on the point of honour. Why did you reveal to me, all the treasures of your generous and lofty spirit? A drop of water stains the snow. Ah, forgive me; forgive me! What, you do not answer me; you turn your head aside—this is cruel in you—I entreat you, look on Marie, who is stretching out her hands to you; you will not refuse me, and then, you know I am of the noble family of Nerville; that family in which there never was a coward, and I thought I should have died, when I reflected that he, whom I loved, had been insulted. But how could I believe it—it was a crime in me—an unpardonable crime. Tell me how I must ask your pardon, and I will do so. But look at me—look at your Marie, for if you do, you will not have the heart to be so angry. Oh, what happiness! your hand clasp in mine, your eyes melt with tenderness; I recognize Savigny's features, when he tells me, 'I love you!' Oh, mother, mother, let me kiss him"—and without waiting for her smiling mother's consent, she threw herself in her betrothed's arms; kissed him tenderly, and hid her face in his bosom. M. Savigny embraced her affectionately; kissed her fair locks; let a tear fall on her neck, and said "dear Marie;" then he disengaged himself from her arms, and went away, saying, "I shall return."

An hour afterwards, Madame de Nerville received a letter from Savigny, stained with blood. He had just shot himself. Poor Marie.

CHAPTER FIVE.

"Joseph, bring me my chocolate and the papers," said M. Lascour, from his alcove. "Ah, here is the paper. Let me read my own glory. Capital!

"Yesterday, a rencontre took place, etc."

"Very well, aha! Savigny's name again! what can that be?

"'Yesterday, about two o'clock, M. Savigny blew out his brains at his own residence. The motive of this horrid action, is unknown. M. Savigny, was on the point of connecting himself with one of the first families of the metropolis.'

Savigny! I must be dreaming—it is not possible—Savigny—yes, it is he, sure enough; he was on the point of connecting himself—there can be no doubt of it. What a riddle! such courage! This is a very meagre article. Something might have been made out of the close connection between his duel, and his suicide; something fine might have been said about the stern intrepidity of that man, who had risked his life, three times that morning already, and yet dared to put an end to it an hour afterwards, not fearing death after having stood so near it? and this strangely brave man, fought with me; and I with him! It does me credit; I will touch the article up. But what could have been the reason? I cannot imagine. He must have been beside himself. With such a wild head, he might have revealed our secret, if he had not killed himself. Joseph, bring me my chocolate."

THE BRIGHTEST FLOWER.

BY I. M'ILTON.

There is a flower, a lovely flower,
Of gayer, greener bloom,
Than ever lent an eastern bower,
Its hue and rich perfume;
Potosi's gems and glittering ore,
Beam not the brightness of this flower.

Not all the sands the Caspean's tide,
Rolls to the skill-wreathed coast;
Nor all the gold on earth beside,
Its brilliancy can boast;
No flood of light nor starry tower,
Can ray the glory of this flower.

The Eden-home where Adam fell,
Was redolent and fair,
No earthly flowers could those excel,
That grew and flourished there;
Yet Eden's shade, and scented bower,
Were gloom, compared to this sweet flower.

Fast by the throne of God it grew,
On Zion's holy towers;
And bloomed in brightness ever new,
Fairest among the flowers;
Nor Seraph's strength, nor Angel's power,
Could rear this rich, this splendid flower.

A bud from heaven's eternal tree,
Plucked by the hand of God,
Transplanted was on Calvary,
And struck its roots in blood;
It grew, and flourished—spotless pure,
A green imperishable flower.

Behold the tree, whose boughs are spread
O'er all the earth abroad,
A shelter for the weary head—
A bower built by God;
He is the root, firm and secure,
That warms with life, the holy flower.

Could Persia's Bdelleum, purchase earth,
And purchase all the skies,
Compared with this, 'twere nothing worth
This pearl of nameless prize,
Religion priced of God and pure,
Is this sacred sainted flower.

LION HUNTING IN SOUTH AFRICA.

BY LEWIS LESLIE, ESQ. 45TH REGIMENT.

Some years ago, it was my fortune to be attached to a party of the Cape Cavalry, encamped on the banks of Orange River in South Africa, for the protection of the boors on the extreme boundary, against a tribe of savages who were then supposed to threaten an invasion on the Colony. That portion of our African territory extending from the Fish River, formerly the north eastern limit to the banks of the Gariep or Orange River. had been but a few years in our possession, and then only a scanty population of Dutchmen was scattered over a space of some hundred miles. The occupation I believe, was not recognized at that time by Government. The character of the scenery was somewhat peculiar; vast plains or flats extended in all directions, bare and sandy, rarely presenting a green blade ot verdure to the weary eye; these plains were enriched or intersected by ranges of low table mountains, whose sides and summits were equally divested of all vegetation; and in passing over the country, as you crossed the lower ridge of some of these hills, a prospect of the same monotonous and barren extent was presented to the view. It was seldom we met with a human habitation, and nought enlivened the dreary scene, save the various species of antelope and quagga abounding in these plains, who, frightened at the appearance of man, ran wildly off in every direction. At a distance they might have been sometimes taken for vast herds of sheep, and droves of cattle. If a boor's dwelling happened to be in the neighbourhood, these dwellings were always erected on the banks of some rivulet or spring, where there might be a sufficient supply of water for their flocks, and to irrigate a few limited roods of land to grow vegetables and tobacco for themselves. In the drier seasons, however, these almost pastoral farmers were obliged to forsake their more permanent abodes, and something like the Israelites in the desert, betake themselves to tents, and with their flocks, wander over the sandy waste in search of pasturage for their sheep and cattle. While encamped in these open plains, their craals or folds were frequently disturbed by the midnight visit of the lion; and their only escape from his attacks was in the discovery of his retreat and his destruction. His usual prey was the quagga or the antelope; but the fleetness of these animals or their instinctive precautions perhaps gave them more security than the feeble defence of a crowded craal.

It was on these occasions that I witnessed the mode in which the boor discovered and rid himself of his troublesome neighbour, as the officer commanding was applied to, and most willingly granted the assistance of a few men, whom we were delighted to accompany. It has been frequently asserted that the lion is not the magnanimous and courageous animal that he was formerly described to be, and I see that Dr. Philip, in his researches, has related facility with which the Boajesmans, (Bushmen,) with their poisoned arrows, destroy the Monarch of these Wilds. From a tolerable long acquaintance and experience on the African Frontier, I am inclined positively to deny both of these opinions. I have seen the Lion on several occasions hunted and slain, and heard the relations of many (on which I could place more credit, than on those of the credulous boor,) which bear ample testimony of his courage and noble bearing when at bay.—The bushmen I have frequently seen practice with their bows, but I have very little faith in the correctness of their aim or the strength of their poison. The most authentic relations I could obtain of their shooting even the smallest species of the antelope, prove that the poison is not at all immediate in its effect; the wounded animal, with the barbed and poisoned arrow in his side, will bound along the plain, where he is traced by the Bushman's eagle eye until he staggers and falls when the poison has been absorbed. If such is the case with a weak and timid animal, what would it be with the powerful, bold, and fiery lion? destruction of the daring bushmen who would attempt to meet him. I am well aware that they assert their being able to kill the lion, but am confident it is for the purpose of imposing on the credulous boor to magnify the power of their favourite weapon. In nine months that we were encamped within a mile of a numerous craal of bushmen, they appeared to live almost wholly on roots, locusts and ants, and what they obtained from the neighbouring farmers, or from our station.

Those who have denied the noble daring of the lion, have never seen him in his native desert.—I have heard an individual who was engaged in the hunt, of which Mr. Pringle gives so vivid a description, bear ample testimony of his high and fearless bearing in many a furious encounter. My own experience is in every instance in his favour. He has nothing of the cunning, cowardice or treachery ascribed to the tiger.—In his conduct there appeared no pusillanimity. Before man he retreats with coolness and deliberation. He avoids because he hates, not because he fears him; once confront him, convince him that he is the object of your pursuit, and he retreats no longer. Whatever may be the number of his enemies, he will no longer shun you. He seats himself on some ridge, which he will never leave, and from thence growls inimitable defiance till loss of blood or some well-aimed bullet lays him prostrate on the earth. Often have I seen him roll, when wounded, from the ridge where he was seated, but on his recovery, his sole object appeared to be to regain it, as if it alone was the object of the contest, and he would only yield it with his life.

The method by which the boors pursue the lion, will be shown by describing the last hunt at which I was present. In every instance it was the same; and in three successful, without injury to any individual of the parties. The north-east bank of Orange River, opposite our encampment, was totally uninhabited save by a few wandering Bushmen.

Vast numbers of antelopes and quaggas grazed upon the plains; and in the rugged and bare hills which intersect them, the lion dwelt during the day, and at night descended after considerable intervals in search of food. I have seldom seen him in the plain during the day, save when, in the extreme heat of the summer, he might be found on the wooded banks of the river; but often during the night, when he bivouacked in the open plain, and the terror of the cattle and horses bore evidence of his approach; at dawn he would be seen winding slowly his way to the loftier summit of some neighbouring mountain. One might hear the thunder of his voice at miles distance, while every animal shook with fear.—A lion of huge dimensions passed the river, which at that season was low, and carried off a horse, the property of a neighboring boor. For some nights previous he had been heard in a hill close to the bank of a river, to which it was supposed he had again retreated on destroying his prey. The boors say that the flesh of the horse is highly prized by the palate of the lion, but perhaps it is because this animal is their own most valuable property. It was proposed to cross the river the following morning, and trace him to his den. With the few boors we could collect, and a party of our men, we mounted immediately after sunrise, and with a large number of dogs, proceeded to the mountain, every crevice and ravine of which we examined without finding him. Gorged with his late meal, he had, perhaps, we thought, remained in the thick cover on the steep bank of the river, to which we then returned, and in passing over a large plain, a spot of ground was pointed out to us by an eye witness, where he had been to seize and devour a quagga some days before. The hard and arid soil was actually hollowed by the violence of the mortal struggle. The dogs had scarcely entered the thick bushy banks of the river, ere they gave tongue, and they appeared to advance in the pursuit as if the lion was slowly retreating. At times it would seem that he turned and rushed upon the dogs. We however, could not dare to enter farther than the skirts of the jungle with a finger on the trigger and the carbine half at the present. One single clutch of his tremendous paw unquestionably would have been fatal.

For a considerable time the dogs remained silent, and we fancied we had irrecoverably lost him. With more and more confidence we examined the thicket, but without success, and were about giving up the pursuit in despair, when a Hottentot and boor observed his footsteps in the sand.

The word was again to horse. The lion's course appeared to be towards the mountain, which he had left. R——, with a party of boors and soldiers, galloped straight up the nearest declivity, while I, with a smaller number, rode round a projecting edge of the hill, into a deep ravine, to which he might have retreated. With my party I had been too late; he had been just brought to bay, as he was commencing his descent on the opposite declivity of the hill, but R——, delayed the attack until we should arrive to witness the encounter; meanwhile the dogs amused him. The ascent by which we could reach the summit was steep and rugged, but our horses were accustomed to such, and with whip and spur we urged them on. Whoever has seen the African lion at bay, would assuredly say the sportsman could never behold a more stirring scene in the chase. There he was seated on his hind-quarters, his eyes glaring on a swarm of curs yelping around him; his dark shaggy mane he shook around his gigantic shoulders, or with his paw tossed in the air the nearest dog, more apparently in sport than anger. We arranged preliminaries. The horses were tied together, in a line, taking care to turn their heads from the direction where the lion was at bay, and likewise that they were to the windward of him, lest his very scent should scare them to flight. The retreat behind this living wall is the boor's last resource if he should advance upon them, that his indiscriminate fury may fall upon the horses. Some of the boors are excellent marksmen, and the Hottentot soldiers are far from being despicable; yet many a bullet was sent ere he was slain. Fired by the wounds he received, his claw was no longer harmless, one dog he almost tore to pieces, and two more were destroyed ere he fell. At each shot he rushed forward as if with the intent of singling out the man who fired, but his rage was always vented on the dogs, and he again retired to the station he had left. The ground appeared to be bathed with his blood. Every succeeding attempt to rush forward, displayed less vigour and fury, and at last, totally exhausted, he fell; but still the approach was dangerous.—In the last struggle of his expiring agony, he might have inflicted a mortal wound; cautiously approaching, he was shot through the heart; twelve wounds were counted on his head, body, and limbs. He was of the largest size, and allied in appearance to the species which the boors call the black lion. We claimed the skin and skull; the bushmen the carcase, which to them is a delicious morsel; and the boors were satisfied with knowing that he would commit no farther depredations on them.

On another occasion we roused two on the summit of a low stony hill. They were deliberately descending one side as we reached the top, and amid a shower of bullets, they quietly crossed a plain to ascend another. We followed, and they separated; we brought them to bay in succession and slew both. It appears to me from what I have seen and heard, that a lion, once wounded, will turn upon his pursuers, but I am of opinion that he seldom attacks man, generally shuns his vicinity, and that he has none of the reported partiality for human flesh. In the district I described, and of which a description was necessary to show that we encountered him upon fair and open ground, the various kinds of lion were originally very numoreus. The boors enumerated three, the yellow, grey, and black. Their numbers were much diminished, principally, perhaps, from their retreating beyond Orange River, to an unoccupied country, although many also were destroyed by the boors. It has been said that the lion dwells in the plains. The African hunter almost always seek him in the mountains, occasionally one or two will not shun the encounter, if armed with their long and sure rifles, which on almost all occasions they carry.

One instance, and I have done. A party of officers a few years previous, along with some boors, discovered a lion, lioness, and two whelps, within a short distance of Hernianus Craal on the frontiers. The lion dashed forward to protect his mate and young ones, and attempted to defend them by shielding them with his body, until the officers, moved by his magnanimity of conduct, entreated that he might not be destroyed, but the Dutchmen were inexorable, and they killed him, the cubs fled and the lioness followed, but all were found dead of their wounds the succeeding day.

The above anecdote was related to me by an officer who was an eye witness.

PETITION OF THE NERVES.

BY L. W. TRASK.

To the human mind:—The undersigned, member of the human system, and as such entitled to certain rights and privileges, beg leave to represent,—that they have ever entertained nothing but sentiments of the highest respect towards your highness. With pride and supreme delectation we have seen ignorance humbled in the dust—we have seen science rearing her banner towards the heavens, bearing this lofty inscription, "Universal mental emancipation." We have seen this, and are proud to acknowledge, that this triumph has been achieved by the great and untiring exertions of the human mind. It would be an unworthy affectation to conceal, that your Highness is highly esteemed by us for your brilliant powers and services, and not only by us, but by an admiring world. Permit us then as your affectionate subjects, to approach your Highness, to come even to the throne of reason, for an effectual and timely redress of the wrongs with which we are afflicted. It is our station in the economy of nature, to be a medium of communication between the mind or [brain,] and the different organs of the system —and by a peculiar action, (which we are not at liberty to reveal,) to transmit from the different organs to the brain, the effects of causes on the several senses, or to carry from the brain to the different organs its wishes or suggestions. This being our office, it will easily be seen that the deep performance of our functions, is of great benefit and necessity to the system. We do not mention this to show our own importance—but for a very different purpose—to show the loss which the mind sustains in our impairment. It is a principle of our constitution, that violent stimulus abstracts our delicate sensibilities, by first raising our actions to an uncommon degree of power, and thus leaving us in consequent debility; disturbing the regularity of our actions—impairing the acute sensibility of our formation, and destroying the tender connexion of our mind with matter. Ardent spirits, is the violent stimulus of which we complain; this, the grievance for which we earnestly implore redress. Free, oh free us from the tyranny of Ardent spirits!—more poisonous than the Bohon Upas—more paralyzing than the Simom's blast—it sweeps over our department—blasting our acute and delicate sensibilities. By its accursed influence, rosy health is turned into disease—sensation into numbness—and genius into faturity. It changes love into hatred—virtue into vice—riches into poverty—honesty into knavery—truth into lies, and religion into infidelity! Great arbiter, the Human Mind, deliver us from worse than Egyptian bondage, sever the manacles that bind—break the chain of habit that surrounds us. Oh! as you regard virtue—as you detest vice—as you revere mental greatness,—as you fear falling from your present elevation,—free us from the curse which is laying waste the moral heritage. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray for your wellfare. THE NERVES.

A SABBATH SCENE.

BY ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

Glad to man's heart comes Scotland's Sabbath morn
When every sound save Nature's voice is still—
Mute shepherd's song pipe—mute the harvest horn—
An holier tongue seems given to stream and rill.
Old men climb silent up the cottage hill,
There ruminate, and look sublime abroad—
Shake from their feet, as thought on thought comes still,
The dust of life's long, dark, and dreary road,
And from this gross earth rise, and give themselves to God.

The warning bell hath o'er the parish rung,
Grove, glade, and glen, sound with the solemn strain:
Wide at the summons every door is flung,
And forth devout walks many a hoary swain,
Their meek wives with them; while, a gayer train,
Their daughters come and gladden all the road,
Of laughing eyes, ripe lips, long ringlets vain;
Young men, like lambs, upon Spring's sunny sod,
Come, light of foot and heart, to seek the house of God.

I loved much in my youth down dale and glen,
Upon the morn of the Lord's Day, to look;
For all the land pour'd forth its stately men,
Its matrons, with staid steps and holy book.
Where'er a cottage smok'd, or flowed a brook,
Or rose a hall, or tower'd a castle gray,
Youth left its joys, old age its care forsook,
Meek beauty grew, and look'd sadately gay,
Nor at her shadow glanced as she went on her way.

Lo! see yon youth—clad as the season's clad
In homely green—he loves with aged men
To come conversing—hears sedately sad
Tales from their lips, which 'scaped historic pen,
And linger still in dale and pastoral glen.
O much they talk, upon their kirkward way,
Of holy martyrs, who, by flood and fen,
Fell 'neath the persecutor's sword a prey—
They point towards their graves, and seem in thought to pray.

And see yon maiden, beauteous as a beam,
Stray'd from the sun upon creation's morn;
Pure as the daylight in yon crystal stream
By which she walks—pure as the bladed corn
Begemm'd with dews, and ripening to be shorn—
Her looks the greensward lighten all, her feet
Seem winged things, and from the ground upborne—
Birds sings new songs such loveliness to greet—
She's lovely, and in love—which makes her doubly sweet.

I saw her in the church. Men's eyes forsook
The sacred page to gaze upon her there;
Young hearts with awe were for the first time struck,
And even the preacher in his parting prayer
Shut his grave eyes, and warn'd them to beware
Of beauty. 'Midst them like a star she shone,
Or a pure lily born in dewy air;
Or rose the moment of its opening—None
Could look on her, but wish'd to look on her alone.

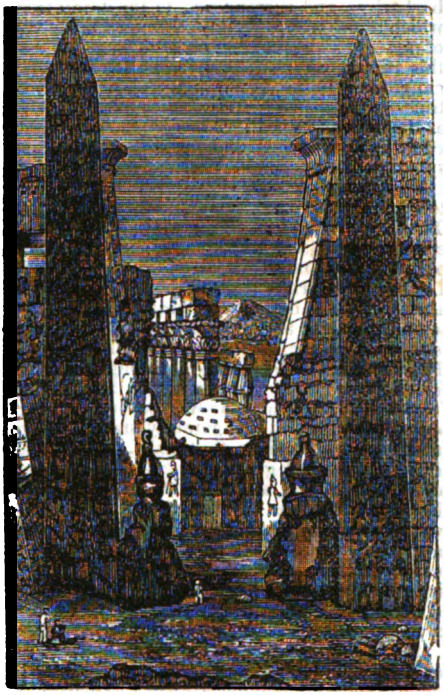
Reverses—A Fragment.

BY LYMAN WALBRIDGE TRASK.

Long ere the delightful shores of the American continent burst like a vision of unspeakable brightness upon the view of Europeans, empire had gained an elevation which enabled her to see nearly the ultimation of earthly glory. But it was emphatically an empire of ignorance. The history of those times comprises more of the daring acts of chivalry—the cruelties and extortions of barbarous tribes, than surprising discoveries in the sciences or the arts. The art of navigation in particular, was so little understood, that, although London was founded 40 years before Christ, and some improvements made in sciences and arts, a vast continent extending almost from pole to pole, and embracing every variety of climate, remained undiscovered until 1492 of the Christian era. But as a consequence of a more enlightened form of society, and a better appreciation of the benefits which science can confer, some progress therein was made but it was trifling for several centuries. Greece was no longer a land of song and eloquence.—Rome in the tide of her successes, subjugated Greece, and became in her turn the nursery of ancient learning; and genius there raised on drooping science the light of his inspiring countenance. But Rome fell as Greece did, before her; and genius and science perished together beneath the ruins of empire. Then succeeded, as I said before, the dark age of papal supremacy, in which, though empire prospered, but little improvement was made in science. The papal supremacy faded also, and on the ruins of those dark ages has arisen the modern temple of science, the most lovely the world ever saw. Oh! may it be forever indestructible! In this renovation of scientific light, Europe and especially England, took a distinguished part. I rejoice that she did—I am glad that she produced men, whose genius and acquirements were universally admired, and who gave to science an importance and brilliancy, which will not soon be effaced. But her savage policy severed from her dominions a territory which will be her rival—a country rich in genius, and almost all the resources which nature can supply, and on which is based a republic of the most flourishing character. Increasing in almost unparalleled rapidity, and with a speedy developement of her resources, our republic promises the full extent of fair anticipation. England, no doubt, has reached the height of her glory; her decline may be slow, but it will be certain. And while the contemplation of the future inspires us with pleasing emotions, we may possibly forget some of the injuries that Europe and England has inflicted on us; for the sake of the support they have given to science. Sure of great political distinction—Sure of immense wealth and magnificence, it must afford pleasure to every mind, to view the exertions of our countrymen, the genius of our literary institutions, and the freedom of our laws. But let us remember that knowledge is the foundation and sure support of a free government like ours, without which it cannot exist, and must fall into dissolution. Americans! let knowledge and science receive your fostering encouragement—let them be ever near your hearts—for they alone can preserve that LIBERTY purchased with blood! Without Knowledge, we should soon decline!

THEBES.



All travellers agree that it is impossible to describe the effect produced by the colossal remains of this ancient capital. No knowledge of antiquity, no long cherished associations, no searching after something to admire, is necessary here. The wonders of Thebes rise before the astonished spectator like the creations of some superior power. "It appeared to me," says Belzoni, "like entering a city of giants, who, after a long conflict, were all destroyed, leaving the ruins of their various temples as the only proofs of their former existence." Denon's description of the first view of Thebes by the French army, which he accompanied in the expedition into Upper Egypt, is singularly characteristic. "On turning the point of a chain of mountains which forms a kind of promontory, we saw all at once ancient Thebes in its full extent—that Thebes whose magnitude has been pictured to us by a single word in Homer, hundred-gated, a poetical and unmeaning expression which has been so confidently repeated ever since. This city, described in a few pages dictated to Herodotus* by Egyptian priests, which succeeding authors have copied—renowned for numerous kings, who, through their wisdom, have been elevated to the rank of gods; for laws which have been revered without being known; for sciences which have been confided to proud and mysterious inscriptions, wise and earliest monuments of the arts which time has respected; this sanctuary, abandoned, isolated through barbarism, and surrendered to the desert from which it was won; this city, shrouded in the veil of mystery by which even colossi are magnified; this remote city, which imagination has only caught a glimpse of through the darkness of time—was still so gigantic an apparition, that, at the sight of its scattered ruins, the army halted of its own accord, and the soldiers, with one spontaneous movement, clapped their hands."

* Herodotus has given no description of Thebes. Denon several times quotes Herodotus for what is not in that author.

Thebes lay on each side of the Nile, and extended also on both sides as far as the mountains. The tombs which are on the western side reach even into the limits of the desert. Four principal villages stand on the site of this ancient city, Luxor and Carnak on the eastern, Gournou and Medinet-Abou on the western side. The temple of Luxor is very near the river, and there is here a good ancient jettée, well built of bricks. The entrance to this temple is through a magnificent gateway, facing the north, 200 feet in front, and 57 feet high above the present level of the soil. Before the gateway stand the two most perfect obelisks that exist, formed, as usual, of the red granite of Syene, and each about 80 feet high, and from 8 to 10 feet wide at the base. Between these obelisks and the gateway are two colossal statues, also of red granite; from the difference of the dresses it is judged that one was a male, the other a female, figure;—they are nearly of equal sizes. Though buried in the ground to the chest, they measure 21 and 22 feet from thence to the top of the mitre.

It is this gateway that is filled with those remarkable sculptures, which represent the triumph of some ancient monarch of Egypt over an Asiatic enemy, and which we find repeated, both on other monuments of Thebes, and partly also on some of the monuments of Nubia, as, for example, at Ipsambul. This event appears to have formed an epoch in Egyptian history, and to have furnished materials both for the historian and the sculptor, like the war of Troy to the Grecian poet. The whole length of this temple is about 800 feet.

The remains of Carnak, about one mile and a quarter lower down the river, are still more wonderful than Luxor. An irregular avenue of sphinxes, considerably more than a mile in length (about 6560 feet) connected the northern entrance of the temple of Luxor with it; but this was only one of several proud approaches to perhaps the largest assemblage of buildings that ever was erected. The irregularities in the structure and approaches of this building show that the various parts of it were raised at different periods. Some parts, both of this temple and of the larger building at Carnak (sometimes called a palace), have been constructed out of the materials of earlier buildings, as we see from blocks of stone being occasionally placed with inverted hieroglyphics. It is impossible, without good drawings and very long descriptions, to give any thing like an adequate idea of the enormous remains of Carnak, among which we find a hall whose roof of flat stones is sustained by more than 130 pillars, some 26 feet, and others as much as 34 feet, in circumference.

The remains on the western side of the river are, perhaps, more interesting than those on the east.

That nearly all the monuments of Thebes belong to a period anterior to the Persian conquest, B. C. 525, and that, among them we must look for the oldest and most genuine specimens of Egyptian art, is clear, both from the character of its monuments themselves and from historical records; nor is this conviction weakened by finding the name of Alexander twice on part of the buildings at Carnak, which will prove no more than that a chamber might have been added to the temple and inscribed with his name; or that it was not unusual for the priests to flatter conquerors or conquerors' deputies, by carving on stone the name of their new master.

THE SKY-LARK.

Whither away, companion of the sun,
So high this laughing morn? are those soft clouds
Of floating silver, which appear to shun
Day's golden eye, thy home? or why 'mid shrouds
Of loosen'd light, dost thou pour forth thy song?
Descend, sun-loving bird? nor try thy strength thus long.

Ambitious songster! soaring merrily,
Thy wings keep time to thy rich music's flow,
Rolling along the clouds celestially,
And echoing o'er the hill's oak-waving brow;
Across the flood, whose face reflects the sky,
And thee, a warbling speck deep-mirror'd from on high.

And thou has't vanished singing from my sight—
So must this earth be lost to eyes of thine;
Around thee is illimitable light—
Thou lookest down, and all appears to shine
Bright as above; thine is a glorious way,
Pavilion'd all around with golden-spreading day!

The broad unbounded sky is all thine own,
The silver-sheeted heavens thy free domain;
No land-mark there—no hand to bring thee down,
Sole monarch of the blue etherial plain;
To thee is airy space far-stretching given,
Broad and unmeasured as the boundless vault of heav'n!

And thou art gone, perchance to catch the sound
Of angel voices heard far up the sky;
And wilt return harmonious to the ground,
Then with new music, taught by those on high,
Ascend again, and carol o'er the bowers
Of woodbines waving sweet, and wild bee-bended flowers.

Lov'st thou to sing alone, above the dews?
Leaving the nightingale to cheer the night,
When rides the moon, chasing the shadowy hues
From list'ning vales, far stretched in silent night;
She veils her head, while thou art with the sun,
Looking beneath on hills, and woods, where deep streams run.

Lute of the sky, farewell! 'till I again
Climb these cloud-gazing hills, thou must not come
To where I dwell, nor pour thy heav'n-caught strain
Above the curling of my smoky home;
Others may hear thee, see thee, yet not steal
That joy from thy glad song, which it is mine to feel.

JACOB FAITHFUL.

The New York Albion furnishes extracts from the adventures of Jacob Faithful, by the author of Peter Simple. They notice Jacob's first love incidents, and possess extraordinary interest. We copy that part relating to Stapleton's daughter, who seems to have made a deep impression on Faithful's susceptible heart. —Stapleton was a fisherman, reported to be deaf, to whom the hero of the tale was apprenticed.

Stapleton had lost his wife, but he had a daughter, fifteen years old, who kept his lodgings, and did for him, as he termed it. He lived in part of some buildings leased by a boat-builder, his windows looking out on the river; and on the first floor a bay window thrown out, so that at high water the river ran under it. As for the rooms, consisting of five, I can only say, that they could not be spoken of as large and small, but as small and smaller. The sitting-room was eight feet square, the two bed rooms at the back, for himself and his daughter, just held a small bed each, and the kitchen, and my room below, were to match; neither were the tenements in the very best repair, the parlour especially, hanging over the river, being lop-sided, and giving you the uncomfortable idea that it would every minute fall into the stream below. Still the builder declared that it would last many years without sinking further, and that was sufficient. At all events, they were very respectable accommodations for a waterman, and Stapleton paid £10 per annum. Stapleton's daughter was certainly a very well favoured girl. She had rather a large mouth, but her teeth were very fine, and beautifully white. Her hair was auburn—her complexion very fair; her eyes were large, and of a deep blue, and from her figure, which was very good, I should have supposed her to have been eighteen, although she was not past fifteen, as I found out afterwards. There was a frankness and honesty of countenance about her, and an intellectual smile which was very agreeable.

"Well, Mary, how do you get on?" said Stapleton, as we ascended to the sitting-room. "Here's young Faithful come to take up with us."

"Well, father, his bed's all ready; and I have taken so much dirt from the room, that I expect we shall be indicted for filling up the river. I wonder what nasty people lived in this house before us."

"Very nice rooms, nevertheless; an't they boy?"

"O yes, very nice for idle people; you may amuse yourself looking out on the river, or watching what floats by, or fishing with a pin at high water," replied Mary, looking at me.

"I like the river," replied I, gravely; "I was born on it, and hope to get my bread on it."

"And I like this sitting-room," rejoined Stapleton; "how mighty comfortable it will be to sit at the open window, and smoke in the summer time, with one's jacket off!"

"At all events, you'll have no excuse for dirtying the room, father; and as for the lad, I suppose his smoking days have not come yet."

"No," replied I, "but my days for taking off my jacket are, I suspect."

"O yes," replied she, "never fear that: father will let you do all the work you please, and look on—won't you, father?"

"Don't let your tongue run quite so fast, Mary; you're not over fond of work yourself."

"No; there's only one thing I dislike more," replied she, "and that's holding my tongue."

"Well, I shall leave you and Jacob to make it out together; I am going back to the Feathers." And old Stapleton walked down stairs, and went back to the inn, saying, as he went out, that he should be back to his dinner.

Mary continued her employment, of wiping the furniture of the room with a duster for several minutes, during which I did not speak, but watched the floating ice on the river. "Well," said Mary, "do you always talk as you do now? if so, you'll be a very nice companion. Mr. Turnbull, who came to my father, told me that you was a sharp fellow, could read, write and do every thing, and that I should like you very much; but if you mean to keep it all to yourself, you might as well not have had it.

"I am ready to talk when I have any thing to talk about," replied I.

"That's not enough. I'm ready to talk about nothing, and you must do the same."

"Very well," replied I. "How old are you?"

"How old am I! O then you consider me nothing. I'll try hard but you shall alter your opinion, my fine fellow. However, to answer your question, I believe I'm about fifteen."

"Not more! well, there's an old proverb, which I will not repeat."

"I know it, so you may save yourself the trouble, you saucy boy; but now, for your age?"

"Mine! let me see; well, I believe that I am nearly seventeen."

"Are you really so old! well, now, I should have thought you no more than fourteen."

This answer at first surprised me, as I was very stout and tall of my age; but a moment's reflection told me, that it was given to annoy me. A lad is as much vexed at being supposed younger than he really is, as a man of a certain age is annoyed at being taken for so older. "Pooh! replied I; "that shows how little you know about men."

"I wasn't talking about men, that I know of; but still, I do know something about them. I've had two sweethearts already."

"Indeed! and what have you done with them?"

"Done with them! I jilted the first for the second, because the second was better looking; and when Mr. Turnbull told me so much about you, I jilted the second to make room for you; but now, I mean to try if I can't get him back again."

"With all my heart," replied I laughing. "I shall prove but a sorry sweet-heart, for I never made love in my life."

"Have you ever had any body to make love to?"

"No."

"That's the reason, Mr. Jacob, depend upon it. All you have to do, is to swear that I'm the prettiest girl in the world, that you like me better than any body else in the world; do any thing in the world that I wish you to do—spend all the money you have in the world in buying me ribbons and fairings, and then——"

"And then what?"

"Why, then I shall hear all you have to say, take all you have to give, and laugh at you in the bargain."

"But I shouldn't stand that long."

"O yes you would. I'd put you out of humour, and coax you in again; the fact is, Jacob Faithful, I made up my mind before I saw you, that you should be my sweetheart, and when I will have a thing I will, so you may as well submit to it at once; if you don't, as I keep the key of the cupboard, I'll half starve you; that's the way to tame any brute, they say. And I tell you why, Jacob, I mean that you shall be my sweetheart, it's because Mr. Turnbull told me that you knew Latin; now tell me, what is Latin?"

"Latin is a language which people spoke in former times, but now they do not."

"Well, then, you shall make love to me in Latin, that's agreed."

"And how do you mean to answer me?"

"O, in plain English, to be sure."

"But how are you to understand me?" replied I, much amused with the conversation.

"O, if you make love properly, I shall soon understand you; I shall read the English of it in your eyes."

"Very well, I've no objection; whem am I to begin?"

"Why directly, you stupid fellow, to be sure. What a question."

I went close up to Mary, and repeating a few words of Latin—"Now," says I, "look in my eyes, and see if you can translate them."

"Something impudent, I'm sure," replied she, fixing her blue eyes on mine.

"Not at all," replied I; "I only asked for this," and I snatched a kiss, in return for which I received a box on the ear, which made it tingle for five minutes.—"Nay," replied I, "that's not fair; I did as you desired—I made love in Latin."

"And I answered you, as I said I would, in plain English," replied Mary, reddening up to the forehead, but directly after bursting out into a loud laugh.—"Now, Mr. Jacob, I plainly see that you know nothing about making love. Why, bless me, a year's dangling, and a year's pocket-money, should not have given you what you have had the impudence to take in so many minutes. But it was my own fault, that's certain, and I have no one to thank but myself. I hope I did'nt hurt you—I'm very sorry if I did; but no more making love in Latin, I've had quite enough of that."

"Well, then suppose we make friends," replied I holding out my hand.

"That's what I really wished to do; although I've been talking so much nonsense," replied Mary. "I know we shall like one another, and be very good friends. You can't help feeling kind towards a girl you've kissed; and I shall try by kindness to make up to you for the box on the ear; so now sit down, and let's have a long talk. Mr. Turnbull told us that he wished you to serve out your apprenticeship on the river, with my father, so that if you agree, we shall be a long while together. I take Mr. Turnbull's word, not that I can find it out yet, that you are a very good tempered, good-looking, clever, modest lad; and as any apprentice who remains with my father must live with us, of course I had rather it should be one of that sort, than some ugly awkward brute who——"

"Is not fit to make love to you," replied I.

"Who is not fit company for me," replied Mary. "I want no more love from you at present. The fact is, that father spends all the time he can spare from the wherry, at the alehouse, smoking, and it's very dull for me, and having nothing to do, I look out of the window, and make faces at the young men as they pass by, just to amuse myself. Now there was no great harm in that a year or two ago; but now, you know Jacob ——"

"Well, now—what then?"

"O, I'm bigger, that's all; and what might be called sauciness in a girl, may be thought something more of a young woman. So I've been obliged to leave it off; but being obliged to remain at home, with nobody to talk to, I never was so glad as when I heard that you were to come; so you see, Jacob, we must be friends. I daren't quarrel with you long, although I shall sometimes, just for variety, and to have the pleasure of making it up again. Do you hear me—or what are you thinking of?"

"I'm thinking that you are a very odd girl."

"I dare say that I am, but how can I help that? Mother died when I was five years old, and father couldn't afford to put me out, so he used to lock me in all day, till he came home from the river; and it was not till I was seven years old, and of some use, that the door was left open. I never shall forget the day when he told me that in future he should trust me, and leave the door open. I thought I was quite a woman, and have thought so ever since. I recollect, that I often peeped out and longed to run about the world, but I went two or three yards from the door, and felt so frightened, that I ran back as fast I could. Since that I have seldom quitted the house for an hour, and never have been out of Fulham."

"Then you have never been at school?"

"O no—never. I often wish that I had. I used to see the little girls coming home as they passed our door, so merry, with their bags from the school-house; and I'm sure, if it were only to have the pleasure of going there and back again for the sake of the run, I would have worked hard, if for nothing else."

"Would you like to learn to read and write?"

"Will you teach me!" replied Mary, taking me by the arm, and looking me earnestly in the face.

"Yes, I will, with pleasure," replied I, laughing. "We will pass the evening better than making love, after all, especially if you hit so hard. How came you so knowing in those matters.

"I don't know," replied Mary, smiling; I suppose, as father says, it's human nature, for I never learnt any thing; but you will teach me to read and write!"

"I will teach you all I know myself, Mary, if you wish to learn. Every thing but Latin—we've had enough of that."

"Oh! I shall be so much obliged to you. I shall love you so!"

"There you are again."

"No, no, I didn't mean that," replied Mary, earnestly. I meant that—— after all, I don't know what else to say. "I mean that I shall love you for your kindness, without your loving me again, that's it."

"I understand you; but now, Mary, as we are to be such good friends it is necessary that your father and I should be good friends; so I must ask you what sort of a person he is, for I know little of him, and of course wish to oblige him."

"Well, then, to prove to you that I am sincere, I will tell you something. My father, in the first place, is a very good tempered sort of man. He works pretty well, but might gain more, but he likes to smoke at the public houses. All he requires of me is his dinner ready, his linen clean, and the house tidy. He never drinks too much, and is always civil spoken; but he leaves me too much alone, and talks too much about human nature, that's all."

"But he's so deaf—he can't talk to you."

"Give me your hand—now promise—for I'm going to do a very foolish thing, which is to trust a man—promise you'll never tell it again."

"Well, I promise," replied I; supposing her secret of no consequence.

"Well, then—mind—you've promised. Father is no more deaf than you or I."

"Indeed!" replied I; "why he goes by the name of Deaf Stapleton."

"I know he does, and makes every body believe that he is so; but it is to make money."

"How can he make money by that?"

"There's many people in business who go down the river, and they wish to talk of their affairs without being overheard as they go down. They always call for Deaf Stapleton: and there's many a gentleman and lady, who have much to say to each other, without wishing people to listen—you understand me?"

"O yes, I understand—Latin!"

"Exactly—and they call for Deaf Stapleton: and by this means he gets more good fares than any other waterman, and does less work."

"But how will he manage now that I am with him?"

"O, I suppose it will depend upon his customers: if a single person wants to go down, you will take the sculls; if they call for oars, you will both go; if he considers that Deaf Stapleton only is wanted, you will remain on shore; or, perhaps, he will insist on your being deaf too."

"But I do not like deceit."

"No, its not right; although it appears to me that there is a great deal of it. Still I should like you to sham deaf, and then tell me all the people have to say. It would be so funny. Father will never tell a word."

"So far, your father, to a certain degree, excuses himself."

"Well, I think he will soon tell you what I have now told you, but till then you must keep your promise; and now you must do as you please, as I must go down in the kitchen, and get dinner on the fire."

"I have nothing to do," replied I; "can I help you?"

"To be sure you can, and talk to me, which is better still. Come down and wash the potatoes for me, and then I'll find you some more work. Well, I do think we shall be very happy."

I followed Mary Stapleton down into the kitchen; and we were soon very busy and very noisy, laughing, talking, blowing the fire, and preparing the dinner. By the time that her father came home, we were sworn friends.

VOYAGE ON THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

In a late number of the Military and Naval Magazine, we find an interesting and well written article under this title. We should be pleased to transfer the whole to our columns, but have only room for the following, in which the reader will be introduced to a character by no means rare in the western country. The date of the excursion on the Upper Mississippi, is June, 1833.

As the steamer was passing a small "white settlement" at the Red Banks of Illinois, a "Sucker," as the frontier inhabitants of Missouri term their neighbors of the opposite State, appeared upon the bank, and with violent gesticulation begged to be taken on board. A boat was sent for him, and as he reached the deck of the vessel, he thus accosted her commander: "I say Captain, seeing I ha'nt no plunder (i. e. baggage) along, I reckon you thinks you wont make no great haul in me; but I've got the pewter about me, and the way it's easy for me to pay my passage is no man's business. But stranger, lets have a horn of your bold face, if you've got the article aboard." "You will find what you want at the bar," replied the Captain, and thither the Sucker proceeded. The whiskey bottle having been set before him, he poured out what in frontier phrase is termed "a buck load." Measuring the quantity with an experienced eye, ere he replaced the bottle on the counter, he remarked with the knowing cut of the eye, "rather a heavy charge, stranger," and with great deliberation was about to return the excess, when changing his mind suddenly, he exclaimed, "d—mine, it's only a relative drink, any how," and so saying, tossed off the glass undiluted. Having paid his sixpence, he returned to the forward deck.

"Captain," said he, addressing him, with the familiarity of a seven years' acquaintance, "the way that them there Sack rascals know how to come over a fellow, is a caution, I tell you. The devils is abroad now, and use about in open ground and they think to have their own fun; but wait till old Whitesides comes up with his battalion of spies, and the way that you'll see them break for tall timber is a sin to Moses." "Have the Sacs commenced hostilities?" inquired the Captain. "They wont fire the first gun," answered the Sucker, "but there's mischief working among them. I fell in with a camp, t'other day at the rapids; they came mighty near laying us out cold as a wagon-tire; but the way I come Charley over 'em is no man's business." The Sucker then commenced his story, but as it would probably be scarcely intelligible to any but a frontier man repeated in the dialect in which it was told, we shall relate it in our own words. It appeared from his account that a few evenings previous, two keel-boats laden with merchandise, and bound to Galena, had hauled up for the night at a convenient spot some miles above the French-Indian, or Indian-French settlement at the Des Moines Rapids. While the crew of these boats were on shore preparing their evening meal, a party of Indians, professedly friendly, and averring to belong to Keokuk's division of the Sacs and Foxes, loitered round their fires, and with the unconquerable pertinacity peculiar to their race, pushed their inquiries in such a variety of shapes that they at length gathered from the answers of their less subtle white brethren, the information they were so desirous to obtain—that the boats contained amongst other articles a quantity of red cloths, powder, whiskey, &c., belonging to the traders who reside with their old enemies the Sioux. When they had satisfied themselves on this point, they begged a bottle or two of whiskey of their "very good friends," and retired to their own camp to drink it.

As soon as they disappeared one of the boatmen, who for many years had enjoyed the advantages of a friendly intercourse with the Indians on the Upper Mississippi, expressed to his companions his fears that all was not right. "These men," said he, "are evidently Sacs; but so far from believing them to be of Keokuk's party, I shrewdly suspect they belong to the British Band, under Black Hawk." Hereupon a council of war was held and it being thought advisable to watch the motions of their late visiters, the speaker volunteered his services. As soon therefore as their own supper was finished and they supposed the "fire water" had begun to do its office with their neighbors, the Sucker, (for it was the same to whom we have already given the appellation common to the people of Illinois,) departed for the purpose of reconnoitring their camp. He found the Red Men already under the influence of the liquor they had drunk, and cautiously crawling towards the fire, the first words that saluted his ear, for he perfectly understood their language, convinced him that his suspicions were but too well founded. The Sacs were five in number, and one of them, apparently a brave of some distinction, was addressing his comrades to this effect, "My brothers," said he, "the storm which has long been gathering in the South, is rolling on in heavy clouds which will soon burst over our heads; the braves of the pale faces are at this moment preparing to surround our towns; even now their watch fires illuminate the forests of our ancestors, their great guns are pointed, their long knives are bared, and they only wait the arrival of their horsemen to force us from the homes, the fair fields and the graves of our forefathers." He paused, and his hearers hung their heads in silence and melancholy dejection. "You see before you," he continued, "the canoes of the pale faces filled with presents for our enemies the Sioux, who, fourteen moons past, under the pretence of offering the pipe of friendship to our tribe, faithlessly attacked our unarmed chiefs, and immolated to the Evil Spirit, whom they serve, eleven of the noblest warriors of our nation. Answer me, my brothers! Shall the treasures of the pale faces reach their destination?" As the speaker concluded, the Sacs simultaneously sprang upon their feet, and a long and thrilling war-whoop was their answer to his question.

Their fierce looks and violent gestures too plainly indicated their purpose to require interpretation; yet the alarmed Sucker maintained his position in breathless anxiety to learn their plan of attack. When the excitement of the moment was over, the Sacs again seated themselves in council. It was decided that one of the party should immediately set out to collect a sufficient force to insure success, and in the mean time, the others were to hover round the boats as they slowly ascended the river, and observe their motions until they reached a certain point, where a strong war party was to await their coming. The plan of operations being arranged, the leader raised the bottle from the ground, scanned its contents with an eagle glance as he held it to the fire-light, then carried it to his mouth. The scout did not wait to see the flask make its round but hurried to his friends with an account of what he had seen and heard. The boatmen were dumbfoundered by this intelligence, and were divided in their opinions as to the course to be pursued.

"We treble 'em in numbers, it is true," said the Sucker, "but without arms we cannot attack them Sacs with a certainty that some on 'em won't escape, and raise all wrath agin us, and at any rate the runner, who has already started, will bring a pack of Red skins upon our track, that'll dog us till we get out of the settlement, and then the way they'll be down upon us is a caution." When the Sucker had delivered himself to his purpose, some of the party were in favor of proceeding on their voyage at once, and making the most of their time, others more timid, were for returning to the settlement. But the Sucker assured them they were in no immediate danger, and that they had nothing to fear before they reached the point designated by the Indians—some distance beyond the Red Banks—unless they should awaken the suspicions of the savages by a precipitate movement. He advised them to pursue their course as it nothing had happened, until they arrived at this settlement, where they might remain in safety until a convoy could be obtained from Fort Armstrong. At the same time he volunteered his services as a runner, and promised to meet them at the appointed place, with a sufficient guard to insure their safety. It was resolved to follow his advice, and the boats having been hauled out from the bank, and sentinels posted on deck, the crews went below to seek that repose which a hard day's cordelling had prepared them to enjoy. At day-light the Sucker was on his way to Fort Armstrong, and having slept at the Red Banks the night before he was introduced to the reader's acquaintance, he was about to resume his journey when the steamboat hove in sight, and was taken on board in the manner related. The weather was charming, and the boat continued her course without interruption. That night, about the middle of the second watch, several of the passengers, unable to sleep, were loitering upon the deck. Nature was at rest, and no sound was heard but the deep intonation of the stream, and the quick, incessant splashing of the boat's wheels. The moon was at the full, and the night beautiful; the silent prairies on the left, smiling in the soft moonlight, were finely contrasted with the dark and frowning woodland that overhung and shaded the waters on the right. The air was redolent of the rich tribute of unnumbered prairie flowers, and Love and Poetry, as they accepted the offering, pronounced the hour to be their own. The silence was broken by the pilot calling to the captain. He had discovered near the right bank, at some distance ahead, a canoe apparently adrift and floating with the stream; but suspecting it contained some Red skins, he asked if he should steer for it. He was directed to do so, and the steamboat immediately changed her course and began to plough the waves in the direction of an object, which gliding along in the shade of the woody bank, would, to an inexperienced eye, have passed for one of the numerous pieces of floating timber which are, at this season, borne seaward on the bosom of the mighty Mississippi. It was as the pilot had anticipated; and as the boat approached the object the prominent prow of the canoe was discernible, but still no human form was visible. The courage of the midnight wanderers was constant, and firm to their purpose they lay perfectly concealed until another revolution of the wheels would have brought the steamboat upon them, and buried them with their canoe in the turmoil of waters that whirled and parted beneath her angry prow. Then, as it were by magic, five dark forms simultaneously appeared above the low sides of the hollowed trunk, and one simultaneous sweep of five light paddles, whirled the canoe like an arrow to the shore, where they sprang upon the rocks and leaving their frail bark to the guidance of the current, disappeared in the thicket. As the steamboat was running close to the shore, she passed within a few yards of the spot, as the bushes closed upon the last of their dark figures. The next morning the pilot pointed out the mouths of Rock river, since become noted in Indian story, as the ancient haunts of the ruthless band of the celebrated Black Hawk. This river pours its tribute into the channel of the great father of waters, between deep flats, covered with an impervious growth of brushwood, above which the tall oaks wave their arms with a wild air of sovereignty. As the boat moved on, a glimpse was had of the Sac village, situated about two miles up the stream, and at that time the quiet abode of the fated tribe.—Soon after, however, the attention of all was called to Fort Armstrong; and Horse Island, in other days the field of deadly strife, together with many minor objects of curiosity were passed with a transient notice.—There, in open view, upon the southern iron-bound promontory of Rock Island, stood the proud little fort, with her red striped flag gallantly floating in the morning breeze. At that distance the fort had precisely the appearance of an ancient feudal castle, and at the water's edge a deep fissure in the precipitous rock, upon the very edge of which, the southern face of the fort stands, might easily have been mistaken for a subterranean sally-port, or an entrance to the donjon keep. While the three blockhouses that flanked the interior faces of the work looked not unlike the flanking towers of other ages. The boat came to just above the fort, when the plain of the island was discovered to be white with tents. A strong force of United States' troops had already been concentrated at this point, and the General commanding, only waited the arrival of a brigade of mounted militia from the State of Illinois, to move the Sacs to their destined lands on the west side of the river; for sound policy required that this measure should be deferred until he had a sufficient mounted force to protect the whole frontier.

The Indians had already assembled in council, and had boldly denied that they had ever authorized a sale of their lands, and as resolutely declared their determination never to leave them. They had been told, however, that the time had now arrived when it was absolutely necessary they should move; that the rapid advance of the settlement, now brought the whites and their red friends into constant collision, and that the peace of the frontier having been repeatedly interrupted of late, they could no longer be permitted to remain upon the government lands. But still they had not consented to give up the lands which they professed to consider their own. Another council had been called, at which they were to give their final answer; and just as the boat arrived, the Indians were seen landing on the opposite side of the Island, for the purpose of attending this meeting.

MOSQUE OF ST. SOPHIA, CONSTANTINOPLE.

The principal church in Constantinople, which was dedicated by the founder of St. Sophia, to the eternal wisdom, had been twice destroyed by fire, when its renewal was undertaken by Justinian. Anthemius formed the design, and his genius directed the hands of ten thousand workmen, whose payment in pieces of fine silver was never delayed beyond the evening. The emperor himself, clad in a linen tunic, surveyed each day their rapid progress, and encouraged their diligence by his familiarity, his zeal, and his rewards. The new cathedral of St. Sophia was consecrated by the patriarch, five years, eleven months, and ten days from the first foundation; and in the midst of the solemn festival, Justinian exclaimed, with devout vanity, 'Glory be to God, who hath thought me worthy to accomplish so great a work; I have vanquished thee, O Solomon!' But the pride of the Roman Solomon, before twenty years had elapsed, was humbled by an earthquake, which overthrew the eastern part of the dome. Its splendour was again restored by the perseverance of the same prince; and in the thirty-sixth year of his reign, Justinian celebrated the second dedication of a temple, which remains, after twelve centuries, a stately monument of his fame. The architecture of St. Sophia, which is now converted into the principal mosch, has been imitated by the Turkish sultans; and that venerable pile continues to excite the fond admiration of the Greeks, and the more rational curiosity of European travellers. The eye of the spectator is disappointed by an irregular prospect of half-domes and shelving roofs; the western front, the principal approach, is destitute of simplicity and magnificence; and the scale of dimensions has been much surpassed by several of the Latin cathedrals. But the architect who first erected an aerial cupola, is entitled to the praise of bold design and skilful execution. The dome of St. Sophia, illuminated by four-and-twenty windows, is formed with so small a curve, that the depth is equal only to one-sixth of its diameter; the measure of that diameter is one hundred and fifteen feet, and the lofty centre, where a crescent has supplanted the cross, rises to the perpendicular height of one hundred and eighty feet above the pavement. The circle which encompasses the dome, lightly reposes on four strong arches, and their weight is firmly supported by four massy piles, whose strength is assisted on the northern and southern sides by four columns of Egyptian granite. A Greek cross, inscribed in a quadrangle, represents the form of the edifice; the exact breadth is two hundred and forty-three feet, and two hundred and sixty-nine may be assigned for the extreme length from the sanctuary in the east to the nine western doors which open into the vestibule, and from thence into the narthex, or exterior portico. That portico was the humble station of the penitents. The nave, or body of the church, was filled by the congregation of the faithful; but the two sexes were prudently distinguished, and the upper and lower galleries were allotted for the more private devotion of the women. Beyond the northern and southern piles, a balustrade, terminated on either side by the thrones of the emperor and the patriarch, divided the nave from the choir; and the space, as far as the steps of the altar, was occupied by the clergy and singers. The altar itself, a name which insensibly became familiar to Christian ears, was placed in the eastern recess, artificially built in the form of a demi-cylinder; and this sanctuary communicated by several doors with the sacristy, the vestry, the baptistery, and the contiguous buildings, subservient either to the pomp of worship, or the private use of the ecclesiastical ministers. The memory of past calamities inspired Justinian with a wise resolution, that no wood, except for the doors, should be admitted into the new edifice; and the choice of the materials was applied to the strength, the lightness, or the splendour of the respective parts. The solid piles which sustained the cupola were composed of huge blocks of freestone, hewn into squares and triangles, fortified by circles of iron, and firmly cemented by the infusion of lead and quicklime; but the weight of the cupola was diminished by the levity of its substance, which consists either of pumice-stone that floats in the water, or of bricks from the Isle of Rhodes, five times less ponderous than the ordinary sort. The whole frame of the edifice was constructed of brick; but those base materials were concealed by a crust of marble; and the inside of St. Sophia, the cupola, the two larger and the six smaller semidomes, the walls, the hundred columns, and the pavement, delight even the eyes of barbarians, with a rich and variegated picture.

"A variety of ornaments and figures was curiously expressed in mosaic; and the images of Christ, of the Virgin, of saints, and of angels, which have been defaced by Turkish fanaticism, were dangerously exposed to the superstition of the Greeks. According to the sanctity of each object, the precious metals were distributed in thin leaves or in solid masses. The balustrade of the choir, the capitals of the pillars, the ornaments of the doors and galleries, were of gilt bronze; the spectator was dazzled by the glittering aspect of the cupola; the sanctuary contained forty thousand pounds weight of silver; and the holy vases and vestments of the altar were of the purest gold, enriched with inestimable gems. Before the structure of the church had risen two cubits above the ground, forty-five thousand two hundred pounds were already consumed; and the whole expense amounted to three hundred and twenty thousand: each reader, according to the measure of his belief, may estimate their value either in gold or silver; but the sum of one million sterling is the result of the lowest computation. A magnificent temple is a laudable monument of national taste and religion; and the enthusiast who entered the dome of St. Sophia, might be tempted to suppose that it was the residence, or even the workmanship, of the Deity. Yet, how dull is the artifice, how insignificant is the labour, if it be compared with the formation of the vilest insect that crawls upon the surface of the temple!"

When, in 1453, Constantinople was taken by Mahomet the Second, and the Turks rushed into the devoted city, the terrified inhabitants, "from every part of the capital, flowed into the church of St. Sophia. In the space of one hour, the sanctuary, the choir, the nave, the upper and lower galleries, were filled with the multitudes of fathers and husbands, of women and children, of priests, monks, and religious virgins." The fane of St. Sophia was violated, as well as that of every other temple in which the wretched Greeks sought a momentary security: they were dragged from the sacred domes and the altars to the slave-market, and from every place where they had sought refuge within the walls, to become the victims of the passions, the cupidity, and the power of their conquerors.

"The profanation of the plunder of the monasteries and churches excited the most tragic complaints. The dome of St. Sophia itself, the earthly heaven, the second firmament, the vehicle of the cherubim, the throne of the glory of God, was despoiled of the oblations of ages; and the gold and silver, the pearls and jewels, the vases and sacerdotal ornaments, were most wickedly converted to the service of mankind. After the divine images had been stripped of all that could be valuable to a profane eye, the canvass, or the wood, was torn, broken or burnt, or trod under foot, or applied, in the stables or the kitchen, to the vilest uses."—Gibbon's Decline and Fall.

After eight hours of disorder and rapine, on the memorable twenty-ninth of May, 1453, the Sultan entered in triumph, by the gate of St. Romanus, the city he had conquered. "At the principal door of St. Sophia he alighted from his horse, and entered the dome; and such was his jealous regard for that monument of his glory, that on observing a zealous Mussulman in the act of breaking the marble pavement, he admonished him with his scymetar, that, if the spoil and the captives were granted to the soldiers, the public and private buildings had been reserved for the prince. By his command the metropolis of the eastern church was transformed into a mosch; the rich and portable instruments of superstition were removed; the crosses were thrown down; and the walls, which were covered with images and mosaics, were washed and purified, and restored to a state of naked simplicity. On the same day, or on the ensuing Friday, the muezin or crier ascended the lofty turret, and proclaimed the ezan, or public invitation in the name of God and his prophet; the iman preached; and Mahomet the Second performed the namaz of prayer and thanksgiving on the great altar, where the Christian mysteries had so lately been celebrated before the last of the Cæsars." "In the new character of a mosch, the cathedral of St. Sophia was endowed with an ample revenue,* crowned with lofty minarets, and surrounded with groves and fountains, for the devotion and refreshment of the Moslems. The same model was imitated in the jami or royal moschs; and the first of these was built, by Mahomet himself, on the ruins of the church of the Holy Apostles and the tombs of the Greek emperors."—Gibbon's Decline and Fall.

SHAKESPEARE.

There is a glorious city in the sea;
The sea is in the broad, the narrow streets,
Ebbing and flowing; and the salt sea weed
Clings to the marble of her palaces.

ROGERS.

There is no spot, on which the European traveller can rest his foot, more fruitful in the most interesting of historical associations, than the noble bridge we are contemplating; and both the simple beauty of its broad span, the magnificent line of marble palaces which adorn the canal over which it is thrown, and its antiquity, render it in picturesque effect, and moral and romantic interest, one of the grandest monuments of past ages.

The present bridge of the Rialto was commenced in the year 1588, and completed in 1591;—Pasquale Cicogna, whose arms appear in the centre of the arch, being then doge of Venice. The design has been attributed by Vasari to Michel Angelo; and his assertion is supported by other authorities, although Michel Angelo died upwards of twenty years before the completion of the bridge. According to Vasari, the design was made at the request of Andrea Gritti, at that time doge of Venice. Many, indeed almost all the great architects of Italy, appear to have furnished designs for this celebrated bridge. The genius of Palladio and Scamozzi was exerted upon it, and Sansovino is said to have presented a design to the Venetians, which was prevented from being carried into execution by a war between the republic and the Turk. Sansovino, however, was the architect of the building or exchange adjoining the bridge of the Rialto known by the name of the Fabbriche Nuove.

Besides the historical recollections attaching to the old Rialto, it is known to have been the scene of many a strange and tragic event—many an act of appaling vengeance for private injury or hate. Hence has it offered so fertile a field of incidents for the genius of the dramatist, the novelist, and the poet; and not only to its own but to almost every European people. The most remarkable of these, like the plots of Othello, the Merchant of Venice, Venice Preserved, and many of those in our old dramatists, are already familiar to us.

Venice was once the queen of the Adriatic, and is yet one of the most remarkable cities of of Europe. A city of this extent, built entirely on small islands, and having canals instead of streets, boats instead of cars and black gondolas instead of coaches, is unique in its kind. It is built, according to some, on ninety, according to others, on seventy-two islands, separated from the continent by the lagoons (a wide and shallow arm of the sea), and connected with each other by 456 bridges, among which is the magnificent Rialto, consisting of a single arch, 187 feet long and 43 wide. The houses, among which are numerous palaces, many of them decaying, and magnificent churches, adorned with precious monuments of Mosaic work, and splendid pictures of the Venetian school, are mostly built upon piers, and almost all of them stand with their front towards the canals which forms wide and long passages, whilst the real streets are hardly passable for three persons on foot abreast. There are forty-one public places, indeed, but only the place of St. Mark, surrounded by arcades, and ornamented with two high columns, deserves the name. The number of houses is stated to be 15,000, and that of the inhabitants 150,000. The principle manufactures are of cloth, linen, silk, gold and silver cloths, masks, artificial flowers, gold wire and other works in gold, soap, wax, theriac and chemical preparations; also copper and brass ware, leather, catgut and wire strings. Considerable ship-building is carried on. In the manufacture of glass, Venice was formerly the teacher of Europe, but at present is surpassed by other countries; the telescopes, spectacles and beads made here, however, are justly esteemed. On the whole, though the manufactures have much declined, and the commerce still more. Venice yet remains one of the most important commercial places of the Adriatic sea. In 1817, 1050 vessels, under the Austrian flag, left this port, and 2653 entered it besides 315 foreign vessels. The value of the merchandise imported was 34,000,000 lire. The port is spacious, but the entrance is difficult, on account of the shallowness of the channels and the constantly fluctuating sand.

THE MUFFLED DRUM.

By Mrs. Hemans.

The muffled drum was heard
In the Pyrenees by night,
With a dull deep rolling sound
Which told the hamlets round
Of a soldier's burial rite.

But it told them not how dear
In a home beyond the main,
Was the warrior youth laid low that hour,
By a mountain stream of Spain.

The oaks of England wav'd
O'er the slumbers of his race,
But a pine of the Ronceval made moan
Above his last lone place:

When the muffled drum was heard
In the Pyrenees by night,
With a dull deep rolling sound
Which call'd strange echoes round
To the soldier's burial rite.

Brief was the sorrowing there,
By the stream from battle red,
And tossing on its wave the plumes
Of many a stately head:

But a mother—soon to die,
And a sister—long to weep,
Ev'n then were breathing prayer for him,
In that home beyond the deep:

While the muffled drum was heard
In the Pyrenees by night,
With a dull deep rolling sound,
And the dark pines mourn'd round,
O'er the soldier's burial rite.

THE WIDOW.

Mine has been a troublous and a perilous life in matters of love: no sooner have I emerged from one ocean of sighs and tears, than I have plunged headlong into another. It is passing strange that I never fell into matrimony in my very early days; my father did so, and so did my mother, and also my respected grand-dame. She, good soul, originally Miss Letitia Simpson, at fifteen married her first husband, a Mr. Jeffery Wilson; at sixteen, gave birth to my mother. Her husband then died without any other issue, leaving her more than well provided for. At seventeen, she espoused a Mr. Winckworth, who, in his turn, consigned her to a single blessedness and a fat dower; after which, having quarrelled with all her race, or all her race with her, she abjured them and the realm, betook herself to the Continent, and was barely heard of afterwards. My mother, following one part of her example, married at sixteen, and enriched the world with me at seventeen. Fate, however, I suppose, (for I am a believer in fate,) destined me to—

"Waste my sweets upon the desert air;"

and thus only can I account for my escaping all the matronly and matrimonial snares that beset me in my youth. But to my tale.

On my arrival on the Continent, I had been but a short time at ——, when my health visibly and seriously declined, and the medical men who attended me advised a visit to —— for its restoration. In accordance with their directions, I, nothing loth, (for a seat at a desk never was a desideratum with me,) set out; and, as I was alone, and was not over-enamoured of my monosyllabic patronyme, assumed one more suited to the euphony of a billet-doux; and having, therefore, rebaptised myself, I made my appearance at my journey's end as Augustus Montagu, with, moreover, a dash of black down on my upper lip, which I dignified, to my own mind, with the title of moustache. Thus yclept, and thus accoutred, I began my way at ——; and, by dint of my modest looks, a litile foppery, and my good name, I shortly won my way into a circle of acquaintance.

At a party to which I had, through these means, been asked, I one night met a Madame Perollet, whose appearance, and more, her sufferance of my attentions, made some impression upon me. She was an extremely fine woman, and English, seemingly about five-and thirty, though less-favoured fair ones spoke of her having numbered fifty years. Her hair and eyes were of the blackest; her eye lashes of the same colour, and long, thick, and silky; her complexion fair, but not ruddy, such as best contrasts with, and best becomes, the raven lock; her features were more beautiful in their expression than in their individuality, although then even they were beautiful; her teeth were the finest I ever saw; and I opine no woman can lay claim to beauty who cannot show, nay, even display, her teeth. She bore an easy, dignified, and complaisant, smile; her figure was of the strictest proportions, and her carriage most graceful; moreover, she was rich and consequently amiable. She was a widow, too; and, with all these qualifications, of course was greatly sought after by the men. But she had sense and caution; and while she smiled on all, and enamoured many, she never gave more than hope, and preserved all her own freedom. The women, who wished her dead, or married, consequently called her a coquette, and some of the vieux garcons agreed with them—but this was suspicious evidence; while the younger men, whom the aunts and mothers of standing spinsters admonished to beware of the widow, only bowed, and then turned on their heel to laugh.

The first time I met her, a glove which she dropped, and which I proffered her, gave me an opportunity of opening a conversation with her. At first, conscious of my youth, I hesitated a little, although my looks bespoke an age riper, by some years, than I had attained; but her answers were so mild, so suave, and so condescending,—her manner to me so kind and easy,—and her whole conduct so engaging and assuring,—that, before I left her, I had, although blushingly, adventured on some little gallant badinage, for which, to the mortification of my elder competitors, she shook her delicate finger at me, and tapped me with her fan. Encouraged thus, I might have proceeded farther; but as she knew how to commence a conquest, so she knew how to continue one; and assuming a dignity, not violent, but perceptible, she restrained my further advances: and being even then sensible that an independent respect is the surest way to a woman's heart, (for I had begun to think of hers,) I contented myself for that time, by expressing a hope that I should have the happiness to meet her again, and bowed myself away.

That night I rose 50 per cent. in my own esteem. "Truly," said I to myself, the man whom that woman distinguishes must own some attractions; she is a lovely and intellectual specimen of her sex; to possess the love of such a one would be something to pride one's self on. What honour is the love of a giddy, indiscriminating girl, who runs the market of matrimony with her heart in her hand eager to bestow it on the first bidder!—Truly, I'll be a chapman no more for such common wares. But vanity! vanity! Can the rich, beautiful, sought, and at an age when prudence has mastered passion, think of such a one as me? Yet she seemed very kind. "But kindness never marries," said a small voice. Yet she ofttimes gives birth to love, I thought, in answer. "But she is wealthy, has a wide range for choice, is a widow, and has the whole town after her," replied my monitor. "True, true," I whispered; "but she has interested me, and by —— I'll try it!"

Again we met—"Et je contais encore quelques fleurettes." The widow smiled at them, and threatened if I persisted, to reprove me. "Cela va bien," said I to myself, and I rotired; for my vanity, or little else, was as yet interested.

A third time we met. "Now then, Ephraim," said I, "for the coup d'essai—this time you must be serious and distant, and if she has thought upon you, the result will tell." I approached her with a low and most respectful reverence; inquired after her health; without giving her time to answer, made some dry remarks on the wet weather, broached a recent murder; remarked on the Almanac, and the last new flounce; and was retiring, when she said—

"But, Mr. Montagu, I wish to trouble you with a commission, if you can find time to execute it for me."

I assured her I was at her service.

"Then will you have the goodness to see my carriage ordered here at twelve, as I have been out all the week and am fatigued. Perhaps you will let me know when it is at the door, as I don't wish to be seen leaving so early."

"Allons, mon bon ami, Ephriam," thought I; "cela va du mieux." And thanking her for the honor of her commands in a tone of deep and grateful respect, I left her to execute them.

That done, and twelve o'clock came, I made my way to her. She was seated near the door, and whispering to her, (for the secrecy she wished to practise gave me the privilege to do so) that the carriage was ready, I offered myself as her escort to it. She accepted my offer, and placed her arm within mine; as she did so, I felt a fluttering in my heart I was unprepared for, and as the stair case was deserted, I looked up in trembling and confusion into her face, and perceived she looked at me. One instant our eyes met, and the next they were cast down or averted, and I thought the confusion was mutual—I positively shook. As I handed her into the carriage, I stammered out an expression of hope that she would feel relieved from her fatigue next day, and begged her permission to call and inquire after her health in the morning; a gracious smile, and a graceful inclination of the head, answered me, and the coach drove off.

"Fool," said I, as I slowly reascended, "to match your puny wits against a woman's charms and wiles! Your own weak snares have entrapped you."

In the morning, having dressed myself with more than ordinary care, I found myself, about two o'clock, with a very unsettled pulse, at Madame de Perollet's door; and being announced, was ushered into the drawing room, where the widow was seated on a couch, at a small and elegantly carved writing table, drawing her small white hands over some invitation cards. The usual enquiries made and answered, our conversation turned on the previous night's party, and she told me she was busy when I entered writing cards for one of her own.

"But do you know," she said, "I wrote so little lately that my hand is quite stiff, and I am so awkward. "See," said she, laying it over the table to me, "see how I have blacked my fingers with the ink."

"Indeed," said I, rising and advancing to the table, and with an affectation of short sight, taking her hand in mine to examine it. "This ink of yours is a most sacreligious violator. Would you permit me,' I added, as she drew her hand away, "to finish your task?"

"Oh indeed," she answered, rising and vacating her place to me, "you will oblige me much, if you will undertake that kind office for me."

"Rather say for myself," I said; "for I fear I am selfish in seeking the pleasure I ask."

She made me no reply, but smiled, and placed herself opposite, with a list of names to dictate.

"What is this?" said I, taking up the last she had finished. "This is my name. Am I the only Mr. Montague of your acquaintance?"

She nodded acquiescence.

"And am I to have the honour of attending you?"

"If," she answered, "no better, no more agreeable engagement."

"Heavens!" said I, "what better, what more agreeable engagement is it possible I could have? what other engagement could induce me to forego——"

"Mr. Montagu," said the widow, "I will read the names."

"I thank you—but, Madam," I resumed, "you must first permit me to thank you for the honour you have done me, or you will make me believe you think so meanly of me as to deem me insensible to it."

"If your thanks are on each recurrence of the occasion to be as fervent," said the widow, "I fear the task will soon be irksome to you, for I have just made up my mind, if you will promise to write all my cards, and be a little more sedate in your gratitude, to put your name down in my book for the season."

"Is it possible, Madame? then will I be sworn, like the Hebrew copyist, never to pen aught else; and will attend you, too happy as your bidden, your bounden scribe—nay, but there is no room for that dubious smile—I will swear."

"Don't, pray," she replied; "remember, if you write for me only, how many damsels will die for lack of the elegant food of your billets-doux!"

"Not one, I assure you, Madam; if I have polluted paper with a line to woman since my arrival, or dared to harbour thoughts of more than one, and she, one to whom I can never presume to aspire——"

"Then there is one, Mr. Montagu? but pray remember my cards. I fear you will make a very negligent amenuensis."

"There is indeed one, Madam, if I dared reveal her."

"Well, well, Mr. Montagu," she said, "I don't wish to confess you."

"And yet, Madam," I answered, "you could absolve me."

"Mr. Montagu," said the widow, hastily, "do, pray, think of my cards, or I must write them; and only see how that nasty ink has stained my fingers."

"It only serves as a foil to the snowy lustre of the rest," I said.

"But yet you would not like it if the hand were yours— "

"If it were mine—if it could ever be mine," said I, warming as I spoke, and raising it to my lips.

"Have done then, have done, Mr. Montagu; see how you have kept your promise, not one card written—oh, fie! and now we really must leave it till to-morrow, for I must go out."

"I hope not, I said. "I will complete them instantly."

"But, indeed, I must go out."

"To-morrow then, perhaps, you will permit me to show my industry?"

"Yes," she said, "if you will promise, very faithfully, really to write."

"As closely as a pundit, on my honour;" and once more pressing her hand, and having fully received pardon for my sins, I withdrew.

The next day and the next, our seats were resumed. I pen in hand, Madame with her pocket-book; but still the cards remained stationary. Not so with other matters: I progressed in love and boldness, until I won from the widow's lips a confession of regard, and the sweetest assurance of it that lips can give. Never did love sit so lightly or so happily on me, though my passion for Matilde, for that she told me was her name, was ardent; and she was beautiful, fascinating, and every way engaging; but she was not to be treated with continual scenes, and her own demonstrations of love were of that nature which satisfied without ever exciting the heart. We felt rather than told each other's hopes and thoughts, and wishes, and I enjoyed serenely what I had before and have often since squandered in unnecessary or unavailing suffering. Her actions spoke more than her words, and I was too proud of her to doubt her for her silence —her and her only have I loved rationally—I loved her as a woman; others I have adored as angels, till adoration became torture; and I have phrenzied myself in seeking and worshipping their attributes.

About four months I led in this way a very happy life, when it was agreed we should be married: a contrat de marriage was necessary, and I was to await upon a notary to instruct him to prepare it. To enable me to do so, Matilde explained to me the nature and amount of her property; which was ample.

"And now, Augustus," said she, "I must own, I have deceived you in one point."

"Indeed!" said I. "I am sure it is a very venial one."

"It is so, indeed; but it is necessary I should now explain it to you—my name is not Matilde Perollet."

"Indeed!" said I, at the same time thinking to myself how easy a way this confession would make for my own on the same subject.

"That name I assumed to escape the importunities of relations in England. Listen, and you shall soon be made acquainted with the brief story of my life. My maiden name, you must, know was Simpson."

"Indeed!" I said, "we have the name already in our family."

"On my first marriage with Mr. Wilson ——"

"Who?" I cried.

"Wilson!" she answered.

My hair stood on end—"Were you married a second time?

"I was."

"To whom?"

"To Mr. Winckworth."

"Winckworth!" I exclaimed, "Simpson, Wilson, Winckworth! Heavens! you are my grandmother."

TROUT FISHING.

Skinner's Sporting Magazine for June, just published, contains a great variety of interesting matter, and is embellished with a representation of the Sebago Trout, a most beautiful and excellent fish, found in Lake Sebago, Maine. The plate is accompanied with a lively and entertaining description of a fishing excursion, a portion of which we extract, being confident that it will please our readers.

There were four of us, C——, P——, F—— and myself. The first was an accomplished angler, an amiable, intelligent and generous companion. The second was a great lover of fishing and of good company, always inclined to an enterprise and full of health and hardihood to support him in it. The third was a novice with the angle and a stranger to Sebago, but exceedingly zealous in the cause and eager to become initiated. With such a fellowship, it may well be imagined that I augured well for our social prospect whatever might be our success among the trout. So on the 22d of May, 1833, we took coach at Portland, in which we packed our rods, creels, baskets, &c. with extra refreshment "tackle and apparel" for a week's campaign, and off we drove for the Sebago.

On Thursday, the 23d, we had a fair day, with flying clouds and a brisk wind from north-west. Temperate. —Soon after breakfast we seated ourselves in the boat, which was sufficiently capacious and equipped with both sails and oars, and set forth upon our first trip across the lake, full of spirits and eager expectation. As soon as we were fairly off the shore each one baited and put out his line, first ascertaining that his minnow would spin handsomely, when passing through the water. As much line was now suffered to run out as was thought proper, varying from thirty to one hundred and fifty feet, and the rods being severally held out from either side of the boat, so as to prevent any entanglement of the lines, we fell to betting who should have "the first bite." We trolled along in this manner for nearly a mile, with no occurrence to break the monotony of the scene or relieve our waning patience, until we all concluded that fish were "scarce," "very scarce!" Perhaps we were "too early for the season," "perhaps the day was not favorable," or "the wind," and "perhaps the trout were destroyed in the canal last autumn!" But there always results a pretty fair compensation for the "scarcity" of fish in the corresponding appreciation of their value when taken, and the excitement of the pursuit is generally in full proportion of the rarity of the prey. We were not doomed, however, to an utter disappointment, "a bite! a bite!" now exclaimed C——, his countenance brightening, while the rest of us were aroused to a livelier degree of interest. "Ah! he is off!—no,—he has hold again;—he is hooked;" said C——, "and I shall have him! reel up." At this signal every other line was rapidly gathered in, so as to give clear play for the fish without the danger of entanglement.

But for this precaution, it is almost impossible to avoid the perplexity, vexation and a total loss of sport. Besides, the capture of a lake trout is a work of time; the boat's progress, too, is arrested in the mean while, and, but for reeling up our lines they would be carried by the sinkers to the bottom, where the hooks would in all probability get foul. Every one is intent upon he operations and chances of the game, watching, with almost as much anxiety the bending rod and straightened line of his lucky companion, as it was his own hook that held the prize and his own hand that wound the reel.

Every moment seems pregnant with event;—the delicate snood,—with which a skilful angler will kill a trout of ten pounds, and which would not lift from the floor to the table a dead weight of two, may break, the trout if hooked in a tender part of the mouth may tear loose, or by a struggling leap may detach the hook, and many other are the chances which favor the fish; in his controversy. Thus is our anxiety kept alive thus it gathers intensity, from the first shock of a bite, to the moment when the dip-net envelops him he is safely deposited in the bottom of the boat.

But we left C—— with a trout at the end of his line, some 75 feet astern. He commences winding up, keeping his rod at right angles to the direction of his line so as to present the maximum of its elasticity, taking care never to allow the line to slacken entirely, nor yet to be so hardly drawn upon as to endanger the tackle. "Look! look!" said F , our novice, "see that larger fish yonder jumping out of water!—How the dashes the spray about! can that be a trout?" "That fish," said C——, slyly and with ineffable complacency, "has my limerick hook in his mouth!" His rod now suddenly sprung back to its position, straight as an arrow and all his alacrity was required to take in line as fast as it slackened, and for one dread moment it was feared that the trout was off. But no—the supple rod bowed down again and C—— felt reassured that master trout and himself had still something to do with each other. The resistance now became more moderate and uniform, so that for several minutes C—— had little do but to wind up and watch sharply. Every moment brought the fish nearer to us and added to the excitement. We knew that, however passively he suffered himself now to be drawn forward, the moment he should come so near as to see the boat, and his formidable array of enemies, he would put forth his utmost powers again in his effort to escape, and that unless he should prove to be well hooked and was managed with an artist like skill, this effort would certainly be successful. Another splash! The water was broke within 20 feet of us and a fine, large, silvery trout leaped up 4 or 5 feet into the air, flashing and sparkling in the sun, then cutting a flourishing summerset, dashed into his element again and down he sped to the bottom, fathoms deep, while the rattling reel spun round most merrily, yielding up to the fleeting captive as much line as he pleased to carry away. But in spite of this symptom of aversion, the actual attachment was too strong to be severed by any such vagary as this, and after squire trout had exhausted his share of the argument, squire C—— put in his replication, and by the aid of the reeling process, the former relations between the parties were soon re-established, and their personal acquaintance with each other, grew closer and closer every moment. Now he was near enough for us to see all his motions. How brightly gleamed his eyes! and how flashed the silvery light from his scales as he clove his way through the water; now starboard, now larboard, now plunging again to his depths and now bursting forth into the air, in restless impatience of his thrall; while the imperturbable, but highly excited C ——, keeping a steady eye upon all his movements, yielding just enough to his impetuosity to save the tackle, but still shortening line upon him at every interval of relaxation; until, wearied out, at length, the noble trout so fierce and vigorous before, now turned languidly upon his side and gave token of complete exhaustion. The landing net was now called in requisition and duly manned. Several spirited efforts, however, were made by the reluctant prisoner before the net could be placed under him; but his strength was now expended, and he suffered himself to be towed in so near to the boat, that he was soon dipped triumphantly from the water into the boat, and received on his head the coup de grace, which put an end at once to his troubles and his existence.

Now for the steelyards!" "and now for a guess" "How much?" "how much does he weigh?"—were the questions each was prompt to ask of the other: five pounds—five and a quarter pounds—four and a half pounds—four and three quarter pounds, were the different opinions ventured, but, the impartial beam disappointed us all, and four and a quarter pounds, was all the weight of this well fed and powerful fish.

But, fruition is not satisfaction. Pursuit—pursuit alone, is that which constitutes the essence of sporting; and, of much more peradventure, which we comprehend under the denomination of human felicity. So "up sails" and "off again for another trout. "Let us now steer," exclaimed P——, as he began to wax impatient for a little action himself; "let us now steer between Sloop and Squaw islands and so up the reach to the "Images." Our lines were soon out again, and for another hour we were fain to content ourselves with conversation, which, however, was now animated by reminiscence as well as by hope, when F—— cried out, "ha? what's that?" his rod bending off to the rear and his line stiff with tension. "You have a bite" "Take care now!" "reel up!" "give him line!" "he'll be off!" "no, you have hooked him!" Were the several exclamations with which the excited F—— was greeted from every quarter; and, for some moments it might well be doubted, whether he could have told his right hand from his left: so excessive is the agitation, which is sure to possess the tyro, on his initiation to this most facinating of sports. "Look!—there he leaps a noble fellow! a trout of at least six pounds:" "be careful now! reel up slowly!" and, so amidst the various cheerings and caveats of the party, did F—— proceed in the grand manipulation of capturing a trout; his eye fixed rigidly on the water where the fish might be, and anon towards his creaking rod which he felt was put to a severer trial than he would ever have dared to impose voluntary; his whole frame trembling in the meantime with half dread, half extacy. For five long minutes this state of silent excitement continued, when a splash in the water, some fifty feet astern of us, betrayed the place of the trout, who made one glorious vault into the air, flapped his tail in high jubilee, and disappeared again beneath the wave. The countenance of F. now fell. His rod was straight and he began to wind in his slackened and unresisting line,—so sadly!! The fish had indeed escaped, and it was a long, long while, before F—— regained his composure and could set his thoughts upon a new trial. He now drew in, to examine his hook and to rebait if necessary, but alas! his hook, snood, swivels and sinkers, were all gone, carried off by the triumphant trout as trophies of his victory. An inspection of the line, which as it proved had given way just above the snood, was sufficient to explain the whole cause of the disaster. F—— had equipped himself very thoroughly with every kind of gear but swivels, and being compelled to borrow, he modestly declined more than one for his snood, which it seems was insufficient or else did not play easily and his beautiful blue silk line was in consequence so untwisted, unlaid and tortured into kinks that its strength was almost entirely destroyed. He thus lost his fish and a full hour of sport besides, for it was not easy to rig another snood to his mind without a resort to our box of spare tackle, which had unluckily been left at our lodgings. This, however, was but the first chapter of accidents, Something or other was constantly giving way, as the fishing became more animated, and before the day was gone we found ourselves much in the situation of a frigate after an engagement; we brought in no less than eight fine prizes, however, which were distributed as follows.

C——killed one trout of four and a quarter pounds—one of four pounds—one of three and a quarter pounds—and one of two pounds. P——killed one of five and quarter pounds—and one of four pounds. F——killed one of two pounds. And myself one of five and three quarter pounds. Full as many more were hooked and afterwards lost, some at a distance, but the greater number after they had been brought near to the boat, where their struggles were always more violent and the hold of the hook upon their lips proportionably weakened. I hooked a fine large trout early in the forenoon, and had beautiful play with him for more than ten minutes; but when brought within a few feet of the boat, he plunged directly down for many fathoms, where he remained a long time, sullen and immovable and at last broke away.

BURYING ALIVE.

There are numerous authentic instances of premature interment on record in the medical works of the old countries, and if authorities were searched, it is probable, that even in America, many of a similar character, might be found. During the prevalence of the yellow fever in this city, in the year 1793, we have every reason to believe, that many persons, suffering with the disease, were removed from their houses and interred before the vital spark had fled. So general was this desolating scourge, that those who officiated as undertakers, acted without any check or responsibility, and if in entering a house the door of which was marked with the fatal characters of the disease, the dying were taken with the dead, to avoid the trouble of a second visit, there was none to call them to account. Horrible, beyond measure, are the reflections which a recurrence to such scenes occasions. An intelligent French gentleman has furnished the editors of the New York Commercial Advertiser with the following facts, relating to premature interments, collected from medical history.

"The diseases in which a partial and momentary suspension of life most often manifests itself, are Asphyxia, Hysterics, Lethargy, Hypochondria, Convulsions, Syncope, Catelepsis, excessive loss of blood, Tetanus, Apoploxy, Epilepsy and Ecstasy.

"Among many cases which have been recorded, the following are particularly striking:—

"Chancellor Bacon relates that Dr. Scott, nicknamed the subtle, was buried alive at Cologne, and that, recovering from this apparent death, he gnawed his hands and broke his head in his tomb.

At Toulouse, a lady having been buried in the church of the Capuchin friars with a diamond ring on her finger, a servant entered the vault to steal the ring, and, as the finger was swelled and the ring could not come off, he began cutting the finger: on hearing a loud shriek from the deceased, the thief fell senseless. At the time of morning prayers, the Monks, having heard some groans, found the lady alive and the servant dead. Thus death had her prey; there was but a change of victims.

"A street porter in Paris, having died at the Hotel Dieu, was carried with the other dead into the same grave; recovering his senses towards 11 at night, he tore open his winding sheet, made his way to his house, knocked at the door which was not opened to him without some difficulty, and took a new possession of his lodgings.

"In 1756, a woman in Paris was thought to be dead, and the body put on some straw with a taper at the feet; some young men who sat up round the corpse, in a frolic overturned the taper. This set the straw on fire. The deceased, whose body the flames now reached, uttered a piercing shrick. Timely assistance was rendered, and she so well recovered that, after her resurrection, she became the mother of several children.

"On the 21st of Nov. 1763, the able Prevot, well known for his literary productions, was taken with an apoplectic fit as he was travelling through the forest of Chantilly. Being supposed dead, he was carried to the house of the mayor of the village and the magistrate directed a post mortem examination to be commenced. A piercing shriek uttered by the unfortunate man proved that he was alive. He expired under the scalpel.

"Dr. Devaux, a surgeon of St. Come hospital in Paris, had a maid-servant who had three times been carried to burial. She did not recover her senses, the last time, till they were lowering the coffin into the grave. That woman having died anew, the body was kept six days lest they should have to bring her back, the fourth time.

"A Mr. Rousseau, of Rouen, had married a young lady of fourteen, whom he left in perfect health at his starting on a short journey. After a few days, he heard that, unless he returned immediately, he would find his wife buried. On reaching home he saw the funeral ready.—In an agony of grief, he had the coffin removed to his room and unscrewed. He placed the body on a bed and ordered twenty-five incisions to be made on it. At the twenty-sixth, probably deeperthan the others, the deceased exclaimed. "How severely you hurt me!" Medical assistance was immediately given. The lady had afterwards twenty-six children.

"The wife of Mr. Duhamel, a celebrated lawyer, having been supposed dead twenty-four hours, the body was placed on a table for the purpose of preparing it for burial. Her husband strongly opposed it, not believing her dead.

To ascertain it, and knowing that she was very fond of the cymbal, and the tunes which cymbal players sing, he called one. Upon hearing the instrument and the voice, the deceased recovered motion and speech. She survived her apparent death forty years.

"Andre Vesale, first physician to Charles V. and Phillip II., after attending a Spanish grandee, thought him dead. Having obtained leave to examine the body, he had scarcely thrust the bistoury into it and opened the chest, when he perceived that the heart palpitated.

The relatives of the deceased prosecuted him as guilty of murder, the inquisitor as guilty of profaneness.—Through the intercession of the King he obtained to be merely condemned to a pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

"In the sitting of the royal Academy of Medicine on the 10th of May, 1027, Mr. Chantournelle read a paper on the danger of hasty inhumations. This led to a discussion, in which M. Desgenettes stated that he had heard from Mr. Thouret who had superintended the removal of the human remains of the cemetry and the charnel house des innocens, that many skeletons had been found in positions showing that the individuals had moved after their inhumation. Mr. Thouret had been so much struck with this that he had inserted in his will an article relating to his own interment."

A Good One.—Dr. Hoadley Ashe, lately dead, was nephew of Dr. Hoadley, who wrote the "Suspicious Husband." I had the pleasure of sitting next to Dr. Ashe one day at dinner, when he began a story, with "As eleven of my daughters and I were crossing Piccadilly—"Eleven of your daughters, doctor!" I rather rudely interrupted. "Yes, sir," rejoined the doctor, "I have nineteen daughters, all living; never had a son; and Mrs. Ashe, myself, and nineteen female Ashe plants, sit down one-and-twenty to dinner every day. Sir, I am smothered with petticoats." He probably meant ashes.

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

A certain lodging house was very much infested with vermin. A gentleman who slept there one night told the landlady so in the morning, when she said, "La, sir, we hav'nt a single bug in the house." "No, ma'am," said he, "they are all married and have large families too."

"I have lived," said Dr. Adam Clark, "to know the great secret of human happiness is this; never suffer energies to stagnate. The old adage of 'too many irons in the fire,' conveys an abominable lie. You cannot have too many—poker, tongs, and all: keep them all a going."

Francis the First asked one day of Duchatel, the learned Bishop of Orleans, if he was a gentleman? "Sire," was the Prelate's reply, "in the ark of Noah, there were three brothers—I cannot tell from which of them I am descended."

Dying Consolation.—"I shall be happy," said the expiring husband to the wife, who was weeping most dutifully by the bedside, "if you will only promise not to marry that object of my unceasing jealousy, your cousin Charles." "Make yourself quite easy, love," said the expectant widow, "I am engaged to his brother."

"Pa, I know what piece of music that is which the band's playing—I do." "Do you, though?—what is it?" "It's the same that sister plays on the pirano; she calls it the overturn of a load of whiskey," (overture to Lodoiska.)—[Baltimore Visiter.

A Simile.—A preacher in the upper part of the city, while descanting on the impossibility of the sinner retracing his steps after he had gone a certain length, made use of the following strong similes: "My brethren, it is a very easy task to row a skiff over Niagara fall—but an all-sufficient job to row it back again!"

An Irish Rainbow in Spain.—A Carlist chief in Guipuscoa, in a proclamation in which he calls on the Spaniards to take up arms, and rush into a civil war in support of Don Carlos, says "peace and justice are the rainbow which precede him."

Riding Courtship.—A little boy just returned from a long visit, was asked by his mother how he had enjoyed himself while absent from home. He answered with a boyish simplicity, that he "liked his visit very well, but he would'nt—that's what he would'nt, never ride home between Cousin George and Sarah again, for they kept hugging and kissing each other so much that they squeezed him all the time, and almost spoilt his new hat!"

Paddy's use of Chocolate.—The porter of a Dublin grocer, was brought by his master before a magistrate, on a charge of stealing chocolate, which he could not deny.—Upon being asked to whom he sold it, the pride of Patrick was greatly wounded. To whom did I sell it?" says pat; "why does he think I took it to sell? "Then, Sir," said the magistrate, "what did you do with it?"—"Do wid it? Since you must know," said he, "we made tea of it."

Odd answer.—The elder folks were talking of the Doncaster, when one turned to a listening child and said. "Did you ever see a race, Bobby?" "Yes," was the answer, "I have seen the candles run?"

"Dear me," said a lady, upon reading in the newspapers, that Lord T———'s son had been brought before a police magistrate, charged with not paying his reckoning; "dear me, the poor fellow, I suppose, had no money in his pocket!" "Madam," cried Tom Moore, who was present, "that is a complaint the young gentleman has." "A complaint, Mr. Moore?" exclaimed the lady. "Yes, madam," rejoined the wag, "and an hereditary one."

Paradise.—An old colored man delivering a sermon, made use of the following beautiful illustration of the high state of enjoyment of the good in the other world:—"Dare my beloved bruddern, ye git de good roast goose, and dare ye git de nice bak'd possum—gravy all runnin down; squash him tween your teeth." Whereupon an old coon in the congregation, jumped up, shook his head, and sung out "whew! whew, too good! so bress my Master; you say dat agin, Cato ge wid you quick!"

The "divided scissors."—A man who passes through life without marrying, is like a fair mansion left by the builder unfinished. The half that is completed runs to decay from neglect, or becomes, at best, but a sorry tenement, wanting the addition of that which makes the whole useful.

The Reason Why.—A small lad asked permission of his mother to go to a ball. She told him it was a bad place for little boys. "Why mother, did'nt you and father use to go to balls when you was young?" "Yes, but we have seen the folly of it," answered the mother. "Well mother," exclaimed the son, "I want to see the folly of it too."

Precise Direction.—While travelling in the state of Connecticut some years since on a first visit to an uncle, having arrived in the vicinity of his residence we came to a cross road, and inquired of a passing farmer, which of the roads led to the house of the Rev. Mr. T——, "Go right ahead," said he, "the minister lives in the last house you come to, before you come in sight of the meetin' house.

The following libel is going the rounds: "Never trust a secret with a married man who loves his wife, for he will tell her, and she will tell her sister, and her sister will tell aunt Hannah, and aunt Hannah will impart it as a profound secret to every one of her female acquaintance."

A Bull.—An Irishman, who was brought up to the police the other day, on a charge of vagrancy, on being asked if he had eaten any thing during the week, replied, that he "hadn't tasted a bit of any thing for three days, barring a little oyster soup made of clams."

No Ear for Music.—A bachelor of Woonsocket Falls, R. I. after descanting on the evils of carrying infants to meeting, which he considers all but an unpardonable sin, thus expresses his abhorrence of the cries of a child. "I can stand firm and face a hurricane; I can brook the tempest, and listen to the roar of an earthquake, but oh! ladies deliver us from the cry of sucklings in the house of God."

Jonathan where was you going to yesterday, when I saw you going to mill?

Why I was going to mill to be sure.

Well I wish I had seen you, I'd got you to carry a grist for me.

Why you did see me did'nt you?

Yes, but not till you got clean out of sight.

"FILL IT AGAIN."—A German parson, in an adjoining county in this State, who was in the habit of indulging, with some of his congregation, when an opportunity offered, in partaking of a social glass together, one Lord's day, after having made several calls on the way, repaired to the church, of which he was pastor, to officiate in his holy calling. After he had finished his sermon, he gave out a psalm, as usual, and took his seat. During the singing, he fell asleep, and continued so until the congregation became impatient to be dismissed, when one of the deacons ascended to his box, and without ceremony gave him a hearty shake, exclaiming—"Wake up, wake up, it is most out," (meaning the service was nearly closed.)—"Is it—fill it again, fill it again," said the parson, partially recovering himself from the effects of sleep, but quite unconscious of where he was, and doubtless thinking that it was his glass the deacon meant, and that he was in a bar-room instead of a pulpit. The congregation, accordingly, in great confusion and laughter, dismissed themselves, leaving the parson and deacon to make the best of the joke.

Light Work—Light Pay.

ANECDOTE.—Dr. Morse, of Charlestown, was the first chaplain to the State Prison, in that town. On his being appointed, Gov. Strong, a particular friend to the doctor, called in person, and informed him that the Governor and Council, had given him the office, and a salary of $200 per annum. The doctor intimated with his customary suavity, that the pay was rather small. "The Governor and the Council, were aware of the smallness of the salary," replied his excellency, "But you will reflect, doctor, that your labour is already half done. The prisoners are now under conviction, and all you have to do, will be to convert them."

The following amusing dialogue occurred at Sierra Leone, between two sailors who happened to be on the military parade, when the soldiers were at drill, going through the evolution of marking time—a manœuvre by which the feet as well as the whole body of the person are kept in motion, presenting a similar appearance to that which they exhibit when they are actually marching. One observed the other watching the movements of the corps very attentively, with his eyes fixed, and his arms akimbo. "What the devil are you looking at?" he inquired. "Why, Jack," replied his companion, "I am thinking there must be a very strong tide running this morning, for these poor beggars have been pulling away this half-hour, and have'nt got an inch a head yet."—Holman's Travels

TEACHING A COW.—A gentleman riding near his own house in Ireland, saw a cow's head and fore feet appear at the top of a ditch, through a gap in the hedge on the road side; he heard a voice alternately threatening and encouraging the cow; he was induced to ride up close to the scene of action, when he saw a boy's head appear behind the cow. "My good boy," said he, "that's a fine cow." "Och, that she is," replied the boy, "and I am teaching her to get her own living, plase yer honor." The gentleman did not precisely understand the meaning of the expression, and, had he directly asked for an explanation, wou'd probably have died in ignorance; but the boy, proud of his cow, encouraged the exhibition of her talents; she was made to jump across the ditch several times, and this adroitness in breaking through fences was termed "getting her own living." Thus, as soon as a cow's education is finished, she may be sent loose in the world to provide for herself; turned to graze in the poorest pasture, she will be able and willing to live on the fat of the land.

NEGRO ELOQUENCE.—Negroes are said to be as fond of set speeches as professional orators; yet amidst their verbose and tautological harangues, we meet, if not good argument, at least that which resembles, and even supersedes its necessity—that is to say, acute illustration.—Does a negro wish to express that it is folly to brave danger unnecessarily, this he will not do by mode and figure; but will at once say—"Crab what walk too much go 'na pot." Does he wish to indicate that oblivion generally follows the death of any one, he says—"When man dead, grass grow at him door." Nor are there wanted instances of a higher kind of elequence. An old negro having beaten a young one, the former was called to give an account of the transaction. Instead of coming directly to the point, he brought a negro child—a little woolly-headed knave—and holding the ebony-skinned infant up in one hand, spoke to the following effect: —"Do you see this boy? When that man (pointing to his opponent) came from Guinea no bigger than this child, he was given by the white people into my charge; when he called for his father, I consoled him; when he wept for his mother, I dried his tears; when hungry, my plantains fed—when weary, my bed supported him; until my kindness drove both father and mother from his memory, for I was both to him. For this I am well repaid.' Nourish a young serpent, and when big enough it will sting you.' Now he has grown as tall and stately as a Palmiste, while my own hair is as white as a cotton shrub, he abuses me, he curses me, he strikes me! Ah Cudgo, Cudgo! 'tis not me you insult, 'tis the ghost of your father! 'tis not me you curse, 'tis the spirit of your mother! 'tis not against me your impious hands are raised, 'tis against Heaven!"

HAVING THE ADVANTAGE.—Tom Hobbs was a queer fellow in his day, and lived in a place called Squam, somewhere on Cape Ann. Tom would drink like a fish, and when he had taken his fifth glass of a morning, no man possessed more shrewdness. When in this condition, and in his happiest mood, Tom one morning met a gentleman on horseback, whom he had never put his eyes on before. As is customary in the country, Tom immediately accosted him: "Ah! here you are, my good fellow, how d'ye do. Upon my honor, it does my heart good to see you once more. How's your family, and the old woman, we hav'nt seen her this long time; when is she coming down to see my wife?" "I am quite well, I thank you," said the gentleman. "but indeed sir, you have the advantage!" "Advantage! my good fellow, what advantage?" inquired Tom. "Why really, sir, I do not know you?" "Know me!" exclaimed Tom, "well, I don't you; where in the deuce is the advantage?"

DUTCH PRAYER.—A Dutch preacher, who was warmly inclined in favor of the tory party during the revolutionary war, happened once to get into an American camp, on a Sunday, and was consequently called upon for a sermon and a prayer. He, from force of habit, commenced the latter with "Got bless te king"—whereupon there was considerable excitement amongst the soldiers when he perceived it, with admiral presence of mind continued. "Yes, mine heares, I say Got bless te king—bless him mit plenty of hardt dimes—bless him mit a whig barliament—bless him mit defeats on landt unt on te zea—bless him mit all kindths of pad luck—bless him mit sickness—bless him mit a shordt life—unt, Lordt, may we have no more of him."

A cheesemonger's wife having attempted, at a Lord Mayor's ball, to take precedence of a grocer's wife, the latter pulled her back, significantly observing, as she rushed by, "Nothing, Madam, after cheese."

SCHOOL AND SCHOOL-FELLOWS.

Twelve years ago I made a mock
Of filthy trades and traffics;
I wondered what they meant by stock;
I wrote delightful sapphics;
I knew the streets of Rome and Troy,
I supp'd with fates and furies;
Twelve years ago I was a boy,
A happy boy, at Drury's.

Twelve years ago!—how many a thought
Of faded pains and pleasures,
Those whispered syllables have brought
From memory's hoarded treasures;
The fields, the forms, the beasts, the books,
The glories and disgraces,
The voices of dear friends, the looks
Of old familiar faces.

Where are my friends? I am alone,
No playmate shares my beaker—
Some lie beneath the church-yard stone,
And some before the Speaker;
And some compose a tragedy,
And some compose a rondo;
And some draw sword for liberty,
And some draw pleas for John Doe.

Tom Mill was used to blacken eyes,
Without the fear of sessions;
Charles Medler loath'd false quantities,
As much as false professions;
Now Mill keeps order in the land,
A magistrate pedantic;
And Medler's feet repose unscann'd.
Beneath the wide Atlantic.

Wild Nick, whose oaths made such a din,
Does Dr. Martext's duty;
And Mullion, with that monstrous chin,
Is married to a beauty;
And Darrell studies, week by week,
His Mant and not his Manton;
And Ball, who was but poor at Greek,
Is very rich at Canton.

And I am eight-and-twenty now—
The world's cold chain has bound me;
And darker shades are on my brow,
And sadder scenes around me:
In Parliament I fill my seat,
With many other noodles;
And lay my head in Germyn-street,
And sip my hock at Doodle's.

But often when the cares of life
Have set my temples aching,
When visions haunt me of a wife,
When duns await my waking,
When Lady Jane is in a pet,
Or Hobby in a hurry;
When Captain Hazard wins a bet,
Or Beaulieu spoils a curry:

For hours and hours, I think and talk
Of each remember'd hobby;
I long to lounge in Poet's Walk,
To shiver in the lobby;
I wish that I could run away
From house, and court, and levee,
Where bearded men appear to day,
Just Eton boys, grown heavy;

That I could bask in childhood's sun,
And dance o'er childhood's roses;
And find huge wealth in one pound one,
Vast wit in broken noses;

And pray Sir Giles at Datchet Lane,
And call the milk-maids Houris;
That I could be a boy again—
A happy boy at Drury's!

PUFFING, A FABLE.

A bustling hen did once acquire
A barn-yard reputation,
For being, certes, the stoutest crier
Of all the feathered nation.

To lay an egg, she'd oft retire,
And then what exultation!
She'd cackle like a house a-fire,
And make a proclamation.

Her jealous sisters tried to mock,
Geese thought she was ill-bred;
The patriarchal turkey-cock,
Was seen to shake his head;
And once, in view of all the head;
He spake to her and said.

"Madam, what good you get by noise
'Tis hard for me to see;
Your constant cackling annoys
My ears exceedingly.
Why need you publish all your joys?
Lay eggs, and let them be."

She, meanwhile scratching with one leg,
Soon gracefully up-drew it;
And poised upon a single peg,
Cried: "Oh! 'tis time you knew it;
'Tis the fashion now to lay an egg,
And then, sir, to REVIEW IT."

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.—The following dialogue is said to have taken place a few months since, between a lawyer, and an editor who had been called into court to give up the name of the author of a certain offensive article in his paper:

Q. Are you the editor of this paper, sir?
A. I am sir.
Q. Did you write that article? [pointing to the one in question.]
A. I did not, sir.
Q. Is this an editorial article?
A. It is, sir.
Q. Who assists you as editor?
A. No one, sir.
Q. Then you write all the editorial yourself?
A. Very little of it, sir.
Q. And still no one assists you?
A. Exactly so, sir.
Q. You deny having written this article—who did write it?
A. Nobody, sir! I got the subject in my head, took up my composing stick, and, as I usually do, set it up without writing it.

TO KISS OR NOT TO KISS.—When a female member of the British Royal family holds a levee, it is customary for her to kiss the ladies of nobility, and no others. It happened that the lady of the Lord Justice Clerk was on one occasion among the number of those presented to the late Princess Amelia, who, as is well known, was very deaf, "Stand by for my Lady Justice Clerk," said the man in waiting. Meanwhile some meddling person whispered him that his announcement was incorrect, the lady being a commoner. By this time the kiss preliminary was about to be performed, when out bawled the man of office, as through a speaking trumpet, "Dont kiss her, madam—she's not a lady!"

No. 9.] PHILADELPHIA.—SEPTEMBER. [1834.

THIRD STREET HALL.

This elegant and commodious establishment, of which the plate is a correct drawing, was erected during the past year by our enterprising townsman, Enoch Middleton, Esq. It is situated on Third above Callowhill street, on a branch of the Columbia Rail-road. It contains 105 rooms, numerous private parlours and bath rooms, where travellers and others can be accommodated with hot or cold baths at all hours.

In the centre of the building stands the observatory, 16 feet square and 88 feet high, commanding a most extensive and delightful view of the city, the river Delaware and the surrounding country.

Two daily lines of cars depart from the door for Pittsburg via the Columbia Rail-road, as also hourly cars for Fairmount and Peters' Island.

The march of improvement in Philadelphia, is not more remarkable in any thing than in this—that the facilities for the accommodation of travellers, have increased to an extent which would, a few years back, have staggered belief. Travelling seems to increase in even a greater ratio than the facilities. Great as these are, by rail-roads and steam-boats, the locomotive propensities of our countrymen seem to keep pace or to exceed them. For every traveller ten years ago, there are one hundred now, and we are sometimes fearful the comforts and conveniences with their cheapness, will make us a nation of travellers, always in motion, and that the art will be brought to such perfection, that it will be cheaper to travel than to stay at home and pay rent—indeed we are not sure but that it is so already.

But be this as it may, very sure we are that Mr. Renshaw, who keeps Third Street Hall, Philadelphia, not only keeps it very well, but that it is away up town near Peg's run, where we should never have looked for such a thing—and where, instead of Peg's run, now runs divers and several very convenient, comfortable, tasty and neat rail-road cars on the Penn Township rail-road, which connects with that to Columbia; so that a person may leave Mr R.'s, and go to Pittsburgh without even entering the city of brotherly love—that is, if he is such a Goth as to choose so to do.

SPIRITUAL WORSHIP.

BY BERNARD BARTON.

Though glorious, O God! must thy temple have been,
On the day of its first dedication,
When the cherubim's wings widely waving were seen
On high, o'er the ark's holy station;

When even the chosen of Levi, though skilled
To minister, standing before thee,
Retired from the cloud which the temple then filled,
And thy glory made Israel adore thee:

Though awfully grand was thy majesty then;
Yet the worship thy gospel discloses,
Less splendid in pomp to the vision of men,
Far surpasses the ritual of Moses.

And by whom was that ritual for ever repealed,
But by him, unto whom it was given
To enter the oracle, where is revealed,
Not the cloud, but the brightness of heaven.

Who, having once entered, hath shown us the way,
O Lord! how to worship before thee;
Not with shadowy forms of that earlier day,
But in spirit and truth to adore thee!

This, this is the worship the Saviour made known,
When she of Samaria found him
By the patriarch's well, sitting weary alone,
With the stillness of noontide around him.

How sublime, yet how simple, the homage he taught
To her who inquired by that fountain,
If Jehovah at Solyma's shrine would be sought;
Or adored on Samaria's mountain!

Woman! believe me, the hour is near,
When he, if ye rightly would hail him,
Will neither be worshipped exclusively here,
Nor yet at the altar of Salem.

For God is a Spirit! and they, who aright
Would perform the pure worship he loveth
In the heart's holy temple will seek, with delight,
That spirit the Father approveth.

From the Saturday Evening Post.

JULIA GRAY,

Or the Orphan.

The world is too much with us; late and soon,
Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers:
Little we see in nature that is ours;
We have given our hearts away, a sordid boon!
WILLIAM WORDSWORTH.

Never were two men much less like each other, than were two very friendly neighbours, Solomon Rayfield, and Patrick O'Doyle. In temper and in creed, these two were opposites; Solomon a Calvanist, and Patrick a Catholic, and both deemed their respective churches the very standard of truth. Solomon most prolific of tongue, and abundant in quotation from his name-sake. Patrick, who is to figure in our veracious history, moulded to unbending stiffness of language and belief, came young, from "The sweetest Isle of the Ocean;" and if the assertion could not be proven, I would never dare state a fact so incredible, Patrick O'Doyle was a man sententious of speech.

With adjoining fences, extended the two very neat and well cultivated farms of Rayfield and O'Doyle, both rising by rather a bold sweep from the banks of Chartier creek, a fine, clear, but noisy stream. Rayfield, with his notable wife Ruth, or Ruthy, as he called her, and their little son and daughter, were the contented inmates of one cottage, whilst Patrick O'Doyle, who gruffly muttered often between his teeth, "Never be denied again," inhabited alone, as to wife and children, a very comfortable cabin.

Facing the Rayfield and O'Doyle farms, rose another far more extensive than both put together. Rising also, by a fine acclivity from the Chartier, and spread like a painting, intentionally so disposed, swept the farm of James Gray, in full view from the front doors and windows of Rayfield cottage. James Gray, and Jane, his wife, had brought with them to Chartier, one most engaging child, a girl, Julia by name, the daughter of her father's first wife; and they brought also, a much larger amount of money, than generally enters into the baggage of emigrants, and a prodigiously swelled sum of aristocratic consequence. The money procured the farm, and its fine set of merchant mills, from a man, who, to use a common proverb, "Peeled an egg for another to eat;" and the patrician manners ensured respect and hatred from their less wealthy neighbours.

For good, sound, plain, and discerning common sense, and for sterling integrity, few stood equal, and none higher, in his country, than did Solomon Rayfield; who to the duties of a Justice which were forced upon him, had to share pretty nearly every vexatious arbitration over the whole vicinity. Being of the same church and congregation, Solomon Rayfield and James Gray were brought into the same temple weekly, and their public duties as magistrates, and other et ceteras, brought them very frequently into contact, in other days of the week; yet between these men, friendship did not, nor could not exist. James Gray and his wife, decidedly the most wealthy couple in the two counties, were probably the most miserable pair in either, and why? Because, gentle reader, they were exactly alike in temper; and had long ago ceased to agree in any but two things. and these were to hate each other, and love money.

Divines of all creeds, and philosophers of all schools, have, on one subject, formed a common conclusion; and that conclusion is, that riches and happiness, do not always dwell together. Now, though I am neither a divine nor a philosopher, but simply a sojourner on earth, walking over it to see what I can see, I have ventured another conclusion; that is, that wealth is not happiness, but one of the elements of happiness. While passing along the vale of life, over which sunshine and storm alternately prevail, I have found kindness of heart the only element inseparable from happiness, and have found that same element, as independent of condition, as gold is of the rubbish in which that precious metal is found.

Of the gold in the human bosom, Solomon Rayfield had his full share, and his neighbour James Gray, and Mrs. Gray his wife, not enough to reward its extraction. Though members of the same church, between two such men friendship could not exist, and even good neighbourship was performed on one side, from a sense of duty, and on the other, by a sense of interest.

The Rev. John Dancey, the spiritual guide of the Rayfield and Gray families, was the pastor of a congregation, much more remarkable for the honesty of their hearts, and the sincerity of their devotion, than for the polish of their manners. Many long years did the minister and his flock meet in harmony weekly. The only complaint against their pastor, made by any one of these pioneers of the wilds of Chartier, was, that he was rather lavish of "Glad Tidings," and trusted too little to their memories. This was, however, a mere speck on the sum of love and respect, and glad were the good people to meet each other and the minister, once every week. Into this temple, not seldom, sat down also, Patrick O'Doyle, though sometimes saying playfully to his friend Rayfield, "A bee can find honey from the thorn flower."

Of all the sweet flowers ever blooming on Chartier, none other ever bloomed more lovely than Julia Gray. Lovely in childhood, she was—not in any respect "A beauty in promise," but every one who saw the little budding sprightly brunette, except her parents, felt, and many rapturously exclaimed, "How Lovely!"

Mary Layton, afterwards Mary Gray, the first wife of James Gray, and the mother of Julia, deserved a better fate than to be united to such a man, even in his best days, and survived by only a few weeks the birth of her child; falling a victim to that worst of cruelty to a fond wife—neglect. Jane Gray, once the spoiled dependent of his first, became his second wife, and effectually revenged the murdered Mary. If James Gray neglected his first wife, his second, did not neglect James Gray; and succeeded by the real terror she excited, combined with imaginary evils to unsettle a brain, harrassed thus by actual, and in his apprehension, impending misery.

James and Mary Gray, were only two of the many Rose-destroyers, and Thorn-searchers, which it has been my fortune to meet with, between the mouths of the Sabine and Passamaquodey, and only two of the many who took ten times more pains to embitter their lives, than would have been necessary to have made them the delight of each other and of their neighbours. No man or woman was ever yet disappointed in the aim of making themselves hated, and this couple succeeded just in proportion to their respective talents: James, to be passably, and Jane, to be supremely hated. Solomon Rayfield, who never dealt in epithets of censure, only sighed when his nearest neighbours were named; but Patrick O'Doyle, though so sparing of words, and warm of heart, seldom named either husband or wife, without finishing by a "Bad luck to them."

It will be only strange to those who have not reflected on the features of human society, what I am now ready to assert. All those feelings of disgust against the wealthy Grays, very seldom appeared on the surface. In the ordinary and extraordinary walks of life, all outward things were on the Gray farm clothed just as on other farms; and even the sarcastic O'Doyle, who was like many other pioneers, a little of every trade, was very often called to do jobs at Gray's; went there, did the job, got his wages, and returned to his cabin, just as he did for Solomon Rayfield, and fifty others. Stop! my young readers, and before you call this hypocrisy, wait until forty years more have passed over your head, and ten to one, but you will then call it prudence. I can tell you, between friends, that were not the affairs of the world thus conducted, the earth would be, as far as man is concerned, one great scene of discord.

To a close observer there appeared nothing of hard hearted atrocity in the character of James Gray, but he loved money, and pursued money for itself, and neglected every thing else; and amongst the rest, his own child. With a view to great profit, which was indeed in the end realised, this man was induced, much to the astonishment of even the man who led him into the engagement, to become security to a considerable amount. His intellects never of high order where his property was concerned, James Gray, the moment his name was on paper became alarmed; the sweets of sound and refreshing sleep fled his pillow, and each day and night fear increased its phantoms, until James Gray added one more name to the list of men whose minds sink to actual insanity, from the apprehension of what, in a majority of cases, never happens. At the age of forty, in ruins, was seen sitting in utter faturity, bewailing his loss, a man who had at that time, perhaps no compeer in wealth in all western Pennsylvania. His family, and the world generally with its concerns, faded from his view, one desolating fancy remaining to render his life a terrific dream. The step-mother and protector of little Julia, we have already sketched and need not add, that tearful indeed was the path of the orphan. Muttering his fancies, and writhing under supposed wrong, the mind of James Gray took a turn in its wanderings. From childish apathy or listless indolence, frenzy succeeded. His range was now the tangled woods, where, with curses loud and fearful, and screams too dreadful for human ear, the very wild animals of the forest, and the casual being of his own species who met him in his walks, alike fled his presence.

Nature could not long support such a condition of existence, and the unearthly maledictions of James Gray, became silent. "Where is he?" demanded one neighbour of another;—none could answer. To do justice to his unworthy wife, in the case of her husband, she added not hypocrisy to want of feeling, and was amongst the last to ask, and the most indifferent to answer, "Where is he."

That question must be a very stirring one, which continues to interest any portion of the great world through one whole week, and taking their way towards oblivion, the name and fate of James Gray, had pretty nearly floated out of the little fraction of the world watered by Chartier, by the next Sunday morning after he had been seen by several persons. Sunday morning, particularly in summer, is in a country place, where friends have but one place of general meeting, a most important little era. To those not fashioned to city manners, let their individual belief be what it may, the sight must be deeply interesting, to see old and young, in decent dress, coming together in peace and harmony, free from toil, and with one voice chaunting a hymn to the AUTHOR OF ALL BEING. That hymn had rose and ceased in the Meeting House of John Dancey, and the Pastor himself, had read:

"And I find more bitter than Death, the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whoso pleaseth God, shall escape from her; but the sinner shall be taken by her." Eccl'sts. vii. 26.

In true singleness of heart the preacher took his text, in a mystical sense, intending by "The Woman," the evil propensities of the human heart, but there was one hearer who received the words literally. This was Mrs. Gray, and the words, "The woman whose heart is snares," was no sooner pronounced, than she had to encounter every eye in the Meeting House, who could get a sight of her, and had her ears greeted by many a heartfelt groan. How she felt, was never known by man, for the reverend gentleman had just commenced the division of his subject into five heads, with a conclusion, and the members of his congregation were adjusting their seats and their patience for a long sitting, when priest and laity were electrified, as in rushed Patrick O'Doyle, his naturally expressive features strongly agitated, and without apology or interlude, observed very deliberately, "I have found him."

Who he had found was surmised at once by all present, and as they rose from their seats, the minister merely demanded, "Where?" and O'Doyle as sententiously replied, "In the Mill Dam." The service was at an end for that day, as all the congregation hurried after Patrick O'Doyle. The body was removed to shore, and as the Coroner of the county was accidentally present, an immediate inquest was held, one member of which was the Rev. John Dancey, and another Solomon Rayfield.

It was one instance of such an inquest, on which the members were not compelled to violate their real convictions from any mistaken delicacy. The insanity of James Gray had been too apparent for doubt, and when the humane heart of Mr. Dancey, was powerfully affected, his language was only short of inspiration. His common prolixity dissappeared, and in the case before us, a short address wrung the heart of every hearer. The utter worthlessness of wealth, as an END, and not as a MEANS, seemed to come to their souls as from the lips of Inspiration. And were not indeed the words the expression of Inspiration?

Not all the influence, however, of Mr. Dancey, Solomon Rayfield and one or two more, could procure for the remains of Gray a resting place, in what in common custom had been called his burying ground. Here a cord was touched which sounded harshly in its vibrations. "His soul is in the hands of his GOD, with that we dare not, we wish not to meddle," said the elders and the far greater part of the congregation ratified the decision, "But let him rest in what he called his own land."

In land once his own, and in a deep and wooded vale, not far distant from, but out of sight of all human habitation, was placed with sad, not sorrowful solemnity, the corpse of James Gray. Much of superstition then lurked, and some yet lurks along Chartier, and soon from "Gray's Grave," according to report, issued sounds at eve, which drove more than the strolling boy far away from where the chilled imagination could give terrible meaning to the echoing winds; and where a sight might appear, too horrible for human courage to behold. The spot, dark, tangled and lonely from nature, became deserted and desolate. Long and mournfully was pronounced "Gray's Grave."

"Man ought not to war with the dead," is one of those humane injunctions not in every case easy to obey. The harsh feelings of man against James Gray, would have yielded, however, to the common law of forgetfulness, had not his child remained to revive every bitter reflection on his memory. Whatever, not of kindness, for that she never enjoyed, but mitigation of hatred, Julia had experienced on the part of her stepmother during the life of her father, now vanished; and this fine child, who inherited the angelic disposition, and was a living miniature of her departed mother, had for three years to endure unremitting torture. Thus, uncloathed, except in rags, unfed, except on the refuse of a kitchen, and compelled to sleep, if sleep she could, amid straw and filth, passed the years of a child entitled to a rich inheritance, the property of her mother.

On the very day of his burial, the man for whom Gray had been security, came forward and fully satisfied all present, that his engagements were fully provided for. And as soon as legal means were also provided, to give him a discharge, this man made complete settlement with, and considerably enlarged the estate.

"What is every body's business is no one's business," is another saying, of much more general application, than that death operates as a treaty of peace between the dead and living. It was every-day rendered more and more obvious, that Julia ought to be taken out of the hands of her persecutor. Pity is a natural feeling, and when it leads to relief, an almost divine feeling; but pity is too often a barren waste of sympathy. Julia Gray, appeared, in despite of any commisseration felt in her favor, to be destined to rise to maturity destitute of education, and moral culture, but from this state of thraldom she seemed at once snatched by a still more dreadful fate. One evening late in autumn, she had been more than usually beaten, and driven, bruised and bitterly weeping, to her pallet of straw.

The next morning the shrill voice of Jane Gray, for the first time, failed to rouse the trembling Julia. Call after call obtained no response, and the irritated step-mother rushed into the kitchen venting threats,—but no Julia was there. Every one about the farm was roused, and the alarm that Julia Gray was missing, soon spread over the neighbourhood, but all search was in vain—not a trace of the lost girl was to be found.

The not idly terrified Jane Gray, made, for once in her life, every effort in favor of humanity, whilst her own danger became every moment more eminent. "Murder," first whispered, was soon audibly, and long before night, loudly sounded in her ear, and the enraged inhabitants were only calmed by her arrest.

In this moment of excessive agitation, and violently aroused passions, when this woman changing a comfortable home for a prison, and crushed by the wrath of her fellow creatures, the conduct of the Rayfield family and their next neighbour, Patrick O'Doyle, excited no small astonishment. In her extremity, Jane Gray found no friends, but she found, where and like all avaricious men, timid to extreme, she least expected, two men, and one of these a very influential man, who persisted in the opinion that she was innocent of the alleged murder.

Only those who have observed society with a scrutinizing eye, can ever perceive the singular and often very deep moral influences, operating on trials of life and death. Her true position Jane Gray could not understand, but she felt, and deeply felt her danger. In herself or in retrospect of her life no consolation offered, and in society, except those purchased by her money, one man only, Solomon Rayfield, entered her prison and spoke of hope and safety. Every legal delay under pretext of still finding alive the lost Julia, having been exhausted, the day of trial came, and with it an almost universal opinion of certain conviction.

The charge was supported by evidence entirely circumstantial, but as the trial advanced, circumstances of crimination seemed to combine with irresistible force. The defence rested on the body not being found, and on the evidence of Patrick O'Doyle. This testimony stated, that the deponent with several others had been the day before the evasion of Julia, employed in repairing some part of the mills belonging to Mrs. Gray; that a very heavy rain had so swelled the creek, that he was compelled to remain all night in Mrs. Gray's house; and that with an intention of returning home, he rose very early in the morning; and saw and spoke to Julia outside of the house. Finally O'Doyle closed by observing, that he "Wondered not at seeing the chile out of doors before day, knowing the ways of the family."

Notwithstanding the closing remark, O'Doyle's testimony was very decisive in favour of the prisoner at the bar:—but still, that a female child of eight years of age, could, in the cold and wet of November, with creeks flowing full, leave the neighbourhood, seemed next to impossible. That by some means the lost child had been drowned, became at length the settled opinion of court and audience, and also of the Jury: but with them was left the awful yes or no, did she fall by accident, or by the hand of her unnatural step-mother. Two days the trial lasted before the Jury was sent to their room, having received a brief and rather vague charge from the bench; but a charge inclining to acquittal. Two nights and one day more, did the Jury remain engaged in earnest recapitulation and comparing the testimony, and on the morning of the second day returned into court. The room and yard was crowded, yet a pin dropping would have been heard. The convulsive sobs of the woman whose life depended on two words, were the only sounds which broke the dread silence. At length the decisive "NOT GUILTY," was read.

If the character of man is mysterious in any one thing more than another, it is in their general conduct, in cases of acquittals on charges involving life and death. Jane Gray, pale as a statue, sat a few moments after hearing of her escape; then clasped her hands to her temples, uttered a piercing scream, and fell senseless; and in a state of infantile weakness was conveyed to her home under the care of Solomon Rayfield, who alone stood by her through the storm.

The acquittal of a Jury often prolongs life, but where a strong suspicion of blood-guiltiness fastens on the public mind, it is difficult to conceive life to be held under any other more dreadful tenure. Existence is in such cases a lingering death, and such was the case of Mrs. Jane Gray. It is true, the dews and rains of Heaven fell upon her fields, as upon the fields of others; the sun shone and the winds blew as genial upon her fields, as upon the fields of others, —her harvests, her orchards, and her stock, were no more liable to blight, mildew, or disease, than were those of her neighbours. To her well constructed and well managed mills, the adjacent inhabitants brought their grain.

In brief, if any difference in prosperity, as far as wealth was concerned, it was perceptible a more than common share fell on the Gray farm. But, still that prosperity was without soil,—a black and scowling gloom hung over the whole scene. For want of direct proof, she had not been punished as a murderess, but yet, as such was she regarded by the public, and the tone of human feeling must greatly change, before public indignation is easily or quickly appeased in any similar case. That impression which grows deeper by time, and which death alone can obliterate, was made on every heart, and "The murdered Julia," came to remembrance whenever Jane Gray, or her history came to remembrance.

So passed ten more tedious years.

* * * * * *

During the most part of the intervening period of ten years, I had been absent, and only occasionally received and exchanged a letter with my old friend Rayfield, to whose house I hastened on my return. Sprigs of the almond tree had crowned the old farmer and his wife, and their daughter had become a fine young woman. My reception was cordial, the evening very fine, and the downward sun glanced his yellow beams over the hills and vallies, and over the Gray farm, which spread from us eastward a rich landscape.

"Jane Gray, is she yet living?" I demanded.

"A living death," replied Mr. Rayfield, "but friend Mark, if you have been surprised at the first part of her history, you will be more astonished at the latter. Jane Gray, is now living in the house she once called her own, under the protection of Warden Rayfield, my son, and his wife Julia, once Julia Gray."

I actually started to my feet, repeating, "Julia Gray!" and sunk back on my chair, still repeating, "Julia Gray!"

"Yes! Julia!" replied father, mother, and daughter together; "The supposed murdered Julia, is now the matron of yonder mansion, and our beloved, daughter and sister."

"Can such glad tidings be true?" I responded, as soon as I recovered from my trance of astonishment.

"Yes! true," replied the whole family together, "as the ways of God are just," and continued Mr. Rayfield, "we have yet time to pass over events ending so heart-pleasing, before supper."

I sat a statue of attention, and the old historian proceeded.

"You no doubt remember the little Julia, and the mysterious circumstances attending her disappearance, and also the trial of Jane Gray. The real facts of the case were only known to the persons here present, to our son Warden, and to Patrick O'Doyle. Before I proceed to relate those facts, I must do justice to that man; by saying, that very few men, educated or uneducated, ever exceeded him in cool, determined courage, of course in presence of mind; and farther, none can exceed him in purity of purpose. You recollect that it was his evidence that saved Jane Gray from conviction, by deposing that the saw and spoke to Julia, on the morning of her disappearance."

That morning was one we had all too much reason to remember, to admit our forgetting the appearance of nature. The moon had passed the full about two days, but the sky was overcast, therefore, it was one of those mornings which prevents us from distinguishing day break. Patrick then in Mrs. Gray's house, I have no doubt providentially detained there, awaked long before day, but not being able to distinguish musky moon light from twilight, though the day had dawned and rose in order to return to his own house. The room he slept in was only divided by a plank partition from the pallet of poor Julia, and we suppose, that the noise he necessarily made, roused the poor distressed girl, and that in the alarm she thought only of her step-mother,—but be that as it may, she started up and rushed frantically from the house, pursued by the astonished O'Doyle, she took the road directly towards Chartier, and towards this house. Such was the effect of her terror that she very closely approached the still foaming creek, before the really active O'Doyle could overtake and seize her in his arms. His voice did not fall kindly on her ear for the first time, and it now came soothingly to her beating heart, as her waking senses returned. He folded her to his manly breast, and in place of bearing her back to her step-mother, dashed through the creek and bore her into this house. We were all up and around the dripping man and child in a few moments, and had a fire kindled before O'Doyle commenced his explanation, which closed with the most bitter "bad luck to her," that I ever heard him express.

When I remember the condition of the suffering child, christian charity seems extinct in my breast. When bereft of her wet, to put on dry and warm clothing, her tender limbs showed one series of wounds and stripes.

My own share in the affairs of Julia Gray, so long accounted for by the public, by every suggestion but the true one, was even a mystery to my family and O'Doyle, at the moment of her evasion, but you will soon receive what will convince you of the correctness of my proceedings. When my real motives were disclosed to the public in this vicinity, some few there were who condemned, but applause came from the far greater number, and what is of infinitely more consequence to me, I have a self-approving and I firmly believe a God approving conscience.—But let us proceed.

So long and so bitterly had Julia suffered every species of hardship, and hunger not even did she escape, that she seemed to devour some warm milk and bread, and in a few moments fell into a sound sleep on the lap of my wife. If our feelings had not been most powerfully enlisted in her cause, our excitement would have been roused to the utmost while looking on her angel face, as she seemed to repose in gladness. A voice went to my inmost soul, saying, "That child is given to thy care."

"And as far as strength is given me," I inwardly breathed, the trust shall be faithfully fulfilled."

My purpose was instanly formed, and I knew Patrick O'Doyle too well to conceal from him that purpose, and I observed, "Julia must not be returned to her."—

"Returned," vehemently interrupted O'Doyle, "No, I'd take her on my back myself and beg before—bad luck to her."

"I have reasons," I replied, "which I cannot explain, for what I am to propose,—Julia must be concealed and taken out of this part of the country. I then detailed the plan of proceeding, which as I came to a close, O'Doyle with one of his inimitable expressions of face, muttered—

"Mother Gray will be"—and pausing a moment, finished by, "She deserves it, come what will."

His thought flashed on us all, and in one breath responded, by completing O'Doyle's prediction, "Will be charged with murder," which I, however, carried out by exclaiming, "so let her be charged, the charge will be only for what she has morally committed. Well does she deserve all the terrors of even a conviction for a crime, it is evident she has no compunction against committing; and we have the means in our hands to snatch the child from the grasp of Jane Gray, and in the last extremity save herself from death, if even convicted."

I then proceeded to arrange matters; secresy, it was merely and indeed scarcely necessary to enjoin. We had long been preparing to send my son Warden to Princeton, within a few miles of which resided a farmer in good circumstances, and a very particular friend of myself and family, and also a cousin of Mary Layton, the mother of Julia. To this man and his wife, I was determined to confide Julia, and never was confidence better placed. For the moment, however, we were put to our utmost resources to carry our design into effect, as, while we were concerting measures, and still before day actually broke, all was uproar at Gray's. Very seldom had poor Julia been permitted to rest on her wretched pallet at open day, and this morning the shrill voice of Jane Gray in a louder and louder key, calling Julia, at length acutnally reached our ears. Not a moment was to be lost, and we were admirably aided by the cool O'Doyle, who snapping his fingers exclaimed,

"Do you fix things; I'll go over there," and away he was like an arrow. We hastily conveyed the little sleeper to an upper room with my daughter to watch over her, and I then followed O'Doyle.

One of the first exclamations made by Jane Gray, when Julia was first missed was, "where is O'Doyle?"—and when the man himself made his appearance with a face expressing, "what is the matter here?"—the now almost distracted woman ran to meet him crying, "Julia oh! Julia," and oh! Mr. O'Doyle, did you see nothing of Julia?"

O'Doyle stopping short, and with a stare, which no man but an Irishman, ever could assume, after a long breath answered her by repetition.

"Julia—Julia—what of her?"

"Mr. O'Doyle what time did you rise?"

"What time did I rise?" replies O'Doyle, as if in the utmost surprise at the question—"why this morning, shure,"

"Oh! heavens, Mr. O'Doyle, did you see nothing of Julia?"

"Did I see nothin of Julia? sartin what could I see of the chile? To be plain Misthress Gray, these are strange questions; an to be more plain Madam, if I d'dnt see you I heard you put'n her to bed last night.—Sure you ought to know bether than me, how she got out nse it."

The first part of this reply was too much for the terrified woman; the close she heard not, but it was not wasted in air, as a number of the neighbours had already arrived, and others every moment appearing, and just as O'Doyle closed to him rather lengthy ejaculations, and I came close to where he was standing, a hoarse and very angry voice was heard.

"She knows very well what has become of her husband's child," and in a tone still more loud and angry, another voice rose, "If Julia Gray is not found, and alive and well, Jane Gray shall be found."

I now exerted myself to turn every attention to search, but long ere noon I found it necessary to keep Mrs. Gray under my own protection, and within her own house. From the decent and reflecting part of the crowd, she had no personal danger to fear, but there were on the ground numerous very different characters, and some half intoxicated, whose threats were not to be disregarded, or easily resisted, and in fact, there were but two men present, O'Doyle and myself, who did not agree in opinion that Julia was murdered. We, you are aware, could not, and myself in an especial manner, as you will see, disclose the truth, without an utter abandonment of our plans. Under the necessity of protecting Jane Gray, I was relieved from what I must know was a fruitless search, but about two in the afternoon, a very serious reflecting though plain man, and a justice of the peace called me to one side, and then observed solemnly,—

"Mr. Rayfield I am dreading every moment to hear that the body of Julia Gray is found, and if it is, and covered with the rags, in which she was usually exposed, that miserable woman will be torn to pieces, and all of us, who wish to leave her to the laws of God and man, will not be able to prevent her destruction." And again, after a long pause he finished in a still more solemn tone, "I dread evening any how."

"She shall be got out of the way," I replied, and hastened into the house and into the room which Mrs. Gray was pacing in little short of distraction. Strange as it may appear, it was on me and me alone she depended for relief or safety in her danger, and in my presence became calm, and passive. It was no time for either delay or misplaced delicacy, and in few words I told her soothingly, that I did not myself join in the charge of murder, but that I could not restrain an enraged multitude, and that her only chance of protection was under the arm of legal authority. She submitted even thankfully, and the man who suggested its necessity made out a warrant, and she was put in custody of a constable.

"Now occurred again another of those mysterious illustrations of human character. It was no sooner known that Mrs. Jane Gray was in the custody of even a common constable under a simple warrant, than threats against her ceased, and late in the afternoon, the county sheriff arrived and the wretched victim of her own cruelty was led from her home to a prison."

"Yes! I see by your looks Mark Bancroft, that you think the affair was carried too far, but I think otherwise, and I must explain another one to my share of the proceedings. Between myself and James Gray, there never was friendship, but on his part towards me there was confidence. In full health, and in complete exercise of his unimpaired faculties, many years before his death, he came to with me a request to draw his will, and to be named as sole executor. To draw up the will, I readily consented, but to be executor I did not consent without much persuasion. But I did consent, and the will was duly executed, and deposited in my hands. Three very respectable men of the county were witnesses. I kept an open copy.

On this will was endorsed, an order, that it should not be opened until Julia Gray, the daughter of the testator was eighteen years of age complete; or in case of her death, or lastly, by consent of the executor, in open court. A second endorsement named me, as also I had been named within, whole and sole executor. In the endorsements no allusion was made to Jane Gray, the second wife.

But to me as matters turned out, and until the will would be opened and its contents made public, only known to me, James Gray by an inconsistency too common in wills, left the custody of his daughter to the full control of her stepmother. Being the only person acquainted with the provisions of the will, and knowing the inextricable legal disputes that would follow a disclosure of the existence of Julia, or the opening of the will on the supposition of her death, and farther, that every humane and prudent consideration regarding the orphan urged her being kept out of the power of her step-mother, I had the important paper deposited as the law directed, after the death of the father, and used my authority to prevent its being opened until the period would pass at the end of which Julia would reach her full age of eighteen, urging the possibility of her being alive, as no direct proof of her death had been produced. Mrs. Jane Gray could not oppose any serious opposition to this course without advancing on the assumption of the death of her step-daughter, which, if she had done, the whole mine of latent suspicion against her would have been blown into a flame; therefore, she was compelled to let matters rest.

Some informality there might have been in all these proceedings, yet not such as to superinduce injustice, but on the contrary, to secure the reverse. Jane Gray was left in possession of the estate, but under my eye; and regarding herself as ultimate and full heiress, she administered it well. She was indeed left to the management of her affairs, as her house was, except by her servants and work people, a solitude. On her brow and in her heart sat cankering, devouring care with sleepless wakefulness. Before her keen sense appeared two impending casualties, to her alike dreadful. She shared with the public, the opinion that Julia had been actually drowned, of course shuddered at the consequences to herself of the fact being by any means rendered certain; for though she well knew she could not be again brought before a court of justice, for the offence, yet that popular vengeance would be again roused. The latter danger she had frequent causes to apprehend, by murmurs which reached her ear from time to time.

In almost any supposable case, except that of Jane Gray, in which a woman endured the suspicion of having murdered her husband's child, the reappearance of that child in life must have been hailed by the suspected party as a benefaction from heaven, but such were the peculiar intricacies of guilt and ruin which environed Jane Gray, that it was doubtful to me, and I had more means of comprehending her struggles than any other person which she most dreaded, the certainty of the life or death of Julia. We leave her now, however, to the inflictions of remorse, shame, and never dying or sleeping anxiety, and follow the footsteps of the object of her fears.

I have already mentioned, that at the time of the disappearance of Julia, we were preparing to send our son Warden to Princeton College, a circumstance very happily well known in our neighborhood, therefore, on the fourth night after the catastrophe, my son with the little charge were far on their way before day break. With letters from me, by diligence they both reached safely the house of my friend Ringwood Layton, in New Jersey. This truely honest and good man had a wife deserving such a husband, and before two days were over little Julia was deep in the affections of both; they were themselves childless. To this worthy couple I disclosed the whole history of Julia. Between Mr. Layton and my son, it was arranged that Julia should pass under the name of her mother Mary Layton, and as an orphan relation of Ringwood Layton. This latter was true in fact. Warden was fixed at Princeton, and little Mary soon as happy as infant innocence, health, and kind treatment could make her, became the cherished child at Ringwood farm.

Except the trial of Mrs. Gray, which was as I have already stated delayed as long as law would admit, ten more years passed away. With us here on Chartier, the ordinary incidents of life only came and went to mark the passing time. In the vacations, Warden retired to Ringwood, and by his letters and those of Mr. Layton, we learned with unmixed delight the progress of Mary.

"The little spirit" says Layton in one of his letters, "she is by turns a bee, an angel, and a sky lark—she is sometimes all three at once. By the hands of a travelling painter, I have had her drawn at her spinning wheel, yes! at her wheel, for she would have one, and declares it is the finest buzzing play thing she ever saw. By the first good chance you shall have the picture—we have what is worth ten thousand such pictures"—and so he ran on, and we were made glad by many more of his letters.

The most strict injunctions were laid on all parties, to avoid before Mary any allusion to her real history, and as years of joy and gladness past, the incidents of her unhappy infancy faded and became dim. Of her father she had lost all recollection, and her step-mother, well remembered, appeared as an infuriate wretch to which in her orphan state she had been exposed. The objects of either joy or sorrow imprinted on our infant minds, is perhaps never obliterated, though in after years we cannot give them restored being in our recollections. It was observed of Julia Gray, that any harsh expression made in her hearing fell so heavily on her mind as to long depress her spirits, and that she shrunk with disgust and horror from any woman, in any manner resembling her step-mother. From fourteen to seventeen she was sent to Bethlehem, where she could hear no sounds but those of kindness and harmony—where she saw no figures to recall her terrors;—and where she learned only what was useful, ornamental and elevating to learn. At her home at Ringwood, again she met only tenderness.

Long before Julia had completed her eighteenth year, and before Warden Rayfield had completed or would consent that he had completed his studies, we learned, at first indeed with pain, that the feelings of cousins as they called each other, had taken a far more serious turn, and deeper intensity. From his lisping childhood, I had endeavoured by kindness and attention to him as a rational being to secure the confidence of my son, and in this instance I received his full confidence.

"My father, he observed in one of his letters my situation with—you know. Was she really the destitute, but virtuous and amiable, Mary Layton, all would be plain before us—But, lovely, accomplished and wealthy as Julia Gray—would to heaven she was restored to her rights, and knew her real condition. From a sense of duty, I have been compelled to fly far from her. I have not seen her for weeks. She thinks me—yes, a monster. Her protectors cannot explain. And—but." Here he entered on another subject. To this letter I answered.

"My son, pursue the path of true honor, of religion.—Be patient, and all may be yet to your wish. A few months, and Mary Layton, will become Julia Gray." In due time I received an answer to the preceding, requesting our consent to a journey into Virginia, in company with a young gentleman and fellow student. The conclusion of this letter ran thus. "I have not strength to meet the trial, nor had I such fortitude, I ought not to be present." Our consent was given, and in the same month. Warden Rayfield set out for Virginia, and Mary Layton for Chartier.

It was in the fall of the leaf, when as in death, a smile played over the pale visage of nature, and in early October, that the silver locks of Ringwood Layton, and the dark locks and sweet blue eyes of Mary Layton were seen at our humble board. As we sat down to our domestic supper, the evening of their arrival, "Thank the All Disposer," ejaculated the worthy old man, "my charge is returned safe into the hands of her best earthly friends," and casting a knowing glance at my wife and myself continued. "As soon as possible after the twelfth of this month, I must set out on my return," laying great emphasis on the word twelfth.

Poor Mary, as we still continued to call her, had been just so far informed of her own history, as to know that the same twelfth day of October was her birthday, and that her next birthday was the completion of her eighteenth year. When Mr. Layton proposed therefore, to remain with us until the said twelfth, Mary very naturally supposed, what was indeed most true to an extent she little conceived, regarded the delay as an affectionate attention to her, tremulously exclaimed "dear uncle"—could say no more, but her tears spoke gratitude.

Little surmising of how immense an importance was this twelfth of October, Mary Layton retired to rest. To me I must confess, it was not a night of rest. Sleep fled my pillow.

The whole circumstances of the Gray family, and my own responsibility, passed in review. Though in a retrospection, I could remember nothing exciting self reproach; yet I could not repress a feverish anxiety on account of the now noble woman, the once bruised, bleeding, and shivering child brought under my roof and protection, by means so extraordinary and attended with such striking circumstances. The future also offered images darkly seen, but of fearful presence. In a few days the stranger Mary Layton would be changed to the wealthy Julia Gray, and my son—thus revolving the past and present passed the night.

The next morning opened and presented all the rich garb of an American autumn, but it was visible to my family and friends, that my mind had been harrassed. My looks were no doubt care speaking, and to their kind inquiries, I replied, as I laid my Bible on the table, and as all sat down around me, I observed, "This will restore my spirits." I then gave out and we chanted together that song which no sceptic could ever hear unmoved, the twenty-third Psalm.

After the morning duties, and our breakfast was over, I called the whole group into the room in which we are now sitting, and setting Mary Layton beside myself, and pointing to the fine eastern landscape in the midst of which beautiful picture spread the Gray farm. Whilst Mary whose taste of the works of nature and rural scenery was exquisite, had her eyes and mind fixed on the scene before her, I opened a roll of paper, observing I had a short tale I wished to read. All was attentive and I in a slow and solemn tone read a narrative of the events I have now related. As the reading advanced, the mind of Mary was withdrawn from the seductive landscape, and her every faculty enchained by the history of Julia. She actually forgot the place where she then sat, and followed the path of the suffering child. I had adopted her own real name. At length she raised her streaming eyes to Heaven, and then leaned on her hands. Thick and crowding came her recollections. She seemed to be awakening from a lengthened dream to reality. Her lips moved, but she interrupted me not, though long before my reading was closed, she was fully convinced that she was the Julia Gray of my tale.

As I closed and was dropping the roll on the table, she fell on her knees leaning on mine, breathing, "oh I have indeed been a brand plucked from the fire." And again, but inaudibly to us she sent her thanks to where they were heard.

From a situation really too painfully delightful to be long supported, we were relieved by another face peeping in at the door. It was the rough but kindly expressive visage of Patrick O'Doyle, who had been thus long purposely kept out of sight. It has been long observed, that the human eye is not only the window but the sun of the human heart. The intervening years, which had greatly changed myself and my wife and daughter, and even our house, had, except changing a few of his hairs to grey, made very few changes on O'Doyle. With her recollections enlivened by the reading of my paper, the moment Julia saw O'Doyle, she almost screamed his name, and in a moment more her arms was clasped round her manly preserver.

After some order had been restored, O'Doyle with a sarcastic smile, observed "Feth that's more than I expicted, and much more than I got this mornin over the creek."

"What did you get over the creek this morning Patrick?" I replied.

"First," says Patrick, "I got a message, while at the mill, that madam wanted to spake to me, and by good luck I wanted to spake to her, so I went up wid my hat in my hand. "Good mornin Misther O'Doyle, says she. Oh! I always know when this Misther comes that a secret is fished for, and I bowed as much as to say, "your will Misthress Gray." "Misther O'Doyle," says she, "I'm tould that there's a lady arrived at Mr. Rayfields."

"A young lady," says I, looking at her.

"Yes, says she, a young lady, and they say her name is Mary Layton."

"Mary Layton, Mary Layton, says I, studying a bit wid my hand to my ear, and then tould her, looking full in her face, "Aye to be shure that's her name, and Misthress Gray, says I, in my turn, wast'nt that the name of Mr. James Gray's first wife?—But my conshins I saw the madam had no notion to give secret for secret, but seemed willin to give me something else I didn't want, an I made a step or two backwards towards the road, for she had a purty stout stick in her hands. Still bating my retrate, I says "Oh madam no offence I hope, but they say that the young lady at Misther Rayfields is as like as two paise to the first Misthress Gray—a relation may be." But before I askt the last question of mysilf, I was by mysilf in the big-road; and says I again to mysilf, Misthress Gray, you'll soon know all about it, you will."

Under the excuses of fatigue and indisposition, neither being altogether confounded, Julia was kept as far as possible out of sight; but so penetrating is curiosity, and so vague popular report, that the week after her arrival had not passed, until it was over the whole adjacent country, that a relation of the first Mrs. Gray was come forward to claim the estate under some plea that it came by and remained in their legal heirs of the first wife. Though in all the varied shapes of such reports, flying from mouth to mouth, strange it was, not a surmise of the real truth was formed. The strong resemblance, I verily believe reported by O'Doyle to torture Mrs. Gray, and the unity of names, was base enough for this invented pyramid.

We found on this occasion, how deep and enduring had been the impression on the public mind of the actual murder of Julia, and the equally strongly impressed confidence, that Providence would in fitting time, reveal the crime and bring to punishment the perpetrator. And by a very natural operation of that sense of justice so salutary to human society, I verily believe Mrs. Gray was protected in great part from personal violence, she being regarded as the reserved victim of vengeance.

As reports were crossing, and often contradicting each other, the eventful twelfth passed, and I sought a meeting with Mrs. Gray, in presence of the two surviving witnesses to her husband's will. She received us with much formality, and in ill concealed anger and trepidation. Before I could state my errand, she observed, "Mr. Rayfield, I am told that there is now residing at your house a young woman of the same name with James Gray's first wife."

"In my house," I replied," at this time there is residing a young woman who came there under the name of Maria Layton."

"And to claim my estate!" sharply responded Mrs. Gray.

There was so much of truth in this indirect demand, that under the circumstances I was compelled to give an evasive answer, but in as mild a tone as I could assume, I observed—

"Mrs. Jane Gray, that young lady came to my house with no such intention, but if she had came there with such views, that would have nothing to do with our present business." I now fixed my eyes firmly on her face and continued, "you know that as soon as possible after the twelfth day of October, which would have completed the eighteenth year of Julia Gray, that her father's will is to be opened. That day has now nearly arrived."

If you can picture a woman past middle age, never very good looking even when young, and whose whole frame, and visage agitated by the worst of passions and remorseful recollections, you may have a faint image in your mind of Mrs. Jane Gray, who sat before us silent as death.

To all requisite arrangements she assented, and in due time, the, to all parties, awful morning dawned, clear and fine and bracing and the sun rose and shone with an enlivening warmth, and splendour, as if grime, or even the imaginings of crime, had never existed. Guilt trembles and shudders at the aspect of such a crisis, and even innocence itself, cannot encounter unmoved such a change in the current of life. It demanded all our support to uphold Julia, as the decisive moment approached.

The fact that James Gray's will was to be opened, spread far and wide, and except to see Jane Gray herself led to what most of her acquaintance thought she deserved, no other event could have collected a larger crowd. Almost literally before ten in the forenoon, the population for many miles round, was poured into the country seat of ——.

This intensity of feeling and of curiosity, was, I am on reflection inclined to think, much increased by some incautious expressions of my family, or of O'Doyle; as the idea, though vague, almost universally prevailed amongst the people present, that the opening of the will of her father, would in some insecretable manner reveal the fate of Julia Gray.

The usual formalities gone through, the seals of the important document were broken and it was read in open court.

This will commenced by stating that the testator James Gray, stood indebted to Mary Layton, with whom he intermarried, for all his property; acknowledging that he the said James Gray was, previous to his first marriage, destitute of property; and then stated the justice of vesting the bulk of his fortune on his daughter, by the said Mary, and her legal heirs, which was then formally done.

To his second wife he directed the payment of an annuity of three hundred dollars, during her life, if she remained unmarried.

In case of the death of Julia Gray, without lawful issue, before the age of eighteen, then the whole property with trifling exceptions was to pass to and be vested in his second wife, as he had no connexion of his own to which he was willing to make out such bequest.

Some other dispositions followed, but which as matters eventuated fell of themselves, I may merely observe that the whole testament being read, a pause of several minutes followed, at the end of which, a middle aged, harsh visaged lawyer rose, the attorney of Jane Gray, who in a speech of some length, expatiated on the long persecutions his client had sustained; endeavouring to maintain that the demise of Julia Gray ought to be assumed as proven; finally demanded probat of the will in favour of Jane Gray.

To this speech our attorney, an old, very mild, but shrewed man replied, by addressing the court, to the following purport.

"We on our side are as anxious, as can be the learned gentlemen on the other side, to terminate the persecutions of Mrs. Gray, as he has been pleased to term them. In this good work we therefore enter zealously. But before probat of this last will and testament is granted, we must claim the right of calling in testimony to render the death of Julia Gray, at least doubtful.

This was granted, and Patrick O'Doyle was called.

With rather a mischievous cast of face O'Doyle presented himself, and was sworn according to the rites of his church.

In his rich brogue, but in a clear manner and voice, he gave a distinct and concise narrative of the manner in which Julia escaped, and his own share in her safety.

As this testimony disclosed a totally unexpected turn in affairs, and established the altogether unexpected fact, that Julia was still alive, the agitation became so great, that the judge was forced to rise and address the audience. He procured the utmost attention by observing, that the people were excusable in their emotion, but were in its expression defeating their own object. After the judge resumed his seat, respiration seemed suspended. O'Doyle was directed to retire, and Solomon Rayfield called and sworn.

My testimony in substance was what you have heard, and even more in detail than given to the court, as I there stated nothing, but what was absolutely necessary. When I reached the point of time at which it was requisite to bring Julia forward to claim her inheritance, I paused a moment from the excess of my own feelings. The pause was too much for the audience, who by an impulse which no judge could punish by even a look of reproach, exclaimed as if by one voice, "Where is Julia Gray?"

The judge and myself both cast imploring looks over the assembled crowd, and all was again the most noiseless attention. My heart was indeed ready to burst, and after several attempts to resume my deposition, I sunk into a chair which had been provided for me, but which I had hitherto refused to occupy.

Our attorney then handed a slip of paper to the sheriff, who in a steady and solemn voice called Julia Gray.

Vain indeed would it be for me to attempt any description of the effect this name produced. As Julia came forth from the public house adjacent, attended by my wife and daughter, and several other female friends, we expected a tumultuous expression of public feeling, but that feeling was too real for noise, and was far more impressively shown by deep silence or repressed exclamations. The crowd parted as if by one impulse, and gave free space to the female group. There was indeed a something indescribably sublime in the low, tremulous, and scarce audible repetition of "Julia Gray, that is Julia Gray, between Mrs. Rayfield and her daughter," breathed every one to themselves, as only one object was thought of. The human heart felt as if a beatified spirit had returned to partake again of human life. Julia was veiled until she reached a chair by my side. She trembled violently, but the touch and presence of her father as she fondly called me, gradually restored her firmness, and throwing back her veil, was in the act of rising, when the judge himself, who had been acquainted with her mother from infancy, in inutterable astonishment, lost for a moment all recollection of his situation, started to his feet, exclaiming "Maria Layton!—Maria Layton!—thy sainted spirit watcheth over thy child." They stood intensly regarding each other sometime, when both sunk back into their seats.

It is really Julia Gray, now ran in murmurs through the crowd, followed by a shout which shook the judgment seat, and then by another and another. All legal interferences would have been vain, nor was such interference necessary, as all again subsided to respectful silence.

Where was, I know you are now ready to ask the fallen woman? forgotten I may reply in this moment of excitement, and fallen, truly fallen. The foul stain of murder was removed from her name—but fortune, fame, and human sympathy, were gone from her forever. To earth she could turn in vain, and to Heaven with dread. During the testimony of O'Doyle and my own, she sat like a frozen corpse, and remained unmovable until the impressive acknowledgment of Julia came from the bench. Then casting a despairing and desolating gaze around her, she clinched her hands in agony. But even Jane Gray in her extremity found one sympathizing bosom in her woe. What bosom say you?—The bosom of her injured daughter, for daughter in its best and highest meaning did Julia Gray become to her father's widow. As the tearless eyes of Mrs. Gray unable to meet a pitying return, she was clasped to the heart of her step-daughter. The act was instantaneous and unexpected; the court was dismissed, and if an angel in reality had shed his wings over the broken hearted woman; those wings could not have more effectually protected her from insult than did the slender arms of Julia.

The close of the drama is soon told, Julia was put into possession of her fine estate. Her stepmother from the opening of the will, became an altered, subdued, and totally changed woman. Her harsh and obdurate spirit was broken. Into the world she could not have gone; the breasts of her fellow creatures were shut against her. She felt her lonesomeness, and she felt that safety from sneer, insult, and violence could be found only under the protection of her husband's child, and that protection she has truly found.

Here Mr. Rayfield paused—"Your son Warden?" I inquisitively exclaimed.

"Oh yes!" replied Mr. Rayfield smiling, "my son Warden was at length thought of, but it is a fact that his name was never once alluded to by Julia, until some days after the final restoration of her rights. In the mean time, my wife and daughter, were not so immersed in legal affairs, as to forget they had a son and brother. Julia remained with us, whilst O'Doyle was preparing her house, sitting one day with my daughter, when a letter from her brother was put into her hand. Sarah turned to the window and while reading became much affected, and at length unmindful that she had a hearer ejaculated in a low and mournful tone, "My brother."

Julia clasped my daughter in her arms and responded, "Your brother does not forget you." Sarah raised her eyes to the face of her friend, and earnestly replied, "No! forget me no—nor any one else he ever loved."

"Oh had I but a brother," replied Julia, pathetically as she resumed her seat.

Women seem to intuitively reach the true sentiments of each other. Warden got a reply to his letter which soon brought him to Chartier—and—yonder comes Warden, and his Julia, and our Julia, over the meadow. MARK BANCROFT.

IN MEMORY

OF MY KINSMAN—JAMES ROSS.

In the morning of youth he has gone to the grave,
While life was still glowing before him,
He sleeps with the honor'd, the gifted and brave,
And sorrow is bending o'er him.

With a mind that never to meanness bow'd,
Adorned with the gifts of nature,
He walked erect in the world's great crowd,
In the pride of his noble stature.

With a heart as warm as the hearts in Heaven,
His friendship ever was cherish'd;
And a nobler nature never was given,
Alas! that so soon he perished.

'Till he fell, no tear had ever been shed
By the friends that dearly lov'd him,
For they honor'd him living—they honor him dead,
For those who knew him, had proved him.

Had he lived till time had honor'd his name,
In the paths of honor and glory,
He might have dwelt in the temple of fame,
And shone on the page of story.

But alas! in youth, he has gone to the grave,
While life was still glowing before him,
He sleeps with the honor'd, the gifted and brave,
And sorrow is weeping o'er him. MILFORD BARD.

GUATIMOZIN.

"He was succeeded by his nephew Guatimozin, who for a while made a vigorous opposition to the assaults of Cortez. After a noble defence he was taken prisoner; but not until he had previously caused all his treasures to be thrown into the lake. Being put to the torture to make him discover his riches, he bore with invincible fortitude the refined cruelties of his tormentors. While extended upon burning coals he exclaimed, "Am I reposing on a bed of flowers?"

Unawed the captive stood before
The haughty chief of Spain;
Instead of royal robes, he wore
The flesh-consuming chain.
The spirit of the King remained,
Though oozing blood his fetters stained.
Still firm, and unsubdued;
His brow no sign of grief betrayed,
And calmly, his dark eye surveyed
The steel-clad multitude.

The instruments of torture nigh
No thrill of dread awoke;
And fixing on the chief his eye,
With energy he spoke
While bitter thoughts convulsed his brow.
"Since to my bleeding country now
I can no aid impart;
Unsheath the dagger by your side,
With the life-blood of thousands dyed,
And pierce this aching heart!"

"But yesterday, my battle-blade
Proved fatal to the foe;
And millions willingly obeyed
My beck, an hour ago;
A crownless captive now I stand,
The sceptre wrested from my hand
Inhuman chief by thee!
The spirit from this tortured frame,
Which neither bars nor bolts can tame,
Is panting to be free.

"Proud King! I will unbind thy chain,"
The cruel conqueror said,
"The crown of Empire shall again
Be placed upon thy head,
If those rich treasures are revealed
Which you have long from me concealed;
But if you rashly dare
Refuse, your treasures to disclose;
On burning coals you shall repose
By all the saints, I swear.

"When famine aided by the brand,"
The fearless King replied,
"Unnerved each bold defender's hand;
When every street was dyed
Of our great capital, with blood,
And vultures came in flocks for food,
My treasures vast, were thrown
By my command, into the sea;
Go, bid the wave give up to thee
Its gold and precious stone!"

The Spanish leader's cheek grew red,
Then darker grew his brow,
And sternly to his men he said,
"Bring blazing faggots now!"
The stake-bound victim trembled not
When fire to torture him, was brought,
With changeless brow he gazed
On those who thronged to see him die;
And calmly spoke, while haughtily
His fettered hand he raised.

"The glowing ember, not one thrill
Of dread, awakes in me,
Unfeeling men! my spirit still
Is unsubdued and free.
Ye cannot bend the chainless mind,
Although in cruel deeds refined;
When raged the battle storm,
This bosom hath been freely bared,
Undaunted I have often dared
Death in his sternest form."

"If thou wilt with those lips of pride,
Tell where thy treasures are;"
The Spaniard with a frown replied
"Your life I yet may spare."
Stretched on the coals, the monarch said,
"Of rose-leaves you have made my bed,
For treasures ask the wave!"
Old Sparta with her dazzling host
Of dauntless heroes, cannot boast
Of one more truly brave.

☞ Bulwer in his new work, the Pilgrims of the Rhine, describing the children of the "Ideal," gives the subjoined

"SKETCH OF BYRON."

And he, the erring great and dimly wise,
O'er whom stern Judgment, while it censures, sighs;
"The young, the beautiful"—whose music cast
A haunting echo where his shadow past,
And with a deep, yet half disdainful, art
Chained to his wandering home the world's mute heart;
Was he not thine—all thine?—his failings, powers,
Faults, fame, and all that make his memory ours?
Not in this world his life; he breathed an air,
It's light thy hope—it's vapor thy despair.
If earthlier passion, snake-like crept within—
If strong suspicion, nursed ungenial sin—
If his soul shrunk within one sickly dream,
Till self became his idol as his theme.
Yet, while we blame, his mournful image chides,
As if we wronged the memory of a friend.
As moonlight sways the trouble of the tides,
Wild minstrel, didst thou sway the soul, and blend
Thyself with us as in a common cause;
And when thy wayward heart its rest had won,
The eternal course of nature seemed to pause;
We stood stunn'd—shocked; thy very life had grown
A part—a power—a being of our own!

Oh, who shall tell what comforts yet were thine,
In the lone darkness of the unwatchful mind?
What time thou stood'st beside the rushing Rhine,
Or heard, through Nero's towers, the moaning wind;
Or watch'd the white moon, in thy younger day,
O'er shrunk Ilyssus shed the dreaming ray?
Victim and votary of the ideal, none
Shall sound their joys, or measure thy despair!—
The harp is shattered, and the spirit gone,
And half of heaven seems vanished from the air!

Yet still the murmurs of the Adrian sea
Shall blend with Tasso's song wild thoughts of thee:
Thy shade shall gloom through old Ravenna's lair
"Till even the forest leaves seemed stirred with prayer;"
And when the future, envious of the past,
Shall break the Argive's iron sleep at last,
Thy reverent name the Albanian youth shall keep;—
Thy shape shall haunt the Ionian maiden's sleep;—
Thy song shall linger by the Oread's hill,
By Love's own isle, and Music's ancient rill:
And one gay halo, all unknown before,
Crest the dear wastes by Missolonghi's shore!

THE GREAT WEST,

As it was sixty years past; or on the eve of the American Revolutionary War.

Bred on the Indian frontier, and an eye witness to the advance of White, and destruction of Indian population, and in the decline of life, when the far greater number of those in whose fate or fame my feelings were ever enlisted, are gone to their rest,—I hope I may speak freely. In my youth long before the most distant idea was conceived of writing on the subject, it had struck me repeatedly, that one material error prevailed, as regarded the Indian population of the Ohio valley, and that was, that their numbers were most enormously exaggerated. "What has become of the Indians?" is a question proposed on all sides, and much of its import may be complied with, by the plain answer "to the amount usually supposed, or any near approach to such an amount, the Indians never had an existence."

"This is a bold assertion," says many, and unsupported by evidence it would really be, not only a bold, but rash assertion. Let us examine the evidence.

The European settlements commenced necessarily on or near the sea coast. The first was that of Virginia, 1607, and between that epoch and 1650, the English had colonised lower Virginia, and the eastern and southern parts of Massachusetts, Rhode-Island and Connecticut; the Dutch had planted a colony on the Hudson; the Swedes one on the Delaware; and the French were scattered along the St. Lawrence. Fifty years still later, the French planted a small and feeble colony on the Mississippi river, now Louisiana. And again, at the end of another half century, or in 1750, what was the condition of the immense interior regions, drained by the confluence of the mighty Mississippi? Thus answers the author of border warfare:

"As settlements extended from the sea shore, the Massawonees gradually retired; and when the white population reached the blue ridge of mountains, the valley between it and the Alleghany, was entirely uninhabited. This delightful region of country was then only used as a hunting ground, and as a highway for belligerent parties of different nations, in their military expeditions against each other. In consequence of the almost continued hostilities between the northern and southern Indians, these expeditions were very frequent, and tended somewhat to retard the settlement of the valley, and to render a residence in it, for sometime insecure and unpleasant. Between the Alleghany mountain's and the Ohio river, within the present limits of Virginia, there were some villages interspersed, inhabited by a small number of Indians; the most of whom retired north-west of that river, as the tide of emigration rolled towards it. Some, however, remained in the interior, after settlements began to be made in their vicinity.

"North of the present boundary of Virginia, and particularly near the junction of the Alleghany and Monongahela rivers, (where Pittsburgh now stands,) and in the circumjacent country, the Indians were more numerous, and their villages larger. In 1753, when General Washington visited the French posts on the Ohio, the spot which had been selected by the Ohio Company, as the site for a port, was occupied by Shingess, king of the Delawares; and other parts of the proximate country, were inhabited by Mingoes, and Shawanees. When the French were forced to abandon the position, which they had taken at the forks of Ohio, the greatest part of the adjacent tribes removed further west. So that when improvements were begun to be made in the wilderness of north western Virginia, (north western and western Pennsylvania also,) it had been almost entirely deserted by the natives; and excepting a few straggling hunters and warriors, who occasionally traversed it in quest of game, or of human beings on whom to wreak their vengeance, almost its only tenants were beasts of the forest."

The following tabular statement, is formed on the information afforded by the best authorities on the subject, and shows, as far as correct, the state of the Indian tribes west of the main spine of the Alleghany mountains on the Ohio valley and adjacent places, at about 1755.

Munsees, Senecas, Cayugas and Sapoonies, residing on Alleghany and Susquehanna rivers, and intermediate country to lake Ontario,	1380
Delawares, residing on Big Beaver, Cayahoga, and Muskingum,	600
Shawanoes, residing on Muskingum and Scioto rivers,	300
Chippewas, near Michilimakinak,	400
Cahunnewagos, residing on Sandusky river,	300
Wyandots, on Maumee river,	250
Twightwees, residing also on Maumee,	250
Miamis, on Miami river,	300
Ottawas, in Michigan towards Detroit,	550
Ottawas, in Michigan towards Michilimakinak,	250
Chickisaws, on the western part of what is now the state of Tennessee, and northern of Mississippi,	750
Cherokees, western part of North Carolina, and adjacent parts,	2,500
Tribes scattering,	1,000
Total,	8,830

It strikes us now with utter astonishment, and to those who have received former accounts on credit and without severe examination, such an exhibition must appear as a tax on their credulity, but on the opposite side of the question to exaggeration. Yet I must venture to assume as fact, that if to the above aggregate we add the whole tribes of Creeks, Choctaws, and every other tribe from the Canadian lakes, to the gulf of Mexico, and as far west as the Meridian of St. Louis, there did not, in 1775, exist along this lengthened region an Indian population of 30,000 souls. The space exceeds an area of 450,000 square miles, or upwards of 15 square miles to every human being.

In no other instance, in all human affairs, was that profound metaphysical truth, that "words are things," more completely proven, than in the history of the Indians of the Ohio and Mississippi region. The pompous title of nation, and when using the term, the idea of nation rose in the mind, though it was given to mere tribes, and what was worse, diminutive tribes. From the first landing of the English at Jamestown, up to the treaty of Greenville, indeed we may say up to 1834, entire peace has never existed along the whole frontier line; the Indians have foreseen their ruin; have attempted confederacies, and yet, have never at any moment been able to assemble an army of 2000 men; and why?—simply because such a body would have in their state of population, demanded the entire males, of a space of country equal to Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia taken together. As the whites advanced, cut down the forests, and let daylight fall upon the earth, the Indians disappeared, as phantoms disappear before the rising sun. To render the preceding observations more striking, let us take a map of the United States, and on it draw a line through the city of Albany, to Lynchburg in Virginia, then continue the same line in both directions, and one extreme will fall on the Gulf of Mexico, a little to the westward of the mouth of Appalachicola river, and the other, after traversing the southern part of Vermont, and the northern of New Hampshire, will leave the United States in the upper part of Maine.

If on the preceding supposed line, we take Martinsville, Henry county, Virginia, as a point of outset, and proceed to the north-east, we would leave all the dense settlements of the then (1775) Anglo-North America colonies to the right or towards the ocean. On the opposite side, in Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New York and Vermont, scattering settlements had been made within the preceding forty years, but receding from the line of demarcation, the settlements became more and more scattered, until along the western ridges of the Appalachian mountains, Pittsburgh and a few other forts marked the utmost frontiers.

Returning again to Martinsville, and following our projected line in a south-westward direction, we would in 1775, have found a few settlements to our right in North Carolina, some in South Carolina, and in Georgia still fewer on that side, and before reaching the Mexican Gulf, plunge into an unbroken Indian country.

If we again suppose a second line drawn parallel to, and one hundred and fifty miles direct air course north-west of the first, the second line would on the Gulf of Mexico, leave the mouth of Mobile river, pass near Knoxville in Tennessee, traverse eastern Kentucky and western Virginia, within from ten to forty miles from Ohio river; enter Pennsylvania near the south-western angles, pass near Pittsburgh, and traversing western Pennsylvania, and western New York, merge into lake Ontario, a little west of the mouth of Oswego river, but after crossing the eastern angle of that lake, then follow the general course of the St. Lawrence, to north lat. 45°.

The parallelogram between those lines include, in the United States a length of 1200 miles, which with a breadth of 150 miles, would comprise 180,000 square miles, and the far greater part of the Appalachian region, and a region there is no hazard in asserting, having in every thing which can conduce to human happiness, no superior continuous section on the surface of the earth. The existing civilized population in 1834, is no doubt underrated at 3,500,000, and as little doubt would have been exaggerated by an estimate of one twentieth part of the number, sixty years past.

The southern part of this parallelogram was then, 1775, occupied by the Cherokees and Muskogees or Creeks; the northern by the Senecas, and other scattering tribes, but the central and far greater part of the surface was a dark, gloomy, and silent void; in regard to human civilization, and what was peculiarly remarkable, appears never to have been the permanent residence of Indian tribes. It was, as we have said, a fearful void in respect to intellectual life and improvement, but nature literally luxuriated, in both animal and vegetable productions. The buffaloe, deer, elk, and other innocent creatures, had to contend with the various tribes of the feline and canine races, and with the bear. I entered this parallel in 1781, and several years afterwards, in western Pennsylvania and Virginia, have seen flocks of deer and turkey (Maleagris Americana,) come frequently in sight of the houses, and heard the dismal howl of the wolf, in the very skirts of Washington in Pennsylvania. This may appear incredible to the generation now residing in that beautiful village, with a densely inhabited and well cultivated neighbourhood; but I can assure them of another fact, which still more strongly attests the then prevalence of the beasts of the forest. The lower part of Washington in its primitive state, was a very tangled thicket, and from that covert, I have heard the soul chilling scream of the panther, than which nature affords no other sound more piercing and appalling. The howling of the wolf is music when compared to the screams of a famished panther. Such were the commingled sounds which rendered still more dreadful by the yells of savage men, broke upon the deep solitude of the forests from the St. Lawrence to the Mexican gulf, within the life of thousands now living in happiness on its surface.

But at the interior verge of the great parallelogram we have drawn, we are still only entering the vast Ohio and Mississippi regions. Let us imagine a third line setting out from Michilimakinak, and passing through St. Louis, and continued to the north-western angle of Louisiana. The latter line is very nearly parallel to the two others, and only a few miles short of 400 to the north-west of the middle line. This interior parallelogram is also about 1200 miles in length, which at 380 miles wide, yields an area of 456,000 square miles, or something above two and a half fold more extensive than the preceding. This immense interior oblong comprises the heart of THE GREAT WEST, and contains the extreme western part of New York and Pennsylvania, three-fourths of Tennessee, two-thirds of Alabama, and half of Arkansas; about one-fourth of Missouri, and one half of Illinois, with all Louisiana, Mississippi, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio and Michigan, and now sustains an aggregate civilized population of at least 3,600,000; but which sixty years since, did not, from any document we can now procure, contain on its surface 30,000 human beings, savage and civilized.

It was not, however, the desolation which reigned over this vast surface, under which nature seemed to have concealed not only her richest but her accumulated treasures, which contributed most to arrest the attention of the very few reflecting whites, who penetrated into its recesses; no, the high problem was the character of the native people. This problem remains unsolved, nor do I come before the reader with a key in hand to unlock the mystery, but I come before the readers with plain facts. I must first, nevertheless, assume one postulate, that is, that MAN, is as much the subject of cultivation, as the ground he treads, with the difference, that MAN very tenaciously nourishes tares as well as wheat, and produces in preference, whichever has been first sown.

The scattered Indian tribes, had one feature in common, one trait of character, a thirst of vengeance, or in other words, war with them was still in its primitive state. Removed as they were in many other respects from the rudest savage state, in war they were unchanged, and unmitigated savages. What did the whites do to soften this ferocious spirit? What did the whites do to teach the savages the first lessons of humanity, mercy and protection to prisoners? These questions will be answered as we advance, most fearfully against the whites.

The statistical view here given, shows that in numbers, the Indians of the west were greatly overrated; and I now proceed to show, that their character, if not overrated, for indeed the contrary was the fact, it was most egregiously mistaken. The Indian has an abstracted contemplative air, which has been taken for stupidity or inattention. If the simple truth had been reflected on, that in civilized life, the deepest thinkers are persons who seem to look inward, the real character of the Indian would have been better understood. As far as their range of ideas extend, they think profoundly, and reflect with great discrimination.

"Their fierce and malignant passions," say some, "deprive the Indian of the benefits of his strong natural reason." True. Read the history of Europe, in all stages of the intellectual advance of its inhabitants; read the history of all the nations it contains, and compare human conduct with human conduct there in all ages, and then reproach the Indians, for sacrificing themselves and their enemies to the demon of vengeance.

Without indulging in epithets, or plunging into theories, we may carry our views backwards, and scan the fate of the Indian race, since the first Anglo-American colony set foot on the continent of North America to this hour. In Virginia, Massachusetts, Plymouth, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Georgia, and the Carolinas, in the primitive white settlements, a very different policy was pursued with the Indians, and yet, one result was produced in every one of these colonies—the Indians disappeared. Many tribes have utterly perished, and many remnants of other tribes attest still more strongly the melancholy fate of this race. The grave of the dead is less striking to our senses, or afflicting to our hearts, than is the decrepit, shrivelled and trembling aspect of expiring nature.

In Europe, Ceres preceded Cadmus by many ages, and men were there taught to make bread before they were taught to write. In the Anglo-American colonies, missionaries were placed amongst the Indians in place of the plough, and in place of taming them by kindness, they were taught the use of fire arms. In words they were described as human beings; but in action treated as incorrigible beasts of prey. And this policy was in full force, about the middle of the last century, when settlements of the whites began to be formed west of the Alleghany, or main spine of the Appalachian system of Mountains. Without stopping in the course of our view, to speculate on the probable consequences of a different system of measures, we proceed to show the effects of those actually pursued.

Between about 1735 and 1750, the whites passed the Blue Ridge. Winchester in Virginia, is the oldest town in the great valley of the United States, between the Blue Ridge and the Alleghany, and south-westward of the Susquehanna. It was a trading post as early as 1730, and gradually became a village, and long within my own recollection, remained the principal place with which the inhabitants on the upper Potomac, and Monongahela and branches, made their traffic. In the progress of settlement from the coast, and before wagons could, without very great difficulty, be conducted over the mountains, Winchester and Hagerstown became temporary, and at the period under our view, very important outposts and entrepots.

I may be permitted to mention in this place, a hitherto unnoticed, but in my humble opinion, the greatest difficulty which opposed the settlement of The West; that was the enormous price, and indispensable necessary of human life, common culinary salt. Well do I remember when salt was from five to ten dollars per bushel, and when money was at least double its present value. This was also a burthen of no momentary endurance, as it was but little abated for upwards of thirty years.

Though at far distant and separate points, from Wyoming in Pennsylvania, to Holston in south-western Virginia, settlements were made previously west of the main spine of the mountains, the real and decisive era of that great interior colonisation dates in 1752, when Robert Dinwiddie came over as Governor of Virginia. With this great man, for he well deserves the title, came John Stuart, and three of his step children; one John Paul, who died on the eastern shore of Maryland, as a Roman Catholic priest; the second, Audley Paul, a British colonial officer; and their sister Mary, afterwards the wife of Col. George Mathews.

The principal circumstance, however, which gave not alone a national but a universal importance to the administration of Governor Dinwiddie, was, that it brought on the stage of human action, one of those men who change permanently the destinies of whole nations. George Washington, third son of Augustine Washington, a planter of Westmoreland county, Virginia, was, when Robert Dinwiddie assumed the government of Virginia, in his twentieth year.

Though a youth in years, this truly extraordinary production of nature, or of a power above nature, was then mature in intellect far beyond what ordinary men ever reach, and had already commenced his military career, against the very people whose history is our theme.

That smothered fire of the civilized world, the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, covered up, or in diplomatic language signed, April 30th, 1748, "had," in the language of an elegant and profound historian, "extinguished a devouring flame with one hand, and with the other, collected combustible materials. Nothing more was wanting but the death of the king of Spain, [Ferdinand VI.] to revive war and its consequences in Europe, and the least spark could re-kindle war between France and Great Britain, on account of their limits in Canada, which had been left undetermined by vague expressions in the former treaties."*

War was not indeed to be re-kindled in the central region of North America; war, and in its most terrific form, had never ceased on that "bloody ground." Here I must anticipate events, and in the language of a most influential actor, depict the spirit of the times. This actor was the Rev. Samuel Davis, in his late years president of Princeton College. This strong minded man, tinctured, however, all the pulpit influence he possessed, with the deep animosity of an Englishman against the French, and of course coupled them and their Indian allies under one unsparing censure. In a sermon preached on the 17th of August, 1755, to Captain Overton's Independent company of volunteers, raised in Hanover county Virginia, the following language is used from the text:

2 Sam. x. 12.—Be of good courage and let us play the men for our people, and for the cities of our God: and the Lord do that which seemeth him good.

"An hundred years of peace and liberty in such a world as this, is a very unusual thing; and yet our country has been the happy spot, that has been distinguished with such a long series of blessings with little or no interruption. Our situation (Virginia,) in the middle of the British colonies, and our separation from the French, those eternal enemies of liberty and Britons, on the one side by the west Atlantic, and on the other by a long ridge of mountains, and a wide extended wilderness, have for many years been a barrier to us; and while other nations have been involved in war, we have not been alarmed with the sound of the trumpet, nor seen garments rolled in blood.

"But now the scene is changed; now we begin to experience in our turn, the fate of the nations of the earth. Our territories are invaded by the power and perfidy of France: our frontiers ravaged by merciless savages, and our fellow subjects, they are murdered with all the horrid arts of Indian and Popish torture. Our general,† unfortunately is fallen; an army of thirteen hundred choice men routed, our fine train of artillery taken, and all this, (oh mortifying thought) all this by four or five hundred dastardly, insidious barbarians!

"These calamities have not come upon us without warning, we were long ago apprized of the ambitious schemes of our enemies, and their motions to carry them into execution; and had we taken timely measures, they might have been crushed before they could have arrived at such a formidable height. But how have we generally behaved in such a critical time? Alas! our country has been sunk in a deep sleep: a stupid security has unmanned the inhabitants; they could not realize a danger at the distance of two or three hundred miles: they could not be persuaded, that even French Papists, could seriously design us an injury, and hence, little or nothing has been done for the defence of our country, in time, except by the compulsion of authority. And now, when the cloud thickens over our heads, and alarms every thoughtful mind with its near approach, multitudes, I am afraid, are still dissolved in careless security, or enervated with an effeminate, cowardly spirit.

"When the melancholy news first reached us, concerning the fate of our army, (under Braddock,) then we saw how natural it is for the presumptuous to fall into the opposite extreme of unmanly despondence and consternation; and how little men could do in such a panic, for their own defence. We have also suffered our poor fellow subjects in the frontier counties, to fall a helpless prey to blood-thirsty savages, without affording them proper assistance, which as members of the same body politic, they had a right to expect. They might as well have continued in a state of nature, as be united in society, if, in such a moment of extreme danger, they are left to shift for themselves. The bloody barbarians, have exercised on some of them, the most unnatural and leisurely tortures, and others, they have butchered in their beds, or in some unguarded hour. Can human nature bear the horror of the sight? See yonder! the hairy scalps clothed with gore! the mangled limbs; women ripped up! the heart and bowels still palpitating with life, and smoking on the ground! see the savages swilling their blood, and imbibing a more courageous fury with the human draught! Sure these are not men; they are not beasts of prey; they are something worse: they must be infernal furies in human shape. And have we tamely looked on, and suffered them to exercise these hellish barbarities upon our fellow men, our fellow subjects, our brethren. Alas, with what horror must we look upon ourselves, as being little better than accessories to their blood!

"And shall these savages go unchecked? shall Virginia incur the guilt, and the everlasting shame of tamely exchanging her liberty, her religion, and her all, for arbitrary Gallic power, and for Popish slavery, tyranny and massacre? Alas! are there none of her children, that enjoyed all the blessings of her peace, that will espouse her cause, and befriend her now in the time of her danger. Are Britons utterly degenerated by so short a remove from their mother-country? Is the spirit of patriotism entirely extinguished among us? And must I give thee up for lost, O my country! and all that is included in that important word? Must I look upon thee as a conquered, enslaved province of France, and the range of Indian savages? My heart breaks at the thought. And must ye, our unhappy brethren in our frontiers, must ye stand the single barriers of a ravaged country, unassisted, unbefriended, unpitied? Alas! must I draw these shocking conclusions?

"No: I am agreeably checked by the happy, encouraging prospect now before me. Is it a pleasing dream? or do I really see a number of brave men, without the compulsion of authority, without the prospect of gain, voluntarily associated in a company, to march over trackless mountains, the haunts of wild beasts, or fierce savages, into an hideous wilderness, to succour their helpless fellow subjects, and guard their country? Yes, gentlemen, I see you here upon this design; and were you all united to my heart, by the most endearing ties of nature or friendship, I could not wish to see you engaged in a nobler cause."

Never did as many words more completely express the moving principles of the times, nor was there ever another address more calculated to rouse the latent feelings of the colonists, and it did rouse them to action, and led on to consequences which were far from the prophetic foresight, and at the time of delivery of his sermon, as far from the wishes of Mr. Davis. But another paragraph of this same sermon, gained a most important historical and political consequence.

"Our continent," continues the fervent preacher, "is like to become the seat of war; and we for the future, (till sundry Europe nations that have planted colonies in it, have fixed their boundaries by the sword,) have no other way left to defend our rights and privileges. And has God been pleased to diffuse some sparks of the martial fire through our country? I hope he has: and though it has been almost extinguished by so long a peace, and a deluge of luxury and pleasure, now I hope it begins to kindle! and may I not produce you, my brethren, who are engaged in this expedition, as instances of it?* Well, cherish it as a sacred fire, and let the injuries done to your country, administer fuel to it: and kindle it in those breasts, where it has been hitherto smothered or inactive."*

These are the expressions of a messenger of peace, and not one quoted, is equal to others in the same collection in denunciations against the Indians and their French allies. That both parties entered on the conflict with feelings of unsparing vengeance, needs no farther proof. But how very different were the means of contest. On one side a rapidly increasing mass, with all the advantages of European science; and on the other, a few detached tribes of savages, which in the whole aggregate of persons of both sexes, fell short of ten thousand.

At this time when the Indians are crushed; when millions of whites reside in the immense regions, were once roamed the warrior hunter, and when new generations have risen, ought we not to scan the past without passion? If we place before us the cruelties of the Indian, ought we not also to place before us, what he has lost and what we have gained? If we scan the long protracted border warfare as military men, can we refuse the meed of admiration, for the prowess of a handful of naked warriors who maintained "A thirty years' War," with force and means so very inadequate, upon any principle of human calculation?

But we return to the direct object of this paper.

Even while in the hands of the French, a few English families had settled near Fort du Quesne, now Pittsburg; and a body of men had been organised under the name of "Indian Traders," and no other body of men were ever of more sinister consequence to their number. Amenable to no law, or under the moral restraint of any principle sacred to man, with few exceptions, these traders were directly and indirectly ministers of blood.

*This sermon was published not long after its delivery, and gained a sublime claim to historical record by the following note, appended to the sentence last quoted:

"As a remarkable instance of this, I may point out "to the public, that heroic youth, COL. WASHING-"TON, whom I cannot but hope PROVIDENCE "has hitherto preserved in so signal a manner, for "some important service to his country."

Short of inspiration, a more remarkable sentence was never written, and if suggestions I have more than once heard, were well founded, and I am myself a convert to their soundness, then this note stands alone in literature, as the words which have had the most effect on the fate of human liberty.

The reader will pardon a personal anecdote on this subject. When residing near Natchez, in the summer of 1800, I got acquainted with an old man, whose name I regret to have forgotten. I found him very intelligent and fond of "fighting his battles over again," one day in conversation on the Revolutionary war, the old man broke from our immediate subject, and abruptly asked me the following question.

"Do you know how George Washington came to be appointed Commander-in-chief of the continental army?"

Seeing me hesitating, he continued "I'll tell you," and springing to his feet with the activity of youth, went into his bed-room, and brought forth an old book, and opening it, proceeded; "Here are the sermons of Samuel Davis, and here is a sermon I heard preached, for I was myself one of Captain Overton's volunteer company. When some years afterwards, but long before the Revolution, I obtained this book, and was much struck myself with this note." He then read me the note, and proceeded, "Mr. Davis became President of Princeton College, and his sermons, of course became well known. Amongst many who remembered the note I have read was Dr. Witherspoon, who had much influence in Congress, when the appointment of Commander-in-chief was discussed; brought this very note forward, and decided the appointment in favour of George Washington."

Here the reader again will pardon reflection. The prediction continued to verify itself. If Mr. Davis could have foreseen the nature and extent of the services, Washington was preserved so signally to perform, it must be evident from other expressions in the same quotation, he would have started backward in terror, unless he could have foreseen also, an intire change in his own political and religious opinions.

Overrating the value of the Indian trade, and to counteract the advance of the French, and to seize the traffic from private hands, the British government chartered the Ohio Company. Under this corporation, the first serious attempts were made by the English and the Anglo-American colonists to extend settlements to the Ohio. Their agents were watched, and circumvented by the traders, who were the real instigators of the French, seizing and fortifying the point where the Monongahela and Alleghany forms the Ohio, which was done in 1754.

So many and so conflicting have been the accounts and conjectures respecting the defeat of Braddock and the army he commanded in 1755, that the real causes have been lost in mist. As I am not confined to any regular plan of historical narration, the following is given as it was given to me.

In January 1824, I met the late James Ross, Esq. of western Pennsylvania, who I had known from my infancy. While recalling old scenes, the defeat of Braddock was mentioned. Mr. Ross observed, "I can on that subject relate what was related in my hearing, by the father of his country," and then proceeded.

"In that part of war, which consists in watching an enemy," observed General Washington, "the Indians are perfect, and that army commanded by Braddock, was watched carefully by Indian spies and some French soldiers trained to Indian manners. Independent of Indians, there were in Fort du Quesne, at the time no force which could with any probability of success, oppose the approaching British and Provincials, and the commandant had expressed the necessity of retreat, or surrender. By accident rather than design or concert, there was about the Fort, four or five hundred Indian warriors. Of the French garrison, one officer of inferior rank, who had been paymaster, strenuously urged, that for the honour of the French arms, some resistance ought to be made. This young man consulted the Indians, who volunteered to the number of about 400. With much difficulty, this hero obtained leave to lead out the Indians, and as many French to a certain limit, as chose to join the desperate enterprise. Of the French about 30 volunteered, and with these 430 men, the officer marched to meet more than three times the number.

"In the mean time every remonstrance made by Washington himself, and other colonial officers, for several others joined him, was met by insult, and Braddock advanced as if determined on destruction, was suffered to proceed just as far as their enemies desired, and defeat and death to near one half of the whole army, with their imprudent general, was the result.

"When the victory was reported to the commandant of Fort du Quesne, his transports knew no bounds, the young hero was received with open arms, loaded with the most extravagant honors, and in a few days, sent to report the event to the Governor General of Canada. But behold! when his despatches were opened, they consisted of the criminal charges of peculation in his office of paymaster, and other charges equally criminal. Under these charges this injured man was tried, broke, and ruined, and so the matter rested, until in the revolutionary war, the subject of Braddock's defeat, happened to come into conversation between General Washington and the Marquis de La Fayette. In this conversation, the real facts were stated to La Fayette, who heard them with unqualified astonishment. But with his powerful sense of justice, determined to do all in his power to repair, what he considered a national act of cruelty and injustice; took careful notes, and on his return to France, had inquiries made, and the victim was found in a state of poverty and wretchedness, broken down by advancing years and unmerited obloquy. The affair was brought before the government of France, and as the real events were made manifest, the officer was restored to his rank and honors."

I do not pretend to have reported the exact words of Mr. Ross, but the facts as he stated them, I do vouch for, and as I have not the least doubt of their truth, am at much loss to determine which most deserves the meed of baseness of the two opposing Commanders-in-chief, outside and inside of Fort du Quesne in 1755.

Another fact I believe to be founded on truth. When I was removed by my parents to the neigbourhood, the popular report was, that Braddock received his mortal wound from a provincial militia-man of the name of Faussett. When my father was removing with his family to the west, one of the Faussetts kept a public house a few miles east of where Uniontown in Fayette county, then Beeson's town, stands. This man's house we lodged in, about the tenth of October 1781, twenty-six years and a few months after Braddock's defeat, and there it was made anything but a secret, that one of the family dealt the death-blow to the British General.

Thirteen years afterwards, I was at Thomas Gallagher's, in Fayette county, where I met an old man, one of the Faussett's in his 70th year, as he informed me. To him I put the plain question, and received the plain reply, "I did shoot him." He then went on to insist, that by doing so, he contributed to save what was left of the army. In brief, in my youth, I never either heard the fact of Faussett having shot Braddock, either doubted or blamed.

Leaving this minion of a corrupt court to his infamy, we may say with safety, that few defeats ever produced more disastrous consequences. The exertions made principally by the colony of Virginia, which then claimed the country, watered by the Monongahela to its mouth, and also the adjacent country, to raise troops to re-take possession, in conjunction with a force of British regulars, encouraged settlers. The defeat of the combined army, gave for three years, all that is now west Pennsylvania and west Virginia to the Indians, and exposed the new settlers to destruction; yet incredible as it may appear, even then settlers pressed into the fearful void, in which at every step the form of an Indian might be expected to burst from the brake, the minister of death or captivity.

As early as 1754, David Tygart, settled on the eastern branch of Monongahela, and gave name to that stream and the valley it waters. About the same time, a man of the name of Files, fixed himself on the same river where stands Beverly, the now county seat of Randolph county. The family of Files, one excepted, fell victims to Indian barbarity. Young Files escaped, and hastening to Tygart's, that family made a timely retreat from the country, and did not return for some years afterwards.

The founding of Red Stone Fort, on Monongahela river, eastern side, at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek, and where the two fine borough towns of Brownsville below the creek, and Bridgeport above, now stands, was the first effectual step taken towards actual and permanent settlements, of that beautiful picturesque, and fertile region between the mountains and Ohio river, and drained by the innumerable fountains of the Monongahela.

The warrior with his gun, hatchet and knife, prepared alike to slay the deer and bear for food, but also to defend himself against and destroy his savage enemy, was not the only man who sought the wilderness. A very interesting and tragic instance was given of the contrary by the three Eckarly's. These men, Dunkards by profession, left the eastern, and cultivated part of Pennsylvania, and plunged into the wilds of the west. Their first permanent camp was on a creek flowing into Monongahela river, in the south-western part of Pennsylvania, to which stream they gave the name of Dunkard Creek, which it still bears. These men of peace, employed themselves in exploring the country in every direction, in which one uncultivated waste spread around them. From Dunkard's Creek, they removed to Dunkard's Bottom on Cheat river, which they made their permanent residence, and with a savage war raging at no considerable distance, these men spent some years unmolested, indeed it is probable, unseen.

In order to obtain some supplies of ammunition and clothing, Dr. Thomas Eckarly, recrossed the mountains to Winchester, with some poultry. On his return to join his brothers, he stopped on the south branch of the Potomac, at Fort Pleasant, and roused the curiosity of the inhabitants by relating his adventures, removals and present residence. His pacific religious principles, as pacific religious principles have every where done, exposed him to suspicion, and he was detained as a confederate of the Indians, and as a spy, come to examine the frontiers and its defences. In vain did Dr. Eckarly assert his entire innocence of any connexion with the Indians, and that on the contrary, him or his brothers had not even seen an Indian since their residence west of the mountains, he could not obtain his liberty until by his own suggestion, he was escorted by a guard of armed men, who were to reconduct him a prisoner to Fort Pleasant, in case of any confirmation of the charges against him.

These arbitrary proceedings, though in themselves very unjust, it is probable saved the life of Dr. Eckarly, and his innocence was made manifest in a most shocking manner. Approaching the cabin where he had left and anxiously hoped to find his brothers, himself and his guard were presented with a heap of ashes. In the yard lay the mangled and putrid remains of the two brothers, and as if to add to the horrors of the scene, beside the corpses, lay the hoops on which their scalps had been dried. Dr. Eckarly and the now sympathising men buried the remains, and not as a prisoner, but a forlorn and desolate man he returned to the South Branch.

Decker's settlement on what is yet Decker's creek, was made on the Monongahela in 1778, under the direction of Thomas Decker, but was in the ensuing year, surprised by a party of Indians, and most of the inhabitants murdered. One of the men composing Decker's settlement, escaped and reached Red Stone Fort, then commanded by a Captain Paul, who being too weak to spare men to pursue the Indians, despatched an express to Fort Pitt, which had a short time before fallen into the hands of the British and Provincials under General Forbes.

In the mean time the murderers of Decker's settlement had escaped, and though Captain Gibson the commander at Pittsburg, marched promptly with thirty men across the country, to get in their front. But if Gibson failed to come up with or intercept those in which he was in pursuit of, he very unexpectedly to both parties, fell in with Kiskepila, (Little Eagle) a Mingo chief, and six or seven more warriors. The meeting took place on Indian Cross Creek, near where Steubenville now stands, at break of day. The Indians had not all risen. The Mingo chief first spied Gibson, raised the war-whoop and discharged his rifle. The ball cut Gibson's clothes, and wounded a soldier, but drawing his cutlass, the captain rushed forward, and by a gigantic swing, severed the head from the body of Kiskepila. Two other Indians fell, and the others fled and escaped.

The act of cutting off the head of the Mingo Chief, by the sword and arm of Captain Gibson, produced some singular consequences. At the final restoration of prisoners, after the treaty of 1763, some white persons who were in the Mingo villages, when the remnant of Kiskepila's party returned, stated that these warriors reported that their chief was killed with "a big knife." A death dance, was then performed, at which several white prisoners were devoted to death, to revenge the dead chief. Amid their horrid orgies, bitter and bloody were their threats of vengeance against "the big knife warrior." The name became general amongst the Indian nations for the Virginians, by which, they then, and long afterwards, included all the white militia, as "the big knife warriors."

Thus stood the country on the upper Ohio and its confluence in the end of 1758. Pittsburg, with a feeble garrison, and Redstone with one still more feeble, were the out-posts of civilization. The main spine of the mountains was really the frontier, as the two posts of Redstone and Pittsburgh were far in advance of the settlements, except a very few cabins, the inhabitants of which, had the Indian hatchet impending every moment over their heads. The Monongahela was then the Rubican, all beyond was silent or hostile.

Similar was the line from Pittsburgh to Georgia. The settlements on the upper Roanoke, near where Salem in Bottetort county, Virginia, now stands, was surprised in 1757, and the inhabitants mostly murdered. A fort had been established on Jackson's river, branch of James river, by Governor Dinwiddie, and known by his name. As soon as the massacre on Roanoke was made known to him, Dinwiddie ordered a detachment of regulars from the Fort on Jackson's river, to join several militia detachments, from the counties along the frontier, and the whole to form an army under the command of Andrew Lewis. The plans of Governor Dinwiddie, evinced a knowledge of the Indian character, of their country and the intermediate country between villages and settlements of Virginia, which must have been acquired by confidence in men of the colony, who had gained their means of advising by experience. The policy of Governor Dinwiddie and his counsellors, was to form a strong line of forts along the Ohio, and had this wise and humane system been carried into effect, what streams of blood and tears would have been stayed.

In the instance before us, the army under Andrew Lewis, was formed and marched to attain two objects. First to chastise the Indians; but secondly, to effect a far more important purpose; that was, to establish a military post, at or near the mouth of Big Sandy. With much delay from various obstacles, the season was far advanced before this little army reached a point on Sandy river, within a few miles of Ohio. What would have been the final result can be never known, as at this critical epoch, Francis Fauquier, succeeded Dinwiddie in the government of Virginia, and marked his commencing administration, by ordering the regular troops back to Fort Dinwiddie, and the militia to return to their homes.

This was one of the innumerable vexatious measures of the British colonial government which irritated, in an especial manner the frontier, and in war, far most formidable portion of the population. This very proceeding of Fauquier, was most dreadfully retaliated, as it was well remembered in the revolutionary war. In the year 1706, settlements were extended to the Holston river, and amongst the men who thus dared an advance, was Evan Shelby, William Campbell, William Preston and Daniel Boone. It is singular, that the sons of Shelby, Campbell and Preston, were amongst the leaders in the battle of the King's Mountain, and from the very country left exposed by the cold hearted Fauquier, twenty-three years afterwards issued that terrible corps, who on the 7th October 1780, dealt death to Colonel Ferguson and his British and tory troops.

To return to Col. Andrew Lewis's little army. The governor's order to return, produced a counsel of war, most of the officers insisted on prosecuting their expedition, and determined to at least to proceed to Ohio river. This was accomplished, and was no doubt the first Anglo-American military force, which ever reached that river below a very few miles from Pittsburg.

With heavy hearts, which is the case in all retreats but in this, the soldiers, however, brave and hardy, had complicated reasons to superinduce depression. Winter had set in; their provisions were exhausted, and ammunition, their resource for food, was scanty; and thus were they to retrace three hundred miles over rapid rivers, in pathless forests, and over high and rugged mountains. To these were added the appaling danger of hovering Indians, which were soon found on their flanks.

In these dreadful circumstances, orders were issued, forbidding either shooting or kindling fires, reducing the men to perish with hunger, to save themselves from being shot by their enemy. Many did perish with cold and hunger. Their famished pack horses, their buffalo hide thongs, the strings of their moccasins, and their belts were used for food. Under such circumstances of suffering, did the remnant of this gallant army reach their homes and friends. Many of those who did survive, lived to gain a terrible vengeance in the revolutionary war, on those they regarded as their worst enemies, the British officers.

The peace of 1763, brought little of any relaxation of hostility or mitigation of Indian war, to the frontier from the environs of Pittsburgh, to the farthest outer settlements of Georgia. Between the frontier inhabitants and the Indians, under their respective circumstances, no peace could exist, and it was by no means an uncommon occurrence for persons to be murdered returning from treaties.

One feature in the Indian military character, began to be developed, and contributed greatly to the advantage of the whites. It was found that the slightest fortification, could be defended against these sons of the woods, who seemed to have no idea of using themselves any other shelter in war but "the tree." To this advantage, the ferocious and faithless character of the Indian added another. It was soon demonstrated, that to surrender was to meet certain death. The knowledge of these advantages were, however, like all other knowledge, purchased at great expence. One terrible purchase I may mention.

About 1760, at or near where Franklin, the seat of justice for Pendleton county, Virginia, now stands, and on the south fork of the south branch of Potomac, was situated Sivert's Fort. About forty persons, men, women and children, had taken refuge in this place of defence. The people within were becoming careless after the first alarm, but were suddenly assailed by a large body of Indians. Captain Sivert prevented the people in the fort from firing on the Indians, proposing to attempt a negociation under a flag. This proceeding, though much opposed, he carried into effect, the Indians very readily agreeing to retire peaceably, on receiving certain presents or ransom; but to test their kindly feelings, the fort was to be opened, that they might shake hands with the people within. These stipulations were complied with, and the gates thrown open, and an almost indiscriminate massacre followed. The number of all ages and both sexes thus sacrificed to the folly or timidity of their commander, amounted to about forty.

In 1761, the Indians penetrated into the country on the head of James river, committed many murders, and led captive several others. On this occasion one man very narrowly escaped death, who lived to perform important services during the Revolutionary war; this was George Mathews, one of the heroes in 1774, of the battle of Point Pleasant, at the mouth of great Kenawha; of the battle of Germantown, on the 4th of October 1777, and twice governor of Georgia.

The hostile spirit kept in excitement, from the end of what has been called "The French War," was not fostered more by the Indians than by the whites, and if we allow for the pretences of religion and superior civilization, treachery and cruelty was really on the side of the whites. There was not any year from 1732, to the end of the Revolutionary war, in which murder to a greater or less extent, was not perpetrated by one or both of these irreconcilable parties. In 1764, in March, "The Manor Indians," or "The Moravian Indians," residing at Litiz, near Lancaster, Pennsylvania, were murdered, under circumstances of peculiar atrocity, if we judge by our modern estimates of the deed. The men who committed the act, where from the neighbourhood where I was born, and well do I remember to hear the destruction of "The Manor Indians," receive a very different title from that of murder. The act, however, never at any time, could be viewed in any other light, than that of a wanton waste of human blood, without any adequate object. But to show the feelings of the times on this very event, I insert the following, which I have repeatedly heard told, and of its entire truth I have not a shadow of doubt. Amongst the men who destroyed the Manor Indians, there were two brothers, both married men, but one without children. The childless brother saved a small child, or rather attempted to save it, as his brother stepped up to him and asked him, "what he had got there?" "A pet," he replied, "which I am going to take home to ———" pronouncing the name of his wife. The words had scarce passed his mouth, when the tomahawk of the brother was dashed into the child's brains, and its innocent blood sprinkled over its protector.

The perpetrator of this dreadful deed, I remember to have seen, and never learned that in common life, there was any atrocity remarked in his conduct, but rather the reverse. Such facts deserve record, if for no other reason than to mitigate our censures and soften our feelings, towards a people, who in retaliating such acts, thought they were only doing a duty imposed upon them, by the laws of their education.

The scenes are passed, and we now look back upon them, as the convulsions of a storm which is to rage no more.

One cause amid every other fluctuation of war, or peace, was steady in its effects, that was the migration of the whites to the west, which might well be compared to a fluid rushing into a void. Danger, hunger, cold, and death itself seemed to have no influence over this all powerful human motion. Individuals and families fell, and their dying screams, seemed to hardly cease their echo in the forest, when other individuals and families followed. I was myself, one who in infancy I may well say, was borne along on this mighty current. MARK BANCROFT.

The following beautiful and affecting lines, are taken from a late number of the Christian Advocate and Journal. They were written by Dr. H. W. Baxley, of Baltimore, subsequently to witnessing the consignment to the tomb of the remains of his departed mother. He speaks the language of filial respect and devotion.

MY MOTHER.

We buried her deep in her own native earth,
Not a murmur nor sigh did we hear;
In view of the hamlet that gave her birth,
We laid her unmourn'd by a tear.

The wind it was still, the grass did not move,
All nature seem'd hush'd in that hour—
Spring's own balmy zephyr had breathed on the grove,
Yet the bud still withheld its gay flower.

The once cherished scenes that partook of her youth,
And join'd in the mirth that it shed,
Seem'd sad at beholding the now mournful truth,
That their early companion was dead.

It was silent around, until the harsh cord,
As drawn from the depths of the tomb,
Gave token that earth had received its award,
That dust was consigned to its doom.

God's minister spake, and the valley's dark clod
Lent a sad, solemn thrill to the heart:
In anguish, it answer'd, O! God, O! my God!
Must a child and a parent thus part?

Then burst the seal'd fountains of grief, as they tore
Them deserted and helpless away;
The soul, in its agony, wept as they bore
Them afar from her still sacred clay.

There was one who stood by, his heart seem'd unmov'd
And his cheek was unstained by a tear;
His memory lingered o'er scenes that he loved,
And his fix'd eye was turn'd on her bier.

He thought of the days affection's pure beam
Shed magical sweetness around,
When life's happy dawn pass'd on like a dream,
And naught save its pleasures was found.

He thought of the bosom that pillow'd his head
In infancy's helpless repose,
The eye that watch'd o'er him, the bright smile that spread
Its influence around when he rose.

When affliction's hard hand was laid on his brow,
What lighten'd the force of its fall?
'Twas her ready breast, ever bared to the blow,
Ever prompt at the sufferer's call.

And must she depart? The earth, as it fell,
Told the tale that his mother was there—
Struck deep on his heart the funeral knell,
And he shudder'd—but shed not a tear.

The fields now stand forth, deck'd in gaudy array,
The graves in their liveried green;
The south brings its zephyrs, and the spring her sweet May,
All nature in gladness is seen.

The lark, as it mounts with its anthem on high,
And the nightingale, over her tomb,
All, all, now exult, while the bosom's deep sigh
Is still heaved at her freedom from gloom.

O, mourn not her death! Let her towering wing
Sweep on through the regions of heaven!
And join the loud choir of angels, who sing,
"To her the bright promise is given!"

SICILIAN FACTS.

THE FATAL MARRIAGE.

Mascali, a thriving town on the eastern coast of Sicily, some miles distant from the city of Catania, is situated on the beach, at the foot of one of the most charming of the Ætnean hills, whose gentle slope is covered with vinyards, corn-fields, and olive grounds, interspersed with gardens and range groves, which impart a delicious perfume to the air. The size and flourishing condition of its productions abundantly testify the exuberant fertility of the soil. A little above the town, and overlooking it, is the modern residence of the ancient family of Z——, situated in one of the pleasantest spots imaginable, embowered in a wilderness of agrunie, whose never-fading verdure gives the appearance of perpetual spring, to this favoured region. The summit of this beautiful eminence is crowned by an antique castle, formerly the abode of the same family; and in still early times, a royal chateau, built by one of the kings of Sicily, for his reception, when disposed to partake of the pleasures of the chase. It commands in front an enchanting view of the distant coast of Italy, the sea studded with craft of every denomination, and the shore variegated with town and village, winding streams, and promontories of lava. To the right, lay the superb city and vast plains of Catania, so renowned for its fertility. To the left, the silver currents of the Acts and the Fiume Freddo, are seen paying their tributes to the sea. Behind, stretches an extensive wood, remarkable for the size and variety of its trees, and the inexhaustible stock of game with which it is furnished. In the distance, the most prominent and sublimest feature of the scene, the snow-crowned Ætna, elevates its smoking head into the clouds. This old edifice is called il Castello della Zita, or the Betrothed, from a daughter of an ancient lord of these possessions, whose father, as the tale runs, arbitrarily promised her hand to one of her suitors, whilst her heart was engaged to another. In spite of tears, prayers, and remonstrances, a day was destined for the marriage. On the evening preceding the morning on which the ceremony was to take place, it was observed, that the intended bride had dried her tears, and appeared composed and resigned to her fate. In the morning the guests had arrived, the priest was ready, the bridegroom in attendance; but the bride was wanting. She was not in her apartment. The castle was searched from turret to dungeon, but the young lady was not found. At length, a pair of slippers was discovered on the ledge of a window; they were recognized as those of the bride. On looking out, she was seen lying in her night dress, a corpse, in the ditch of the castle, into which she had precipitated herself to avoid a detested union.

The present story, though of a more modern date, as it happened somewhat after the middle of the last century, in some points resembles the foregoing; but the lady, although, if possible, still more unfortunate in her destiny, does not appear to have possessed the desperate resolution of her fair predecessor.

Baron Z——, the proprietor of these domains at that period, had led a single life until near fifty, and perhaps might have continued to do so, had not some disagreement with his brother, who in default of issue was his heir, determined him to disappoint his expectations by taking a wife at that late period. Having formed this resolution, he proposed for the daughter of the Prince of P——, of Catania, a girl of eighteen, whom perhaps he had not seen twice in his lifetime. The baron being well known by his large possessions, the father consented at once to a match, which, reckoning for nothing the disparity of years, or the inclinations of his child, he esteemed highly advantageous. When he communicated the offer to his daughter, and ordered her peremptorily to receive the baron as her future husband, the young lady was thunderstruck, at intelligence so unlooked for, and disagreeable, and remained silent, being incapable of utterance, in the presence of the prince; but no sooner had he retired, than throwing herself at the feet of her mother, she conjured her to prevent a union, which could not fail to plunge her in irremediable misery. The princess, though attached to her daughter, knowing the arbitrary and violent character of her husband, declined all interference in the matter, and recommended obedience, as the wisest and fittest course. In fact, both her parents were aware that her principal objection to the baron was, an attachment she entertained for a cadet, of a noble family, an officer in the army, then absent in Naples; but neither of them suspected that she had already clandestinely become his wife. They had, previous to his departure, been privately married by the family chaplain, who had been won over by their entreaties. No wonder, then, that the unfortunate girl testified such repugnance to the match now proposed to her. In vain she expostulated and entreated; a deaf ear was turned to her prayers. Her union with the officer she dared not reveal, well knowing, from the vindictive temper of her father, that such confessions would cost the life of her husband. She prevailed on the chaplain who had married them, to remonstrate with the prince, on the injustice he was about to commit by forcing the inclinations of his daughter, and thus rendering her miserable for life; but the efforts of the priest were unavailing, the prince drove him from his presence, and threatened him with his vengeance, for this uncalled for interference in his family affairs.

Whilst the young lady remained utterly at a loss, what step to take in so deplorable a condition; her father aware, as I have said, of her inclination for the young officer, artfully procured a letter to be sent from Naples, detailing a fictitious account of his death; conceiving that when he had thus succeeded in shutting out all hope, he should find her more tractable. These dreadful tidings overwhelmed her with grief; but far from answering the expectations of the prince, seemed only to have increased her aversion to the baron; until her father, designing to terrify her into consent, gave her the choice of a convent, or that nobleman for a husband; disappointed by her gladly embracing the former, he retracted his offer, which had been mere menace, and would not even hear of the alternative he had himself proposed. He then allowed her but three days to prepare herself, giving her to understand that the baron, at the expiration of that period, would come to the palace to be betrothed to her, as is the custom in Sicily, previous to the actual celebration of the marriage ceremony.

These three days, were three whole ages of horror, to the unfortunate young lady. At times her heart misgave her, and suspicions came over her mind, that the story of her husband's death, might be a fabrication; a notion which only served to add to the cruel embarrassment of her situation. She resolved still to hold out, and to refuse her consent when the fatal hour arrived. When it did, and the baron came in state, with a long train of relatives and friends to witness the event, she refused to appear, and remained in an undress within her chamber. But these were weak preservatives against the fury of her father, who violently tore her in that condition from her appartment, and apologizing to the baron for what he termed girlish waywardness, commanded her to signify her consent to the proposed union. Terrified by his menaces, and not gifted by nature with any great energy of character, she said, in faltering accents, that she was compelled to comply with the will of her father. This dubious assent was esteemed sufficient by those to whom a direct refusal would have signified as little. Soon after the marriage ceremony took place; she was carried by force to the church, where she fainted at the altar, and remained in a state of insensibility, during the greater part of the service. After its termination, the exulting baron returned to Mascali, with his mourning bride, whose sorrow he attributed, as her father had hinted, to her being now, for the first time, removed from the parental residence.

Her internal struggles, her grief for the supposed death of her real husband, the agitation she had undergone affected her brain, and though not altogether amounting to insanity, she began to give proofs of aberation of intellect. There was at the time, and there still is, in the grounds, a beautiful reservoir of water, ornamented with a superb fountain. This was her favourite resort; she would sit by its margin for hours together, in utter listlessness, or mingling her tears with its pellucid stream. Even at night she would leave her bed, hasten there, and giving vent to her feelings, commit a thousand extravagances. The baron, who it seems, was in reality much attached to her, was at first alarmed by these nightly wanderings, but having caused her to be watched, and finding that she discovered no inclination to injure herself, he thought it best to let her have her own way, and gradually grew accustomed to her wild and eccentric habits. At length she became a mother, an event which gave great delight to the baron, and seemed for a time, to relieve the devouring melancholy which preyed on her heart.

It is not improbable that the flow of new feelings, maternal affection, and the assurance that her first husband was no more, might have finally succeeded in restoring reason, which had only been occasionally clouded, to the empire of her mind. She gradually grew better, and appeared reconciled to her situation; when one day, her favourite attendant, whom she had brought with her from Catania, told her, that she had seen the ghost of her former husband, in the garden: that it attempted to approach her, but overcome with terror, she had escaped into the house. The wretched young baroness, never entirely convinced of his death, saw at once through the deceit, that had been practised on her, and broke into violent exclamations of grief, remorse and despair. She directed the maid to watch the garden, and the next time she saw the appearance, (which she was convinced was not a spirit, but her beloved husband in person,) to speak to him, and relate how cruelly she had been beguiled into a marriage with the baron, and to acquaint him that she would, the same night, meet him at her favourite haunt, the fountain. Next day the woman again fell in with him, and on his addressing her, soon found that he was no spectre, but the living husband of her lady. Having imparted all her mistress had desired, the young man said, that hearing of her marriage with Baron Z——, he had felt assured that she had been made the victim of some artful misrepresentation, and that as soon as he had been able to obtain leave of absence, he had hastened to Sicily, to hear the fatal story from her own lips; prepared, in case he found her union was voluntary, to bury his own claim in oblivion, rather than destroy her peace, or injure her honour in the eyes of the world, whatever the effort might cost him.

That night, the wretched husband and wife met at the fountain, and gave vent to the poignant anguish with which they were alike penetrated. They would willingly have fled together, but where would they be safe from the pursuing resentment of her father and the baron? To avow their marriage, and claim her as his wife, was equally hopeless and hazardous. There was no other witness to the marriage, which had taken place privately in the family chapel, than her own servant and the priest who performed the ceremony; whose testimony no doubt would be overruled, or themselves, if expedient, put out of the way. After several hours spent in fruitless deliberation, they at length parted: having resolved, as their only practicable plan, to attempt an escape to a foreign country, as they could not hope to be secure in their own. Night after night the unhappy couple continued to meet at the fountain. The baron, aware of her mental infirmity, and of her similar excursions before her confinement, paid little attention to what he supposed a return of the malady. In the mean time, the officer having collected what money he could command, which, with the lady's jewels, was all they had to rely on for future subsistence, he hired a felucca, which was to convey them to Trieste, whence they proposed making their singular story known to her family, and effecting, if possible, a reconciliation with them.

All, for some time, appeared to favour their plans, the day appointed for the sailing of the felucca and the flight of the lady approached. But their nightly meetings, carried on with too little precaution, had attracted the attention of the domestics; one of them, the gamekeeper, to ingratiate himself with his master, betrayed the secret of the unhappy couple. The baron, infuriated at being thus, as he conceived, dishonoured, ferociously gave orders to the informer and an assistant, to lie in wait for, and dispatch the unhappy young man, in the presence of his supposed mistress. These men, though they accepted the horrible commission, less cruel than their master, had the compunction to forbear committing the dreadful deed before the eyes of the lady. The officer was, as usual, the first who came to the place of meeting. The assassins discharged their blunderbusses at him, a few paces distant from the fountain, willing that their mistress might at least be spared the terrible shock of discovering the body herself. But the dying man, badly wounded as he was, either to slake the death thirst, or obtain perhaps a last sad look of his beloved, contrived to crawl to the margin of the fountain, and there expired, a few moments before his wretched wife came to the spot. When she saw and recognized her husband, heedless of discovery, she threw herself on the bleeding body, pressed it in her arms, and filled the air with her piercing screams. The murderers conjecturing the cause of the cries, drew near to the spot. When she saw them approach, she sprang up, and endeavoured to precipitate herself into the water. Prevented in this design by the savage humanity of the assassins, she broke from them, and ran wildly through the grounds, frightfully shrieking, leaving behind her, a track of her husband's blood, which dropped from her night dress, saturated with the crimson stream. When at length overtaken, and conveyed to the house, deliquium followed deliquium, and when they ceased, frenzy succeeded; the dark night of insanity, had utterly quenched the light of reason. In her lucid intervals, which were few, and far between, she was heard to pray for the return of madness, as a relief from sufferings too acute to be endured. The baron, her husband, never mentioned the circumstance, nor suffered it to be alluded to in the house. The morning after the event he ordered the corpse to be consigned into the hands of the police, as that of a person killed by his servants in the supposition that he was a robber, having been found trespassing by night on his premises.

During the short time the lady lived, she returned to the former habit of wandering by night. The spot stained with the blood of her husband, was her favourite haunt; there was she accustomed to sit and linger for hours, seeming to hold converse with some invisible being, addressing the visionary creation of the brain, with the most endearing epithets, and extending and folding her arms, as if embracing a beloved object. Long after her death, the terrified domestics were wont to assert, that they often beheld at night, a female form sit weeping by the brink of the fatal fountain.

It is easier to admire than to imitate, and there is no error more common, than to imagine that talking of virtue is to practice it.

He who cannot endure a single disagreeable word, exposes himself to the annoyance of hearing many.

THE VISION.

BY LYMAN WALBRIDGE TRASK.

This was written in 1830, and if the reader will consult the History of Greece since that time, he will see that the predictions contained in this "Vision" have been fulfilled.

The wind was wild—the sea ran high,
No star-light smil'd upon the sky;
The roaring winds soon left the plain,
Careering onward o'er the main.
From heaven's arch, burst on my sight,—
A being of seraphic light
And—o'er the mighty watery way
He shewed me Greece, and seemed to say:
"Behold those isles, of genius bright,
Once brilliant with a heavenly light,—
A land that endless fame has rung
The clime where classic Homer sung;
Where genius raised his towering fires—
And muses touched their sweetest lyres,
Where spirits bold with vengeful hand
Dared vindicate the rights of man.
Though Greece, once sunk in awful gloom,
Has risen from her ancient tomb—
Though now the modern Grecian son
Has triumphed o'er the Ottoman—
Yet other tyrants seize the hour;
Yes! other tyrants lust for power,
And thus these tyrants will decree,
That modern Greece shall not be free!"

He said, and quick as lightning flew
Above, to the etherial blue;
And darkness o'er the spreading plain
Assumed again her dismal reign.

From the Alexandria Gazette.

ON THE DEATH OF LA FAYETTE.

Death at length his work has done,
Fallen is the mighty one,
To his rest of glory gone—
To his home on high.

O'er his bier Columbia weeps,
O'er the grave where low he sleeps,
Mourning, she her vigil keeps,
Wat'ring with her tears

That now consecrated spot,
Destin'd ne'er to be forgot,
Till the things which are not,—
Till time shall be no more.

With her tears we mingle ours:
Over Freedom's happy bowers
Dark the cloud of sorrow lowers,
Freedom weeps thy fall.

Yet we mourn not as do they
Who, when lov'd ones fade away,
Early see their hopes decay,
Blighted in the bud.

Not by an untimely doom
Fall'n, in manhood's op'ning bloom,
To the cold and lonely tomb
Wast thou borne away.

Late to thee the summons came.
Hero of immortal name,
Full of years, and full of fame,
Thou art laid to rest.

Strew we, then, thy grave with flowers,
Cease the tears that nature pours,
Thou art Freedom's, now, and ours,
Given to deathless fame.

Leaning Tower at Pisa, Italy.

THE LEANING TOWER AT PISA.

We have already embellished the Casket with views of different Leaning Towers; we now introduce to our readers the celebrated Tower at Pisa, in Italy. Its height is about 187 feet, it is ascended by 355 steps, and contains 7 bells. It stands alone, unconnected with the neighbouring buildings, and was probably intended as an ornamental belfry. It is inclined from the perpendicular rather more than 14 feet. It is built of marble and granite, and has 8 stories, formed of arches, supported by 207 pillars, and divided by cornices. Its form and proportions are graceful, and its whole appearance, from a short distance, remarkably beautiful. Whilst approaching the city (which is situated on an extensive plain) at the distance of a few miles, the effect, when the tower is seen over the tops of the trees, between two others which are perpendicular, is so striking, that the spectator feels almost inclined to doubt the evidence of his senses. It was erected about A. D. 1174, by Wilhelmus, or William, a German architect, assisted by two Pisans. From the inclination of the stairs, it seems to a person going up or down hastily, to roll like a ship. This beautiful structure, notwithstanding its inclination, seems to have withstood the ravages of time with more than usual success, as it has now stood for more than 600 years, without any fissure, or the slightest perceptible sign of decay. Travellers, antiquaries, and the learned in general, have been perplexed and divided in opinion, with respect to the cause of the inclination: some have argued in favour of its being accidental; others have merely stated the different opinions on the subject, without giving their own; whilst Dr. Arnott, in his popular work "on the Elements of Physics," distinctly says, that it was built intentionally inclined, to frighten or surprise.

It has remained for the accurate observation of an English lady, who travelled in Italy a few years ago, to set the question at rest, by discovering what had escaped the notice of so many learned gentlemen. "In that part of the Campo Santo," says Mrs. Starke, "in which the life of St. Ranieri is painted, we see the now leaning tower upright." These paintings are supposed to have been done about A. D. 1300, more than 100 years after the tower was erected: so that it may now be considered as certain, that the inclination was caused by the gradual sinking of the earth, as in all other instances in Italy. This opinion is confirmed by the circumstances of the lowest row of pillars being sunk deep in the earth, the mouldings not running parallel with the horizon, and the inclination of the stairs.

MIRROR.

Julia! in this glass you see
Her who is admir'd by me.
Oh, that in it I could view,
The happy man belov'd by you!

HOPE.

Hope, heaven-born cherub, still appears,
Howe'er misfortune seems to lower;
Her smile the threat'ning tempest clears,
And is the rainbow of the shower.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, NEW YORK.

This edifice rears its venerable head in the very centre of bustle and fashion. It is situated in Broadway, with Fulton street on one side, and Vesey street on the other—the American Museum is opposite, and the Park—the City Hall—and the Theatre, are in its immediate vicinity. Standing as it does, with its grave-yard shadowed by old trees, and white with tomb-stones, it seems as though it was intended to arrest the attention of the gay passer-by, and inspire him with serious thought, while he is in the eager pursuit of his business or his pleasures.

St. Paul's Church was built about 74 years ago—the steeple was finished in 1794. The front upon Broadway, is an Ionic portico, supported by 4 columns of brown stone; its pediment contains a statue of St. Paul in a niche. In front of the great window, is the monument erected by order of Congress, to the memory of General Montgomery, under which his bones now repose. The interior of the church exhibits a great deal of elegant taste, an arched ceiling is supported by Corinthian columns, the galleries are airy, yet substantial, and the tones of the fine organ, are unrivalled in power, by any in the city.

The steeple rises to a height of above 200 feet from the ground. In symmetrical beauty, it cannot be surpassed by any thing in the Union. A quadrangular section of the Ionic order, with proper columns, pilasters, and pediments, rises above the tower, then follow two octangular sections of the Corinthian and Composite orders, with columns at the angles, a neat spire crowns the whole. The church, tower, and first section, are of stone, the rest is of wood The most beautiful view of the church, at present, is, from the steps of the City Hall, where you have the verdure of the Park for a fore-ground. Mr. Aston's large hotel, when completed, will, it is feared, materially intercept this view.

In the rear of the Church, upon a little hillock, stands the monument erected by Edmund Kean, over the remains of a kindred genius, George Frederick Cooke; and by the side of the church, near Fulton street, is the obelisk to the memory of the eloquent and patriotic Emmet. It consists of one solid piece of white marble, with appropriate ornaments, and his head, a very tolerable likeness, in bass relief.

St. Paul's and St. John's Churches, are attached to the parish of Trinity Church, and were under the pastoral care of the Bishop of the Diocese, as rector, with associate ministers, during the life-time of the late Bishop Hobart. Shortly after the consecration of the present Bishop, it was deemed proper to separate the Diocesan from parochial occupation. The Rev. Wm. Berrian is now rector, and the Rev. T. F. Schroeder, and the Rev. Henry Authon, associate ministers.

NOTES ON PERIODICALS.

This is the true millenium of the printers. Oh! that those typographical heroes of the fifteenth century, Faust, Guttenberg, and Peter Schoeffer, could burst the marble monuments in which they are enshrined, and just take a peep at one of our steam-engines, which deliver to Fame, or to the cheesemongers, as many sheets in an hour as they, with infinite labour, though with ingenuity laudible for such an age, brought forth in a month! Doubtless every department of the press will henceforth be subjected to the same law of periodicity, which prevails throughout every region of the heavens. The earth is at once an annual, laden with all the accumulated treasures of the year; a Quarterly Review, delighting us with the varieties of each succeeding season; and a Daily Newspaper, teeming with new events which keep us, its readers, in a state of constant excitement. The moon, what is it but a perpetual "New Monthly Magazine?" In the highest firmament of the skies, we hear of systems which require for their periodical completion some five hundred years. What prodigious periodicals the people in those remote planets must possess! Their weeks must be longer than our years, their hours than our days. "Paradise Lost" they would look upon as a trifle. It would scarcely fill the space which they dedicate to the "Poet's Corner." As for this article, upon which we are at present engaged for the edification of our much-beloved readers, whoever they may be, we fear that it would be scarcely perceptible in a page of the "New Monthly" which illuminates and exalts the good folk who bask in the rays of Bellatrix or Betelgeux. Heaven defend us from being appointed, some fine morning, for our sins, editor of the Times, in the head of the Ram, or the tail of the Great Bear!

Indeed, matters are in a sufficiently deplorable state on the petty planet to which we happen at present to belong. Behold us obliged,—the thing is so cheap we cannot help it,—to take in, or be taken in by, "Johnson's Dictionary," converted into a neat periodical. For the same irresistible reason we renew our acquaintance every Saturday with the beauties of "Guthrie's Gazetteer," and the pleasantries of that Grammar, which goes under the renowned name of Lindley Murray. We next turn with enthusiasm to four pages of law; made easy to the most obtuse mind, and beguiling to the most phlegmatic. Astronomy comes before us, clothed in the garb of romance; and History looks so gay with all her embellishments, that we hand out our penny for her with rapture. We have already become perfect geologists for the sum of three-pence; and for a groat we received in exchange such a degree of enlightenment in the mysteries of anatomy, that we hereby undertake to kill any man in such a really agreeable and expeditious way, that he shall know nothing at all of the process. To determined suicides we shall be found invaluable, and we take the liberty to recommend ourselves to their attention. Paganini spent fourteen years and all his fortune in learning to play on one string. We played excellently on four, in two weeks, by the aid of the "Musical Magazine," for which we paid the sum of three halfpence. We may say, without vanity, that we shine in botany, divinity, zoology and horticulture, having made ourselves perfect masters in these branches of useful knowledge, at the rate of two-pence halfpenny per branch. In short, we expect that, before Christmas, we shall be, in our proper person, a complete animated Encyclopædia, at the sum total expense of half a crown. When the holidays come, however, we shall repay our poor soul for the heavy burdens which we at present hebdomadally impose upon it. We are all Minerva now,—then we shall be Bacchus.

Look at the illustrations, their perfections, their brilliancy, the number of them that we can buy for a trifle! Portraits, landscapes, still life, dogs, horses, game, Landseer, Turner, Martin, Cruikshank, all you may have almost for nothing. Montgomery the Second is gone to Pandæmonium to collect materials for landscapes, which he has undertaken to describe in a most tremendous poem. The ever-to-be-lamented Rosa Matilda is already awakened from her tomb, for the purpose of lending her never-to-be forgotten verses to the prints of Charles Tilt. We are soon to have not only a new edition of Robert Burns, but charming sketches of every individual whiskey-house which he honoured by getting particularly drunk therein. The Findens threaten to make even Crabbe popular.

What is to become of all the paper which is now in constant process of typo-impressment? What are we to do with it? Where is it to find room in some half-dozen years? We observe, indeed, more than one Encyclopædia in progress, which is likely to be concluded about the year of our Lord 2000. As we do not intend to live so long as that, we leave the said Encyclopædia to shift for itself. But, mercy on us, how are we to dispose of the "National Library?" Here is a collection "intended to place all the most useful, instructive, moral, and entertaining works, comprising the standard literature of almost all countries, within the means of all families in the three kingdoms!" We are kindly informed, lest our natural feelings should be alarmed at the prospect of paying for such a number of books, still more of perusing them, that all this is to be accomplished "without taxing too heavily, at one and the same time, either the pocket or the head of the reader." Infinite are the obligations of the happy subscriber to the editors, for thus dividing the inflictions which they are resolved to heap upon his devoted head. After being nicely wrecked on the rocks of Scylla, most comfortably swallowed up in the whirlpool of Charybdis.

It is not long since we came home one day from the Bank with our dividends in one pocket, and about a hundred weekly journals in the other, which we purchased in the fragrant purlieus of Fetter Lane. We were seduced by the show which they made, all embellished with cuts as they were, in a shop window. There shone "The Cab," price one halfpenny, addressed to gentlemen of aspiring notions, but limited means; and offering them, in return for a small annual subscription, not only the Cab itself, but the occasional use of a chariot, with horses quiet to drive, ride, or run in tandem, and also the loan of boxes at Covent Garden and the Opera, as well as ladies of the fashion, only for the purpose of gracing the said boxes by their appearance. They were to present themselves moustaches a la porcupine, to talk loud during the opera or the play, to smell of cigar, and to take snuff in abundance. It was necessary of their periodical felicity that they should, in all externals, be men of ton, whatever their previous habits might have been in the mystery of picking pockets. "The Halfpenny Magazine" had already, by some accident, arrived at a seventh number, a fatal one, we fear, for the editors were fain to confess. "We have no cut this time." "The Halfpenny Library" had the singular merit of manufacturing a new adage out of an old one. There is an ancient saying, "Truth lies in a well." "May not the modern adage," quoth the said Library, "run thus, 'The most certain charity is at a pump?'" "The Magnet," after admiting candidly that periodicals had increased beyond the possibility of purchase, or perusal, had the courage to add to the number, and the conscience to promise that it would print the essence of the whole in its own pages. "The Squib" threatened to blow up all its rivals. Forgetting that it was itself of inflammable materials, it became the first victim of its own temerity. "The Sunday Chronicle" came to proclaim the comfortable doctrine that all the world was mad, and that, as things went, Miss Baxter would have made a capital Lord Mayor. The editor gave demonstrative proof of his own wisdom, by departing spontaneously from such a world almost as soon as he came into it. Among the prescriptions of "The Doctor" and "The Penny Lancet," we looked in vain for a remedy capable of being administered to a young periodical diseased. We never beheld two medical practitioners, who stood more in need of assistance from their own "damnable compounds." "The Tourist" had pledged itself to travel from Wellington Street, in the Strand all over the civilized and savage world. After crossing over Waterloo Bridge, and disporting himself amid the pleasant retreats of Lambeth, he returned by Blackfriars to the place of Wellington once more, where we found him ruminating in the following penitential strain:—"Human hopes are frequently falsified by experience. No sooner are they submitted to an infallible criterion, than they have been proved defective and illusory:—the offspring of self-conceit, or of partial knowledge. We are free to acknowledge that we have failed to realize our own expectations." "Rude Boreas" Dibdin! What is it really Tom? It is in truth, the same concoctor of immortal songs, pouring with all his might, the tones of a heart still buoyant after every vicissitude, through a "Penny Trumpet," in the character of one Doctor Blow. Alas! poor Tom!—he was soon destined to realize the converse of a story, which he himself tells of Schmidt, one of the late King's band. The German, having been once asked to sustain a note of forty minims' duration, replied, "You may find ears, but who the devil is to find wind?" Dibdin was copious in wind, but, after essaying a few blasts, he found an appalling deficiency of ears.

Peace be to the shades of the many "Gleaners," "Spies," "Investigators," "Scrap-books," "Caskets," "Correctors," "Schoolmasters," "Guardians," and "Devils," which we have consigned to the tender mercies of our scoul, in order to save the expense of wood for the ignition of our fires. We were about to add to them a whole volume of the "Crisis," when the ghost of Robert Owen, its patron, stared us in the face, mildly reproving us for our consummate ignorance of the disorders which prevail throughout all classes of society, and for which he, Robert, believes that he has discovered a most effectual remedy. The "Crisis" is, it seems, intended to prepare the way for the new terrestial Paradise, which he has been labouring for many years to create. Having been quietly bowed out of the factory at New Lanark, where he had been for some time managing clerk, but where he had contrived, by his inspirations, to introduce most admired confusion, he came to London to dissipate his chagrin, and diffuse his principles. But here he toiled in vain. He found no associates to assist him in the scheme of rendering property common, in order that he might come in for a commodity of which he happened then, as he happens still, to be rather in need. He next, like many other speculators who have been sadly disappointed at home, turned his eyes towards America, and, having purchased a dim forest in the back settlements, for a few dollars, he 'yclept it, "New Harmony." But old Discord was too strong for even that sweetly sounding title, the concern was dissolved, and he returned once more, on fresh speculations, to this Babylon. He took up his residence near the pastoral glades of Burton-crescent, put up a brick and composition portico to a little, low house, which he called "The Institution for the removal of Ignorance, and the regeneration of the World." Here he preached and lectured, gaining a few shillings now and then, by way of admission money, and informing his slender audience that he was charged with an express mission (from whom or whence we never could learn) for the purpose of turning the whole fabric of society exactly upside down.

It has been our good fortune to meet with him sometimes in our nocturnal perambulations.—Strange to say, if it rained, he held an umbrella over his head like any common mortal. Nay, more, we have actually seen this great reformer of our bad habits eating beef, and drinking bottled beer!—although he is indisputably (according to his disciples) the identical person referred to by the sybils of yore, the long-expected of nations, at whose birth

> "Magnus ab integro seclorum nascitur ordo:
> Jam redit et virgo, redeunt saturnia regna;
> Jam nova progenies cœlo demittitur alto."

With him the age of iron is to cease, that of pure gold to begin. Every trace of ancient sin and sorrow is to disappear at his command from earth. The lion shall gambol with the lamb, and every field shall spontaneously grow yellow with golden harvests. There will be no necessity for public worship, as in the new order of things everybody is to pray in secret, if he have any disposition that way. If not, he can judge or whistle if he like, instead of going to church, for no church there is any longer to be. The lawyers may sell their wigs and gowns, for law is come to an end. Order is to be altogether dispensed with, as a beautiful confusion is to prevail in its place. A young man shall met a young maiden in the streets, and, without saying "A fine day, my dear," or anything else of that bashful tendency, he is straight to pop the question, "Will you marry me?" and she will! They are to live together from that moment, without further ceremony, just as long as they choose; they may separate, and their children, if any there be, are to receive maintenance from the public treasury. Here will be a glorious state of things for all the bucks of Cambridge.

"They who give themselves to the study of just and good works," says the Cumæan sybil, "and to piety and holy thoughts, shall be carried by the angels through the flaming river, into a place of light, and a life without care, where the immortal path of the great God is, and where three fountains of wine, milk, and honey flow without cessation. And the earth shall be equal to all, not divided by walls or partitions, but shall bear much fruit spontaneously; and all shall live in common, and their wealth shall be undivided; neither poor nor rich shall be there, nor tyrant, nor servant, nor one greater or less than another; no king, nor leader; all shall enjoy all things in common, and none shall say the night is come, nor to-morrow, or yesterday is past; and no care shall be for many days. There shall be no spring nor summer, no winter nor autumn; nor marriage, nor death; nor buying, nor selling; nor setting nor rising of the sun, for there shall be a long day." "This is a highly figurative description of heaven upon earth, in the usual hyperbolical style of prophecy," quoth the "Crisis:" "but it is evident, when stripped in part of its mystical character, that it describes such another state of things as we propose to establish by the adoption of the new system of society?"

Now observe the wonderful process by which the new system has been already, in part, carried into effect. Among the various speculations upon which Mr. Maberly, unluckily for himself, bestowed, some years ago, his time, together with a princely fortune, was an immense edifice, which he erected near the top of Gray's Inn Road, intending the lower part thereof for a horse-bazaar, the upper for a mart, in which all things whatever, from a kitchen-range to a doll's eye, were to be exposed for sale. Exposed, indeed, many articles of utility and finery were upon neat stalls, peeping eagerly behind which were numbers of the prettiest faces which that quarter of the metropolis could turn out; but, by some fatality, no purchasers appeared. Indeed, who that could afford to buy even a tetotum was to guess that a bazaar existed in Gray's Inn Road? We have not, at present, the most remote idea how we ever chanced to hear of such a thing. Of course, it was soon shut up.

The time was now at hand, when the true regenerator of mankind was to step forth upon a more public stage than the small institution in Burton-place enabled him to enjoy. Having converted the landlord of the said Horse Bazaar to his principles, he prevailed upon the man to give him the use of the empty premises for nothing. He then collected together numbers of poor mechanics from the neighbourhood of Clerkenwell, formed them into a society pro bono publico, appointed himself their father, and set about knocking into their heads his magnificent principles in a series of grave lectures. In the course of his labours, he had the good fortune to receive the most valuable assistance from Miss Macauley, a lady some time out of her teens, and not unknown to fame as an actress, a teacher of enunciation, a reader of plays and poems, a head of a new religion, in which capacity she preaches, and as an author of pamphlets upon the currency, the poor laws, agricultural distress, the Factory Bill, and a variety of other subjects, equally poetical and enchanting. She has also a horse, or rather a mule, to which is appended a little omnibus. Within the omnibus sits a lad. On the front, the back, and the sides of the machine are painted, in gigantic letters, three mystic words—"Miss Macauley's Repository." "A repository of what?" we asked the lad, for in our ignorance we deemed it a public vehicle, and flattered ourselves with the hope that it would carry us for a penny from Finsbury, where it then stood, to the rural groves of Paddington. "Sir," replied the urchin, smiling, "of Miss Macauley's pamphlets, will you buy one? you may have it for a penny." When her store of literature shall have been disposed of, it is Miss Macauley's intention to convert her shop into a Thespian cart, and to act tragedies all along the New-Road.

The mirror-like serenity with which this fair associate of Mr. Owen delivered herself of the new doctrines was marvellous. The Messiah, she declared, was a very good sort of a person in his way, considering the manner in which he was brought up, and was tolerably well informed too, remembering the dark age in which he lived; but he knew nothing, or next to nothing, of the evils of society, or of the real remedies which they required. These were matters wholly unrevealed to the world until the——Owen made his debût. She was proud to be one of his most zealous disciples, and was ready, as far as she was concerned, to carry all his principles into practice. To her inventive genius the patriarch is indebted for the establisment of what are called social festivals, at which the mechanics, their wives, their sons and daughters, together with a galaxy of beauties from the virtuous precincts of Shire-lane, assemble periodically, and sing, and dance, and take tea, and enter into those temporary engagements which are to form the principal felicity of the new system.

So much for the instruction and amusement of the diciples—and thus far they go in common with the St. Simonians of France, who have recently despatched missionaries to this country, in order to assist in the propagation of the doctrine. But the practical remedy for the real evil of society, that is to say, for the poverty of the lower orders—the secret hitherto unknown to all men save Robert Owen—stands disclosed in the most admirable invention of modern times, the "Equitable Labour Exchange." Through the instrumentality of this institution, the labour of the industrious is constantly converted into gold. Knowledge is power. Give the ignorant education, and they will therefore be the rulers of the country. Labour is wealth. Let the poor labour, and they must in consequence become the proprietors of all the land and money in the empire. This is the logic of these grand reformers. But how are syllogisms to be transformed into loaves and roast beef? That is the question. We shall see.

There was an abundance of room to spare, as we have already mentioned, in the bazaar in Gray's Inn Road. Thither the distressed shoemaker was invited by the patriarch to send such part of his stock as lay upon his hands. To the same receptable the cabinet-maker was advised to commit his tables and chairs, the hatter his hats, the cooper his tubs, the nailer his nails, the tinman his pans, the musical-instrument maker his fiddles, and flutes, and tambourines, the toyman his dolls, the milliner her caps, the baker his bread, the butcher his meat, the market gardener his vegetables. Upon such of these articles as were transmitted to the bazaar, a certain valuation was fixed, according to the proportion of labour supposed to have been bestowed upon the production of them; and that labour was estimated, in every case, at sixpence per hour. Thus a table or a dog collar, for instance, was valued at twenty hours; and to the owner thereof, a nicely printed slip of paper, resembling a country bank-note, was given, stating the number of hours at which his deposite was estimated. This note he had then an opportunity of presenting to one of the attendants behind the counter of the bazaar, and from that officer he was entitled to receive any other article then in store, which was valued at the same amount. Unfortunately, however, nobody could get exactly the thing he wanted. The nailer presented his note for some coals; but there were none, as yet, in the bazaar. An umbrella or a fife was very much at his service; but he needed not the one, and had neither time nor disposition to play on the other. The weaver who had deposited a piece of cloth, the labour of a whole week, required some bread. But the bakers were not yet disciples of the new system, would he have any objection to a tambourine? The cabinet-maker, who had placed in the store a capital chest of drawers, looked forward with considerable glee to a series of legs of mutton. But when he was told that the butchers had not yet become Owenites, and that the market-gardeners continued incredulous, when he looked round and discovered that he could only obtain in exchange for his said chest, a flute or an old coat, or some dozen of list shoes, or half a ton of dog-collars, or a case of dried beetles, or a picture of a shipwreck, or necklaces, or merry-andrews, or some pile of Miss Macauley's pamphlets, he naturally enough kicked up a row. Complaint became contagious among the disciples, riot the order of the day, and the Bazaar the scene of tumult which demanded the interposition of the police. The plain sense of Clerkenwell revolted at the gross imposture of the new Messiah, the Bazaar was shut up once more, and the precious institution was transferred to the West End. Thus the rogue, who is detected in the city, puts on a new coat and renews his enterprizes in Portman-square. The "Crisis" is still the organ of the gang, assisted by "The Destructive," "The Pioneer," and several other periodical publications, which, though unstamped, comprise all the ordinary topics of newspapers, and are attaining a wide circulation amongst the industrious orders of our population. There is a rude energy in their style, added to a profligate dereliction of morality in their principles, which renders them acceptable to all the discontented men in the country—a numerous as well as an active race of idle libertines, who, having neither character nor property to lose, are fervently looking forward to new revolutions, by which they hope, if they cannot ameliorate their condition, to reduce the happier orders of society to the level of their own wretchedness.

MILLENNIUM.

By I. McLEOD.

Traveller stop? the morn is breaking,
Nature from her sleep is waking;
See her sun rise glorious up,
O'er life's sea his beams are throwing,
Gladly now the waves are glowing,
All the world of waters flowing,
Lustered by immortal hope.

Hail the long predicted morning,
All the moral waste adorning,
Sprinkling heavenly brightness there;
Soft the light through æther spreading,
Slowly on the darkness treading,
Chasing gloom and glory shedding,
Brilliant on the ambient air.

From Heaven's throne in clusters beaming,
Thousand hued the rays are streaming,
Sainted spirits side by side,—
In shining ranks, are all advancing,
Lightly on the glory dancing,
The glittering heart with tread entrancing,
Revel on the radiant tide.

Holy harps in sweetest numbers,
Waking sleepers from their slumbers,
Role the highest notes of song;
The vaulted heavens ring with praises,
Loud the mighty anthem raises,
Holy harps in holy praises,
Bear the sacred sounds along.

The banner of the cross unfurling,
Bloodless on the air is curling,—
Waving on its glorious fame,
Before it Islam's power is falling,
Allah's honours all are thralling,
Jew and Moslem both are calling
On the true Messiah's name.

See the son of God ascending,
All the ransom'd throng attending;
Lo! he grasps the sceptre now,
Multitudes in light are winging—
Seraphim sweet incense flinging,
Cherubim new honours bringing,
Binds them on Messiah's brow.

Harps of heaven in hallowed numbers,
Burst the world's protracted slumbers,
Call the dead in sin to rise;
Thousands who with woe are sweeping,
In the shades of death were sleeping,
Wakened from their dreams, are keeping
The sacred Sabbath of the skies.

DREAMS.

Dreams have at all times excited the attention of the ignorant—they have been regarded as omens of coming events, and have in many instances been productive of the most melancholy instances. A dream has sometimes put whole families in agitation and alarm for a week. Before its magic influence, appetite, pleasure and peace have vanished—weddings have been suspended, journeys postponed, and the great business and duties of life, have been interupted by these sleeping phantasies of the mind, these visionary creations of a disturbed and excited brain. In former times and ages they received more attention than at the present,—and this change in opinion in regard to their influence, has arisen from the more advanced state of knowledge of the present to past periods. The philosophy of dreaming is now better understood than formerly, and medical physiologists of the present day ascribe them to the activity of certain organs of the brain, during sleep, which should be in a state of repose. Our space will not admit of our enlarging upon this, or we could readily show that dreams are occasioned by natural causes, and that the prevention of their recurrence may be secured by proper means. For the entertainment of our readers we select a chapter from a work on the philosophy of sleep, entitled "Prophetic Power of Dreams."

Dreams have been looked upon by some, as the occasional means of giving us an insight into futurity. This opinion is so singularly unphilosophical, that I would not have noticed it, were it not advocated even by persons of good sense and education. In ancient times, it was so common as to obtain universal belief; and the greatest men placed as implicit faith in it as in any fact of which their own senses afforded them cognizance. That it is wholly erroneous, however, cannot be doubted; and any person who examines the nature of the human mind, and the manner in which it operates in dreams, must be convinced, that under no circumstances, except those of a miracle, in which the ordinary laws of nature are triumphed over, can such an event ever take place. The Sacred Writings testify that miracles were common in former times; but I believe no man of sane mind will contend that they ever occur in the present state of the world. In judging of things as now constituted, we must discard supernatural influence altogether, and estimate events according to the general laws which the Great Ruler of Nature has appointed for the guidance of the universe. If, in the present day, it were possible to conceive a suspension of these laws, it must, as in former ages, be in reference to some great event, and to serve some mighty purpose connected with the general interests of the human race; but if faith is to be placed in modern miracles, we must suppose that God suspended the above laws for the most trivial and useless of purpose—as, for instance, to intimate to a man that his grandmother will die on a particular day, that a favorite mare has broke her neck, that he has received a present of a brace of game, or that a certain friend will step in and take pot luck with him on the morrow.

At the same time, there can be no doubt that many circumstances occurring in our dreams have been actually verified; but this must be regarded as altogether the effect of chance; and for one dream which turns out to be true, at least a thousand are false. In fact, it is only when they are of the former description, that we take any notice of them; the latter are looked upon as mere idle vagaries, and speedily forgotten. If a man, for instance, dreams that he has gained a law-suit in which he is engaged, and if this circumstance actually takes place, there is nothing at all extraordinary in the coincidence; his mind was full of the subject, and, in sleep, naturally resolved itself into that train of ideas in which it was most deeply interested. Or if we have a friend engaged in war, our fear for his safety will lead us to dream of death or captivity, and we may see him bent up in a hostile prison-house, or lying dead upon the battle plain. And should these melancholy catastrophies ensue we call our vision to memory; and, in the excited state of mind into which we are thrown, are apt to consider it as a prophetic warning, indicative of disaster. The following is a very good illustration of this particular point.

Miss M——, a young lady, a native of Rossshire, was deeply in love with an officer who accompanied Sir John Moore in the Peninsular war. The constant danger to which he was exposed, had an evident effect upon her spirits. She became pale and melancholy in perpetually brooding over his fortunes; and, in spite of all that reason could do, felt a certain conviction, that when she last parted with her lover, she had parted with him forever. In vain was every scheme tried to dispel from her mind the awful idea; in vain were all the sights which opulence could command, unfolded before her eyes. In the midst of pomp and gaiety, when music and laughter echoed around her, she walked as a pensive phantom, over whose head some dreadful and mysterious influence hung. She was brought by her affectionate parents to Edinburgh, and introduced into all the gaiety of that metropolis, but nothing could restore her, or banish from her mind the insupportable load which oppressed it. The song and the dance were tried in vain; they only aggravated her distress, and made the bitterness of despair more poignant. In a surprisingly short period, her graceful form declined into all the appalling characteristics of a fatal illness; and she seemed rapidly hastening to the grave, when a dream confirmed the horrors she had long anticipated, and gave the finishing stroke to her sorrows. One night, after falling asleep, she imagined she saw her lover, pale, bloody, and wounded in the breast, enter her apartment. He drew aside the curtains of the bed, and with a look of the utmost mildness, informed her that he had been slain in battle, desiring her, at the same time, to comfort herself, and not take his death too seriously to heart. It is needless to say what influence this vision had upon a mind so replete with woe. It withered it entirely, and the unfortunate girl died a few days thereafter, but not without desiring her parents to note down the day of the month on which it happened, and see if it would be confirmed, as she confidently declared it would. Her anticipation was correct, for accounts were shortly after received that the young man was slain at the battle of Corrunna, which was fought on the very day, on the night of which his mistress had beheld the vision.

This relation, which may be confidently relied upon, is one of the most striking examples of identity between the dream and the real circumstances with which I am acquainted, but it must be looked upon as merely accidental. The lady's mind was deeply interested in the fate of her lover, and full of that event which she most deeply dreaded—his death. The time of this occurrence, as coinciding with her dream, is certainly curious; but still there is nothing in it which can justify us in referring it to any other origin than chance. The following events, which occurred to myself, in August 1821, are almost equally remarkable, and are imputable to the same fortuitous cause.

I was then in Caithness, when I dreamed that a near relation of my own, residing three hundred miles off, had suddenly died: and immediately thereafter awoke in a state of inconceivable terror, similar to that produced by a paroxysm of nightmare. The same day, happening to be writing home, I mentioned the circumstance in a half-jesting, half-earnest way. To tell the truth, I was afraid to be serious, lest I should be laughed at for putting any faith in dreams. However, in the interval between writing and receiving an answer, I remained in a state of most unpleasant suspense. I felt a presentment that something dreadful had happened, or would happen; and although I could not help blaming myself for a childish weakness in so feeling, I was unable to get rid of the painful idea which had taken such rooted possession of my mind. Three days after sending away the letter, what was my astonishment when I received one written the day subsequent to mine, and stating that the relative of whom I had dreamed, had been struck with a fatal shock of palsy the day before—viz. the very day on the morning of which I had beheld the appearance in my dream! My friends received my letter two days after sending their own away, and were naturally astonished at the circumstance. I may state that my relation was in perfect health before the fatal event took place. It came upon him like a thunderbolt, at a period when no one could have the slightest anticipation of danger.

The following case will interest the reader, both on its own account, and from the remarkable coincidence between the dream and the succeeding calamity; but, like all other instances of the kind, this also must be referred to chance.

"Being in company the other day, when the conversation turned upon dreams, I related one, which, as it happened to my own father, I can answer for the perfect truth of it. About the year 1731, my father, Mr. D. of K——, in the County of Cumberland, came to Edinburgh to attend the classes, having the advantage of an uncle in the regiment then in the Castle, and remained under the protection of his uncle and aunt, Major and Mrs. Griffiths, during the winter. When spring arrived, Mr. D. and three or four young gentlemen from England, (his inmates,) made parties to visit all the neighboring places about Edinburgh, Roslin, Arthur's Seat, Craig-Millar, &c. &c. Coming home one evening from some of those places, Mr. D. said, 'We have made a party to go a-fishing to Inch-Keith to-morrow, if the morning is fine, and have bespoke our boat; we shall be off at six;' no objection being made, they separated for the night.

"Mrs. Griffiths, had not been long asleep, till she screamed out in the most violent agitated manner, 'The boat is sinking; save, oh, save them!' The Major awaked her, and said, 'Were you uneasy about the fishing party?' 'Oh no,' said she, I had not once thought of it.' She then composed herself, and soon fell asleep again: in about an hour, she cried out in a dreadful fright, 'I see the boat is going down.' The Major again awoke her, and she said, 'It has been owing to the other dream I had; for I feel no uneasiness about it.' After some conversation, they both fell sound asleep, but no rest could be obtained for her; in the most extreme agony, she again screamed, 'They are gone; the boat is sunk!' When the Major awakened her, she said, 'Now I cannot rest; Mr. D. must not go, for I feel, should he go, I would be miserable till his return; the thoughts of it would almost kill me.'

"She instantly arose, threw on her wrapping-down, and with great difficulty she got his promise to remain at home. 'But what am I to say to my young friends whom I was to meet at Leith at six o'clock? 'With great truth you may say your aunt is ill, for I am so at present; consider, you are an only son, under our protection, and should any thing happen to you, it would be my death,' Mr. D. immediately wrote a note to his friends, saying he was prevented from joining them, and sent his servant with it to Leith. The morning came in most beautifully, and continued so till three o'clock, when a violent storm arose, and in an instant the boat, and all that were in it, went to the bottom, and were never heard of, nor was any part of it ever seen."*

Equally singular is the following case, from the "Memoirs of Lady Fanshawe."

"My mother being sick to death of a fever, three months after I was born, which was the occasion she gave me suck no longer, her friends and servants thought to all outward appearance she was dead, and so lay almost two days and a night; but Dr. Winston coming to comfort my father, went into my mother's room, and looking earnestly on her face, said, 'She was so handsome, and now looks so lovely, I cannot think she is dead;' and suddenly took a lancet out of his pocket, and with it cut the sole of her foot, which bled. Upon this, he immediately caused her to be laid upon the bed again, and to be rubbed, and by such means, as she came to life, and opening her eyes, saw two of her kinswomen stand by her, My Lady Knollys and my Lady Russell, both with great wide sleeves, as the fashion then was, and said, 'Did not you promise me fifteen years, and are you come again?'

which they not understanding, persuaded her to keep her spirits quiet in that great weakness wherein she then was; but some hours after, she desired my father and Dr. Howlworth might be left alone with her, to whom she said, 'I will acquaint you, that during the time of my trance I was in great quiet, but in a place I could neither distinguish nor describe; but the sense of leaving my girl, who is dearest to me than all my children, remained a trouble upon my spirits. Suddenly I saw two by me, clothed in long white garments, and methought I fell down upon my face upon the dust; and they asked why I was so troubled in so great happiness. I replied, O let me have the same grant given to Hezekiah, that I may live fifteen years to see my daughter a woman: to which they answered, it is done: and then, at that instant, I awoke out of my trance!' and Dr. Howlsworth did there affirm, that that day she died made just fifteen years from that time."

A sufficiently striking instance of such coincidence occurs in the case of Dr. Donne, the metaphysical poet; but I believe that, in this case, it was a spectral illusion rather than a common dream. Two days after he had arrived in Paris, he was left alone in a room where he had been dining with Sir Robert Drury and a few companions. "Sir Robert turned about an hour afterwards. He found his friend in a state of ecstacy, and so altered in his countenance, that he could not look at him without amazement. The Doctor was not able for some time to answer the question, what had befallen him?—but after a long and perplexed pause, at last said, 'I have seen my dear wife pass twice by me through this room, with her hair hanging about her shoulders, and a dead child in her arms. This I have seen since I saw you.' To which Sir Robert answered, 'Sure, Sir, you have slept since I went out; and this is the result of some melancholy dream, which I desire you to forget, for you are now awake.' Donne replied, 'I cannot be more sure that I now live, than that I have not slept since I saw you; and am as sure that at her second appearance she stopped, looked me in the face and vanished."*

It is certainly very curious that Mrs. Donne, who was then in England, was at this time sick in bed, and had been delivered of a dead child, on the same day, and about the same hour, that the vision occurred. There were distressing circumstances in the marriage of Dr. Donne which account for his mind being strongly impressed with the image of his wife, to whom he was exceedingly attached; but these do not render the coincidence above related less remarkable.

I do not doubt that the apparatition of Julius Cæsar, which appeared to Brutus, and declared it would meet him at Philippi, was either a dream or a spectral illusion—probably the latter. Brutus, in all likelihood, had some idea that the battle which was to decide his fate would be fought at Philippi: probably it was a good military position, which he had fixed upon as a fit place to make a final stand; and he had done enough to Cæsar to account for his own mind being painfully and constantly engrossed with the image of the assassinated Dictator. Hence the verification of this supposed warning—hence the easy explanation of a supposed supernatural event.

At Newark-upon-Trent, a curious custom, founded upon the preservation of Alderman Clay and his family by a dream, has prevailed since the days of Cromwell. On the 11th March, every year, penny loaves are given away to any one who choose to appear at the town hall and apply for them, in commemoration of the alderman's deliverance, during the siege of Newark by the parliamentary forces. This gentleman, by will, dated 11th December, 1694, gave to the mayor and aldermen one hundred pounds, the interest of which was to be given to the vicar yearly, on condition of his preaching an annual sermon. Another hundred pounds were also appropriated for the behoof of the poor, in the way above mentioned. The origin of this bequest is singular. During the bombardment of Newark, Oliver Cromwell's forces, the alderman dreamed three nights successively that his house had taken fire, which produced such a vivid impression upon his mind, that he and his family left it; and in a few days the circumstances of his vision actually took place, by the house being burned down by the besiegers.

Dr. Abercrombie relates the case of a gentleman in Edinburgh, who was affected with an aneurism of the poplitel artery, for which he was under the care of two eminent surgeons. About two days before the time appointed for the operation, his wife dreamed that a change had taken place in the disease, in consequence of which an operation would not be required. "On examining the tumor in the morning, the gentleman was astonished to find that the pulsation had entirely ceased; and, in short, this turned out to be a spontaneous cure. To persons not professional, it may be right to mention that the cure of popliteal aneurism, without an operation, is a very uncommon occurrence, not happening, perhaps in one out of numerous instances, and never to be looked upon as probable in any individual case. It is likely, however, that the lady had heard of the possibility of such a termination, and that her anxiety had very naturally embodied this into a dream: the fulfilment of it, at the very time when the event took place, is certainly a very remarkable coincidence."*

Persons are said to have had the period of their own death pointed out to them in dreams. I have often heard the case of the late Mr. M. of D——related in support of this statement. It is certainly worth telling, not on account of any supernatural character belonging to it, but simply from the extraordinary coincidence between the dream and the subsequent event. This gentleman dreamed one night that he was out riding, when he stopped at an inn on the road side for refreshment, where he saw several people whom he had known some years before, but who were all dead. He was received kindly by them, and desired to sit down and drink, which he accordingly did. On quitting this strange company, they exacted a promise from him that he would visit them that day six weeks. This he promised to do; and, bidding them farewell, he rode homewards. Such was the substance of his dream, which he related in a jocular way to his friends, but thought no more about it, for he was a person above all kind of superstition. The event, however, was certainly curious enough, as well as melancholy; for on that very day six weeks on which he had engaged to meet his friends at the inn, he was killed in attempting to spring his horse over a five-barred gate. The famous case of Lord Lyttleton* is also cited as an example of a similar kind, but with less show of reason, for this case is now very generally supposed to be an imposition; and so will almost every other of the same kind, if narrowly investigated. At the same time, I do not mean to doubt that such an event, foretold in a dream, may occasionally come to pass; but I would refer the whole to fortuitous coincidence. Men dream, every now and then, that they will die on a certain day, yet how seldom do we see those predictions fulfilled by the result! In very delicate people, indeed, such a visionary communication, by acting fatally upon the mind, might be the means of occasioning its own fulfilment. In such cases, it has been customary for the friends of the individual to put back the clock an hour or two, so as to let the fatal period pass by without his being aware of it; and as soon as it was fairly passed, to inform him of the circumstance, and laugh him out of his apprehension.

There is another way in which the apparent fulfilment of a dream may be brought about. A good illustration in point is given by Mr. Combe. The subject of it was one Scott, executed in 1823, at Sedburg, for murder. "It is stated in his life, that, some years before the fatal event, he had dreamed that he had committed a murder, and was greatly impressed with the idea. He frequently spoke of it, and recurred to it as something ominous, till at last it was realized. The organ of Destructiveness was large in his head, and so active that he was an enthusiast in poaching, and prone to outrage and violence in his habitual conduct. This activity of the organ might take place during sleep, and then it would inspire his mind with destructive feelings, and the dream of murder would be the consequence. From the great natural strength of the propensity, he probably may have felt, when awake, an inward tendency to this crime; and, joining this and the dream together, we can easily account for the strong impression left by the latter on his mind."†

One method in which death may appear to be foretold is, by the accession of frightful visions immediately before the fatal illness. This, however, goes for nothing in the way of argument, for it was the state of the system shortly before the attack of disease which induced such dreams. According to Silimaches, the epidemic fever which prevailed at Rome was ushered in by attacks of nightmare; and Sylvius Deleboe, who describes the epidemic which raged at Leyden in 1669, states, that previous to each paroxysm of the fever, the patient fell asleep, and suffered a severe attack of nightmare. The vulgar belief, therefore, that unpleasant dreams are ominous death, is not destitute of foundation; but the cause why they should be so is perfectly natural. It is the incipient disease which produces the dreams, and the fatal event which often follows, is a natural consequence of that disease.

It is undoubtedly owing to the faculty possessed by sleep, of renewing long-forgotten ideas, that persons have had important facts communicated to them in dreams. There have been instances, for example, where valuable documents, sums of money, &c., have been concealed, and where either the person who secreted them, or he who had the place of their concealment communicated to him, may have forgotten every thing therewith connected. He may then torture his mind in vain, during the waking state, to recollect the event; and it may be brought to his rememberance, at once, in a dream. In such cases, an apparition is generally the medium through which the seemingly mysterious knowledge is communicated. The imagination conjures up some phantom that discloses the secret; which circumstance, proceeding, in reality, from a simple operation of the mind, is straightway converted into something supernatural, and invested with all the attributes of wonder and awe. When such spectral forms appear, and communicate some fact which turns out to be founded on truth, the person is not always aware that the whole occurred in a dream, but often fancies that he was broad awake when the apparition appeared to him and communicated the particular intelligence. When we hear, therefore, of hidden treasures, wills, &c., being disclosed in such a manner, we are not always to scout the report as false. The spectre divulging the intelligence was certainly the mere chimera of the dreamer's brain, but the facts revealed, apparently by this phantom, may from the above circumstance, be substantially true. The following curious case is strikingly in point, and is given by Sir Walter Scott in his notes to the new edition of "The Antiquary."

"Mr. R——d of Bowland, a gentleman of landed property in the Vale of Gala, was prosecuted for a very considerable sum, the accumulated arrears of tiend, (or tithe,) for which he was said to be indebted to a noble family, the titulars (lay impropriators of the tithes.) Mr. R——d was strongly impressed with the belief that his father had, by a form of process peculiar to the law of Scotland, purchased these lands from the titular, and, therefore, that the present prosecution was groundless. But after an industrious search among his father's papers,

* "Of late it has been said and published, that the unfortunate nobleman had previously determined to take poison, and of course, had it in his own power to ascertain the execution of the prediction. It was, no doubt singular, that a man, who meditated his exit from the world, should have choosen to play such a trick upon his friends. But it is still more credible that a whimsical man should do so wild a thing, than that a messenger should be sent from the dead, to tell a libertine at what precise hour he should expire." Scott's letters on Demonology, p. 361.

an investigation of the public records, and a careful inquiry among all persons who had transacted law business for his father, no evidence could be recovered to support his defence. The period was now near at hand when he conceived the loss of his lawsuit to be inevitable, and he formed the determination to ride to Edinburgh next day, and make the best bargain he could in the way of compromise. He went to bed with the resolution, and, with all the circumstances of the case floating upon his mind, had a dream to the following purpose. His father, who had been many years dead, appeared to him, he thought, and asked him why he was disturbed in his mind. In dreams, men are not surprised at such apparations. Mr. R——d thought that he informed his father of the cause of his distress, adding, that the payment of a considerable sum of money was the more unpleasant to him, because he had a strong consciousness that it was not due, though he was unable to recover any evidence in support of his belief. 'You are right, my son,' replied the paternal shade; 'I did acquire right to these tiends, for payment of which you are now prosecuted. The papers relating to the transaction are in hands of Mr. ———, a writer, (or attorney,) who is now retired from professional business, and resides at Inveresk, near Edinburgh. He was a person whom I employed on that occasion for a particular reason, but who never on any other occasion transacted business on my account. It is very possible,' pursued the vision that 'that Mr. ——— may have forgotten amatter which is now of a very old date; but you may call it to his recollection by this token that when I came to pay his account, there was difficulty in getting change for a Portugal piece of gold, and we were forced to drink out the balance at a tavern.'

"Mr. R——d awoke in the morning with all the words of the vision imprinted on his mind, and thought it worth while to walk across the country to Inveresk, instead of going straight to Edinburgh. When he came there, he waited on the gentleman mentioned in the dream, a very old man. Without saying anything of the vision, he inquired whether he remembered having conducted such a matter for his diseased father. The old gentleman could not at first bring the circumstance to his recollection, but on mention of the Portugal piece of gold, the whole returned upon his memory; he made an immediate search for the papers, and recovered them —so that M. R——d carried to Edinburgh the documents necessary to gain the cause which he was on the verge of losing.

"The author has often heard this story told by persons who had the best success to know the facts, who were not likely themselves to be deceived, and were certainly incapable of deception. He cannot, therefore, refuse to give it credit, however extraordinary the circumstances may appear. The circumstantial character of the information given in the dream, takes it out of the general class of impressions of the kind, which are occasioned by the fortuitous coincidence of actual events with our sleeping thoughts. On the other hand, few will suppose that the laws of nature were suspended, and a special communication from the dead to the living permitted, for the purpose of saving Mr. R——d a certain number of hundred pounds. The author's theory is, that the dream was only the recapitulation of information which Mr. R——d had really received from his father while in life, but which at first he merely recalled as a general impression that the claim was settled. It is not uncommon for persons to recover, during sleep, the thread of ideas which they have lost during their waking hours. It may be added, that this remarkable circumstance was attended with bad consequences to Mr. R——d; whose health and spirits were afterwards impaired, by the attention which he thought himself obliged to pay to the visions of the night." This result is a melancholy proof of the effect sometimes produced by ignorance of natural laws. Had Mr. R——d been acquainted with the nature of the brain, and of the manner in which it is affected in sleep, the circumstance above related would have given him no annoyance. He would have traced the whole chain of events to their true source; but, being ignorant of this, he became the victim of superstition, and his life was rendered miserable.

STANZAS,

On seeing a group of Girls kneeling in silent Prayer.

Look—they are kneeling—and each brow is covered
With the white hands that press them—and an awe,
Rests on their souls, as if above them hovered
The Holy Spirit, visibly, to draw
The young affections of their guileless bosoms.
The ardent hopes that burn within each breast.
From earthly treasures, to those fadeless blossoms
That wreath the bowers of everlasting rest!

Still—still—as if each spirit held communion
In silence with its God!—or else had flown
Away from Earth to seek a closer union
With him that sits upon that dazzling Throne
Before which angels and archangels, bending,
Offer perpetual worship!—while abroad
Through Heaven's bright regions, harps with voices blending,
Pour loud hosannahs to the LIVING GOD!

A balmy breeze, with fragrance richly laden,
Comes as from Heaven, to greet those kneeling girls,
And, as it softly passes by, each maiden
Feels its air-fingers dallying with her curls—
But feels it not, unless, perchance, her spirit
Deems it a whisper from another world,
Which the pure-hearted shall alone inherit,
When Earth to utter nothing shall be hurled!

Are they not beautiful?—nor noise, nor motion
Is there—and yet those silent worshippers
Feel their hearts burning with as pure devotion
As e'er was uttered—and the love that stirs
Each humble spirit, is a flame from Heaven
Lit on the altar of the human heart.
Oh! bright will be the hope that shall be given
To those pure girls—and theirs the "better part."

Do they—the guileless—guiltless—whose existence
Hath been a summer morning, cloudless bright,
Do they, while gazing in the forward distance
On future scenes of joyance and delight,
Feel they have sins which need to be forgiven?
That in God's mercy they alone can trust?
If they need grace to fit their souls for Heaven
Be my proud spirit humbled in the dust.

BUBBLES FROM THE BRUNNENS OF NASSAU.

One of the most entertaining books of the day is now in the course of publication in Waldie's popular Select Circulating Library. It is entitled "Bubbles from the Brunnens of Nassau," and describes the society, manners and customs of the fashionable society at the Watering places of Germany, with a description of the country, the celebrated Seltzer Springs of Nassau, &c. It is said in the title, to be by "an old man," who is thus represented blowing his bubbles:

Major Head, the celebrated traveller, is said to be the author; the following account of the Schwein-General, or pig-keeper, of one of the villages, is surely an amusing sketch:—

THE SCHWEIN-GENERAL.

Every morning at half-past five o'clock, I hear as I am dressing, the sudden blast of an immense long wooden horn, from which always proceed the same four notes. I have got quite accustomed to this wild reveille, and the vibration has scarcely subsided, it is still ringing among the distant hills, when, leisurely proceeding from almost every door in the street, behold a pig! Some from their jaded, care-worn, draggled appearance, are evidently leaving behind them a numerous litter; others are great, tall, monastic, melancholy-looking creatures, which seem to have no other object left in this wretched world than to become bacon; while others are thin, tiny, light-hearted, brisk, petulant piglings, with the world and all its loves and sorrows before them. Of their own accord these creatures proceed down the street to join the herdsman, who occasionally continues to repeat the sorrowful blast from his horn.

Gregarious, or naturally fond of society, with one curl in their tails, and with their noses almost touching the ground, the pigs trot on, grunting to themselves and to their comrades, halting only whenever they come to any thing they can manage to swallow.

I have observed that the old ones pass all the carcasses, which, trailing to the ground, are hanging to the butchers' shops, as if they were on a sort of parole d'honneur not to touch them; the middle-aged ones wistfully eye this meat, yet jog on also, while the piglings, who (so like mankind) have more appetite than judgment, can rarely resist taking a nibble; yet, no sooner does the dead calf begin again to move, than from the window immediately above, out pops the head of a butcher, who, drinking his coffee, whip in hand, inflicts a prompt punishment, sounding quite equal to the offence.

As I have stated, the pigs, generally speaking, proceed of their own accord; but shortly after they have passed, there comes down our street, a little bareheaded, barefooted, stunted dab of a child, about eleven years old,—a Flibbertigibbet sort of creature, which in a drawing, one would express by a couple of blots, the small one for her head, the other for her body; while, streaming from the latter, there would be a long line ending in a flourish, to express the immense whip which the child carries in its hand. This little goblin page, the whipper-in, attendant, or aide-de-camp of the pig-driver, facetiously called at Langen-Schwalbach, the "Schwein-General," is a being no one looks at, and who looks at nobody. Whether the hofs of Schwalbach are full of strangers, or empty—whether the promenades are occupied by princes or peasants—whether the weather be good or bad, hot, or rainy, she apparently never stops to consider: upon such vague subjects, it is evident she never for a moment has reflected. But such a pair of eyes, for a pig, have perhaps seldom beamed from human sockets! The little intelligent urchin knows every house from which a pig ought to have proceeded; she can tell by the door being open or shut, and even by footmarks, whether the creature has joined the herd, or whether, having overslept itself, it is still snoring in its stye—a single glance determines whether she shall pass a yard or enter it; and if a pig, from indolence or greediness, be loitering on the road, the sting of the wasp cannot be sharper or more spiteful than the cut she gives it. As soon as finishing with one street, she joins her general in the main road, the herd slowly proceed down the town.

As I followed them this morning, they really appeared to have no hams at all; their bodies were as if they had been squeezed in a vice; and when they turned sideways, their long sharp noses, and tucked-up bellies, gave to their profile the appearance of starved greyhounds.

As I gravely followed this grunting, unearthly-looking herd of unclean spirits, through that low part of Langen-Schwalbach which is solely inhabited by Jews, I could not help fancying that I observed them holding their very breaths, as if a loathsome pestilence were passing; for though fat pork be a wicked luxury—a forbidden pleasure which the Jew has been supposed occasionally to indulge in, yet one may easily imagine, that such very lean hungry pigs have not charms enough to lead them astray.

Besides the little girl who brought up the rear, the herd was preceeded by a boy about fourteen, whose duty it was not to let the foremost, the more enterprising, or in other words, the most empty pig, advance too fast. In the middle of the drove, surrounded like a shepherd by his flock, slowly stalked the "SCHWEIN-GENERAL," a wan spectre-looking old man, worn out, or nearly so, by the arduous and every-day duty of conducting, against their wills, a gang of exactly the most obstinate animals in creation. A single glance at his jaundiced, ill-natured countenance, was sufficient to satisfy one that his temper had been soured by the vexatious contrarieties and "untoward events" it had met with. In his left hand he held a staff to help himself onwards, while round his right shoulder hung one of the most terrific whips that could possibly be constructed. At the end of a short handle, turning upon a swivel, there was a lash about nine feet long, formed like the vertebræ of a snake, each joint being an iron ring, which, decreasing in size, was closely connected with its neighbour by a band of hard greasy leather. The pliability, the weight, and the force of this iron whip, rendered it an argument which the obstinacy even of the pig was unable to resist; yet, as the old man proceeded down the town, he endeavoured to speak kindly to the herd; and, as the bulk of them preceded him, jostling each other, grumbling and grunting on their way, he occasionally exclaimed, in a low, hollow, worn-out tone of encouragement, "Nina! Anina!" (drawling, of course, very long on the last syllable.)

If any little savoury morsel caused a contention, stoppage, or constipation on the march, the old fellow slowly unwound his dreadful whip, and by merely whirling it round his head, like reading the Riot Act, he generally succeeded in dispersing the crowd; but if they neglected this solemn warning, if their stomachs proved stronger than their judgements, and if the group of greedy pigs still continued to stagnate—"ARRIFF!" the old fellow exclaimed, and rushing forwards, the lash whirling round his head, he inflicted, with strength which no one could have fancied he possessed, a smack that seemed absolutely to electrify the leader. As lightning shoots across the heavens, I observed the culprit fly forwards, and for many yards continuing to sidle towards the left, it was quite evident that the thorn was still smarting in his side; and no wonder, poor fellow! for the blow he received would almost have cut a piece out of a deer.

As soon as the herd got out of the town, they began gradually to ascend the rocky barren mountain which appeared towering above them; and then the labours of the Schwein-general and his staff became greater than ever; for, as the animals from their solid column began to extend or deploy themselves into line, it was necessary constantly to ascend and descend the slippery hill, in order to outflank them. "ARRIFF!" vociferated the old man, striding after one of his rebellious subjects; "Arriff!" in a shrill tone of voice was re-echoed by the lad, as he ran after another; however, in due time, he drove reached the ground which was devoted for that day's exercise, the whole mountain being thus taken in regular succession.

The Schwein-general now halted, and the pigs being no longer called upon to advance, but being left entirely to their own notions, I became exceedingly anxious attentively to observe them.

No wonder, poor reflecting creatures! that they had come unwillingly to such a spot—for there appeared literally to be nothing for them to eat but hot stones and dust; however, making the best of the bargain, they all very vigorously set themselves to work. Looking up the hill, they dexterously began to lift up with their snouts the largest of the loose stones, and then grubbing their noses into the cool ground, I watched their proceedings for a very long time. Their tough wet snouts seemed to be sensible of the quality of every thing they touched; and thus, out of the apparently barren ground, they managed to get fibres of roots, to say nothing of worms, beetles, or any other travelling insects they met with. As they slowly advanced working up the hill, their ears most philosophically shading their eyes from the hot sun, I could not help feeling how little we appreciate the delicacy of several of their senses, and the extreme acuteness of their instinct.

In this situation do the pigs remain every morning for four hours, enjoying little else than air and exercise. At about nine or ten o'clock, they begin their march homewards, and nothing can form a greater contrast than their entry into their native town does to their exit from it.

Their eager anxiety to get to the dinner-trough that awaits them, is almost ungovernable; and they no sooner reach the first houses of the town, than a sort of "sauve qui peut" motion takes place; away each then starts towards his dulce domum: and it is really curious to stand still and watch how very quickly they canter by, greedily grunting and snuffling, as if they could smell with their stomachs, as well as their noses, the savoury food which was awaiting them.

At half-past four, the same four notes of the same horn are heard again; the pigs once more assemble—once more tumble over the hot stones on the mountain—once more remain there for four hours—and in the evening once again return to their styes.

Such is the life of the pigs, not only of Langen-Schwalbach, but of those of every village throughout a great part of Germany: every day of their existence, summer and winter, is spent in the manner I have described. The squad consists here of about a hundred and fifty, and for each pig the poor old Schwein-general receives forty kreutzers, (about 13*d.*) for six months' drilling of each recruit. This income, therefore, is about 20*l.* a year, out of which he is to pay the board, lodging and clothing, of his two aids-de-camps; and when one considers how unremittingly this poor fellow-creature has to contend with the gross appetites, sulky tempers, and pig-headed dispositions of the swinish multitude, surely not even the most niggardly reformer, would wish to curtail his emoluments.

THE BEGGAR.

From the French.

Not long since an old beggar, named James, was in the daily habit of placing himself at the principal gate of a church in Paris. His manners, tone and language, showed that he had received an education far superior to that which is the ordinary lot of poverty. Under his rags, which were worn with certain dignity, shone a still living recollection of a more elevated condition. This beggar also enjoyed great authority among the paupers belonging to the parish. His kindness, his impartiality in distributing alms among his fellow paupers, his zeal in appeasing their quarrels, had earned for him well-merited respect. Yet his life and misfortunes were a complete mystery to his most intimate comrades, as well as to the persons attached to the parish. Every morning for twenty-five years, he regularly came and sat down at the same place. People were so accustomed to see him there, that he made, as it were, part of the furniture of the porch; yet, none of his fellow-beggars could relate the least particular of his life.

Only one thing was known, James never set his foot in the church, and yet he was catholic. At the time of the religious services, when the sacred dome resounded with hymns of devotion, when the incense, ascending above the altar, with the vows of the faithful towards heaven, when the grave and melodious sound of the organ swelled the solemn chorus of the assembled christians, the beggar felt himself impelled to mingle his prayers with those of the church; with an eager and contented eye, he contemplated from without, the solemnity which the house of God presented. The sparkling reflection of the light through the gothic windows, the shade of the pillars, which had stood there for ages, like a symbol of the eternity of religion, the profound charm attached to the gloomy aspect of the church: every thing inspired the beggar with involuntary admiration. Tears were sometimes perceived to trickle down his wrinkled face; some great misfortune, or some profound remorse seemed to agitate his soul. In the primitive times of the church, he might have been taken for a great criminal condemned to banish himself from the assembly of the faithful, and to pass, like a shade, through the midst of the living.

A clergyman repaired every day to that church to celebrate mass. Descended from one of the most ancient families in France, possessed of an immense fortune, he found a joy in bestowing abundant alms.—The beggar had become the object of a sort of affection, and every morning the Abbe Paulin de Saint ——, accompanied with benevolent words his charity, which had become a daily income.

One day James did not appear at the usual hour. The Abbe Paulin, desirous of not losing this opportunity for his charity, sought the dwelling of the beggar, and found the old man lying sick on a couch. The eyes of the clergyman were smitten with the luxury and the misery which appeared in the furniture of that habitation. A magnificent gold watch was suspended over the miserable bolster; two pictures, richly framed, and covered with crape, were placed on a white-washed wall; a crucifix in ivory of beautiful workmanship, was hanging at the feet of the sick man; an antiquated chair, with gothic carvings, and among a few worn out books lay a mass book, with silver clasps; all the remainder of the furniture announced frightful misery. The presence of the priest revived the old man, and with an accent full of gratitude, the latter cried out—

"M. Abbe, you are then kind enough to remember an unhappy man?"

"My friend," replied M. Paulin, "a priest forgets none but the happy ones, I come to inquire whether you want any assistance."

"I want nothing," answered the beggar, "my death is approaching; my conscience alone is not quiet."

"Your conscience! have you any great fault to expiate?"

"A crime, an enormous crime, a crime for which my whole life has been a cruel and useless expiation; a crime, beyond pardon!"

"A crime beyond pardon! there does not exist any! The divine mercy is greater than all the crimes of man."

"But a criminal, polluted with the most horrible crime, what has he to hope for? Pardon? There is none for me."

"Yes, there is," cried out the priest with enthusiasm; "to doubt it would be a more horrible blasphemy than your very crime itself. Religion stretches out her arms to repentance. James, if your repentance is sincere implore the divine goodness; it will not abandon you. Make your confession."

Thereupon the priest uncovered himself, and after pronouncing the sublime words, which open to the penitent the gates of heaven, he listened to the beggar.

"The son of a poor farmer, honoured with the affection of a family of high rank, whose lands my father cultivated, I was from my infancy welcomed at the castle of my masters. Destined to be a valet-de-chambre to the heir of the family, the education they gave me, my rapid progress in study, and the benevolence of my masters, changed my condition; I was raised to the rank of a secretary. I was just turned of twenty five years of age, when the revolution first broke out in France; my mind was easily seduced by reading the newspapers of that period; my ambition made me tired of my precarious situation. I conceived the project of abandoning for the camp the castle which had been the asylum of my youth. Had I followed that first impulse, ingratitude would have saved me from a crime! The fury of the revolutionists soon spread through the provinces; my masters, fearing to be arrested in their castle, dismissed all their servants. A sum of money was realized in haste, and selecting from among their rich furniture a few articles, precious for family recollections, they went to Paris to seek an asylum in the crowd, and find repose in the obscurity of their dwelling. I followed them, as a child of the house. Terror reigned uncontrolled throughout France, and nobody knew the place of concealment of my masters. Inscribed on the list of emigrants, confiscation had soon devoured their property; but it was nothing to them, for they were together, tranquil and unknown. Animated by a lively faith in Providence, they lived in the expectation of better times. Vain hope! the only person who could reveal their retreat, and snatch them from their asylum, had the baseness to denounce them.—This informer is myself. The father, the mother, four daughters, angels in beauty and innocence, and a young boy, of ten years of age, were thrown together into a dungeon, and delivered up to the horrors of captivity. Their trial commenced.

The most frivulous pretences were then sufficient to condemn the innocent; yet the public accuser could hardly find one motive for prosecution against that noble and virtuous family. A man was found, who was the confident of their secrets and their most intimate thoughts; he magnified the most simple circumstances of their lives into guilt, and invented the frivolous crime of conspiracy. This calumniator, this false witness, I am he. The fatal sentence of death was passed upon the whole family, except the young son an unhappy orphan, destined to weep the loss of all his kindred, and to curse his assassin, if he ever knew him. Resigned, and finding consolation in their virtues, that unfortunate family expected death in prison. A mistake took place in the order of the executions. The day appointed for theirs, passed over, and if nobody had meddled with it, they would have escaped the scaffold, it being the eve of the ninth of Thermidor.

A man, impatient to enrich himself with their spoils, repaired to the revolutionary tribunal, caused the error to be rectified; his zeal was rewarded with a diploma of civism. The order for their execution was delivered immediately, and on that very evening the frightful justice of these times had its course. The wicked informer, I am he. At the close of the day, by torch light, the fatal cart transported that family to death!—The father, with the impress of profound sorrow on his brow, pressed in his arms his two youngest daughters: the mother a heroic and christian-like woman, did the same with the two eldest; and all mingling their recollections, their tears and their hopes, were repeating the funeral prayers. They did not even once utter the name of their assassin. And it was late, the execution. Little accustomed to the horrible work, the valet, on the way, begged the assistance of a passer-by. The latter consented to help him in his ignoble function. This man, is myself. The reward of so many crimes was a sum of three thousand francs in gold; and the precious articles, still deposited here around me are the witnesses of my guilt.

After I had committed this crime, I tried to bury the recollection of it in debauchery; the gold obtained by my infamous conduct was hardly spent, when remorse took possession of my soul. No project, no enterprise, no labour of mine, was crowned with success. I became poor and infirm. Charity allowed me a privileged place at the gate of the church, where I have passed so many years. The remembrance of my crime was overwhelming; so poignant, that, despairing of divine goodness, I never dared implore the consolation of religion, nor enter the church. The alms I received, yours especially, Mr. Abbe, aided me to hoard a sum equal to that I stole from my former masters: here it is. The objects of luxury which you remark in my room, this watch, this crucifix, this book, these veiled portraits, were taken from my victims. Oh! how long and profound has my repentance been, but how powerless! M. Abbe, do you believe I can hope pardon from God?"

"My son," replied the Abbe, "your crime, no doubt is frightful: the circumstances of it are atrocious. Orphans, who were deprived of their parents by the revolution, understand better than any one else, all the bitterness of the anguish suffered by your victims! A whole life passed in tears, is not too much for the expiation of such a crime. Yet the treasures of divine mercy are immense. Relying on your repentance, and full of confidence in the inexhaustable goodness of God, I think I can assure you of his pardon."

The priest then rose up. The beggar, as if animated by a new life, got out of bed and knelt down. The Abbe Paulin de Saint C. was going to pronounce the powerful words which bind or loosen the sins of man, when the beggar cried out:

"Father, wait! before I receive God's pardon, let me get rid of the fruit of my crimes. Take these objects, sell them, distribute the price to the poor."—In his hasty movements, the beggar snatched away the crape which covered the two pictures. "Behold!" said he—"behold the august images of my masters!"

At the sight, the Abbe Paulin de Saint C. let these words escape:—"My father! my mother!"

Immediately, the remembrance of that horrible catastrophe, the presence of the assassin, the sight of those objects, seized upon the soul of the priest, and yielding to an unexpected emotion, he fell upon a chair. His head leaning on his hands, he shed abundant tears; a deep wound had opened afresh in his heart.

The beggar, overpowered, not daring to lift up his looks on the son of his masters, on the terrible and angry judge, who owed him vengeance rather than pardon, rolled himself at his feet, bedewed them with tears, and repeated in a tone of despair—"My master! my master!"

The priest endeavored, without looking at him, to check his grief. The bagger cried out:

"Yes, I am an assassin, a monster, an infamous wretch! M. Abbe dispose of my life! What must I do to avenge you?"

"Avenge me!" replied the priest, recalled to himself by these words—"avenge me, unhappy man!"

"Was I not then right in saying that my crime was beyond pardon? I knew it well, that religion itself would repulse me. Repentance will avail nothing to a crimnal of so deep a dye; there is no forgiveness for me—no more pardon—no forgiveness?"

These last words, pronounced with a terrible accent, reached to the soul of the priest, his mission and his duties. The struggle between filial grief and the exercise of his sacred functions ceased immediately. Human weakness had for a moment claimed the tears of the saddened son. Religion then stirred the soul of the servant of God. The priest took hold of the crucifix, his paternal inheritance, which had fallen into the hands of this unhappy man, and presenting it to the beggar, he said, in the strong accents of emotion:

"Christian, is your repentance sincere?"

"Yes."

"Is your crime the object of profound horror?"

"Yes."

"Our God, immolated on this cross by men, grants you pardon! Finish your confession."

Then the priest, with one hand uplifted over the beggar, holding in the other the sign of our redemption, bade the divine mercy descend on the assassin of his whole family!

With his face against the earth, the beggar remains immovable at the priest's feet. The latter stretched out his hand to raise him up—he was no more!—N. Y. Mirror.

THE BETTER LAND.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

"I hear thee speak of the better land,
Thou callest its children a happy band;
Mothers! oh where is that radiant shore?
Shall we seek it, and weep no more!
Is it where the flower of the orange blows,
And the fire flies glance through the myrtle boughs!"
—"Not there, not there, my child!"

"Is it where the feathery palm trees rise,
And the date grows ripe under sunny skies?
Or, midst the green Islands of glittering seas,
Where fragrant forests perfume the breeze.
And strange, bright birds, on their starry wings,
Bear the rich hues of all glorious things?
—"Not there, not there, my child?"

"Is it far away, in some region old,
Where the rivers wander o'er sands of gold?—
Where the burning rays of the ruby shine,
And diamonds light up the secret mine,
And the pearl gleams forth from the coral strand?
Is it there, sweet mother, that better land?"
—Not there, not there, my child!"

"Eye hath not seen it, my gentle boy,
Ear hath not heard its deep songs of joy:
Dreams cannot picture a world so fair—
Sorrows and death may not enter there:
Time doth not breathe on its fadeless bloom,
Far beyond the clouds and beyond the tomb,
—It is there, it is there, my child!"

THE SOUL IN PURGATORY;

OR, LOVE STRONGER THAN DEATH.

The angels strung their harps in Heaven, and their music went up like a stream of odours to the pavilions of the Most High. But the harp of Seralim was sweeter than that of his fellows, and the voice of the Invisible One (for the angels themselves know not the glories of Jehovah—only far in the depths of Heaven, they see one Unsleeping Eye watching for ever over creation) was heard, saying,

"Ask a gift for the love that burns upon thy song, and it shall be given thee."

And Seralim answered—

"There are in that place which men call Purgatory, and which is the escape from Hell, but the painful Porch of Heaven, many souls that adore Thee, and yet are punished justly for their sins: grant me the boon to visit them at times, and solace their suffering by the hymns of the harp that is consecrated to Thee!"

And the voice answered—

"Thy prayer is heard, oh gentlest of the angels; and it seems good to him who chastises, but from love.—Go! Thou hast thy will."

Then the angel sang the praises of God, and when the song was done, he rose from his azure throne at the right hand of Gabriel, and spreading his rainbow wings, he flew to that melancholy orb which, nearest to earth, echoes with the shrieks of souls, that by torture become pure. There the unhappy ones see from afar the bright courts they are hereafter to obtain, and the shapes of glorious beings, who, fresh from the Fountains of Immortality, walk amid the gardens of Paradise, and feel that their happiness hath no morrow; and this thought consoles amid their torments, and makes the true difference between Purgatory and Hell.

Then the angel folded his wings, and entering the crystal gates, sat down upon a blasted rock, and struck his divine lyre, and a peace fell over the wretched; the demon ceased to torture, and the victim to wail. As sleep to the mourners of earth was the song of the angel to the souls of the purifying star, one only voice amid the general stillness seemed not lulled by the angel; it was the voice of a woman, and it continued to cry out with a sharp cry—

"Oh, Adenheim—Adenheim, mourn not for the lost!"

The angel struck chord after chord, till his most skilful melodies were exhausted, but still the sweetest harp of the angel choir, cried out—

"Oh, Adenheim—Adenheim, mourn not for the lost!"

Then Seralim's interest was aroused, and approaching the spot whence the voice came, he saw the spirit of a young and beautiful girl chained to a rock, and the demons lying idly by. And Seralim said to the demons, 'Doth the song lull ye thus to rest?'

And they answered, 'Her care for another is bitterer than all our torments; therefore are we idle.'

Then the angel approached the spirit, and said, in a voice which stilled her cry—for in what state do we outlive sympathy? 'Wherefore, oh daughter of earth, wherefore wailest thou with the same plaintive wail? and why doth the harp that soothes the most guilty of thy companions fail in its melody with thee?'

'Oh! radiant stranger,' answered the poor spirit, 'thou speakest to one who on earth loved God's creature more than God; therefore is she thus justly sentenced. But I know that my poor Adenheim mourns ceaselessly for me, and the thought of his sorrow is more intolerable to me than all the demons can inflict.'

'And how knowest thou that he laments thee?' asked the angel.

'Because I know with what agony I should have mourned for him,' replied the spirit, simply.

The Divine nature of the angel was touched; for love is the nature of the sons of heaven. 'And how,' said he, 'can I minister to thy sorrow?'

A transport seemed to agitate the spirit, and she lifted up her mist-like and impalpable arms, and cried:

'Give me—oh, give me to return to earth but for one little hour, that I may visit my Adenheim; and that, concealing from him my present sufferings, I may comfort him in his own.'

'Alas!' said the angel, turning away his eyes, for angels may not weep in the sight of others, 'I could, indeed, grant thee this boon, but thou knowest not the penalty. For the souls in Purgatory may return to Earth, but heavy is the sentence that awaits their return. In a word, for one hour on earth, thou must add a thousand years to the tortures of thy confinement here!'

'Is that all!' cried the spirit; 'willingly, then, will I brave the doom. 'Ah, surely they love not in heaven, or thou wouldst know, oh Celestial Visitant, that one hour of consolation to the one we love is worth a thousand thousand ages of torture to ourselves!—Let me comfort and convince my Adenheim; no matter what becomes of me.'

Then the angel looked on high, and he saw in far distant regions, which in that orb none else could discern, the rays that parted from the all-guarding Eye; and heard the VOICE of the Eternal One, bidding him act as his pity whispered. He looked on the spirit, and her shadowy arms stretched pleadingly towards him: he uttered the word that looses the bars of the gate of Purgatory; and lo, the spirit had re-entered the human world.

It was night in the halls of the Lord of Adenheim; and he sat at the head of his glittering board; loud and long was the laugh, and merry the jest that echoed round; and the laugh and jest of the Lord of Adenheim were louder and merrier than all.

And by his right side sat a beautiful lady: and ever and anon he turned from others to whisper soft vows in her ear.

'And oh,' said the bright dame of Falkenbery, 'thy words what ladye can believe; didst thou not utter the same oaths and promise the same love to Ida, the fair daughter of Loden; and now but three little months have closed upon her grave!"

"By my balidom, quoth the young Lord of Adenheim, 'thou dost thy beauty marvellous injustice.—Ida! Nay, thou mookest me; I love the daughter of Loden! why, how then should I be worthy thee? A few gay words, a few passing smiles—behold all the love Adenheim ever bore to Ida. Was it my fault if the poor fool misconstrued such common courtesy? Nay, dearest lady, this heart is virgin to thee."

"And what!" said the lady of Falkenberg, as she suffered the arm of Adenheim to encircle her slender waist, 'didst thou not grieve for her loss?"

"Why, verily, yes, for the first week; but in thy bright eyes I found ready consolation.'

At this moment the Lord of Adenheim thought he heard a deep sigh behind him: he turned, but saw nothing, save a slight mist that gradually faded away, and vanished in the distance. Where was the necessity for Ida to reveal herself?

* * * * *

"And thou didst not, then, do thine errand to thy lover?" said Seralim, as the spirit of the wronged Ida returned to Purgatory.

"Bid the demons recommence their torture," was poor Ida's answer.

"And was it for this that thou hast added a thousand years to thy doom?"

"Alas," answered Ida, "after the single hour I have endured on earth, there seems to be but little terrible in a thousand fresh years of Purgatory!"*

"What! is the story ended?" asked Gertrude.

"Yes."

"Nay, surely the thousand years were not added to poor Ida's doom; and Seralim bore her back with him to heaven?"

"The legend saith no more. The writer was contented to show us the perpetuity of woman's love—"

"And its reward," added Vain.

"It was not I who drew that last conclusion, Albert," whispered Gertrude.

COL. BOONE, THE BACKWOODSMAN.

Who has not heard of Daniel Boon, the free and fearless hunter of the western wilds, and the patriarch of Backwoods Rovers? A name identified with the history of Kentucky, and with the founders and benefactors of our great Republic? A name that shall live through all time and in every portion of the globe; in history, in sculpture, in eloquence and in song, and what is still more enduring, "in the hearts of his countrymen!" Mr. Flint has lately issued his biography of him, "interspersed with incidents in the early annals of the country," from which we make a selection that will not fail to interest our readers.

Boon was born near Philadelphia, in 1746, and was at the time referred to in our extract, at about his majority. We must here premise that Boone's father with his family had removed from Pennsylvania, and after travelling "o'er the hills and far away" for many a weary mile, they at length located themselves (about 1765) in an unbroken forest at no great distance from the eastern slope of the Alleganies, in the vallies of which game was abundant, affording the embryo Leather Stocking, Trapper, and Scout, a fine oppottunity for indulging those pecul ar habits, and for the developement of that roaming, restless disposition so characteristic of his descendents and of a large portion of the denizens of Yankee land.

Our contemporary of the Tribune speaking of young Boone, says, "at an early age we find him roaming the vast forest at the south and west; now hunting deer and other game for subsistence; now struggling in bloody conflict with a panther, a bear or a wolf; now watching in his rude cabin in momentary expectation of being attacked by the hostile red men with whom he is surrounded; now a captive of the merciless savage; and now bound to the stake with the bloody tomahawk raised over his head. Yet he appears, with all their dangers and privations, to have preferred the solitudes of the forests to the open country with the comforts and luxuries of civilized life; for no sooner do we find that other emigrants are gathering around the spot where he has located himself—that the smoke of other cabins is mingling with that of his own, and that his clearing is to be extended by the hands of other adventures, then we see him with his rifle upon his shoulder departing for the still untrodden depths of the forest."

Many adventures of the chivalrous backwoodsman are here depicted in Mr. Flint's happiest style, and will serve occasionally to give variety to our columns; we this week present Boone's encounter with his wife when "shining a deer;" after first giving some account of his local habitation, the country, &c. which is in fine keeping with the singular character of the enterprising emigrants.

The country was well stocked with all kinds of game and afforded fine range both for pasture and hunting. These forests had, moreover, the charms of novelty; and the game had not learned to fear the rifles of the new settler. It need hardly be added that the spirit of Boone exulted in this hunter's new paradise. The father and the other sons settled down quietly to the severe labour of making a farm, assigning to Daniel the occupation of his rifle, as aware it was the only one he could be induced to follow; and probably from the experience, that in this way he could contribute more effectually to the establishment, than either of them in the pursuits of husbandry.

An extensive farm was soon opened. The table was always amply supplied with venison, and was the seat of ample and unostentatious hospitality. The peltries of the young hunter yielded all the money which such an establishment required, and the interval between this removal and the coming age of young Boone, was one of health, plenty, and privacy.

But meanwhile this settlement began to experience the pressure of that evil which Boone always considered the greatest annoyance of life. The report of his family's prosperity had gone abroad. The young hunter's fame in his position, attracted other emigrants to come and fix themselves in the vicinity. The smoke of new cabins and clearings went up to the sky. The baying of other dogs, and the crash of distant falling trees began to be heard; and painful presentiments already filled the bosom of young Boone, that this abode would shortly be more pressed upon the one he had left. He was compelled, however, to admit, that if such an order of things bring disadvantages, it has also its benefits.

A thriving farmer by the name of Bryan, had settled at no great distance from Boone, by whose establishment the young hunter, now at the period of life when other thoughts than those of the chase of wild game are sometimes apt to cross the mind, was accustomed to pass.

This farmer had chosen a most beautiful spot for his residence. The farm occupied a space of some hundred acres on a gentle eminence, crested with yellow poplar and laurels. Around it rolled a mountain stream. So beautiful was the position, so many its advantages, that young Boone used to often pause in admiration, on his way to the deeper woods beyond the verge of human habitation. Who can say that the same dreary thoughts that inspired the pen of the eloquent Rousseau, did not occupy the mind of the young hunter, as he passed this rural abode? We hope we shall not be suspected of a wish to offer a tale of romance, as we relate, how the mighty hunter of wild beasts and men was himself subbued, and that by the most timid and gentle of beings. We put down the facts as we find them recorded, and our conscience is quieted, by finding them perfectly natural to the time, place and circumstances.

Young Boone was one night engaged in a fire hunt, with a young friend. Their course led them to the deeply timbered bottom that skirted the stream which wound round this pleasant plantation. That the reader may have an idea of what sort of pursuit it was that young Boone was engaged in, during an event so decisive of his future fortunes, we present a brief sketch of a night fire hunt. Two persons are indispensable to it. The horseman that precedes, bears on his shoulder what is called a fire pan, of blazing pine knots, which cast a bright and flickering glare far through the forest. The second follows at some distance, with his rifle prepared for action. No spectacle is more impressive than this pair of hunters, thus kindling the forest in a glare. The deer reposing quietly in his thicket, is awakened by the approaching cavalcade, and instead of flying from the portentous brilliance, remains stupidly gazing upon it, as if charmed to the spot. The animal is betrayed to its doom by the gleaming of its fixed and innocent eyes. The cruel mode of securing a fatal shot is called in hunter's phrase, shining the eyes.

The two young men reached a corner of the farmer's field at an early hour in the evening. Young Boone gave the customary signal to his mounted companion preceding him, to stop, an indication that he had shined the eyes of a deer. Boone dismounted, and fastened his horse to a tree. Ascertaining that his rifle was in order, he advanced cautiously behind a covert of bushes, to reach the right distance for a shot. The deer is remarkable for the beauty of its eye when thus shined. The mild brilliance of the two orbs was distinctly visible. Whether warned by a presentiment, or arrested by a palpitation, and strange feelings within, at noting a new expression, in the blue and dewy lights that gleamed to his heart, we say not. But the unerring rifle, and a rustling told him that the game had fled. Something whispered him it was not a deer; and yet the fleet step, as the game bounded away, might easily be mistaken for that of the light-footed animal. A second thought impelled him to pursue the rapidly retreating game; and he sprang away in the direction of the sound, leaving his companion to occupy himself as he might. The fugitive had the advantage of a considerable advance of him, and apparently a better knowledge of the localities of the place. But the hunter was perfect in all his field exercises, and scarcely less fleet footed than a deer; and he gained rapidly on the object of his pursuit, which advanced a little parallel with the field fence, and then, as it endowed with the utmost accomplishment of gymnastics, cleared the fence at a leap. The hunter, embarrassed with his rifle and accoutrements, was driven to the slow and humiliating expedient of climbing it. But an outline of the form of the fugitive, fleeting through the shades in the direction of the house, assured him that he had mistaken the species of game. His heart throbbed from a hundred sensations; and among them an apprehension of the consequences that would have resulted from discharging his rifle, when he had first shined those liquid blue eyes. Seeing that the fleet game made straight in the direction of the house, he said to himself. "I will see the pet deer in its lair," and he directed his steps to the same place. Half a score of dogs opened their barking upon him, as he approached the house, and advertised the master that a stranger was approaching. Having hushed the dogs, and learned the name of his visitant, he introduced him to his family as the son of their neighbour, Boone.

Scarce had the first words of introduction been uttered before the opposite door opened; and a boy apparently seven, and a girl of sixteen rushed in, panting for breath and in seeming affright.

"Sister went down to the river, and a painter chased her, and she is almost scared to death," exclaimed the boy. The ruddy, flaxen-haired girl stood full in view of her terrible pursuer, leaning upon his rifle, and surveying her with the most eager admiration. "Rebecca, this is young Boone, son of our neighbour," was their laconic introduction. Both were young, beautiful, and at that period when the affections exercise their most energetic influence. The circumstances of the introduction were favourable to the result, and the young hunter felt that eyes of the deer had shined his bosom as fatally as his rifle shot had even the innocent deer of the thicket. She, too, when she saw the high, open, bold forehead; clear, keen, and yet gentle and affectionate eye—the firm front, and the visible express of decision and fearlessness of the hunter—when she interrupted a look which said as distinctly as looks can say it, "how terrible it would have been to have fired!" she can hardly be supposed to have regarded him with indifference. Nor can it be wondered at that she saw in him her beau ideal of excellence and beauty. The inhabitants of cities, who live in mansions, and read novels stored with unreal pictures of life and the heart, are apt to imagine that love, with all its golden illusion, is reserved exclusively for them. It is a most egregious mistake. A model of ideal beauty and perfection is woven in almost every youthful heart, of the brightest and most brilliant threads that compose the web of existence. It may not be said that this forest maiden was deeply and foolishly smitten at first sight. All reasonable time and space were granted to the claims of maidenly modesty. As for Boone, he was incurably wounded by her, whose eyes he had shined, and as he was remarkable for the backwoods attribute of never being beaten out of his track he ceased not to woo, until he gained the heart of Rebecca Bryan. In a word, he courted her successfully, and they were married.

TO ——.

Whilst my poor bark its stormy way
O'er life's dark sea is wending,
Without one star's enliv'ning ray,
Its gloomy course befriending;
By adverse currents often swept,
Far from the course its steering,
Thy mem'ry o'er my soul has crept,
Its drooping sadness cheering.

'Tis thus when struggling on his way,
'Midst billows' wild commotion,
The sailor spies that welcome ray,
Come beaming o'er the ocean;
From where removed by howling storm,
And braving every danger,
The light-house rears its noble form,
To guide the wearied stranger.

Yes, thus, when sorrows dark and wild,
Within my breast are striving,
And my worn soul of peace beguil'd,
Has scarce a hope surviving,
Thy memory like the light-house beam,
Can break the dreary sadness,
And o'er its darkness shed a gleam,
That lights it up to gladness!

ARIOSTO.

STANZA.

My hopes are like the azure clouds,
Enveloped in the evening sky,
Rapt in terror's darkest shroud,
And showered on the earth to die;
Yet morning calls the clouds away,
And evening's darkest mists shall flee,—
But in sorrow's dark array,
Who shall drop a tear for me?

My hopes are like the fragile bark,
Whom terror's raging billows save,
But without the beacon's mark,
To guide it o'er the roaring wave;
But ah, when oceans storm's have sped,
Others bark shall stem the sea,
But when every hope is fled,
Who shall drop a tear for me?

My hopes are like the witching dream,
Fashioned on the feverish bed,
Ere morning sends its cheering beam,
Its visions and its scenes are fled;
Yet life may view an other morn,
And dreams shall other visions see,—
But when every hope is gone,
Who shall drop a tear for me?

A SCENE IN VIRGINIA.

On a lovely morning towards the close of Spring, I found myself in a beautiful part of the Great Valley of Virginia.—Spurred on by impatience, I beheld the sun rising in splendor and changing the blue tints on the tops of the lofty Alleghany mountains into streaks of the purest gold, and nature seemed to smile in the freshness of beauty. A ride of about fifteen miles, and a pleasant woodland ramble of about two, brought myself and companion to the great Natural Bridge.

Although I had been anxiously looking forward to this time, and my mind had been considerably excited by expectation, yet I was not altogether prepared for the visit. This great work of nature is considered by many as the second great curiosity in our country, Niagara falls being the first. I do not expect to convey a very correct idea of this bridge, for no description can do this.

The natural bridge is entirely the work of God. It is of solid limestone, and connects two large mountains together by a most beautiful arch, over which there is a great wagon road. Its length from one mountain to the other is nearly 80 feet, its width about 35, its thickness about 45, and its perpendicular height over the water is not far from 220 feet. A few bushes grow on its top by which a traveller may hold himself as he looks over. On each side of the stream, and near the bridge, are rocks projecting ten or fifteen feet over the water, and from 200 to 300 from its surface, all of limestone. The visitor cannot give so good a description of the bridge as he can of his feelings at the time. He softly creeps out on a shaggy projecting rock, and looking down a chasm of from 40 to 60 feet wide, he sees nearly 300 feet below a wild stream foaming and dashing against the rocks beneath, as if terrified at rocks above. The stream is called Cedar Creek. The visitor here sees trees of 70 feet under the arch, and yet to look down upon them, they appear like bushes of perhaps two or three feet in height. I saw several birds fly under the arch and they looked like insects. I threw a stone down and counted thirty four before it reached the water. All hear of heights and depths, but they here see what is high and feel it to be deep. The awful rocks present their everlasting butments, the water murmurs and foams far below, and the two mountains rear their proud heads on each side, separated by a channel of sublimity. Those who view the sun, the moon and the stars, and allow that none but God could make them, will here be impressed that none but Almighty God could build a bridge like this.

The view of the bridge below, is as pleasing as the top is awful.—The arch from beneath would seem to be about two feet in thickness. Some idea of the distance from the top to the bottom may be formed from the fact, that as I stood on the bridge and my companions beneath, neither of us could speak with sufficent loudness to be heard by the other. A man from either view does not appear more than four or five inches in heighth.

As we stood under the beautiful arch we saw the place where visitors have often taken the pains to engrave their names upon the rock. Here Washington climbed twenty-five feet and carved his own name, where it still remains. Some wishing to immortalize their names have engraved them deep and large, while others have tried to climb up and insert them high in the book of fame.

A few years since, a young man, being ambitious to place his name above all others, came very near losing his life in the attempt. After much fatigue he climbed up as high as possible, but found that the person who had occupied his place, was taller than himself, and consequently had placed his name above his reach, but he was not thus to be discouraged. He opens a large jacknife, and in the soft limestone began to cut places for his hands and feet. With much patience and difficulty, he worked his way upwards, and succeeded in carving his name higher than the most ambitious had done before him. He could now triumph, but his triumph was short, for he was placed in such a situation that it was impossible to descend unless he fell upon the rugged rocks beneath him.

There was no house near, from whence his companions could get assistance. He could not long remain in that condition, and, what was worse, his friends were too much frightened to do any thing for his relief. They looked upon him as already dead, expecting every moment to see him precipitated upon the rocks below and dashed to pieces. Not so with himself. He determined to ascend. Accordingly he plies himself with his knife, cutting places for his hands and feet, and gradually ascending with incredible labor. He exerts every muscle. His life was at stake, and all the terrors of death rose before him. He dared not look downwards, lest his head should become dizzy; and perhaps on this circumstance his life depended. His companions stood on the top of the rock exhorting and encouraging him. His strength was almost exhausted: but a bare possibility of saving his life still remained, and hope, the last friend of the distressed, had not forsaken him. His course upwards was rather obliquely than perpendicular. His most critical moment had now arrived. He had ascended considerably more than 200 feet, and had still farther to rise, when he felt himself fast growing weak. He thought of his friends and all earthly joys, and he could not leave them. He thought of the grave and dared not meet it. He now made his last effort and succeeded. He had cut his way not far from 200 feet from the water, in a centre almost perpendicular; and in little less than two hours his anxious companions reached him a pole from the top and drew him up. They received him with shouts of joy; but he himself was completely exhausted. He immediately fainted away on reaching the spot, and it was some time before he recovered.

It was interesting to see the path up these awful rocks, and to follow in imagination this bold youth as he thus saved his life. His name stands above all the rest, a monument of hardihood, of rashness, and of folly.

We stayed around this seat of grandeur four hours; but from my own feelings, I should not have supposed over half an hour. There is a little cottage near lately built; here we were desired to write our names as visitors to the bridge, in a large book kept for this purpose. Two large volumes were nearly filled already. Having immortalized our names by enrolling them in this book, we slowly and silently returned to our horses, wondering at this great work of nature; and we could not but be filled with astonishment at the amazing power of him who can clothe himself in wonder and terror, or throw around his works a mantle of sublimity.

JUGGLERS.

From an article on the "Autobiography of the Emperor Jahagueuir," in the Quarterly Review.

The author makes a characteristic transition from the grave subject on which he had been just engaged to an account of the feasts of some Bengal jugglers, which cannot, he thinks, but be considered among the most surprising circumstances of the age. The description of the operations of these men, is, however, in itself by no means unworthy of attention, inasmuch as it shows the degree of perfection to which they carried their various contrivances for deceiving the imperial court. Jahaugueir was so struck with astonishment at the wonders which they wrought, that he ascribes them without hesitation to supernatural power. The jugglers were first desired to produce upon the spot, from the seed, ten mulberry trees.—

Digitized by Google

They immediately sowed in separate places seed in the ground, and in a few minutes after a mulberry plant was seen springing from each of the seeds, each plant, as it rose in the air, shooting for the leaves and branches, and yielding excellent fruit! In the same manner, and by a similar magical process, apple trees, mangoes, fig trees, almond and walnut trees were created, all producing fruit, which Jahaugueir assures us was exquiste to the taste. This, however, he observes was not all:—

"Before the trees were removed, there appeared among the foliage birds of such surprising beauty, in colour and shape, and melody of song, as the world never saw before. At the close of the operation, the foliage, as in autumn, was seen to put on its variegated tints, and the trees gradually disappeared into the earth from which they had been made to spring.

Major Price states, that he has himself witnessed similar operations on the western side of India, but that a sheet was employed to cover the process. "I have however," he adds "no conception of the means by which they were accomplished, unless the jugglers had the trees about them, in every state, from the seeding to the fruit."

The reader will be amused with the Emperor's narrative of some more of these "specious miracles."

"One night, and in the very middle of the night, when half this globe was wrapped in darkness, one of these seven men stripped himself, almost naked, and having spun himself swiftly round several times, he took a sheet with which he covered himself, and beneath the sheet drew out a resplendent mirror, by the radiance of which a light so powerful was produced, as to have illuminated the hemisphere to an incredible distance round; to such a distance indeed, that we have the attestation of travellers to the fact, who declared, that on a particular night, the same night on which the exhibition took place, and at the distance of ten days' journey, they saw the atmosphere so powerfully illuminated as to exceed the brightness of the brightest day they had ever seen.

"They placed in my presence a large seething pot or chaldron, and filling it partly with water, they threw into it eight of the smaller mauns of irick of rice; when without the smallest spark of fire, the chaldron forthwith began to boil; in a little time they took off the lid, and drew from it nearly a hundred platters full, each with a stewed fowl at top!"

But these feats of skill fall into insignificance when compared with the following extraordinary process:—

"They produced a man whom they divided limb from limb, actually severing his head from his body. They scattered these mutilated members along the ground, and in this state they lay for some time. They then extended a sheet or curtain over the spot, and one of the men putting himself under the sheet, in a few minutes came from below, followed by the individual supposed to have been cut into joints, in perfect health and condition, and one might have safely sworn that he had never received a wound or injury whatever.

This trick we can easily understand to have been performed by means not unlike those which are resorted to upon our stage, whenever it becomes necessary to hang, draw, and quarter pantaloon in the pantomime. If it be true, as Jahanguer relates, that his jugglers also in a moment covered a pond with a mantle of ice sufficiently strong to bear an elephant, the machinery sent from England to India some time ago for freezing water must have been no novelty in that country. We should much like to know Sir David Brewster's conjectures with respect to the following, which must have been optical deceptions, and in which we trace a certain similarity to some of the stories so amusingly cleared up in the "Letters on Natural Magic."

"They caused two tents to be set up, the one at a distance of a bow shot from the other, the doors or entrances being placed exactly opposite: they raised the tent walls all around, and desired that it might be particularly observed, that they were entirely empty. Then, fixing the tent walls to the ground, two of the seven men entered, one into each tent, none of the other men entering either of the tents. Thus prepared, they said they would undertake to bring out of the tents any animal we chose to mention, whether bird or beast, and set them in conflict with each other. Khaunse-Jahaun, with a smile of incredulity, required them to show us a battle between two ostriches. In a few minutes two ostriches of the largest size issued, one from either tent, and attacked each other with such fury that the blood was seen streaming from their heads; they were at the same time so equally matched, that neither could get the better of the other, and they were therefore seperated by the men, and conveyed within the tents. In short they continued to produce from either tent whatever animal we chose to name and before our eyes set them to fight in the manner I have attempted to describe; and although I have exerted my utmost invention to discover the secret of the contrivance, it has been entirely without success.

"They were furnished with a bow and about fifty steel-pointed arrows. One of the seven men took the bow in hand, and shooting the arrow into the air, the shaft stood fixed at a considerable height; he shot a second arrow, which flew straight to the first, to which it became attached, and so with one of the remaining arrows, to the last of all, which striking the sheaf, suspended in the air, the whole immediately broke asunder, and came at once to the earth.

"They procured a chain 50 cubits in length, and in my presence threw one end of it towards the sky, where it remained, as if fastened to some hinge in the air. A dog was then brought forward and being placed at the lower end of the chain, instantly ran up and reaching the other end immediately disappeared in the air. In the same manner a hog, a panther, a lion and a tiger, were alternately sent up the chain and all equally disappeared at the upper end of the chain.

At last they took down the chain, and put it into a bag, no one even discovering in what way the different animals were made to vanish into the air in the mysterious manner above described. This I may venture to affirm was beyond measure strange and surprising."

EARLY FRUGALITY.—In early childhood, you lay the foundation of poverty or riches, in the habits you give your children. Teach them to save everything,—not for their own use, for that would make them selfish—but for some use. Teach them to share everything with their playmates; but never allow them to destroy anything. I once visited a family where the most exact economy was observed; yet nothing was mean or uncomfortable. It is the character of true economy to be as comfortable with a little, as others can be with much. In this family, when the father brought home a package, the older children would, of their own accord, put away the paper and twine neatly, instead of throwing them in the fire, or tearing them to pieces. If the little ones wanted a piece of twine to play scratch-cradle, or spin a top, there it was in readiness; and when they threw it upon the floor, the elder children had no need to be told to put it again in its place.—From the Frugal Housewife.

Lord Byron's Lines, found in his Bible.

Within this awful volume lies
The mystery of mysteries.
Oh! happiest they of human race,
To whom our God has given grace
To hear, to read, to fear, to pray,
To lift the latch, and force the way;
But better had they ne'er been born,
Who read to doubt, or read to scorn.

Second Verse.

Let darkness ne'er the cumber;
What tho' the moon does slumber,
The stars of the night
Will lend thee their light,
Like tapers clear without number;
Then, Julia, let me woo thee,
Thus, thus, to come unto thee,
And when I shall meet
Thy silvery feet,
My thoughts I'll then declare thee.

WIT AND SENTIMENT.

"THE DEVIL TO PAY."—This phrase doubtless originated in a printing office, on some Saturday night's settlement of weekly wages. "John," says the publisher to the book keeper, "how stands the cash account?" —"Small balance on hand sir."—"Let's see," rejoins the publisher, "how far will that go towards satisfying the hands?" John begins to figure—arithmetically: so much due to Potkins—so much to Typus—so much to Grubble—and so on, through a dozen dittos. The publisher stands aghast. "Here is not money enough by a jug full."—"No sir—and besides, there is the devil to pay."—Nantucket Inq.

LEFT-HANDED PLEA.—A prisoner at the bar of the Mayor's Court, Philadelphia, being called on to plead an indictment for larceny, was told by the clerk to hold up his right hand. The man immediately held up his left hand. 'Hold up your right hand,' said the clerk. 'Please your Honour,' said the culprit, still keeping his left hand up, 'Please your Honour, I am left handed.'

JOKES UPON LAWYERS.—The English papers state that a certain member of the bar, remarkable for his red face and irritable temperament, goes by the appropriate name of the "red precipitate." A better joke than this however has been committed at the expense of one of the gentlemen of the long robe remarkable for his high stature and at the same time vacant countenance. He has been christened "The long vacation." Another in New Hampshire, whose complexion indicated a more extensive practice at the bar of the Hotel than of the Court, was said by Judge V. to be a very deep red lawyer.

WATER.—Some humane persons has affixed printed handbills to the pumps, cautioning those who are heated against drinking water. "Botheration," said an Irishman, "only look at that—one says, don't drink ony of the cratur, my darling, for it will be the death on ye; anither says, don't drink any water, honey, or you will be kilt out right. By the powers, I'll mix the whiskey and the water in equal parts, and chate both of 'em."—N. Y. Star.

GRAMMATICAL CONSTRUCTION.—A Farmer's son, just returned from a boarding school, was asked "if he knew grammar?" "Oh yes, father!" said the pupil, "I know her very well—Grammer sits in the chair fast asleep."

CONSCIENTIOUS MOLLY.—"Molly," said a lady to her servant, who was not remarkable for her quickness of conception or general industry, "I think you'll never set the Thames on fire." "No, ma'am" was the reply, "I should be very sorry to do any thing so wicked."

It is known to all who are acquainted with the early history of Kentucky, that the first emigrants settled in small squads, like the first settlement in all other frontier countries, for mutual defence. The order was, whenever an alarm was given all were to run to that place. Early one morning the shouts and cries of a female were heard—all ran to the spot. When they arrived they saw a bear and a man engaged in combat. They had it hip and thigh, up and down, over and under, and the man's wife standing by and hallooing "fair play! fair play!" The company ran up and insisted on parting them. The woman said, "No—no—let them fight! for it is the first fight I ever saw that I did not care which whipped."

NEW PROFESSIONAL SERVICE.—'Docther,' said an Hibernian as he entered the office of a practitioner in this city, 'I'd be afther spaking a word to you in secret.'

"Speak on, no one will hear you."

"Are you sure of that, intirely? By me sowl, its afraid to think I am, lest the botherin" crature should hear me."

"Who?"

"Why who but Kathleen Mahoney to be sure.—Hasn't she bewitched intirely me body and sowl; the swate murdherin hussey? And isn't it meself that can't slape for drameing of her, nor wake for the nightmare; that can't ate a maly paraty but of her cookin' nor taste a drap o' the cratur widout wishing good luck to her swate face!"

"You love her then?"

"You may say that! the blessed Saint Patrick niver loved the howly church bether."

"You must marry her."

"O wouldn't I! but the unfaling creature wont so much as spake to Terence O'Flaherty, and that's meself, your honor."

"Then she don't like you?"

"Divil a bit, your honor, she spur-rns me worse nor St. Patrick would blast a toad or a sarpint!"

"Quit her then."

"I can't your honor. Havn't I kept away from the cabin till the char-rms and wicked arts of the crature make me go back agen like a tomtit into the mout of one of your ugly Yankee sarpents, bad luck to them."

"Well, Terence," said Esculapius, with difficulty suppressing a laugh, "this is a severe visitation, but what am I to do?"

"Docther," in a whisper, "Docther, I'll take my bodily oath that Kathleen has been puthin a somethin in my dhrink to make me love her."

"Well."

"Can't you be afther givin me a dose to mix in her potheen to make her bewildered afther me, jist as I'm crazy for her, your honor?"

"No, Terence, but I'll give you a dose to cure you of your love."

"Its not that exactly I'd have your honor. If Kathleen loved Terence, and Terence loved Kathleen, wouldn't we make a swate couple? and barrin a bit of a row now and thin, we'd agree intirely."

"Ah, Terence, Terence, its only wicked wizards that bewitch, I can't do that, but I can cure those who are so unlucky as to get in the clutches of the wicked. You look sick. You'll die to a certainty, if I don't remove the spell."

Poor Pat was in a quandary.

"Ah well, Docther, jist fix me the articul, bether live alone, than die with a witch; oh, murther! murther! Kathleen you murdherin witch, St. Patrick defind me from you!"

If Terence did not curse the Docther as well as Kathleen, when he had taken his panacea, the fault was not in the recipe.—Boston Galaxy.

INTERESTING FACT—A few years ago, a very worthy laboring man, in this town, who had been so unfortunate as to acquire a habit of drinking spirit, becoming convinced of its ruinous tendency, had strength of mind sufficient to form an effectual resolution of future abstinence. At the time, he had a wooden box made, with a hole in the lid, and labelled "RUM," into which he every day dropped as much money as he had been in the habit of spending for liquor. The box was never opened till very recently, when, on counting the sum, it was found to amount to no less than one hundred and eighty dollars, with a part of which he purchased a good house lot, and the remainder will go towards putting a neat and comfortable new house upon it.—Such examples are above all praise.—Salem Gaz.

LONDON POLICE.

MANSION HOUSE.—SHAVING EXTRAORDINARY.

A journeyman barber was brought before the Lord Mayor, on Saturday, charged with having, in a fit of drunkenness, threatened to assault and shave his mistress dry.

The mistress, who keeps a shaving shop in Petticoat lane, stated that she employed two men besides the defendant to do the business of the shop, which had a very fair trade considering the general negligence of the neighborhood as to the growth of unnecessary hair. Unfortunately, the defendant's habits became offensive to the customers. She had expostulated with him frequently, for he was a skilful hand, but remonstrance was useless. The customers began to go to a rival establishment—and, to save hereelf from ruin, she told him he must depart. This sentence at once introduced him to a gin shop; where he took so copiously to the "cream of the valley," that he besieged the shaving shop, and, to the terror of the neighbors, proceeded to the work, razor in hand, and swearing that he would shave his mistress, without the mercy of a taste of soap and water.

The defendant—My Lord, it's all revenge. Misses has a grudge towards me, for she always puts me in the rough work, and I'm blest if my hand can stand it.

The Lord Mayor—What do you call the rough work? I suppose you have to shave and cut hair as the other men do?

The defendant—Like the other men! Lord bless you, your vorship, I've got for to shave all the Jews as comes to our shop out of mourning. (Laughter.) It's no joke to go over a pair of cheeks wot no steel's touched for three months.

The mistress stated that those remarks were a libel upon her character, and calculated to do great injury to her shop.

The defendant—Only let me have fair play at a face, and I defy Barbarossa; but I'm hanged if I can make a horse's tail as smooth as a yard of velvet in a couple of minutes. (Laughter.) Besides, please you, my lord, if there's a blacksmith or a coal-heaver as wants his face to be goe'd over, why missus calls out to me, "Jack, clap your suds upon this face. (Laughter.)

The Lord Mayor tried to reconcile the parties, but in vain. The defendant was discharged. He said he would try for employment at the other end of the town.

Remarkable Coincidence.—During the Revolution an artillery carriage among other munitions was captured at the surrender of Gen. Burgoyne, in 1777.—This carriage together with a brass field piece taken by Gen. La Fayette in person at the storming of a redoubt at York Town, in which memorable battle he bore a conspicuous part, are now at the Government Arsenal in Gibbonsville. While Gen. La Fayette was on his tour through the United States in 1825, he called to visit the Government works opposite this city, and while the salute was being fired he recognised the identical cannon above mentioned, and is said to have instantly approached and embraced it as the companion of his youth. Another link in this chain of coincidence, was added on Saturday last. The Government order had been received the day before at the Arsenal, respecting the death of La Fayette, directing the half hour gun to be fired in honor of that great patriot. The order was executed with the same gun, which had figured so conspicuously in his early history. The effect upon those who heard the salute, with a knowledge of the historical coincidents connected with it must have been peculiarly affecting and melancholy.—Troy Whig.

NEW YORK POLICE—LIBERTY OF THE PRESS.

John McLean, one of the gentlemen of the Press was brought up for getting drunk on Sunday night, and further added to the enormity, by not getting sober before he was put to the bar.

Mag.—Well McLean, how came you to get drunk on Sunday?

McLean.—Bekase as yer honor pleases, I have no time to get drunk any other day. Bad luck to me, isn't Sunday a day of rist: and its little rist I get any way, save when I am peaceably drunk, and then I can neither walk nor work, ate or dhrink, nor THINK, and it's risted I am then, intirely, according to scripture; and if I'm right according to gospel, sure I'm not wrong according to law.

Mag.—Well, have you any money to pay your fine?

John.—Divil a cent, sir; I worked seventeen hours a day all last week, in turning a wheel for the printers, and I got but five dollars and my liberty of a Saturday night, for the rason, they said, I didn't make quite a week's work. Bad luck to me (said he, bursting into a laugh,) but I'd like yer honor jist to have one spell at that wheel—you'd say it was the most pressing and roundabout business you ever took in hand.

Mag.—I'll take your word for it—you may go; for your absence may, perhaps, delay the publication of some of the journals.

John.—Bad 'cess to me, but you're right—divil a paper could they get out at all without me. I see yer honor knows how to respect the liberty of the press. Good morning, and good many such to you.—Tran.

An Irish Watchman in London.—It happened a few years since that a gentleman who is now living in Dublin was, with some of his companions, arrested by a party of watchmen as they were making their way out of a tavern in London. The gentleman recognised in the voice of his captor the mellifluous tones th characterise those who inhale their brogue upon t banks of the Lee. "You are from Cork," said he the watchman. "Why, then, you may say that, answered the watchman, "many is the fine day, whe I was young and handsome, I worked in Mulligan' nursery there." "In Mulligan's nursery!" replied th gentleman, who at once perceived what string in h countryman's heart could be played upon, "sure I ar the son of Mr. Mulligan." "The son of Mr. Mulligan!" exclaimed the captor, relaxing his hold; "the son of Mr. Mulligan—by dad then I'll be bail, you're Master George, that I have often heard was living in London." "Indeed I am Master George Mulligan," sighed out the captive. "Why, then, Master George, the devil a bit of Pat Daly will bring you to the watch-house this blessed night; but I must have a prisoner at all events. Now," said he, grasping at an English gentleman who happened to be passing him on the pathway, "now, Master George—run, you devil, down that lane with you." Master George took the hint, and, as he hurried off, he heard the watchman abusing the unconscious delinquent for resisting his arrest. "What, you vagabone, would you be trying to be after getting off from me that way? Come along peaceably, or I'll knock you into smithereens.—Irish Mag.

Magic of a name.—What romantic lady has not wept over the fate of Charlotte and Werter? The very name of Charlotte is replete with sentiment—but did curiosity ever prompt thee to ask the other name of the heroine? Goethe, who wrote the "Sorrows of Werter," has revealed the secret in the memoirs of his own life. Her name was Buff! Charlotte Buff! Here is an end to the romance of it, and what a puppy Werter must have been, to blow out his brains for a girl named Charlotte Buff!

I'M NOT A SINGLE MAN.

Well, I confess, I did not guess
A simple marriage vow
Would make me find all womankind
Such unkind women now;
They need not, sure, as distant be
As Java or Japan—
Yet every Miss reminds me this—
I'm not a single man!

Once they made choice of my bass voice
To share in each duet;
So well I danced, I somehow chanced
To stand in every set.
They now declare I cannot sing,
And dance in Bruin's plan;
Me draw! me paint! me any thing!
I'm not a single man!

One used to stitch a collar then,
Another hemmed a frill;
I had more purses netted then
Than I could hope to fill.
I once could get a button on,
But now I never can—
My buttons then were bachelor's—
I'm not a single man!

Oh, how they hated politics
Thrust on me by papa;
But now my chat—they all leave that
To entertain mamma.
Mamma, who praises her own self,
Instead of Jane or Ann,
And lays her girls upon the shelf—
I'm not a single man!

Ah me, how strange it is, the change
In parlour and in hall,—
They treat me so, if I but go
To make a morning call.
If they had hair in papers once,
Bolt up the stairs they ran.
They now sit still in dishabille—
I'm not a single man!

Miss Mary Bond was one so fond
Of Romans and of Greeks;
She daily sought my cabinet,
To study my antiques.
Well, now she doesn't care a dumb
For ancient pot or pan,
Her taste at once is modernised—
I'm not a single man!

My spouse is full of homely life,
And all that sort of thing;
I go to balls without my wife,
And never wear a ring:
And yet each Miss to whom I come,
As strange as Genghis Khan,
Knows by some sign, I can't divine,
I'm not a single man!

Go where I will, I but intrude,
I'm left in crowded rooms,
Like Zimmerman on Solitude,
Or Hervey at his tombs.
From head to heel they make me feel
Of quite another clan;
Compell'd to own, though left alone,
I'm not a single man!

'Tis hard to see how others fare,
Whilst I rejected stand—
Will no one take my arm because
They cannot have my hand?
Miss Parry, that for some would go
A trip to Hindostan,
With me don't care to mount a star—
I'm not a single man!

Some change, of course, should be in force,
But, surely, not so much—
There may be hands I may not squeeze,
But must I never touch?
Must I forbear to hand a chair,
And not pick up a fan?
But I have been myself picked up—
I'm not a single man!

I must confess, I did not guess
A simple marriage vow,
Would make me find all womankind
Such unkind women now;
I might be hash'd to death, or smash'd
By Mr. Pickford's van,
Without, I fear, a single tear—
I'm not a single man!

A SCOT'S LUVE SANG.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

Could this ill warld hae been contrived
To stand without mischievous woman,
How peaceful' bodies wad hae lived,
Released frae a' the ills sae common!
But since it is the waefu' case
That maun hae this teazing mony,
Why see a sweet bewitching face!
—O had they no been made so bonny!

I might hae wandered dale and wood,
Brisk as the breeze that whistles o'er me.
As careless as the roe-deers brood,
As happy as the lands before me;
I might hae screwed my tunefu' pegs,
And carolled mountain streams so gaily,
Had we but wantit a' the Megs
Wi' glossy een sae dark an wily.

I saw the danger, feared the dart,
The smile, the air, and a' sae taking,
Yet open laid my wareless heart,
And gat the wound that keeps me waking.
My harp waves on the willow green;
O' wild witch-notes it has nae ony,
Sin' e'er I saw that pawky queen,
Sae sweet, sae wicked, an' sae bonny!

CONJECTURES.

A horse with his nose in a bag,
Is probably thinking of corn;
A vestment reduced to a rag,
Is likely enough t' have been worn;
A sceptic, who boggles at doubts,
May silently swallow a sin;
And in politics, they who are "outs,"
May possibly wish to get in.

A lady, when dressing for church,
May perhaps have a thought of this earth;
A lover, when left in the lurch,
With maudlin may bother your mirth;
A lawyer who frowns at a fee,
May be moved by some deeper pretence;
And a man who is hanging, can be
In a state of most painful suspense.

LITERATURE, WIT AND SENTIMENT.

"To aid thy mind's development—to watch
Thy dawn of little joys—to sit and see
Almost thy very growth—to view thee catch
Knowledge of objects—wonders yet to thee!
To hold thee lightly on a gentle knee,
And print on thy soft cheek a parent's kiss—
This, it would seem, was not reserved for me!
Yet this was in my nature:—as it is,
I know not what is there, yet something like to this."

INFANCY.

BY FREDERICK S. ECKARD.

Sacred your play and gladness,
Fair creatures! to recal
Those dim refreshing memories
On which no taint can fall;
A charm too, like the sunset
On the young blossom's hue,
They fade amidst the waning hours,
And change must come o'er you.

You can wake our early pleasures,
When dream-like and unknown
Life stretch'd beyond,—a glittering morn
Before the dew has flown;
You can give us back unsullied
The phantasies of youth,
When the sunshine from the bosom veil'd
The ruggedness of truth.

Those visions soon are ended,
For deeper thoughts must fill
The current of our after years,
Yet we are losers still;
For with them goes the innocence
That own'd no evil thought,
And knowledge, at that heavy price,
Alas! is dearly bought.

As those who in a tempest
Are shuddering o'er the grave,
When hope has almost ceased to nerve
Their strivings with the wave,
Discover some green island,
Some calm sequester'd spot,
Where terror may be hill'd to rest,
And ocean's rage forgot;

Thus, O ye joyful children!
Appears your radiant glee,
A fairy land to which the soul
From storm and cloud can flee.
'Midst bitterness and discord
Ye come like music sweet;
A zephyr from the balmy dawn,
To check the noon-day heat.

STANZAS.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

Unto him who hath loved us, and gave himself for us and washed us from our sins, in his own blood.—Rev.

How hath he loved us?—Ask the star
That on its wondrous mission sped,
Hung trembling o'er that manger scene
Where His, the Eternal, bow'd his head:
He, who of earth doth seal the doom,
Found in her lowliest inn no room!

Judea's mountain—lift your voice;
With legends of the Saviour fraught;
Speak, favor'd Olivet—so oft
At midnight's prayerful vigil sought—
And Cedron's brook, whose rippling wave
Frequent his weary feet did lave.

How hath he loved us?—Ask the band
That fled his woes with breathless haste—
Ask the weak friend's denial tone,
Scarce by his bitterest tears effaced—
Ask of the traitor's kiss—and see
What Jesus hath endured for thee.

Ask of Gethsemane, whose dews
Shrank from that moisture strangely red,
Which in that unwatch'd hour of pain,
His agonising temples shed!
The scourge, the thorn, whose anguish sore,
Like the unanswering lamb, He bore.

How hath he loved us?—Ask the cross,
The Roman spear, the shrouded sky—
Ask of the sheeted dead, who burst
Their cerements at his fearful cry—
O, ask no more,—but bow thy pride,
And yield thy heart to him who died.

MARIA HAMMOND.

A TALE OF REAL LIFE.

"We live in a world beset on all sides with mysteries and riddles."—STERNE.

What is the human mind? It is an "auræ divina particula," says Horace: "it is material," whispers Infidelity: "it is an essence," replies Religion: "I declare," says my Uncle Toby, "I know nothing of the matter." Now I am certain, and I will undertake to prove it this minute, that my Uncle Toby's answer is the best, the wisest, and indeed the only sensible answer that can be given to the question by man, woman, or child.

Sometime in the month of last November, I was sitting in the evening by myself, before the parlour fire, chewing the bitter cud of a vexed spirit. That day a series of petty annoyances had given me the "horrors." Twenty thousand devils, as blue as indigo, had taken possession of my brain, and were scampering about, grinning and kicking up their heels, in utter defiance of all the most approved exorcisms in such cases made and provided. I treated my disease first phlogistically: that is to say, I drank a glass of brandy and water hot, with sugar. I was not an iota the better. I treated it anti-phlogistically: that is to say, I took another glass cold, without. I got no better—but at last, recollecting Dr. Hahnemann's theory of medicine—"Similia cum similibus"—or, as he calls it, his "System of Homœpathics"—and the night being a miserable, suicidal sort of night—a thick fog having fallen, like a wet blanket, over that part of nature's face on which stands the city of London—and my friend Withering being a most wearisome proser, and living at a distance of at least two miles—I resolved to give Dr. Hahnemann's system a trial, and treat my case homœpathically. So seizing my hat and stick, with the air of a man who has taken his resolution, I trudged away through mud and mire, filth and fog, to my friend Withering's.

I have said that a thick fog had fallen over that part of Nature's face on which stands the city of London. This remark, I am sensible, exposes me to the inconvenience of being asked what part or particular feature of Nature's face it is which the aforesaid city occupies. But in order to forestall any such inquiries, I do hereby openly acknowledge that I am wholly at a loss to answer them with any degree of certainty; but if I may be allowed to venture a guess on so difficult a subject, I should say, it must certainly be the upper lip. For how otherwise is it possible to account for the dust, dirt, and dinginess with which London is eternally besmutted? But grant that it stands on the upper lip—and only suppose, further, that Dame Nature is, like most other ancient dames, a snuff-taker, and not a cleanly one, and the thing is explained at once—'tis as plain as a pikestaff. Nay, by heavens! "it is much plainer,"—"'tis as plain," may it please your Grace of Wellington, "as the nose on your face."

My friend Withering is a natural philosopher—by which I mean a philosopher naturally, and not by acquired habits. He knows that the great sum of human misery is made up by the continual addition of small items—that these items are the taxes which we are called upon to pay to the King of Kings, for the protection which he affords us, and for the countless blessings he is continually showering down upon us. He knows, moreover, that, let us grumble as we will, pay them we must—so my friend pays them cheerfully. He knows, too, that the sum of human happiness does not chiefly consist of high excitement and momentary transports—but of the quiet enjoyment of things as they are—so my friend takes the world as he finds it. He walks through life with a composed step—neither turning to the right to gallop after the will-wi'-the-whisps with which the beckoning devil, temptation, lights up the marshes and quagmires of life, nor is he frightened away to the left by the hobgoblins of fanaticism—but holds on his way as nearly in a straight line as he can, content to gather by the way-side here a flower and there a flower.

On the present occasion, however, I found my friend's equanimity thrown a little off its centre. On inquiring the cause of the musing dejection in which I found him absorbed, he addressed me as follows:—

"You must remember to have often heard me mention the name of a very old and dear friend, who died some ten years ago. His name was Hammond. When he died he was a widower, and left behind him an only daughter. His little Maria was the apple of her poor father's eye, and on his death-bed he besought me to keep a parent's watch over her till I saw her settled in life. After the funeral of her father, Maria was sent to reside with a maiden aunt, and shortly after that event was conveyed to a respectable boarding-school of my own choosing. At this school she almost immediately formed an intimate acquaintance with a Miss Melton—an interesting child of her own age, and the daughter of highly respectable parents. They became at once school-cronies. They walked always together—sat always next each other at the desk and at the dining-table—slept together—and each spent one half of the holidays at the house of the other. During the whole time they remained together at school their friendship never was broken—but grew with their growth, and strengthened with their strength. At length the time arrived for Miss Melton to leave school, and the two friends were parted. About twelve months after this, Miss Hammond also left school and returned to live with her aunt, when she learnt that Mr. Melton had gone to reside in a distant part of the country.

"Not very long after Miss Hammond left school, her aunt fell into a bad state of health, and her medical attendants recommending her to try a change of air, she went to reside at the town of C——, taking of course her niece along with her. After having resided here about twelve months, she one day met in the street, leaning on the arm of a gentleman, her old friend Miss Melton—now, however, no longer Miss Melton, but Mrs. Remington. She had been married, it seems, all parties happily consenting, only a few months previously, to Mr. Remington, who was an attorney (and a most excellent man) in full practice at the town of C——. The old friendship was of course renewed, and from that time they were almost daily visitors at each other's houses. It was about this time that I received a letter from Maria's aunt, requesting to see me. When I arrived, I found I had been summoned by the old lady in order to consult with her as to the propriety of allowing Maria to accept the addresses of a young gentleman who had made pretensions to her hand. I immediately set about making inquiries into his respectability, connexions, &c., and found him in all things an unexceptionable match. I do not mean to say that the young man was represented to me as an absolute saint; but all parties agreed in speaking of him as an honourable young man, of promising talents. Having satisfied myself thus far, and having seen and conversed with him on the subject of his pretensions to Maria, he was formally permitted to visit my protegée as her accepted suitor; and I returned to town. This gentleman's name was Charles Fenton. All things seemed to "work together for good." I was delighted with my poor orphan's prospects; and had she not been an orphan, could I have congratulated my poor friend on the approaching happinsss of his only and beloved daughter—we should have set our feet, at the same moment, and shaken hands together on the topmost step of human happiness.

"Days, weeks, and months passed away, and our sky was still without a cloud. Fenton, however, became importunate with Maria to name the wedding day, which was at last fixed. It was to be the sixth Saturday after Mrs. Remington's confinement, which was expected to take place in the course of the current month. This was exacted by Maria in compliment to her friend, in order that she might be present at the ceremony. Maria was now almost constantly with Mrs. Remington, assisting her in the various little preparations for her approaching accouchement; and frequently sleeping at her house. On these occasions, Fenton of course went also to see Maria. It was, in fact, her friend's house, at which Fenton had first seen Miss Hammond, for he had become acquainted with Remington, and had visited him on the most friendly footing, almost from the time of his marriage. One evening while Maria was sitting at work with Mrs. Remington—rather late in the evening, for she intended to stay all night—Fenton knocked at the door. When he was admitted into the parlor where the ladies sat, it was instantly perceived that he had been drinking somewhat too freely. As this was, however, a circumstance of exceeding rare occurrence, and as he was always at such times well-tempered and tractable, it occasioned no uneasiness in Miss Hammond, but was only treated by her as a matter of good-humoured raillery. On this occasion Fenton was so much excited, that Mr. Remington insisted on his staying where he was all night; and soon after supper he was prevailed on to go to bed. As he was going up stairs, the maid following with a light, he suddenly stopped, and laughing as he did so, took off his coat and giving it to the servant, "Here," said he "carry this into Maria's bed-room."* The servant considering the thing as a mere drunken frolic or whim, did as she was ordered, and when she came down stairs mentioned the circumstance, with a smile, to Miss Hammond. When Maria went into her bed-room for the night, the first thing she saw was Fenton's coat, spread out on the back of a chair. "What a ridiculous fancy!" said she, and then without further notice, proceeded to undress and get into bed. It appears, however, continued my friend with a forced smile, that although she took no further notice of the coat, either it or its owner was still uppermost in her mind; for she forgot to put out the light until she was in bed. As she rose again for this purpose, the coat again caught her eye, and it now, for the first time occured to her, that certainly Fenton must have had some motive in sending his coat into her room. She sat upright in the bed for a minute or two with her eyes fixed on it, musing and wondering what that motive could be. Not being able to frame, however, any satisfactory conjecture, but still intent upon the subject, she once more lay down in bed, and once more discovered that she had again wholly forgotten the light. When, however, she made this second discovery, she did not immediately get up and rectify the error, but lay for some time still pondering on the circumstance of the coat. At length she suddenly started up, exclaiming to herself, "I'll lay my life Fenton has some present, or perhaps a letter, in his coat-pocket for me; and has taken, in 'tipsy fun, this whimsical method of delivering it." She got out of bed and went straight to the chair on which hung the object that had so much puzzeled her. She had no sooner come within reach of it, however, than she hesitated, and began to question the propriety of putting her hand into another's pocket. After a little pause—whether it was that she felt assured it was sent there by its owner for that very purpose, or whether it was the perfect innocence and simplicity of her intentions, or that she thought the whole affair altogether too ridiculous to be worth a moment's serious reflection, or whether, continued my friend with another sad smile, it was curiosity—whatever it was, it soon overcame her scruples, and laughing to herself, and putting her hand into one of the pockets she withdrew from it, not one merely, but several letters, all with their seals broken. The idea of reading these letters, merely because, the seals being broken, she might do so undiscovered, never even presented itself to the delicate mind of Maria Hammond; but in looking at them, one by one, in order to discover whether any of them were addressed to herself, she was struck with the strange fact that the subscriptions were all evidently in the handwriting of her friend, Mrs. Remington, and all addressed to Fenton. An indefinable misgiving came over her, and almost made her sick. The shadow of some impending evil fell upon her, the frightfulness of which was only so much the more appalling, that she had no distinct notion of its nature and extent. She longed to know the contents of the letters—perhaps the whole happiness depended upon it—but she could not bring herself to read them: it was a trying moment—one by one she returned them slowly to the pocket, her eye dwelling on the superscription of each as she did so, till she came to the last. She paused—over and over again the poor girl read the superscription—it was certainly her friend's writing—it was impossible to doubt it; she looked on the other side of the letter—the seal was quite broken—the paper was not even confined by having one of its folds slipped within the other—she could even see, where the edges gaped, a little of the writing within. It was not in human nature to resist the temptation—and, while her mind was in the act of reiterating its condemnation of the deed, her eyes, swimming in tears, were running over the contents of the letter. Poor Maria! she has not yet forgiven herself for that act of what she calls treachery, though so fully justified by the event, as far as events can justify any act—"but, indeed," said Maria, weeping most piteously, when she told me the circumstance, "indeed I could not help it."

"When she had read the letter through, she let it fall to the floor, and taking another from the pocket, (for her mind was now too far bewildered to speculate on the nature of the act) she read that also, and so on, till she had read them all: then sinking down upon a chair by the bed-side, she buried her face in the bedclothes, and wept bitterly. The feeling which most oppressed her at that moment was not resentment, but a sense of desolation. There was not one of all those letters, which did not contain proofs of an improper intimacy between the woman whom from her childhood she had loved as her friend, and the man whose vows of affection had so often and so lately mingled with her own; and who was on the point of becoming her husband. "If these," said she, "injure and betray me, who will love and protect me?" At length, her mind having recovered somewhat of its tone, she rose, refolded the letters, and returned them all, except one, to the pocket. She then got into bed to weep away the night. In the morning, before the family had risen, she dressed herself, and merely telling the serant she felt unwell, and that she was going home, left the house. To her aunt's inquiries she gave some evasive answer, for with a beautiful feeling of compassion and forbearance towards her who had wronged her, but who nevertheless she felt she had wronged herself more, she had already determined to make no disclosure till she had recovered from the perils of her expected accouchement; perhaps not then, unless circumstances should compel her. In case Fenton should call, she desired the servant to say, she was ill, and could not see him. This, indeed, was perfectly true; for the poor girl was unable to leave her room for some days.

"In the course of the day, on the morning of which she left her friend's house, Remington called to inquire after her. She saw him; but to all his inquiries she only answered with tears, and the reiterated expression: "I am ill, and low-spirited, but shall soon be better." I was sent for by her aunt, and pressed her to consult a physcian, but this she steadily and absolutely refused to do. Fenton never once called—and it is evident that he, having missed one of the letters, guessed but too truly how matters stood. There was a young gentleman, whose name was Markham, who, being a friend of Remington and Fenton, had often met Miss Hammond at the house of the first. One day this gentleman called, and requested to see Maria. He was admitted. He had heard nothing of Maria's indisposition, and was wholly unconscious of its cause. After a little general conversation, he told her that he had often wished to see her alone, and that he had come at last on purpose; "for," said he, "I think you ought to know that Fenton is in the habit of showing your letters about among his friends—which is, in my estimation, as I have often told him, a piece of conduct alike ungenerous and ungentlemanly. "I own," said he, "that this seems something like intermeddling with matters which concern me not: and yet, by concealing the fact from you, I really did feel as though I should be guilty of a sort of misprison of treason against the united sovereignty of love and honour." Maria did not seem so much surprised and offended at this as Markham expected.—She merely said that it certainly was unhandsome conduct, but there was nothing in her letters which might not be exhibited to the whole world; so the matter dropt. Shortly after Mr. Markham took his leave. Soon after he was gone, however, it occurred to her that perhaps, Fenton had exhibited as her's, the letters he had received from Mrs. Remington, only concealing the signature. This thought overwhelmed poor Maria with confusion, and she instantly dispatched a note to Mr. Markham, requesting to see him immediately. He came, and saved Miss Hammond the embarrassment of opening the business, by remarking at once that the handwriting of the note he had just received was nothing like the writing of those letters which Fenton had shown, among others, as having come from her. The truth was now clear. Fenton had shown Mrs. Remington's letters, concealing the signature, and had boasted of having received them from Miss Hammond. It now became necessary to her reputation, therefore, to tell the whole circumstances to Markham, which she did at once; for an honest and honourable pride had now mastered every other feeling. Without comment, Markham asked if she had secured the letters. She said she had retained one, in case it should become necessary to vindicate her future conduct towards Fenton and Mrs. Remington. "And have you taken no steps to bring this foul affair to light?" said he. She said she had not—that she resolved not to stir in the matter, at all events, until after her friend's confinement, for fear of consequences—and not then, unless it were to vindicate her own reputation. "But what can I do?" said the poor girl, weeping, "I cannot suffer it to be supposed that those vile letters were written by me!" "Do!" said Markham, rising from his chair—"but no—give me that letter, and I will do it for you." He then took the letter which Maria had concealed, and went straight to Remington's house. He found him alone; and after a short preface, told him the facts. The only answer he received from Remington was:

"'It's a lie, by God!'

"'My dear friend,' said Markham, 'I can easily understand your feelings, and therefore pass over that expression unnoticed—but it is all, believe me, too true.'

"'Dare you confront my wife with that tale?'

"'I will confront her immediately,' said Markham.

"They went up stairs into the drawing-room. Mrs. Remington was sitting at the table sewing. Markham repeated, in her presence, the principal facts. Mrs. Remington sewed on, with a dogged resolution, exhibiting no symptoms of concern, excepting that her fingers moved more quickly as the speaker went on. When he had nearly done, poor Remington started up, exclaiming, 'Helen! why do you not deny this foul calumny?'

"His wife sewed on, making no reply; and Markham, taking the letter from his pocket, gave it to Remington. He sat down, and opening it, began to read. Slowly and steadily his eyes travelled along the lines till they settled finally on his wife's signature at the bottom of the page. Here they rested. At last, the iron band, which had hitherto restrained his feelings, gave way, and he burst into tears. For one whole hour he sat weeping and sobbing, with the letter in his hand, in wordless agony. He was then taken to bed. The next morning Mrs. Remington was no where to be found; and yesterday the iron gates of a mad house closed on poor Remington—perhaps for ever.

"In this sad story," concluded Withering, "there are two remarkable circumstances—that of Fenton sending his coat into Maria's room—and that of her forgetting, not once only, but twice, to put out the light; for had she extinguished the light, the chances are a hundred to one that the discovery of this iniquitous transaction had not been made. Shall we say that these circumstances only serve to show by what minute threads the most important accidents of life hang suspended—from what trival causes the most stupendous effects often result—or would it be wiser to suppose, that circumstances like those mentioned above, are nothing less than the visible finger of PROVIDENCE, indicating the existence of crime, and pointing to the means of its detection and arrest?"

Soon after my friend had finished his relation, I returned home, heartily ashamed of the petulent temper into which I suffered a few trifling mortifications to throw me. On my way home I puzzled myself in endeavouring to account for the difference of character in these two young women. Both born of parents equally virtuous and good—educated under the same circumstances, at the same school—companions together, from childhood to womanhood—both occupying the same respectable position in society—the one proves all that is estimable—the other infamous.

Concluding as I began, once more I ask, "What is the human mind?"* EGO ILLE.

* As the leading incidents of the above story are facts, and of very recent occurrence, it will gratify my readers to learn that Mr. Remington already exhibits some symptoms of recovery.

THE BLESSED LAND.

"The inhabitants shall not say—I am sick."
Isaiah.

Not sick! shall throbbing brows no more
With nameless anguish start?
No more the ebbing life-blood pour
Cold currents through the heart?

No tortur'd nerve with racking pain
To sudden madness thrill?
Nor strive the powerless limbs in vain
Their office to fulfill?

Is there no weak, no palsied hand,
No agonizing breast?
Where, book of mercy, is that land
Which thus thy page has blest?

Dwells there no sickness of the heart
Within that favor'd bound?
No pleasure with its poison'd dart,
The unwary youth to wound?

No hope deferr'd the soul to harm?
No joy on parting wing?
No love with fickle smile to charm,
With false embrace to sting?

Oh glorious world! from ills of time,
From fears and dangers free,
Why should we fear to seek that clime,
Tho' death our passport be?

SONG.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

* * "Oh! cast thou not
Affection from thee! in this bitter world,
Hold to thy heart that only treasure fast,
Watch, guard it—suffer not a breath to dim
The bright gem's purity!"

If thou hast crushed a flower,
The root may not be blighted,
If thou hast quenched a lamp,
Once more it may be lighted;
But on thy harp, or on thy lute,
The string which thou hast broken,
Shall never in sweet sound again
Give to thyself a token?

If thou hast loosed a bird,
Whose voice of song could cheer thee,
Still, still he may be won
From the skies to warble near thee;
But if upon the troubled sea
Thou hast thrown a gem unheeded,
Hope not that wind or wave shall bring
The treasure back when needed.

If thou hast bruised a vine,
The Summer's breath is healing,
Its cluster yet may glow
Thro' the leaves their bloom revealing;
But if thou hast a cup o'erthrown
Filled with a bright draught, never Shall earth give back that lavished wealth
To cool thy parched lips' fever!

The heart is like that cup,
If thou waste the love it bore thee,
And like that jewel gone,
Which the deep will not restore thee,
And like that string of harp or lute
Whence the sweetest sound is scattered;—
Gently, oh! gently touch the chords
So soon forever shattered.

TALE OF ERROR.

On one of the very few clear afternoons of May of the present year, the Felton family were seated in their back parlor after dinner. The cloth had been removed. Mr. Felton lighted a cigar, as was his wont, and closed his eyes to enjoy more tranquil sensations that stole over him. The nurse brought in a bright-eyed infant, and placed him in the arms of the blooming mother. The warm wind blew through the opened window and lifted the child's curls; then a little more roughly, till the tender frame shuddered—and then, victorious over the zephyr, the mimic man lifted his voice, and crowed long and loudly.

The glad mother took him to the rocking-chair in which his father sat, and bending over, placed the rose-bud lips upon the still closed eyes. Mr. Felton smiled, without opening them. He knew he was very happy; but he was not a man of words, and his wife was accustomed, and contented, to read in a smile, all that her heart needed.

The folding doors opened into the front parlor; and sitting by the closed blind, was a young lady, bending over a little table. Now and then she raised a pair of blue eyes, fixed them for a moment upon the group in the other room, and then resumed her occupation.

Mr. Felton finished his cigar, and rose to depart.

"Oh—I forgot: here are your tickets."

"And cannot you go with us?"

"No: business first—the Messenger will be in to-day, and I must be on the ground to see her."

"Well—then,—good bye."

Mr. Felton took his way to Long wharf; his wife rung for the nurse, showered kisses on the cherub face as it vanished, and then went into the other parlor.

"What a piece of work is man, Kate:—or rather, what a piece of business, is man! I was in hopes Mr. Felton would have been able to go to the Gallery with us, to-day—but you see how it is—business,—business,—all the time."

"And yet you are very happy?" queried Miss Felton, with an arch smile.

"Yes,—very—very. I don't say that I could not be more so, if it would please your brother to spend one hour out of the twenty-four, in conversation, or in affording himself rational entertainment,—but—"

"But—'husbands are as God pleases,' as the French woman said, and so you are very wisely happy as you are."

"Yes, and so you would be Catharine."

"Never."

"Which is to say, you know nothing about it."

"Which is to say, I don't know myself;" answered Miss Felton.

"Which is to say the truth."

"Now don't suppose I am to be persuaded in this way, out of my common sense, my dear. Because you have been deceived in yourself, and have fancied you were romantic, without cause, that is no reason I should fall into the same error."

"Very excellent sense, Kate—which will be proved nonsense in good time.

"Who—or how?"

"Experience."

"The old argument of married people!—as if one could not judge as well what is necessary for one's happiness at my age as a they ever can!"

"We shall see. What is this?" said Mrs. Felton, taking up the sketch that was lying on the table. "Our charming selves, as I live! This, of Mr. Felton, is very good—but you had only to make a perfect beauty, you know, and you could not help getting a likeness. You have wisely avoided my face, I see—and this sketch of the darling, with his little hands stretched out, is admirable;—after all, Catharine, you have a taste for domestic pictures. I am sure you will come round by and by, and it will be my turn to take the pencil. Here, let me try. Tilburnas, in white satin—but you don't affect splendour: in white linen, then: the great unknown, what pencil can portray him?—perfect beauty—grace—wit—accomplishments! chivalric, imaginative, poetical, noble, proud, and with a name beginning with a Fits—and ending with a what? Kate—what ending is worthy of such a beginning?"

"Laugh on, if you will. But I have good sense still on my side. Taste, or habit of thought, or whatever you please to call it; romance if you choose—whatever it is—I should never, I could never, be happy, unless that taste were satisfied, though all the world else were perfectly settled that I was a fool, and the great unknown, every thing that was desirable in 'an establishment.'"

As Catharine spoke, she rose from her seat in the earnestness of her feelings. At sixteen, girls are apt to be in earnest, and Miss Felton joined to an unsophisticated contempt of the ways and means generally employed to procure an establishment, a romance, quite as unsophisticated. It was not the weak offspring of a novel-turned brain, but the healthy result of natural feeling. She was right in her principle, but she was apt to be wrong in her applications.

Mrs. Felton did not reply to her last remark. She often heard her express the same sentiments: so she only smiled.

"What do you say then, to our going now to the Gallery? such a continual rain—rain—as we have had!—we may as well improve this pleasant afternoon.—What say you, Kate,—yes or nay?"

"Yea, verily."

"Then it is an unanimous vote."

* * * * * *

Mrs. Felton and Catharine stood delightedly gazing on the picture of "Joan of Arc, in prison." The gallery was dark and cool. A few persons only remained, of the crowd which had filled it through the earlier part of the day.

"Beautiful! beautiful!" murmured Catharine, as she looked at the surpassing loveliness of the warrior victim; "Can any thing be more perfect? I declare, this picture thrills me like a trumpet-note!"

"Don't you think her eyes are rather fierce?"

"Perhaps they would be, but for the softening, redeeming roundness of the cheek—and the feminine grace of the form:—but how full of soul it is! how spirited the attitude! and how melancholy the contrast between what she is dreaming of, and what she is! Oh! I hope she will keep the illusion!—if she could die now! at the head of the army, with the war-cry ringing in her ear—"

Mrs. Felton passed on to look at a portrait, and Catharine remained, entranced by the beauty of the picture, and recalling all the noble and mournful associations it excited, till the tears fell fast over her face. As she wiped them from her cheek and half smiled at her own enthusiasm, she looked again at the picture, and started to see the same high look, beaming out of the dungeon. Its haughty glance remained, and the stern "Avancez!" seemed bursting from the quivering and open lip.

Mrs. Felton touched her arm, and she started again as if from sleep.

"Have you been standing here, ever since I left you, Catharine?"

"Yes."

"What a strange girl you are! Why, I have made the whole circuit of the gallery.—Who is that behind us?" continued Mrs. Felton, in a low voice.

Catharine turned her head, and saw a gentleman extended at full length, on one of the seats, and leaning his head on his hand. He looked up, as she turned, and met her glance with one of evident admiration.

"I don't know who it is;—I never saw him before."

"I guess he thinks you are crazy; standing before one picture an hour together."

Two young girls passed them at the moment, with shoulders of two yards width, and two little bonnets between them; from which proceeded two little voices, whence nature had long ago departed in disgust.

"Oh what is this? 72—Mary and Martha—sweet face, isn't it?"

"Lovely!—what's that she's got on? horrid! isn't it? Oh! have you read Pilgrims of the Rhine?"

"No—but Fred MacDodd said there was the sweetest story in it about a fox and a cat!"

"Dear! so there is! Oh, I met a Pole to day! such splendid moustaches! you can't imagine!"

"Mercy! I know two very well. Elegant creatures! nothing in the world to be seen but their eyes! Oh! the sweet smile they have! don't you think them divine?"

"Yes indeed—what's this? 74—Joan of Arc—what's she? how she looks! she's chained! do you know anything about it?"

"No—rather a low thing, I fancy. See the straw all about."

"Horrid!—come, let's go—I don't see as there is a creature her one knows—let's go to the Artist's Gallery."

They passed on, and down stairs, Catharine looked after them. A smile still lingered on her lip, when she met, again, the eye of the gentleman, who had been so long prone behind her. He too smiled, as if he understood what she thought. There is something very captivating in such a smile, and Catharine looked again, not to see whether she had ever seen him before, but how he did actually look.

The survey was not very satisfactory. He was a small man, and his dress of dark cloth, made him look almost diminutive. His features strong and sharp.—Black eyes, piercing enough of themselves, were shadowed by an habitual frown; and his mouth, when the expressive smile had subsided, was compressed and straight. There was a charm about his face, as there is about every face, however unfortunate: and the charm of his, was the smile that played like summer lightning, over the gloom of his marked features.

Catharine wondered she had never seen him before, and then, all at once, the illusion so common to imaginative persons, came over her, and she remembered that she had seen him before, and in the same place,—a long time ago. But when? Just then, the stranger rose from his seat, and walked to the upper end of the gallery; and Catharine felt quite certain that he would stop before a particular picture. And he did.

"It is very strange," said she to Mrs. Felton, "but I am perfectly confident that I have seen that person before: only what puzzles me, is, that it must have been in this same gallery, and just as we are standing now:—for my memory of him, is not only akin to the present, but absolutely identified with it. I feel as if I must have been looking at this picture, long ago—and as if this man, were a shadow of former time—I remember him—and now he will turn and go out—now do you doubt that I have the second sight?"

"I don't doubt you are losing your senses; so let us go too: you promised, you know, to meet Mrs. Aiken, at five, and it wants but a quarter to that time."

"Is it possible? and I have seen but one picture."

"You would see but one picture now, if we were to stay till midnight. But we will come again."

* * * * * *

The next day it rained—and the next;—and the first time it did not rain, Catharine proposed to Mrs. Felton, that they should go early, very early to the Athenæum Gallery.

When they entered, a gentleman who stood before the Joan of Arc, stepped aside; and Catharine was glad of an opportunity to gaze once more on the beautiful features that had haunted her like a presence, since her former visit. She looked at the picture, until gradually the scene before her of degradation and suffering, faded away, and another came over her eye.—Yet the principal figure remained. There was a crowd and many cries. But the cries were execrations, and the crowd were blood-thirsty and superstitious wretches. There was a public market-place, and a million of heads—and a stake—and a far off cry of "sorcery!" "witchcraft!" Then the flames curled about the form of the heroine—but the proud glory of the face was unblanched. The eye shot forth the glance of command, and the pale cheek was fixed and stern, as when the pulses beat to victory.

As a new burst of flames seemed to curl around the light form of the victim, Catharine started and shuddered.

"This is indeed, the true triumph of art," said a low voice at her side. "To be able to call up such pictures to the fancy,—to enthral—to subdue—to pale the cheek, with the reality of the horrors it images—this is worth being a painter for! and were I a painter—I would not resign the flush of pleasure, or pain it may be, that such a picture brings up from the heart, for loud plaudits eternally."

The person who spoke, was the same that had attracted Catharine's attention the day she had been before at the gallery. She suspected he was an artist:—and yet he had said, "if I were a painter," implying that he was not one. She replied to his remark; and he smiled and repeated her's, with the pleasant preface of, "as you just now, truly observed," (it is so pleasant to find that one's sentences, at sixteen, are worth repeating by a dark, stern-looking man!) and Catharine thought when he talked and smiled, he looked almost handsome. They had talked of painters and paintings—and then of scenery —and then of picturesque scenery on Connecticut river—and then of Bellows Falls in particular—finally of several persons whom they discovered they both knew; and although the gentleman contradicted several of Catharine's favorite opinions, and maintained two or three that she did not agree to at all, she thought him very, very agreeable, and wondered more than ever, who he could be.

Mrs. Felton said, "Shall we go now? It is two o'clock."

"Is it possible?" answered Catharine, looking about the gallery, for the first time, and seeing it nearly empty. Mrs. Felton looked at her companion—but as none of the three were acquainted, there was no hope of introduction—and the gentleman bowed and departed.

"Have you seen most of the pictures, Kate, to-day?"

"Just as many as I had, before I came."

"You are a strange child. Who was it you were talking with when I spoke to you?"

"I don't know his name," said Catharine, and she colored slightly, without imagining why. Mrs. Felton was looking at a French muslin, which hung at a shop window, and did not notice her embarrasment.

When they reached Chesnut Street, it was half past two o'clock. Dinner had been waiting some time, and Mr. Felton had come as near to being audibly vexed as he ever did, at their long delay. He was reading a newspaper as they came in, and read aloud:

"A new combatant has appeared in the arena. The young member from A———, has astonished even his friends. His sudden outpouring yesterday, in the House, of eloquent remonstrance against the late proceedings of the administration, the indignant force of his arguments and the cutting sarcasm with which he adduced some illustrations of the conduct of the collar men, altogether marked him out as destined to a high rank as an orator and statesman, and a terror to some evil doers we could name."

"The member from A———," said Mrs. Felton, "why that is your friend Tagfoot Waddle, is it not?"

"Yes—and I am a little surprised at his breaking out in this way: he was a dull scholar in college, I remember."

"Tagfoot Waddle!" exclaimed Catharine, "you are joking! there can't be such a name!"

"Indeed there can," replied her brother, "and he may be thankful he had not got the whole."

"The whole! I hope there is no more to it?"

"Yes there was—the original name was Bunting—old Waddle Bunting of Philadelphia: uncle to the young member, I visited him several times, on my return from the south. He was the oddest being, I believe that ever lived."

"Well, I don't understand now," said Catharine "how Tagfoot came to be harnessed to all this euphonious set of names?"

"Money, Kate: money does every thing, you know. Old Bunting was rich as a Jew—and he left to his sister's eldest son, the pretty sum of $20,000, on condition of his changing the very decent name of John Russell, to the very indecent one of Tagfoot Waddle."

"Twenty thousand dollars!" exclaimed Catharine, indignantly, "and could he yield to a temptation so paltry—and make himself ridiculous for life!—And how does he look? though you need not tell me;—I know how Tagfoot Waddle must look;—Tagfoot Waddle!" repeated Catharine over and over; and the more she repeated it, the more unaccountable it appeared, that any person of common sense should have required the assumption of such a name, and doubly so, that any body could be found willing to take it.

"I ought to tell you, Kate," said Mr. Felton, "that Waddle had a motive beyond money, for exposing himself to so much ridicule. His mother and sisters are placed in comfortable circumstances by his means, and his younger brother is at Cambridge."

"But I thought you said he was at college with you."

"Yes, he was. His uncle paid his college expenses—but his widowed mother was quite poor. Another thing—whatever people may think, he is not in much danger from their ridicule. They would be daring, indeed, who would insult John Russell,—Tagfoot though he be—and you see he is making a figure in the House, in spite of his name."

"Yes," replied Catharine, musingly, "and how did you say he looked? red haired, I guess: since he has such a fiery temper—and eyes that look every way, as if they would say—'Does any body dare to insult Tagfoot Waddle, member from A——!'"

"It is a pity to spoil such a picture," said Mr. Felton, "so I will not contradict you."

"And you?"

"I never beheld him," replied Mrs. Felton. And Catharine could not persuade her brother to enlighten her any farther.

* * * * *

A month after this conversation, Mr. Felton, with his wife and sister, were pacing the deck of a steamboat which was bound for Portland. The sky was as blue as the smooth wave, and the air bracing and cool.

A gentleman who stood near the companion-way, looked towards them, and Mr. Felton immediately went to him.

"Who is that?" said Mrs. Felton, "My husband seems to know him very well—they are shaking hands!—I can't imagine who it is.

"But I can," said Catharine, laughing and blushing, for she at once saw it was the incognito of the gallery.

Mr. Felton now came towards them, and introduced his companion. "Mr. Smith—an old friend of mine."

"Smith," thought Mrs. Felton, "I wonder if he is one of the Exeter Smiths?"

"Smith!" thought Catharine, "what a name!"

And they both curtseyed and smiled, as sweetly as if his name had not been Smith.

Mr. Smith seemed pleased to recognize the intelligent face of Miss Felton, and alluded to their meeting in the gallery, thence the transition was easy to many subjects they had discussed at that time, and Catharine thought he had lost none of his powers of making himself agreeable.

"Do you go on to Portland?"

"No," answered she, hesitatingly.

It was but a short time, however, before she told him, without any hesitation, that they were to stop in York harbour; go on board Captain Croft's vessel, the schooner Mary Ann; that Captain Croft was a particular friend of their's; and that then and there, they were to visit Dom-Daniel's cavern in the depth of the ocean."

"How! what do you mean?"

"I wish we may make it out a more romantic expedition, than I fear we shall. Capt. Croft has a diving-bell on board, with which he is exploring the wreck of sunken glories, in the shape of white wax, bales of duck, and other gems of the ocean; and Mrs. Felton and myself intend to find out the latest sleeve-patterns for sea-fairies, and leave our cards at some of the country seats and coral groves, one hears of. This is at least a perfectly safe curiosity—there is not the slightest danger to be apprehended, if Captain Croft tells us; or my sister and myself were both too arrant cowards to tempt our destiny in this way."

Mr. Felton approached them, and asked Mr. Smith if he stopped at Portsmouth.

"If you had asked me that question half-an hour ago," he replied, "I should have said yes: now I have a great inclination to say no."

"Then Miss Felton has enlightened you, as to our projected tour? I wish you would join our party."

"That will I, with the greatest pleasure," answered Mr. Smith—and it was all settled. Mrs. Felton looked extremely pleased: Mrs. Felton smiled mischievously at Catharine; and Catharine herself, though she was very glad of so pleasant an addition to their party, felt rather uncomfortable. She was not quite at ease with Mr. Smith. Very foolish of her, to be sure; but some how or other, he had struck her imagination. Her imagination was always playing truant. This Mr. Smith, with his ugly face—but his face was no longer ugly;—and Catharine remembered, how she had laughed at a lady of her acquaintance, for asserting that Mr. ——— neither stammered nor squinted, though he was notoriously given to both practices. People do change so on acquaintance. She listened to Mr. Smith, who was talking with Mr. Felton and another gentleman, on some political subject, and she was proud of the good sense he showed, and the energy and strength with which he defended his opinions. There was nothing ornamented or laborious in his manner of speaking, but it was manly and forcible, and Catharine was proud of him. Already her face flushed with satisfaction. She had begun to identify his success with her own happiness. The symptoms were alarming. Thank fortune! his name is not Tagfoot Waddle. Smith, though a very common name, was bearable. There were James and Horace Smith, of England—names to be proud of. It might be refined into Smythe. It might be worse.

"Why is that flag hung out?" she asked.

"It is a signal, I believe, to Captain Croft," replied Mr. Smith; "do you not see his vessel off there to the left?"

"Yes, I do—it is but a little way off—shall we go alongside, as the sailors say?"

"Oh, no; that vessel is more than two miles off; the captain of the boat will send us there."

"Is it possible it is so far off? and it looks so near!"

As Catharine spoke, a boat manned by eight rowers, shot up to the side of the steam-boat, and Captain Croft stepped on deck. Introductions—apologies—compliments, followed—baggage lowered, and in five minutes the boat was bounding over the water like a spirit.

The exhilirating motion of a swift boat, contrasted with the monotonous, rolling, half-sickening one of the vessel they had been in, was delightful—and when they found themselves at the side of Captain Croft's vessel, Catharine could hardly believe it possible that they had come two miles.

"Welcome, ladies, to the good schooner Mary Ann," said Captain Croft, when they reached the deck, crowded with men, bales of wet duck and machinery, and the masts hung with thousands of yards of duck, drying in the sun; while twenty men were actively employed in unfolding and drying the remainder.

"Not exactly in a fit condition for ladies, to be sure, but she makes her own apology. Now let me give you some refreshment; and then I propose that you improve this fine afternoon, to make your descent. I have been down myself twice to-day, and the water is perfectly quiet: the ground swell above, to be sure, but you don't feel that after you are a fathom or two below."

"Then why not go immediately?" said Mr. Felton, who had drank a glass of wine, and was always prompt; "I see no need of delay."

"None in the world. We are not sure of to-morrow—and even to-day—the wind may rise, in which case you could not go down."

"Why?" said Catharine, "is it dangerous?"

"No—not dangerous—but you would find it unpleasant, if the water is agitated. It is perfectly still now."

Captain Croft gave some orders to the men who stood at the other end of the ship, and in a few moments the diving-bell slid out from the deck, and stood over the water, about three feet above the surface.

"Who shall go first?" was the question.

"Why not all go together?"

"Oh, that is not possible. Only two can go at a time, besides the bell-man, who directs the machine. The seat will hold but three."

"Will you go first, Catharine?" asked Mr. Felton.

"Ye——s," said Catharine, with a shudder at the thought of it—"there is no danger you say?"

"Not the least in the world. You see those cords from above, where the men are, which go into the bell? those are the signal ropes; and the man inside will direct the motion, up or down, one way or the other, by pulling them. So you see the machine is perfectly manageable."

"And suppose a shark walks in?"

"Oh, you must take your chance. If you will go to shark's domains, you must expect him to call upon you."

Mr. Smith asked Catharine if she would accept his escort, and Catharine was very willing to accept it.

"Take a glass of wine," said Mrs. Felton. But Catharine had grown very brave, and said it was quite unnecessary. She was equal to it.

Captain Croft told her she had better tie a handkerchief about her head. "The compression of the air, when you first go down, is unpleasant; it is like water poured into your ears."

Catharine recollected her escort; and she thought she should prefer the unpleasant sensation of which Captain Croft spoke, to the unpleasant consciousness of her own appearance, with her head bound up as if it was broken: and she declined. A small boat was now lowered, and Catharine was handed into it. It passed round to the bell—under it—then the bell was lowered a little. Mr. Smith held his hand for her to step on, and she sprang into the seat. The man followed and Mr. Smith. They were all in their places, and the boat floated out from beneath.

The signal was given, and the men above cheered long and loudly. The water pressed up into the bell, till it nearly touched their feet, and the air became hot as a furnace. Catharine closed her eyes. There was a rushing in at her ears, like the sound of many waters, and then a sensation of something tight round her head like an iron band. She had no idea of time, till she felt herself supported by her companion, and heard him say anxiously,

"Are you faint, Miss Felton?'

"Not at all, now," she answered; and she started at the strange sound of her own voice.

"How far down are we?" said Mr. Smith to the bellman.

"Six—ten—about eighty feet, sir."

"And the bell is still——"

"Catharine looked at her companion's face. It was deadly pale.

"You are faint, surely!"

"Not in the least," replied Mr. Smith, casting his eye towards the lights at the top of the bell; "it is the reflection of the green water—you, too, look very pale."

Through these lights Catharine could see the fish float quietly by—and below them, on the bottom, lay a large shining flounder as motionless and aristocratical as might be.

"Poets do not tell the truth after all, said Mr. Smith; "where are the 'purple mullet and gold fish,' and 'the sea-flower with leaves of blue?' alas! alas!"

"Shall I move the bell, ma'am?" asked the man.

"Why?"

"Only to show the facility with which it can be managed," replied Mr. Smith. "Raise it a little."

The man pulled one of the ropes, and the bell rose.

"Now to the right."

"Now to the left."

And the obedient machine moved in the directions indicated.

"Now let us be perfectly still," said Catharine, "I want to feel that we are really under the 'deep, deep sea.'"

There was silence. Her companion held her hand, and a quick pressure of it, showed that he understood the feeling that subdued her. Catharine was glad, very glad, that she could associate with this impression of the sublime, that one sympathy with one, in whom she felt a great and increasing interest. Altogether the feeling was worth all the trouble of gaining it. It is so seldom that one has the opportunity of feeling really sublime. At length Mr. Smith broke the silence, by asking the man how long it would be practicable to stay.

"There is air for one, an hour and a half," he replied—"for three, half an hour, of course."

"Then our time must be nearly expired."

"Within five minutes," said the man, taking out his watch. "Shall I sign to rise?"

As he spoke, a grating loud sound, like that of some heavy body falling across the top of the bell, startled them all.

"What can it be? how it shook us!"

The man hesitated—looked anxiously out of the bull's eye, and then said,

"It is the cable chain! how the confounded thing has got out here, I can't guess—but here 'tis, that's plain. I'll sign to rise, if you like."

"By all means!"

But the signal was not obeyed. It was repeated.

"I've made it twice, sir."

"What is the matter! what shall we do?" cried Catharine, in great alarm.

"Be calm—be quiet," said Mr. Smith, holding her firmly with one arm, while with the other, he clasped a large iron hook which hung from the side of the machine. "What is the reason they don't answer you, do you think?"

"The d—d thing has got afoul of the bell, and they can't move us," replied the man, in evident and painful anxiety.

"And the air will last but a short time longer," said Mr. Smith.

"Oh, what can we do! what can we do!" exclaimed Catharine, in an agony of fear, which she vainly tried to control.

"I shall dive! and if I get up, I'll send you word," said the bell man; and suiting the action the word, he was out of sight in a moment.—

Here then they were—exposed to almost inevi-able death. Catharine looked at her companion, ut she could not tell what were his emotions;
is face was nearly hidden by the thick vapor hat rolled up to the top of the bell. She began o feel a sense of suffocation, and she breathed ardly and painfully, as if every breath would e her last. Then the thought of all she left bove, and in her own green, sunny home, came rer her—and the terrible death she must die!—
was too dreadful. She tried to speak, but she ould not utter a word. Her companion at ngth broke silence.

"If he has got safely up, we shall very soon
e relieved—if you can be calm."

Catharine was quieted by the resolute tone of er companion, and she found she could breathe od even speak.

"Is there any danger but he will get up? I ought he could not help rising—shall not we o, go the same way if we are not relieved soon?"

"I hope very much he will reach the surface safety—'

"And you fear—?

"I fear—that he may hit against the vessel.
or that reason, I would not expose you to such chance if it is possible to escape it. But you re very calm—you bear it nobly!"

The air was now almost exhausted. Cathane heard Mr Smith say. 'I dare not wait loner, let me bind this handkerchief round your m and fasten it to my own—and now hold your reath!'—he put one arm round her waist—— he bell jarred.

"Thank God! we are rising! exclaimed both
e sufferers at once, as a quick grating sound owed that the chain was removed, and the ell rose rapid to the surface. It was but a inute, and the cheer of the men above came o their ears:

"A Lady in the Bell! yeo! cheerily!" sung e hoarse voices of the sailors, and no band of usic ever approached the sounds, in more heanly beauty. A moment more, and the fresh air the upper world rushed in. They were safe.
The revulsion of feeling, was too much for e exhausted Catharine, and she fainted as she as lifted into the boat.

When she came to her senses, the first object e saw was the bell-man lying on the deck; his ad bound with a handkerchief stained with ood:—and the next was her companion in danr and safety anxiously bending over her. A ousand thoughts rushed through her brain in instant. But for him she must certainly have ed.—She would have fainted, but for his coure—or she would have followed the bell-man in e impatient fear of delay: his courage—his mposure had saved her life; and with a feel-g of over-powering gratitude, she clasped his nds, and thanked him, as well as her gushing ars would let her.

'Do not thank me,' he replied smiling, and t as if he sympathized in her enthusiasm. 'I uld have done nothing, but for your own calm-ss and energy—and the efforts of this brave low here.'

"Yes,' said Mr. Felton 'we could not imagine y you did not come up—the men felt the signals, and had put on more purchase, but of course had no idea of the entanglement, when what should appear above water, but this glorious fellow—his head broke—blood pouring out and he ready to drop with exhaustion,—however he wouldn't faint, till he had got out 'Cable chain—over bell!' and then he sank away in an instant. Hadn't it been for that you were gone,
I can tell you;—my dear, give Kate some of that wine. Well, Waddle, you've had a taste of the brine! I fancy you'll not be in a hurry to go again!'

"Mr. Smith!" was all that Catharine could utter.—He answered her look of astonishment.

"I believe your brother did not intend the de-nouement to happen quite so soon—however he must thank himself. And now, since it has happened, he will perhaps explain to me, as well as to you, why he wished me to drop my own name for the one I have so patiently borne. I have been quite passive under it, so far, but will now resume my lawful cognomen of Waddle."

As he spoke he drew himself up with so much dignity that Catharine did not laugh. Somehow or other, she did not feel at all in a laughing mood. And so—this man—the incognito of the gallery—the companion of her danger—'the member from A—' this man—who, with all his want of beauty, grace, manner,—any thing that she could have thought captivating,—had interested her more than any man she had ever seen;
—this man, was Tagfoot Waddle!—What could be done? he never would change it again.' Alas!
she had no rich uncles, like old Bunting, to tempt him back to his old name!—Oh, if it were his old name!—or even Smith refined into Smythe—but Waddle! Tagfoot! what could be done! what could be done!'

She looked up at Mr. Felton. He was smiling: so was Mrs. Felton; and with such mischievous and expressive smiles, that Catharine could only blush to the tips of her fingers, and fix her eyes on the green water. She envied the placid wave, which contrasted so strongly with her own tempest tost mind. Once more she turned over in her thoughts the possibility of being 'Mrs. Tagfoot Waddle,' and this time she glanced at Mr. Tagfoot Waddle. He stood a little apart from the others, and an expression of gravity, almost of melancholy, rested on his peculiar features. It touched Catharine to the heart. How sad it must be, to bear such a name!
to bear it too alone! Probably he would never wish, would never dare to ask anybody to share it with him. She wondered if he ever would.
She began to fear he would not. After all,
'what's in a name?' And Catharine was thinking how much 'experience' had done towards changing some of her opinions, when Mr. Felton spoke, and she started, for she thought her ears had deceived her. No: she had heard very plainly, as was evident from the response. Mr.
Felton had said:

"Did you bring Mrs. Waddle with you to Boston?' And he had replied, that Mrs. Waddle's health was indifferent, and the care of her children detained her,——' Then there was a
Mrs. Tagfoot Waddle! and a number of little Waddles!'

Extrordinary Murder.

A trial took place very recently in the Grand Duchy of Hesse Cassel, in Germany, which excited a very strong sensation throughout the whole continent. The history of the case is as follows:

Two young travellers, in the course of a tour which they were making into one of the provinces of the above duchy, visited a Benedictine monastery which is situate on a very high mountain, and from the beauty of scenery, had been much frequented by tourists. In returning down from the convent, the stranger saw, lying under a beech tree, the dead body of a man, with a cord doubled round his neck, and they instantly ran back to the convent and gave information of the fact to the monks. The prior immediately despatched a messenger to the proper officers, who lost no time in hastening to the spot. It is mentioned in the account that according to the custom in Germany, the legal officer was accompanied by two medical men. Upon an examination of the body, they found that it was that of a highly distinguished count, Count Uregg, who lived in the neighborhood, and whose ancient castle could be seen from the mountain where the monastery was situated. The question now was, how the count met his death, and, as the circumstances in which he was found justified the suspicion that he lost his life by violent means, the officers instituted an immediate inquiry. An inquest was accordingly held, and the jury, who relied on the evidence of the medical witnesses, brought in a verdict to the effect that the deceased must have been murdered.

The history of the catastrophe was this: The Count Uregg lived in his castle, where his ancestors had resided before him, in splendor and comparative happiness. About the period when he had attained his fifteenth year, there came into the neighborhood to live a military gentleman and his family. The name of the stranger was Conord Essor, and having the habits of a gentleman, he became acquainted with the count, and was hospitably received by him. An intimacy sprung up between the count and Essor's family, and the result was that the former offered his hand to Miss Essor, then a beautiful girl. The count was so determined on the marriage, that he was ready to secure the young lady for his wife on any terms; and he agreed by a settlement, not only to provide an ample fund for his wife in case of his death, but to support the parents in his castle, or, if they disagreed, that he should give them an ample allowance for supporting them in a suitable manner. For some time the family lived very happily together, but about two years after the marriage, the villagers began to remark that a very rich landlord, who resided a short distance from the castle, and whose name was Antoine Osterfeld, came every Sunday to see M. Essor.—The real truth was that Osterfeld paid clandestine attention to the Countess, and he was encouraged by the parents, and particularly Mrs. Essor, in his immoral project. Such was the nature of the evidence obtained by the law officers in their early inquiries; and having ascertained thus much, they thought it essential at once to proceed to the castle and make inquiries. They examined the Countess.

At this period, it is proper to state, that the Count had left his castle some months before for a short time; that he had charged his wife with criminality, and imputed both to her father and mother a privity of her guilt; he moreover obtained a legal prohibition for preventing Osterfeld from visiting his residence. The mother of the Countess was examined, as were also her father and the servants, and the nature of the evidence was such as to authorize the officers to place those parties in custody, on the accusation of being accessories to the murder.

Whilst in prison a young woman, who happened to be a prisoner also, in an adjoining apartment to that where the Countess and Osterfeld were placed, overheard their conversation, and she communicated the substance of it to the officers.

A variety of witnesses were afterwards forthcoming who spoke to the utterance of various expressions on the part of the Countess her mother, and Essor, which confirmed the suspicion they had a hand in the murder.

The countess was, therefore, submitted to a fresh examination, when the President of the Court conducted the interrogatories. The acuteness and address which he displayed, were two much for her, and she confessed that Osterfeld had told her that he murdered her husband with the assistance of her father and mother; but in the most solemn manner, she declared that she was convinced that neither of her parents had any thing to do with the crime. At this juncture Osterfeld was brought in and confronted with the Countess.

He first attempted to make a denial, but he at last confessed that he and Essor, with Essor's wife, all were parties to the murder. Osterfeld proposed a mild way of getting rid of the Count, but Essor would not listen to this, and said he had injuries of his own to avenge. He then stated that he was the person who dragged the Count from his horse, assisted by Mr. Essor, and when the Count was down he held his mouth while Essor perpetrated the murder!—(We refrain from giving the account of this act in detail, as the death of the unfortunate victim was effected in a manner which showed a great anatomical skill.)—It was Essor who put the cord about the victim's neck.

The whole were found guilty. Essor died in prison before the final trial. The other prisoners were sentenced as follows:—

Osterfeld imprisoned for life in the house of correction but in the mean time he is at liberty to prove that he was not the principal.

Juliah Essor the mother-in-law of the victim, four years of hard labor, after which she must give security that she will be forthcoming whenever required by the government.

Amelia Uregg, three years and a similar penalty.

The three prisoners were further obliged to pay the whole expenses of the prosecution.

One sign of mediocrity of sense, is to be always talking stories.—La Bruyer.

THE INTEMPERATE.

"Come along," said James Harwood to his wife, who, burdened with two children, followed in his steps. Her heart was full, and she made no reply.

"Well, be sullen if you choose, but make haste you shall, or I will leave you in the woods."

Then, as if vexed because his ill humor failed to irritate its object, he added in a higher tone—

"Put down that boy. Have not I told you twenty times, that you could get along faster if you had but one to carry? He can walk as well as I can."

"He is sick," said his mother; feel how his head throbs. Pray take him in your arms."

"I tell you, Jane Harwood, once for all, that you are spoiling the child by your foolishness. He is no more sick than I am. You are only trying to make him lazy. Get down I tell you, and walk," addressing the languid boy.

He would have proceeded to enforce obedience, but the report of a gun arrested his attention. He entered a thicket, to discover whence it proceeded, and the weary and sad heartened mother sat down upon the grass. Bitter were her reflections during that interval of rest among the wilds of Ohio. The pleasant New England village from which she had just emigrated, and the peaceful home of her birth, rose up to her view—where, but a few years before, she had given her hand to one whose unkindness now strewed it with thorns. By constant and endearing attentions, he had won her youthful love, and the two first years of their union promised happiness. Both were industrious and affectionate, and the smiles of their infant in his evening sports or slumbers, more than repaid the labours of the day.

But a change became visible. The husband grew inattentive to his business, and indifferent to his fireside. He permitted debts to accumulate, in spite of the economy of his wife, and became morose and offended at her remonstrances. She strove to hide, even from her own heart, the vice that was gaining the ascendancy over him, and redoubled her exertions to render his home agreeable. But too frequently her efforts were of no avail, or contemptously rejected. The death of her beloved mother, and the birth of a second infant, convinced her that neither in sorrow nor sickness could she expect sympathy from him, to whom she had given her heart, in the simple faith of confiding affection. They became miserably poor, and the cause was evident to every observer. In this distress a letter was received from a brother, who had been for several years a resident in Ohio, mentioning that he was induced to remove farther westward and offering them the use of a tenement which his family would leave vacant, and a small portion of cleared land, until they might be able to become purchasers.

Poor Jane listened to this proposal with gratitude. She thought she saw in it the salvation of her husband. She believed that if he were divided from his intemperate companions, he would return to his early habits of industry and virtue. The trial of leaving native and endeared scenes, from which she would have once shrunk, seemed as nothing in comparison with the prospect of his reformation and returning happiness. Yet when all their few effects were converted into the wagon and horse which were to convey them to a far land, and the scant and humble necessaries which were to sustain them on their way thither; when she took leave of her brother and sisters, with their households; when she shook hands with the friends she had loved from her cradle, and remembered that it might be for the last time; and when the hills that encircled her native village faded into the faint, blue outline of the horizon, there came over her such a desolation of spirit, such a foreboding of evil, as she had never before experienced. She blamed herself for these feelings, and repressed their indulgence.

The journey was slow and toilsome. The autumnal rains and the state of the roads were against them. The few utensils and comforts which they carried with them were gradually abstracted and sold. The object of this traffic could not be doubted. The effects were but too visible in his conduct. She reasoned,—she endeavoured to persuade him to a different course. But anger was the only result. When he was not too far stupified to comprehend her remarks, his deportment was exceedingly overbearing and arbitrary. He felt that she had no friend to protect her from insolence, and was entirely in his own power; and she was compelled to realize that it was a power without generosity, and that there is no tyranny so perfect as that of a capricious and an alienated husband.

As they approached the close of their distressing journey, the roads became worse, and their horse utterly failed. He had been but scantily provided for, as the intemperance of his owner had taxed and impoverished every thing for its own support. Jane wept as she looked on the dying animal, and remembered his laborious and ill-repaid services.

"What shall I do with the brute," exclaimed his master, "he has died in such an out-of-the-way place, that I cannot even find one to buy his skin."

Under the shelter of their miserably broken wagon, they passed another night, and early in the morning pursued their way on foot. Of their slender stores, a few morsels of bread were all that remained. But James had about his person a bottle, which he no longer made a secret of using. At every application of it to his lips, his temper seemed to acquire new violence. They were within a few miles of the termination of their journey, and their directions had been very clear and precise. But his mind became so bewildered and perverse, that he persisted in choosing by-paths of underwood and tangled weeds, under the pretence of seeking a shorter rout. This increased and prolonged their fatigue; but no entreaty of his wearied wife was regarded. The little boy of four years old whose constitution had been feeble from his infancy, became so feverish and distressed, as to be unable to proceed. The mother, after in vain soliciting aid and compassion from her husband, took him in her arms, while the youngest, whom she had previously carried, and who was unable to walk, clung to her shoulders. Thus burdened, her progress was tedious and painful. Still she was enabled to go on: for the strength that nerves a mother's arm, toiling for her sick child, is from GOD. She even endeavored to press on more rapidly than usual, fearing that if she fell behind her husband would tear the sufferer from her arms, in some paroxysm of his savage intemperance.

Their road during the day, though approaching the small settlement were they were to reside, lay through a solitary part of the country. The children were faint and hungry; and as the exhausted mother sat upon the grass, trying to nurse her infant, she drew from her bosom the last piece of bread, and held it to the parched lips of the feeble child. But he turned away his head, and with a scarcely audible moan, asked for water. Feelingly might she sympathize in the distress of the poor outcast from the tent of Abraham, who laid her famished son among the shrubs, and sat down a good way off, saying, "Let me not see the death of the child." But this Christian mother, was not in the desert, nor in despair. She looked upward to HIM, who is the refuge of the forsaken and the comforter of those whose spirits are cast down.

The sun was drawing toward the west, as the voice of James Harwood was heard issuing from the forest, attended by another man with a gun and some birds at his girdle.

"Wife, will you get up now, and come along? —We are not a mile from home. Here is John Williams, who went from our part of the country, and says he is our next-door neighbour."

Jane received this hearty welcome with a thankful spirit and rose to accompany them. The kind neighbour took the sick boy in his arms, saying—

"Harwood, take the baby from your wife; we do not let our women bear all the burdens here in Ohio."

James was ashamed to refuse, and reached his hands towards the child. But accustomed to neglect or unkindness, it hid its face, crying in the maternal bosom.

"You see how it is. She makes the children so cross, that I never have any comfort of them. She chooses to carry them herself, and always will have her own way."

"You have come to a new settled country, friends," said John Williams; but it is a good country to get a living in. Crops of corn and wheat are such as you never saw in New England. Our cattle live in clover, and the cows give us cream instead of milk. There is plenty of game to employ our leisure, and venison and wild turkey do not come amiss now and then on a farmer's table. Here is a short cut I can show you; though there is a fence or two to climb. James Harwood, I shall like to talk with you about old times and old friends down east. Why dont you help your wife over the fence with her baby?"

"So I would, but she is so sulky. She has not spoke a word to me all day. I always say let such folks take care of themselves till their mad fit is over."

A cluster of log cabins now met their view through an opening in the forest. They were pleasantly situated in the midst of an area of cultivated land. A fine river, surmounted by a rustic bridge of the trunks of trees, cast a sparkling line through the deep, unchanged autumnal verdure.

"Here we live," said their guide, "a hard-working, contented people. This is your house which has no smoke curling up fron the chimney. It may not be quite so genteel as some you have left behind in the old States, but it is about as good as any in the neighbourhood. I'll go and call my wife to welcome you; right glad will she be to see you, for she sets great store by folks from New England."

The inside of a log cabin, to those not habituated to it, presents put a cheerless aspect. The eye needs time to accustom itself to the rude walls and floors, the absence of glass windows, and doors loosely hung upon leather hinges. The exhausted woman entered and sank down with her babe. There was no chair to receive her. In a corner of the room stood a rough board table, and a low frame resembling a beadstead. Other furniture there was none. Glad kind voices of her own sex, recalled her from her stupor. Three or four matrons and several blooming young faces, welcomed her with smiles.—The warmth of reception in a new colony, and the substantial services by which it is manifested, put to shame the ceremonious and heartless professions, which in a more artificial state of society, are dignified with the name of friendship.

As if by magic, what had seemed almost a prison, assumed a different aspect, under the ministry of active benevolence. A cheerful flame rose from the ample fireplace; several chairs and a bench for the children appeared; a bed with comfortable coverings concealed the shapelessness of the bedstead, and viands to which they had long been strangers were heaped upon the table. An old lady held the sick boy tenderly in her arms, who seemed to revive as he saw his mother's face brighten, and the infant, after a draught of fresh milk, fell into a sweet and profound slumber. One by one, the neighbours departed, that the wearied ones might have an opportunity of repose. John Williams, who was the last to bid good by, lingered a moment as he closed the door, and said—

"Friend Harwood, here is a fine, gentle cow feeding at your door; and for old acquaintance sake, you and your family are welcome to the use of her for the present, or until you can make out better."

When they were left alone, Jane poured out her gratitude to her Almighty Protector in a flood of joyful tears. Kindness to which she had recently been a stranger, fell as a balm of Gilead upon her wounded spirit.

"Husband," she exclaimed in the fulness of her heart, "we may yet be happy."

He answered not, and she perceived that he heard not. He had thrown himself upon the bed, and in a deep and stupid sleep was dispelling the fumes of intoxication.

gers. The difficulty of procuring ardent spirits in this small and isolated community, promised to be the means of establishing their peace. The mother busied herself in making their humble tenement neat and comfortable, while her husband, as if ambitious to earn in a new residence, the reputation he had lost in the old, labored dilligently to assist his neighbors in gathering in their harvest, receiving his payment in such articles as were needed for the subsistence of his household. Jane continually gave thanks in her prayers for this great blessing; and the hope she permitted herself to indulge of his permanent reformation, imparted unwonted cheerfulness to her brow and demeanor. The invalid boy seemed also to gather healing from his mother's smiles, for so great was her power over him, since sickness had rendered his dependence complete, that his comfort, and even his countenance, were a faithful reflection of her own. Perceiving the degree of her influence, she endeavored to use it, as every religious parent should, for his spiritual benefit. She supplicated that the pencil which was to write upon his soul, might be guided from above. She spoke to him in the tenderest manner of his Father in Heaven, and of his will respecting little children. She pointed out His goodness in the daily gifts that sustain life; in the glorious sun as it came forth rejoicing in the east; in the gently falling rain; the frail plant, and the dews that nourish it. He loved even the storm and the lofty thunder, because they came from God. She repeated to him passages of scripture, with which her memory was stored, and sang hymns, until she perceived that if he was in pain, he complained not, if he might but hear her voice. She made him acquainted with the life of the compassionate Redeemer, and how he called young children to his arms, though the disciples forbade them. And it seemed as if a voice from heaven urged her never to desist from cherishing this tender and deep rooted piety, because like the flower of grass, he must soon fade away. Yet, though it was evident that the seeds of disease were in his system, his health at intervals seemed to be improving, and the little household, partook, for a little time, the blessings of tranquility and content.

But let none flatter himself that the dominion of vice is suddenly or easily broken. It may seem to relax its grasp, and to slumber, but the victim who has long wore its chain, if he would utterly escape, and triumph at last, must do so in the strength of Omnipotence. This James Harwood never sought. He had begun to experience that prostration of spirits which attends the abstraction of a habitual stimulant. His resolution to recover his lost character was not proof against this physical inconvenience. He determined at all hazards to gratify his depraved appetite. He laid his plans deliberately, and with the pretext of making some arrangements about the wagon, which had been left broken on the road, departed from his home. His stay was protracted beyond the appointed limit, and at his return, his sin was written on his brow, in characters not to be mistaken. That he had also brought with him some hoard of intoxicating poison, to which to resort, there remained no room to doubt. Day after day did his shrinking household witness the alterations of causless anger and brutal tyranny. To lay waste the comfort of his wife, seemed to be his prominent object. By constant contradiction and misconstruction, he strove to distress her, and then visited her sensibilities upon her as sins. Had she been more obtuse by nature, or more indifferent to his welfare, she might with greater ease have borne the cross. But her youth was nurtured in tenderness, and education had refined her sensibilities, both of pleasure and of pain. She could not forget the love he had once manifested for her, nor prevent the chilling contrast from filling her with anguish. She could not resign the hope that the being who had early evinced correct feelings and noble principles of action, might yet be won back to that virtue which had rendered him worthy of her affections. Still, this hope deferred was sickness and sorrow to the heart. She found the necessity of deriving consolation, and the power of endurance wholly from above. The tender invitation by mouth of a prophet, was as a balm to her wounded soul,—"as a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, and as a wife of youth, when thou wast refused, have I called thee, saith thy God."

So faithful was she in the discharge of the difficult duties that devolved upon her—so careful not to irritate her husband by reproach or gloom—that to a casual observer she might have appeared to be confirming the doctrine of the ancient philosopher, that happiness is in exact proportion to virtue. Had he asserted that virtue is the source of all that happiness which depends upon ourselves, none could have controverted his position. But, to a woman, a wife, a mother, how small is the portion of independent happiness! She has woven the tendrils of her heart around many props. Each revolving year renders their support more necessary. They cannot waver, or warp, or break, but she must tremble and bleed.

There was but one modification of her husband's persecution which the fullest measure of her piety could not enable her to bear unmoved. This was unkindness to her feeble and suffering boy. It was at first commenced as the surest mode of distressing her. It opened a direct avenue to her heart strings. What began in perverseness seemed to end in hatred, as evil habits sometimes create perverted principles.—The wasted and wild eyed invalid shrank from his father's glance and footstep as from the approach of a foe. More than once had he taken him from the little bed which maternal care had provided for him, and forced him to go forth in the cold of the winter storm.

"I mean to harden him, said he. All the neighbours know that you make such a fool of him that he will never be able to get a living. For my part, I wish I had never been called to the trial of supporting a useless boy, who pretends to be sick only that he may be coaxed by a silly mother."

On such occasions, it was in vain that the mother attempted to protect her child. She might neither shelter him in her bosom, nor control the frantic violence of the father. Harshness, and the agitation of fear, deepened a disease which else might have yielded. The timid boy, in terror of his natural protector, withered away like a blighted flower. It was of no avail that friends remonstrated with the unfeeling parent, or that hoary headed men warned him solemnly of his sins. Intemperance had destroyed his respect for man and his fear for God.

Spring at length emerged from the shades of that heavy and bitter winter. But its smile brought no gladness to the declining child. Consumption fed upon its vitals, and his nights were restless and full of pain.

"Mother, I wish I could smell the violets that grew upon the green bank by our old dear home."

"It is too early for violets my child. But the grass is beautifully green around us, and the birds sing sweetly, as if their hearts were full of praise."

"In my dreams last night I saw the clear waters of the brook that ran by the bottom of my little garden. I wish I could taste them once more. And I heard such music, too, as used to come from that white church among the trees, were every Sunday the happy people meet to worship GOD."

The mother saw that the hectic fever had been long increasing, and knew there was such an unearthly brightness in his eye, that she feared his intellect wandered. She seated herself on his low bed, and bent over him to sooth and compose him. He lay silent for some time.

"Do you think my father will come?"

Dreading the agonizing agitation which in his paroxysms of coughing and pain he evinced at the sound of his father's well known footstep, she answered—

"I think not, love. You had better try to sleep."

"Mother, I wish he would come. I do not feel afraid now. Perhaps he would let me lay my cheek to his once more, as he used to do when I was a babe in my grandmother's arms. I should be glad to say good-by to him, before I go to my SAVIOUR."

Gazing intently in his face, she saw the work of the destroyer, in lines too strong to be mistaken.

"My son—my dear son—say LORD JESUS receive my spirit."

"Mother," he replied, with a sweet smile upon his gastly features, "he is ready. I desire to go to HIM. Hold the baby to me, that I may kiss her. That is all. Now sing to me, and, oh! wrap me close in your arms, for I shiver with cold."

He clung, with a death grasp, to that bosom which had long been his sole earthly refuge

"Sing louder, dear mother, a little louder, I cannot hear you."

A tremulous tone, as if from a broken harp, rose above her grief, to comfort the dying child. One sigh of icy breath was upon her cheek, as she joined it to his—one shudder—and all was over. She held the body long in her arms, as if fondly hoping to warm and revivify it with her breath. Then she stretched it upon its bed, and kneeling beside it, hid her face in that grief which none but mothers feel. It was a deep and sacred solitude, alone with the dead. Nothing save the soft breathings of the sleeping babe fell upon that solmen pause. Then the silence was broken by a wail of piercing agony. It ceased, and a voice arose, a voice of supplication, for strength to endure, as "seeing HIM who is invisible?" Faith closed what was begun in weakness. It became a prayer of thanksgiving to HIM who had released the dove-like spirit from the prison house of pain, that it might taste the peace and mingle in the melody of HEAVEN.

She arose from the orison, and bent calmly over the dead. The thin, placid features wore a smile, as when he had spoken of JESUS. She composed the shining locks around the pure forehead, and gazed long on what was to her so beautiful. Tears had vanished from her eyes, and in their stead was an expression almost sublime, as of one who had given an angel back to GOD.

The father entered carelessly. She pointed to the pallid, immovable brow,—

"See, he suffers no longer."

He drew near and gazed on the dead with surprise and sadness. A few natural tears forced their way, and fell on the face of the first-born who was once his pride. The memories of that moment were bitter. He spoke tenderly to the emaciated mother; and she, who a short time before was raised above the sway of grief, wept like an infant as those few affectionate tones touched the sealed fountains of other years.—Neighbors and friends visited them, desirous to console their sorrow, and attend them when they committed the body to the earth. There was a shady and secluded spot, which they had consecrated by the burial of their few dead. Thither that whole little colony were gathered, and seated on the springing grass, listened to the holy, healing words of the inspired volume. It was read by the oldest man in the colony, who had himself often mourned. As he bent reverently over the sacred page, there was that on his brow which seemed to say "this has been my comfort in affliction." Silver hairs thinly covered his temples, and his low voice was modulated by feeling, as he read of the frailty of man withering like the flower of grass, before it groweth up; and of HIS majesty in whose sight "a thousand years are as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night." He selected from the words of the COMPASSIONATE ONE, who "gathereth the lambs with his arm, carrieth them in his bosom;" who, pointing out an example of the humility of little children, said, "Except ye become as one of these, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of Heaven," and who calleth all the weary laden to come unto him, that he may give them rest. The scene called forth sympathy, even from manly bosoms. The mother, worn with watching and weariness, bowed her head down to the clay that concealed her child. And it was observed with gratitude by that friendly group, that the husband supported her in his arms, and mingled his tears with hers.

He returned from the funeral in much mental distress. His sins were brought to remembrance and reflection was misery. For many nights sleep was disturbed by visions of his neglected boy. Sometimes he imagined that he heard him coughing from his low bed, and felt constrained to go to him, in a strange disposition of kindness, but his limbs were unable to obey the dictates of his will. Then he would see him pointing with a thin dead hand to the dark grave, or beckoning him to follow to the unseen world. Conscience haunted him with terrors, and many prayers from pious hearts arose that he might now be led to repentance. The venerable man who had read the bible at the funeral of his boy, exhorted him to yield to the warning voice from above, and to "break off his sins by righteousness, and in his iniquities by turning unto the LORD."

There was a change in his habits and conversation, and his friends trusted it would be permanent. She who, above all others, was interested in the result, spared no exertion to win him back to the way of truth, and sooth his heart into peace with itself, and obedience to his MAKER. Yet was she doomed to witness the full force of grief and of remorse upon intemperance, only to see them utterly overthrown at last. The reviving virtue, with whose indications she had solaced herself and even gave thanks that her beloved son had not died in vain, was transient as the morning dew. Habits of industry, which had begun to spring up, proved themselves to be without root. The dead, and his cruelty to the dead, were alike forgotten. Disaffection to the chastened being, who against hope still hoped for his salvation, resumed its dominion. The friends who had alternately reproved and encouraged him, were convinced that their efforts had been of no avail. Intemperance, "like the strong man armed," took possession of a soul that lifted no cry for aid to the HOLY SPIRIT, and girded on no weapon to resist the destroyer.

Summer passed away, and the anniversary of their arrival at the colony returned. It was to Jane Harwood a period of sad and solemn retrospection. The joys of other days, and the sorrows of maturity, passed in review before her, and while she wept, she questioned her heart what had been its gain from a Father's discipline, or whether it had sustained that greatest of all losses—the loss of its affections.

She was alone at this season of self communion. The absence of her husband had become more frequent and protracted. A storm, which feelingly reminded her of those which had often beat upon them when homeless and weary travellers, had been raging for nearly two days. To his cause she imputed the unusually long stay of her husband. Through the third night of his absence she lay sleepless, listening to his footsteps. Sometimes she fancied she heard shouts of laughter, for the mood in which he returned from his revels was various. But it was only the shriek of the tempest. Then she thought some ebulition of his frenzied anger rang in her ears. It was the roar of the hoarse wind through the forest. All night long she listened to those sounds, and hushed and sang to her affrighted babe. Unrefreshed, she arose and resumed her morning labors.

Suddenly her eyes were attracted by a group of neighbors, coming up from the river. A dark and terrible foreboding oppressed her. She hastened out to meet them. Coming towards her house was a female friend, agitated and fearful, who, passing her arm around her, would have spoken.

"Oh! you come to bring me evil tidings; I pray you let me know the worst."

The object was, indeed, to prepare her mind for a fearful calamity. The body of her husband had been found drowned, as was supposed, during the darkness of the preceding night, in attempting to cross the bridge of logs, which had been partially broken by the swollen waters. Utter prostration of spirit came over the desolate mourner. Her energies were broken, and her heart withered. She had sustained the privation of poverty and emigration, and the burdens of unceasing labor and unrequited care, without murmuring. She had laid her first-born in the grave with resignation, for faith had heard her SAVIOUR saying, "Suffer the little child to come unto me." She had seen him, in whom her heart's young affections were garnered up, become a persecutor and injurer, a prey to vice the most distructive. Yet she had borne up under all. One hope remained with her as an "anchor of the soul"—the hope that he might yet repent and be reclaimed. She had persevered in her complicated and self-denying duties with that charity which beareth all things,—believeth all things,—endureth all things. But now he had died in his sin. The deadly leprosy which had stolen over his heart, could no more be "purged by sacrifice or offering for ever." She knew that not a single prayer for mercy had preceded the soul on its passage to the HIGH JUDGE'S bar. There were bitter dregs in this grief, which she had never before wrung out.

Again the sad hearted community assembled in their humble cemetery. A funeral in an infant colony awakens sympathies of an almost exclusive character. It is as if a large family suffered. To bear along the corpse of a strong man, through the fields which he had sown, and to cover motionless in the grave that arm which trusted to have reaped the ripening harvest, awakens a thrill deep and startling in the breast of those who had wrought by his side during the burden and heat of the day—To lay the mother on her pillow of clay, whose last struggle with life was, perchance, to resign the hope of one more brief visit to the land of her fathers,—whose heart's last pulsation might have been a prayer that her children might return and grow up in the shadow of a school house and the church of GOD, is a grief in which none, save emigrants, may participate. To consign to their narrow, motionless abode both young and old, the infant and him of hoary hairs, without the solmeu knell, the sable train, the hallowed voice of the man of GOD, giving back in the name of his fellow christians, the most precious roses of their pilgrim path, and speaking with divine authority of HIM who is the "resurrection and the life," adds desolation to that weeping with which man goeth downward to the dust.

But with heaviness of an unspoken and peculiar nature was this victim of vice borne from the home that he troubled and laid by the side of his son, to whose tender years he had been an unnatural enemy. There was sorrow among all who stood around his grave, and it bore features of that sorrow which is without hope.

The widowed mourner was not able to raise her head from the bed when the bloated remains of her unfortunate husband were committed to the earth. Long and severe sickness ensued, and in her convalescenec a letter was received from her brother, inviting her and her child to an asylum under his roof, and appointing a time to come and conduct them on their homeward journey.

With her little daughter, the sole remnant of her wrecked heart's wealth, she returned to her kindred. It was with emotions of deep and painful gratitude, that she bade farewell to the inhabitants of that infant settlement, whose kindness, through all her adversities, had never failed. And when they remembered the example of uniform patience and piety which she had exhibited, and the saint-like manner in which she had sustained her burdens, and cherished their sympathies, they felt as if a tutelary spirit had departed from among them.

In the home of her brother, she educated her daughter in industry, and that contentment which virtue teaches. Restored to those friends with whom the morning of life had passed, she shared with humble cheerfulness the comforts that earth had yet in store for her; but in the cherished sadness of her perpetual widowhood, in the bursting sighs of her nightly orison, might be traced a sacred and deeprooted sorrow—the memory of her erring husband, and the miseries of unreclaimed intemperance.

Written for the Casket.

LOVE,

(As exemplified in the influence of woman.)

Oh! how the dullest heart is stirred,
As that word melts upon the ear,
That gentle and delightful word,
Our happiest hours have made so dear.

'Tis nature's blessed beacon-light,
That burns with soft and steady ray,
Leading the world's lone wanderers right,
When life's cold tempests cloud their way.

Its power sways e'en our satchel'd years,*
Ere the young men can reason why;
Joined with a thousand hopes and fears,
That make the school-boy smile or sigh.

Before he's learn'd the name to spell,
Love has been busy in his breast,
Awaken'd by some childish belle,
Whose witcheries will not let him rest.

The object of his bashful choice,
To whom he is afraid to speak,
Or, if he ventures—with faint voice,
And downcast glance, and glowing cheek.

Too often will her thrilling eye,
Steal on his lesson, with a look
That makes him bid the task good-bye,
Wondering what can ail the book.

And when he rises to his teens,
What spurns his studies and his plays?
Nerves him, among the roughest scenes?
The hope of some girl's whispered praise.

Yes, woman's white hand rules the world;
That beauteous sceptre all obey;
The soul's strong pinions are unfurl'd,
Wheree'er it points to glory's way.

The sailor, on the midnight deck,
When death is ankle-deep in gore,
'Mid the fierce noise and blazing wreck,
Thinks of a fond pale face ashore.

The soldier, moving to the field,
That few, perhaps, may never leave;
Where his most anxious thought reveal'd,
'Twould be for her he left to grieve.

The statesman, in his mightiest speech,
On which a nation's weal may rest,
Thinks of the time when it will reach
The home some female form has blest.

The poet, who has breathed a song
Whose echo centuries will repeat,
Amid the earth's admiring throng,
Deems woman's tearful mood most sweet.

Thus through every grade of life,
From the proudest to the hum'blest place,
From study's calm to battle's strife,
Her influence leaves a lasting trace.

With her sweet memory are allied
Our loveliest hopes from youth to age,
Her smile has been the dearest pride
Of mortals high on history's page.

Each glorious prompting of the mind,
Each hallow'd impulse of the heart,
All that's ennob'ling and refined,
With woman's image have a part.

'Tis felt to blend with every aim
Ambition's grand excitement wakes;
And dearest is that quiet fame,
That from her lip its softness takes.

Her presence, like a moonlight calm,
A tranquil brightness round us throws;
Life owes to her its purest charm,
Through every rough change to its close.

* Byron is said to have felt the tender passion at the age of seven. The experience of others, less susceptible, might confirm a similar circumstance.

LINES

Written for a Lady's Album, under an Engraving of the Rising Sun.

Thy beams, oh, Sun of Righteousness! hath power
To quicken life, and bid all moral darkness flee:
A healing balm they waft on wings of love,
To heal the moral sickness of the soul.
Thy rays spread joy and peace on all around,
And genial influence to the opening bud impart;
They brighten as they lengthen—and,
As they brighten, cherish, and sustain
The tender scion of a pious heart.
E'en decomposed, they please the eye of faith,
And give, in rainbow hues, unchanging signs
Of God's unchanging love to fallen man.
In mid-day splendour, soon thou wilt appear,
Clad in the bright effulgence of our God!

The Miseries of Artificial Teeth.

Every one has, it is said, one's misfortune, a favorite grievance, which grows to a head, withdrawing the attention from other evils, and carrying off the discontents of the system,—a sort of healthy disease, if I may so express it. So Ætna and Hecla have been called safety-valves of the earth, great pimples, which every now and then relieve our venerable mother from a too great heat of the system. My pimple, or safety-valve, has been my teeth, or rather, my want of teeth; true, I have had what some may think greater misfortunes; I have lost money—much more than was convenient; have lost friends also; and, perhaps, I may say, consequently, I have lost an eye, and three fingers on the sword-hand by the cut of a sabre. Some people would call these greater misfortunes. Bah! They did not hinder me from eating, talking, and laughing, as usual; but when I lost my teeth my invaluable incisores and molaires, and, by the rigid laws of society, was obliged to supply their place with false ones, then, indeed and for the first time, I felt what is meant by the troubles of life, and such like lugubre phrases;—then, when an embargo was laid on my mouth, and I could not eat, talk, or laugh as I had been used to do, my fortitude was shaken, and I felt that man is, indeed, born to trouble. But I believe it is usual, in a piece of autobiography, for the reader to be introduced, with more or less of form, to the writer. Briefly then, to my intimates, and at the Club generally, I am Jack Webster merely,—to the rest of the world, my name and addition are Major Webster of the —— Regiment of the line; pretty well known, I believe, as a sub in the Peninsular War, a Captain at Waterloo, and, since peace, a Major,—though peace itself has been war to the Major, as you shall see. More I say not on this head; the intelligent reader will pick up an idea of my character, as he will surely sympathize with my misfortunes, in the course of the following narrative. No one, as I have said, knew less of pain and grief than I did before I lost my teeth, those "inestimable instruments of mastication, utterance, and beauty," as they are styled in the affiches of advertising dentists. Since then I am certainly, in some sort, an altered man. How far I am excusable, from the circumstances of the case, I now proceed to show:

About five years ago, (I am now five and forty, or thereabout,) I first perceived little dusky specks between my front teeth, and shortly after on the occasion of a sharp but temporary bout of illness, felt a tenderness about my gums, and found that my teeth, like those of a portcullis, had a tendency to drop,—this I mentioned to my medical man, who, after examining them closely, told me, with all the cold-blooded precision which they affect on these occasions, that he thought it more than probable that I should "not be able to save them!"—Not save them! Heaven and earth! the idea of being toothless had never seriously, and to its full extent, occurred to me for a moment. This my Mephistophiles of a doctor well knew, and stood grinning at my consternation, much like his prototype in the inimitable designs of Retzsch, the twenty-third of the series, I think it is. However, his prediction was true; out they all came,—not all at one time, however,—and only in the upper jaw; but the front teeth in this all deserted, on different occasions, in the course of a few weeks. One—the first, a front tooth—I shall never forget it—came out as I was sucking an orange; and not being sufficiently on my guard, went down my throat before I was aware of anything being the matter; I felt it, indeed, rather scrape on my œsophagus as it passed, but thought I had only swallowed a pip, or some such matter: my tongue, however, soon detected the gap that was left, and told me—more gently, certainly, than any other tongue could do—the grievous event that had happened. To be brief, they all followed, one after another; not I mean, down my throat; I was too much on my guard for that; for though teeth are the necessary instruments of digestion, they are not, I believe, very digestible things themselves. But this was only a foretaste of what I was doomed to suffer, as you shall see. When I next saw the doctor, I told him what had happened, which, indeed, it was not possible for me to open my mouth without doing; when he told me, with another Mephistophelian smile, that it was of no great consequence, as I could easily get a new set. This idea was some comfort to me at the moment; unfortunate people catch at straws, and are easily made grateful, for I almost forgave him the display of his own firm white set with which he conveyed the intelligence to me; though it was, I am now sure, at the thought of the unknown misery I was going to endure in the wearing of artificial teeth. Next morning, my mouth muffled up, and squeezed into the corner of my cab, I drove to Mr. ——, the fashionable dentist in —— Street. The case was a clear one; not a peg (or a stump) to hang a doubt upon. I must have "a whole set," or "an under and upper piece," as they are technically called. Such was the decision—disinterested one, no doubt—of the man of teeth. Here I would fain give to the uninitiated reader an idea of the dire and complicated piece of machinery which was proposed to me; but no,—my graphic powers are, I feel, quite unequal to the task. To the inquisitive loiterer through the streets of London, who has ever been drifted by the current of Sydney's Alley and St. Martin's Court, into the neighbourhood of May's Buildings, little explanation will be necessary; and I thing it better to refer those who would have an adequate idea of what sort of "infernal machines" some people carry about with them in their mouths, to this place, which is the market for this kind of ware—the Bezesteen of tooth-drawers. Here, on every hand, are to be seen glass cases filled with all sorts and descriptions of this precious merchandise, "from a single tooth to a full set," grinning insultingly, in all the pride of white and scarlet, on the toothless passenger; but many cannot, or will not, visit the shops of these plebeian tooth-drawers: let them imagine, then, a something which presents to the sight about so much of the teeth and gums as are to be seen when the lips are drawn forcibly back, called in English a "piece or set;" and at Paris somewhat more elegantly "un ratellier." It consists of two parts,—the cadre or frame, and the teeth themselves:

the former is a piece of metal, or of the tusk of the hippopatamus, or of the walrus, made to fit in some degree to the gums, and a part of the roof; to this human teeth are usually rivetted, through sometimes, to save expense, the material of the frame itself is employed. In order to keep this machine from falling out of the mouth, which, from its weight and bulk, is has a strong propensity to do, a stiff spiral wire spring is employed; one of which is attached on each side of the two pieces, and unites them, so that when the teeth are put into their natural posture, the springs being bent back into the hollow of the cheek, force the two pieces against the upper and lower jaws respectively, and keeps the whole apparatus it its place, that is, until something disturbs it, and after all, in a most uncomfortable and precarious state. All this, and much more, I learnt on my first visit to the dentist; quite enough, indeed, to open my eyes to the unfortunate situation in which I was placed. I went home, therefore, in no very jocund mood, pondering over, and balancing the dire alternatives that were before me, no easy matter to decide. On one hand the question was no less than to pass the remainder of my days with a mouth filled with metal plates, spiral springs, and dead men's teeth; on the other, to give up talking, laughing, flirting, in short, the world—retire to some "nook merely monastick," and feed on pottage and batter puddings—"a trim reckoning!" For a whole week I mused and calculated the sacrifices on either side; the scale so nearly balanced that each alternately seemed going down. The world, with a thing nearly as big as a musical snuff-box, in one's mouth (che boccone!) or a hermitage with toothless gums, that was the question. Society, I well knew, by its rigid code, allows no one with any conspicuous personal defects, remediable or not, to join its ranks; and a blotched face, or a broken mouth, would exclude a man from many circles more decidely than doubtful acts, or a broken reputation. This may be very right, at least so far as regards the disqualifying character of personal defects; at any rate, I who had been a strict disciplinarian in this matter, had no right to expect any special indulgence in my own favour. At last the world prevailed; I was only forty, had always lived in society: postponed—not given up matrimony; I felt, too, like a soldier, ashamed of a retreat; and thought with my experience and savoir vivre, under all disadvantage, the last chances of the game were still worth playing for.

The next morning, accordingly, I drove to my dentists's again seated myself with a kind of desperate courage in his vile operating fauteuil, and told him to proceed; in five minutes he was prepared, and at my side, with a large lump of bees-wax in his hand. This he stuffed into my mouth, pressing against the roof and gums, to get, as he said, a form or mould for a model of the locale. No very plesant operation this, a man's hand, and half a pound of bees-wax, for some minutes together, in one's mouth, half-stifled, and hardly able to sestrain an insurrectionary disposition in the stomach, to explode all his wax-work in his face. A detail, however, is impossible of half the annoyance to be endured between the initiative process of "taking the model," and the completion of the work. A week at least elapses; and three or more of these purgatorial sort of operations. But my job was finished, and the engine was jammed between my jaws, with about the same sort of sensation on my part, as I suppose a young horse feels when the breaker's bit is first brought into his mouth. Imagine, ye who never experienced the like,—for I shall never be able to describe it,—what I felt on finding my mouth full of metal plates, strong wire springs, and teeth that ought to have been lying quietly with their original owners in some neighbouring church-yard,—a combination of physical and moral annoyances, that can hardly be equalled, I think, in the class of minor evils, as they are called. From this time I was an altered man; looks, manners, temper, all gave way in some degree, and my spirit was fairly broken in by this vile "bit" in my mouth. My friends all observed an extraordinary change in me; from gay to grave, from talk to taciturnity,—and puzzled themselves mightly about the cause. I had something on my conscience, seemed to be the general opinion. Some crime committed in my youth, remorse for which had at last overtaken me. Some were content to say I was only suffering the usual consequences of early debauchery and hard drinking: I was guiltless in all and every respect; but I said nothing. I had only to open my mouth to clear up my character and explain everything, but I prudently preferred to keep my mouth shut, and suffer in silence. All my attempts to return to my former habitudes, and regain my place in society, were in vain; the difficulties I had to contend with were too much for me; and after struggling with them for a twelvemonth, I gave it up, and made a retreat to a small and tolerate circle of old friends and relations in a provincial city.

I shall here describe a few of the difficulties and annoyances which I have endured, to show the world that I am not the chicken-hearted fellow that some have supposed, or have yielded to slight or imaginary evils. I shall give those instances of my sufferings without any order or connexion, save that in which they shall occur to my memory, and shall add, perhaps, before I conclude, some part of the mass of information which I have gained in the course of my experience in the matter of artificial teeth. The subject is not without its curious points, its arcana. Some are piquant enough, and even border on the horrid; they are also for the most part little known, une lettre close, to the multitude. They can only be known by personal experience, and are seldom communicated; for vanity, a better guard than masonic oaths, keeps the secret. And first, for my personal annoyances. A man's mouth is useful in so many ways, (a woman's certainly not less so,) that to have, as it were, a padlock put on it, and all its functions embargoed, must, it is clear, be no trifling calamity; thus I found, so soon as my mouth was fitted up with the diabolical machinery which I have been describing, that, besides the misery of such a mouthful, I could neither eat nor talk with any degree of ease or security; laughing was quite out of the question, though I confess I had not much disposition to exercise the faculty just at that time. After a short period, however, I thought I would make trial of the efficiency of my new weapons, and make my first essays at the club and in a few morning calls. The results, however, were by no means so encouraging as to induce me to venture on the more ardous field day-of a dinner, or evening society; for though the click of my metalic mouth-piece was perhaps audible only to my watchful ears, yet now and then the spiral springs, which remain curved in the hollow of the cheek, escaped and sprang forward, projecting between my lips like the gold and silver out of the good girl's mouth in the fairy tale, and often resisted all my efforts, with my handkerchief to my mouth, to force it back into its place again. On one of these occasions, my friends seeing me, with my eyes rolling about, and unable to speak, thought I was going to be choked; and one old lady, in her fright, gave me some hard thumps on the back, by way of relieving me. What could I do with half-a-dozen astonished faces turned towards me? Explanation was impossible: I could not utter a world. A hasty and unexplained retreat was the only course that my military or social tactics could suggest; this I effected, and through the doorway too, though I should not have refused the window; and would have given my half-year's pay to have been able to descend through a trap-door in the floor, like the ghost in Hamlet, veiled in blue smoke. On another occasion, while talking with some acquaintances at the door of our club, a sudden inclination to yawn, not prudently resisted, or in time, again threw all my tackle into disorder, and I remained for some time a silent, though not very attentive, listener to a political discussion in which I had been taking an active part. My silence at last, and projecting lips, drew upon me the scrutinizing eyes of my companions; if I had attempted to speak, I should certainly have delivered something much more sterling than is usually depicted in such conversations; but then my secret would infallibly have come out, clattering upon the pavement, like Belphegor, when told that his wife was a-coming. A thought, however, luckly occurred to me—the cholera, which was then rife in the land. Screwing up my face, therefore, as if in great pain, and pressing my hand against my epigastrium, I bobbled off, without looking to the right hand or to the left, as if labouring under an incipient stage of the epidemic. My escape, however, was not yet complete. I was still in the street, and almost certain of meeting some acquaintance, for few men have a greater number. I therefore continued my retreat into the Park, where, thinking myself secure from observation, I relieved my mouth of its burden, and proceeded to re-adjust and replace my teeth according to the directions of my dentist, in such case made and provided,—namely, by placing the springs backward, and then pressing the two pieces together, in the natural position, with the forefinger and thumb of each hand—back it into its place in my mouth again. But all this is not done by an inexperienced hand in a moment; it took me some time, and so absorbed my attention, that I did not observe a group of nurse-maids who had approached the part of the garden where I stood, and who were stilling their little ones, to have a better view of what I was about. At last, as I was cautiously raising my double set of teeth to place it in my mouth—lifting up my eyes in the operation—I beheld half-a-dozen funny faces peeping at me over each other's shoulders, and only waiting that signal to burst into a general laugh. Here no generalship could be of any avail—a retreat, anyhow, was the only thing to be thought of; so, without any more ado, I crammed my teeth into my pocket, and made off as fast as I could, reaching home luckily without meeting any one to speak to. I cannot pretend, however, to detail all, or half of what I suffered in this way. At last I resolved to leave London. Whatever has been connected with our griefs seems a part or a cause of them. I would try country air—the sea air—Madeira—the Cape—anywhere—to escape from my annoyances; and indeed it was necessary to think of getting away, at least for a season, for my acquaintances began to whisper about that there was something not quite right about me. If they had said that all was not right in my head, they would not have been far from the truth. Enfin, I thought of a sea-bathing place in Wales, where, unknown and unquizzed, I might practise on this new mouth-organ of mine at leisure, and prepare myself to return to the world by degrees. I chose Aberistwith, and inquired for a quiet boarding-house. I can't live alone,—that's the devil of it. Nothing to fear here, thought I, when I saw my fellow-boarders: three or four old ladies—fixtures—such as always form the nucleus of these establishments; an East Indian; an old Irish doctor; and a banker, and his wife and daughter, (with his cursed political economy,) from the neighbourhood of Cirencester. But who can conceal any thing from the scrutiny of a regular boarding-house old lady's eye? Before three days were over they had found out my secret, and watched every mouthful I took, with the kind expectation of seeing my teeth tumble into my plate, trying to make me talk for the same benevolent purpose, and inquired, very significantly, if I was ever troubled with the tooth ache? Use, however, had now begun to lessen the piquancy of these and similar annoyances. We soon get accustomed to, and indulgent in our own defects; besides, my tongue and lips were now drilled into better management of the new-comers, over which they stood guard unceasingly,—the tongue especially, who was constantly going his rounds, to feel that all was right, or re-adjust any disorder that had taken place. Still I was then, and for the next two or three years, constantly meeting with accidents and contretems with my borrowed teeth, of which my space will only allow me the brief mention of a few, as echantillons, of the mass of miseries I have endured from this prolific cause.

On one occasion, I recollect being at the opera with some ladies. Hanging over the front of the box for a moment, to see who were in the house, and speaking at the same time, out sprung my unlucky teeth, and fell into the pit. With out any explanation, (what could I say without my teeth?) I hurried down, and though the alley was much crowded, began to search quietly for my lost property. The men standing there supposed at first that I had dropped a glove, or some such matter, and took little notice of me. At last I caught sight of my set of teeth, partly concealed under the shoe of an officer in the Guards. The avidity with which I begged him to move his foot and picked it up excited their notice, and made them think I had found something of value. They began to feel for their snuff-boxes, &c.; and one of them, thinking that he missed his box, followed me into the corridor, and requested to see what I had found. I refused, of course; high words ensued; and a crowd came round to see what was the matter. The affair was awkward enough, and I was completely at a loss what to do. Seeing, however an officer of the police coming up, I took him aside, and showing him the cause of all the hubbub, desired him to inform the gentleman that the property was mine, and of no sort of value to any body but the owner; and of not much to him he might have added. I stood aloof while this explanation was made, and heard him exclaim, "But what is it, then? why can't I see it?.' The man, finding no other way out of the affair, whispered something—the bare fact, I suppose—into his ear, which was immediately followed by a rather indecrous laugh, as it seemed to me; the disposition to which, before I could get out of hearing, was rapidly extending itself among the bystanders.
